It is very clear that "Emoh" is a real album and not just a batch of songs, as Barlow's previous solo efforts have a tendency to be. Barlow keeps the downbeat and beaten-down attitude and lyrics that his fans have become so accustomed to. The fact that the music feels so naked makes the lyrics all the more vulnerable. Barlow could be singing about going to get a hamburger and, with this musical background and his delivery, it would probably sound very depressing. Luckily Barlow doesn't try that idea and keeps his lyrics earnest in the best of ways.

So does this new tact and approach make for an album that rivals Barlow's classic work? In a word, no.

But that is not a fair or complete assessment. Is the album a failure? No. Is it a success? Probably. "Legend" builds into a particularly soaring song, the cover of Ratt's "Round & Round" is really, really, really good (and not ironically) and "If I Could" definitely belongs aside Barlow's best tracks from his career. The album as a whole, however, is simply not dynamic enough to really grab and retain a listener's attention. There aren't any tracks on "Emoh" that stand out as bad, or even sub-par, but there are only a few that stand out as superb tracks. "Emoh" is without a doubt "mood music," the type of thing to put on for a lazy Sunday afternoon, but it doesn't have much to offer outside of its designated setting.

Of course even that isn't quite a fair argument. Barlow may be headed into folksy singer/songwriter territory but he is still an indie-rocker and an artist. Barlow shouldn't feel that he has to make music for everyone; his prior work hasn't been made for everyone and has ranged from being loved by all to loved by a few. "Emoh" is a very successful album given what it set out to accomplish and is due to be loved by a good amount of Barlow's fans. Of course a good amount of Barlow's fans probably will hate it, and a good amount will probably be indifferent to it and Barlow probably won't care what people think at all.

This is definitely unique and original music, which will surely be loved by some of Barlow's old fans while earning him some new fans as well. The album maintains Barlow's core principles, integrity and talent. It's always great to see a respected and loved artist experiment and try out new things, but you wouldn't want Barlow to continue sounding "Emoh" for the rest of his career.

COURTESY MATADOR

Some critics have said that many of the tracks on Barlow's solo debut "Emoh" have a naked, more vulnerable tone.

Actress Mary Lynn Rajskub finds time in fast-paced '24'- hour day

Rajskub, formerly of "The Larry Sanders Show," plays Chloe on "24".

By Maureen Ryan
Chicago Tribune

With its chirping phones, chronic inter-office sniping and dozens of stressed-out, computer-bound workers, "24's" Counter Terrorism Unit sometimes comes across as a high-tech version of the British cubicle comedy "The Office."

Right there in the thick of all the sniping and the technobabble is computer whiz Chloe O'Brian, who's not quite as clueless as "The Office's" David Brent, but then again, she's certainly not overly concerned with buttering up her colleagues.

"Usually when I talk to the press, people are like, 'Chloe is so annoying!'" says Mary Lynn Rajskub, who plays the curt but somehow likable O'Brian on Fox's "24," which now occupies its new 9 p.m. Monday time slot after a four-hour premiere last week.

Rajskub's defense of the unsuave and misunderstood O'Brian is that the tech-savvy O'Brian is way too smart to waste time on fools or brown-nosers (and, like most workplaces, CTU has plenty of both).

"You try to be in her super-genius brain," says Rajskub, laughing.

"A lot of people think that she's so annoying, but she's usually right. And nobody listens to her." Rajskub says of her character, who ended up being arrested at the end of episode four for clandestinely using CTU's computers and satellites to help Jack Bauer (Kiefer Sutherland), who himself is a wanted man himself as episode five begins.

Rajskub, a native of the Detroit suburb of Fenton, Mich., got into performing after a stint in art school, and she says she almost didn't take the job when the "24" gig came up a couple of years ago.

Producers of the show had noticed her in the film "Punch Drunk Love," and wanted her for the role of computer whiz O'Brian. But the first scenes Rajskub read, which had fairly minimal dialogue, didn't do much for her.

But her agent talked Rajskub into going to the audition, where, she says, producers said her role would be beefed up, and she's happy to say, it was. Trouble really struck, however, the first time she tried to reel off the complicated techno-speak that's often found in "24" scripts.

"My very first day, I didn't have that much to do (at first), just two or three lines, and we got it in a couple of takes," Rajskub recalls.

Later that day, however, the lines she was supposed to say in more complicated scenes about data storage "just disappeared from my mind."

"I felt like I was 10 years old, and I broke out in a sweat," Rajskub says. "Kiefer (Sutherland), who plays Bauer, came over later and said, 'Sometimes we don't know what we're saying, we just rush through that stuff.'"

What was difficult this year was adjusting to the fact that her character is so far the only holdover from last season's CTU office staff (Carlos Bernard, who played key staffer Tony Almeida in past seasons, is reportedly returning in episodes that will air starting in February).

"It was hard. And the show has had a lot of the same crew (since it began), so it was tough for them after having worked with all those people for so many years," she notes.

BEHAVIORAL HEALTH NETWORK
HUMAN SERVICES RESIDENTIAL STAFF
Direct care staff needed for all shifts, day, evening, weekend, overnight (asleep/awake), full, part time and relief positions available in Hampshire County and surrounding communities. Assist individuals with developmental disabilities in their homes, day/vocational programs, respite sites or residential programs. A High school diploma or equivalent, accesses to reliable transportation preferred. Experience helpful but not mandatory, on-going training available. Generous benefit package at 30 hours. Salary: $9.00- $9.73/hr
Please send cover letter and resume to:
Attn: Program Directors
Behavioral Health Network,
492 Pleasant St.
Northampton, MA 01060
AA/EOE

Winter wonderland

Some UMass students take a break from their busy schedules during the first week of classes to construct an igloo, now five days in the making. One student, Brian Grab, displayed just how large the creation is. Visitors say most people can stand up straight when inside.

Discover Your LOVER
The Collegian Dating Game
Win A Free Date!
Sign Up Now!
Sign-ups will be held in the Campus Center Concourse TODAY through Thursday Feb. 3rd from 11-2 3 lucky Men and 3 lucky Women will be selected to go on blind dates. Collegian readers will vote online to select who will date whom!
Look in the Arts Section for: The 3 Men on Tuesday, February 8th The 3 women on Wednesday, February 9th
Start voting online Wednesday, February 9th www.dailycollegian.com

THE BOLTWOOD PROJECT™
(35 years of service—and counting!)
A STUDENT / COMMUNITY SERVICE LEARNING PROGRAM
(an RSO and Dept. of Landscape Architecture & Regional Planning sponsored prog.)
REACH OUT—AND BECOME A SPECIAL FRIEND TO PEOPLE WITH SPECIAL NEEDS
Your life will NEVER be the same!
••EARN 1-2 CREDITS ••GAIN VALUABLE EXPERIENCE ••REWARDING, CHALLENGING, and FUN
Spring Semester 2005 — Recruitment Nights
You must attend ONE of these meetings. No exceptions, even if you have participated before!
6:00-8:00 PM (Note: Prompt starting time!!!)
Room 163C of the Campus Center for all meetings •Jan 31 (Mon) •Feb 1 (Tues) and Feb 2 (Wed)
•Assignment notification ONLY Thurs. Feb. 3rd @ Boltwood table CC Concourse
No telephone inquiries. YOU (or a friend) must pick up the notification letter!!!
Volunteer, while earning credit!

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
NOW HIRING
FOR
Special Issues Coordinator & Promotions Manager
Boost your resume,get real business experience, earn cash, and have some fun!
Possibility of receiving internship credits
Now accepting applications. Come to the Campus Center Basement Rm 113 or call 545.3500 and ask for Tiffany.

THE HARP
5 TV's!!! 92" LCD/HD Screen
Irish Pub
Super Bowl Bash!
Free Half Time Buffet!
PBR Bottles $1.50
Honey Brown & Molsen Pints $2.00 / Pitcher $6.50
Amherst's last great neighborhood pub!
163 Sunderland Rd. - N. Amherst
Just north of the apartments
413-548-6900

Physicians prove link between high metabolism and weight loss

By Cheryl Powell
Knight Ridder Newspapers

AKRON, Ohio — You know those people who can eat anything they want and seemingly not gain an ounce?

They probably have their resting metabolic rate to thank.

Resting metabolic rate represents the calories your body needs to maintain vital functions, such as heart rate, breathing and brain function. The higher the number, the more you can eat without packing on the pounds.

Thanks to technology, dietitians are increasingly using hand-held calorimeters that came onto the market several years ago to measure people's resting metabolic rate and develop individualized diet and exercise plans.

"It gives people a more accurate picture of what their calorie needs actually are and how much activity they need to do," said Mary McArthur, community nutrition educator and dietitian at Medina (Ohio) General Hospital.

After all, experts estimate that resting metabolic rate accounts for about 75 percent of all the calories you use each day.

Medina General is among the hospitals offering resting metabolic rate measurements with a machine known as MedGem.

The cost for a measurement varies, depending on where it's done and what services are included. But patients usually pay from $30 to $100 for a measurement and, in some cases, comprehensive nutrition counseling.

To find out their resting metabolic rate using MedGem, people plug their noses and breath through the machine's mouthpiece for five minutes to 10 minutes while they rest.

The machine measures the amount of oxygen consumed, which it uses to determine resting metabolic rate.

To ensure an accurate reading, you must avoid eating, drinking, exercising, caffeine and decongestants for at least four hours before testing.

Once the machine gives a reading, a dietitian uses a formula based on how active you are to determine the total amount of calories used each day.

"In order to lose weight, it all goes back to calories in and calories out," said Maxine Smith, clinical dietitian for Summa Health System in Akron, which uses MedGem.

To lose a pound a week, for example, you need to shed 500 calories a day. Want to lose two pounds a week? Then you need to cut calories by 1,000 a day.

CRASH-DIET WOES

But be warned: nutrition experts say it's difficult to meet nutritional needs if daily calories dip below 1,200.

People who go on crash diets and slash too many calories too soon are ultimately setting themselves up for failure, McArthur said.

When calorie intake dips below the amount needed to maintain vital body functions, survival mode kicks in. Your body adapts and learns to make do with less energy.

Ultimately, your resting metabolic rate drops. And when you quit that hard-to-maintain crash diet, guess what? You'll now gain weight even faster if you return to eating the same foods you did before the diet made your resting metabolic rate lower.

"When you find out what your resting metabolic rate is, I tell people that's a number you should never go below," McArthur said. "You may be working against yourself if you go lower than that number."

ADJUSTING

Another problem: People who lose weight too quickly also tend to lose muscle mass, said Dr. Troy M. Smurawa, a sports medicine physician at Akron Children's Hospital.

"The faster you lose it also means you're going to lose more lean body mass," he said. "If you lose lean mass, your resting metabolic rate will drop and, therefore, your overall metabolic rate will drop."

Joyce Lagios knows firsthand the ups and downs of dieting.

"There isn't one I haven't tried," the Fairlawn woman said.

Nothing seemed to work until last year, she said, when she got involved with a program at Summa geared to make sure women have healthy hearts.

As part of the program, she met with Summa's Smith, who tracked her resting metabolic rate to help her adjust her diet and exercise plans.

"I never knew they could gauge what I should be doing by something like that," she said.

After noticing Lagios' resting metabolic rate dropped while she dieted, Smith recommended she increase her exercise routine from once to three times a week.

Lagios said she's lost 62 pounds in the past year and plans to lose 50 more.

Though it's possible to find formulas on the Internet that use age, weight and height to determine resting metabolic rate, people should beware that these tools are accurate for only about 20 percent of the population, Smith said.

Many factors influence metabolic rate, including age, amount of fat and muscle mass, hormones and genetics, Smith said.

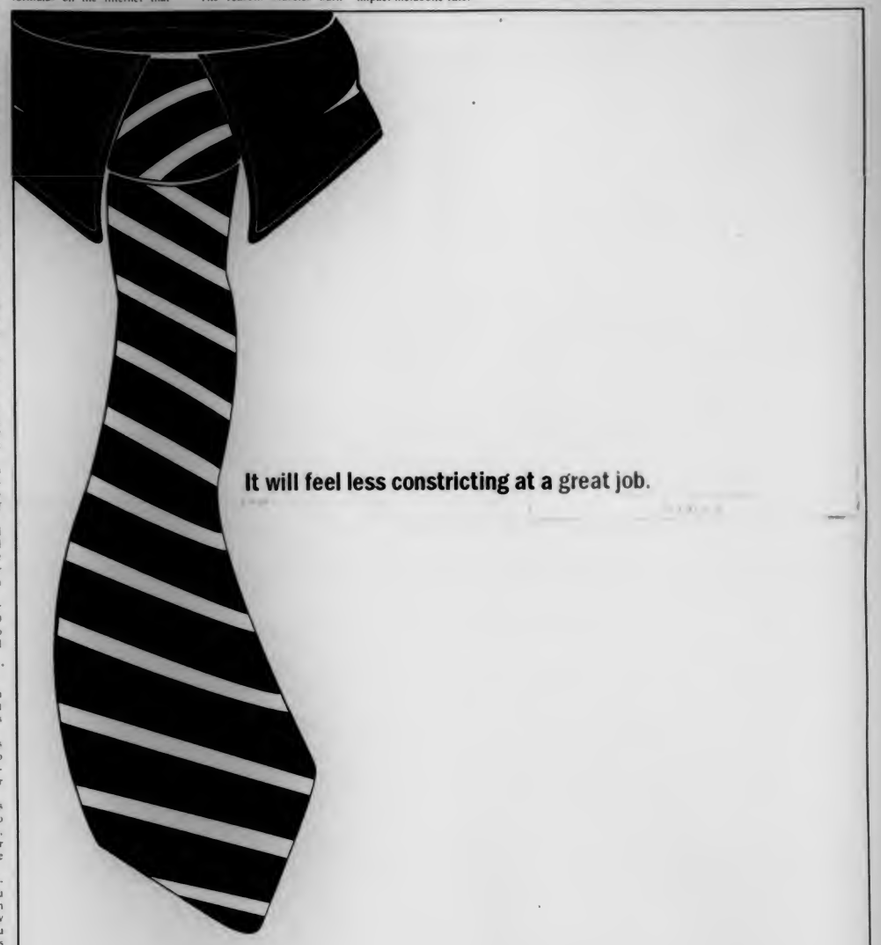
Some things are out of your control. As you age, your metabolism usually slows by about 2 percent per decade. Men tend to have faster metabolisms than women.

But there are some things you can do to boost your resting metabolic rate.

For starters, include strength training exercises that build muscle mass in your weight-loss plans, said Karen Bangert, a personal trainor at the Akron General Lifestyles Health and Wellness Center.

The reason: Muscles burn up more calories than fatty tissue, even when the body is resting.

"Muscle is metabolic tissue," she said. "There is not a whole lot of value to fatty tissue. If you can increase your lean muscle mass and decrease the fatty tissue on your body, you are then going to be able to boost the resting metabolic rate."



Another way to improve your resting metabolic rate is to eat smaller, balanced meals more frequently rather than a couple of big meals, Bangert said.

"In order to make sure we have a good maintenance of resting metabolic rate, we want to make sure people have good food frequency, so they're eating every three hours," she said. "You don't want to go long periods of time without food because this, again, does impact metabolic rate."

KEN COWL/AKRON BEACON JOURNAL

Doctors test a patient's metabolism with MedGem, a machine that measures metabolic rate to determine specific calorie needs.

FORTUNE® 100 BEST COMPANIES TO WORK FOR 2004

At Ernst & Young, the opportunity for growth is enormous. We offer over 7,000 professional development programs – some of the best formal learning programs in the country – because our philosophy is People First. We recognize that our employees are essential to the firm's growth and success. And in order to attract the best talent, we've built an environment that Fortune® magazine has consistently recognized as one of the "100 Best Companies To Work For." So whether you're looking for a place to grow or a great place to work, look for our recruiters on campus. ey.com/us/careers

Audit • Tax • Transaction Advisory Services
ERNST & YOUNG
Quality In Everything We Do

STSTRAVEL.COM
Join America's #1 Student Tour Operator
CANCUN ACAPULCO JAMAICA BAHAMAS FLORIDA
SPRING BREAK 2005
Sell Trips, Earn Cash & Travel Free
1-800-648-4849 www.ststravel.com

Owens has Super practice

OWENS from page 10

its first NFL championship since 1960.

"If T.O. says he's going to play, he's going to play," Eagles linebacker Jeremiah Trotter said Tuesday. "T.O. is going to be just fine. I think T.O. is going to come out and surprise a lot of people."

The Patriots downplayed the possibility of Owens' return.

"We've got to prepare for all the players," coach Bill Belichick said. "We expect everybody to be at their best for this game. That's the only way the ever think about it. We never expect anything less from our opponents."

After a checkup last week in Baltimore, Myerson said that while he's pleased with Owens' recuperation, the operation requires a recovery period of eight to 10 weeks. Myerson added that any attempt to accelerate the rehabilitation process poses the same risk for injury.

But it's telling that to Owens, who insisted on testing his leg during this Super Bowl week.

"We limited what he did, but he did it well, and he did it with the team," Eagles coach Andy Reid said. "He moved around pretty well. I'll have to see how he does before we decide whether he'll play."

The final decision on Owens' status will come down to the player, Reid and the team's medical staff.

"Could the same injury occur? Yes," Reid said. "But he won't damage it any further than he already has."

Terrell Owens runs past Cowboys safety Roy Williams to the endzone on Nov. 15 in Dallas.

It's time to stop all the talk and just let T.O. play football receiver, but in private, if Philly's captain isn't begging Owens to take the field in four days, it will be the biggest Super Bowl overnight since CBS' preparation for Janet Jackson's halftime peepshow.

HOWE from page 10

Besides, what other offensive threat will the Eagles have?

Brian Westbrook won't be a factor. Bill Belichick will do the same number on him as he did to the even-more-dangerous Marshall Faulk just three short years ago.

That makes their two healthiest weapons Todd Pinkston, who is as effective in the middle of the field as Terry Glenn, and Freddie Mitchell, whose bow ties, suspenders, top hats and self-proclaimed "Trohawk" have earned him nothing more than 15 minutes of shameful fame.

When did a receiver who caught as many touchdown passes (two) as Patriots linebacker Mike Vrabel have the right to call out the most punishing defense in the league?

So that leaves Terrell Owens — who three times has caught more balls in one season than Freddie Mitchell has caught in his entire career (90) — to clean up the mess that is the Eagles' offense.

If you don't want to call him noble for playing, call him selfish for trying.

Who knows? Maybe he is doing this for himself. Maybe he isn't looking out for Philadelphia's best interest.

But once again, who cares?

That is who Terrell Owens is. Love him or hate him, that is what makes T.O. the flashy, self-absorbed character who puts his team on the national stage for three hours every week.

He is playing in what could potentially turn out to be a Hall-of-Fame career, and if he wants to jeopardize that, then it's his decision, not the decision of Andy Reid, the fans, Stephen A. Smith or any medical experts who feel like dropping their respective opinions at packed press conferences or the private confines of a training room.

Once again, he has put himself in the spotlight, as the center of attention, all without playing a single down in a month-and-a-half.

It's time for T.O. — and now everyone else — to shut up and let him play.

Jeff Howe is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at JeffHowe@dailycollegian.com.

Jacksonville fights its bad rap

JACKSONVILLE, Fla. — Civic leaders cringed when the Philadelphia Eagles' Lito Sheppard was asked about his hometown of Jacksonville, the site of Sunday's Super Bowl XXXIX.

"There's not much to talk about," he said.

Washington Post sports-writer and ESPN personality Tom Kornheiser went further, devoting a column last week to trashing the city. "How did Jacksonville get the Super Bowl?" he wondered. "What, Tuscaloosa was booked?"

It is that kind of thinking that city leaders and Chamber of Commerce types are hoping to change with this weekend's festivities. For years, they have been working to erase Jacksonville's image as a smelly, redneck, Bible Belt backwater.

Outsiders "think we're all a little bit backward," said Trish McCranie, 39, selling drinks outside a seafood restaurant. "We're going to show them how Jacksonville really is."

The Super Bowl will draw more than 100,000 visitors to the city, including thousands of out-of-town media representatives, and the worldwide television audience could reach 1 billion.

—Associated Press

Atlantic 10 is tight at the top with Bonnies stuck at bottom

ATLANTIC 10 from page 10

RAM TOUGH

After losing eight of their first 12 games, the Rams have been one of he hottest teams in the A-10 since Jan. 8, when they defeated Richmond 79-56. Fordham went on to win three of its next five games with impressive victories over Xavier (Jan. 16, 76-74), Rhode Island (Jan. 22, 63-59), and Temple (Jan. 26, 54-47).

The two losses were against, oddly enough, Temple, who blew the Rams out of the building 77-45 on Jan 22. Their next loss came at the hands of the Massachusetts men's basketball team, who defeated Fordham 76-63, on Jan. 19 at the Mullins Center.

The Rams are looking towards a bright future as their leading scorer, and spark-plug for the season, has been freshman Bryant Dunston who is averaging 14.4 points per game, good for seventh in the league.

FLYING HIGH

Although Fordham had a respectable run during January, no team capitalized on the last month as much as St. Joseph's. The Hawks have won six out of their last eight games en route to a 6-1 record in the A-10.

The bread and butter of St. Joseph's has been the play of sharp-shooting, senior forward, Pat Carroll. Carroll, who was the third option on last year's Elite Eight squad, has emerged as an offensive weapon from beyond the arch. His 54 three-pointers lead the A-10, with George Washington's T.J. Thompson in second with 51. Thompson, however, has played in 18 games while Carroll has participated in 16.

Carroll dominated the stat line last week and was named the A-10 Player of the Week. Over the week Carroll averaged 23 ppg and five rebounds in two games against Penn-sylvania (a 67-59 loss on Jan. 25) and Xavier (a 67-59 victory on Jan. 29).

BUMBLING BONNIES

On the other side of the spectrum, the St. Bonaventure Bonnies have easily had the worst January in the conference. The Bonnies came out of December with its first victory of the year (a 80-66 victory over Alcorn St. on Dec. 29), but went on to lose seven straight, all to A-10 opponents.

The Bonnies have been ranked as one of the top five worst teams in the NCAA by ESPN.com for all but the last week of January. St. Bonaventure jumped up to the sixth worst after a 82-78 double-overtime loss to UMass on Jan. 26.

No Cals Last Call anti-hangover & nutritional drink No Carbs

No Hangover

All-Natural Anti-Hangover & Nutritional Drink

Last Call... a one-of-a-kind Natural beverage is specifically designed to alleviate fatigue and hangover symptoms by replenishing the body with a special formula of vitamins, minerals and herbs.
Last Call... can be enjoyed BEFORE, DURING, OR AFTER consuming alcohol.
Last Call ... Makes a great mixer and comes in two delicious flavors - Mango and Pina Colada

Last Call WORKS!

It is also a great ALL NATURAL alternative to sports and energy drinks

Last Call is available now at:
Liquors 44, Four Season's Liquors, Stoney's Pub, Holyoke Liquor Mart, Pop's Liquors, R&P Liquors and Niedbala's.
Ask for it at your favorite bar and restaurant

Campus Rep Opportunities Available, Call for more Information
Distributed By Baystate Beverage Distributors, Westfield, MA 413-642-0150

Please Drink Responsibly

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

NOW HIRING

WebMaster

The Collegian is looking for someone to maintain its website. If you have any experience with HTML, online advertising or web design apply now!
Freshman and sophomores strongly encouraged to apply

All applicants should call:

(413)-545-3500

Ask For Rich

EXTROVERTS WANTED UMASS AMHERST IS IN SEARCH OF

TOUR GUIDES

1. Lead campus tours for students and families interested in the UMass Amherst Campus.
2. Paid hourly position with a minimum commitment of 5 hours a week including some weekends.
3. Serve as panel speakers, hosts, and tour leaders at on and off campus yield activities such as Open Houses and College Fairs.
4. Conduct informational interviews with prospective students and their families.

UMASS AMHERST

To find out more about the position or to pick up an application visit us at the Campus Center Concourse from January 31st-February 4th. Applications are also available at the Visitors Center. Application deadline is February 4th, 2005

GET FUZZY • By Darby Conley

JEFF, GOFF, & GOAT • By Grant Goforth

VALLEY OF THE SQUIRRELS • By Comrade X

FRANCO THE CLARINETTING NAVY BEAN • By Rebecca Scarborough

CAVEMAN RA • By Robbie's and Heather

QUOTE OF THE DAY

"When lip service to some mysterious deity permits bestiality on Wednesday and absolution on Sunday, cash me out."

— Frank Sinatra

ACROSS
1 Lion's plants
6 Sharp residue
10 Landed
14 Nocturnal raptor-to-be
15 Collection of rules
16 Drawstring
17 Place
18 Concludes
19 Naturalist John
20 Making certain
22 Roses protection
24 Happy song
25 Adolescent
26 Mortarboard attachment
29 Pooped
30 Like Wrigley Field's walls
31 Domesticated
32 Bonkers
35 Why not?
36 Made do
37 Type of skirt
38 Before, before
39 Walking aids
40 Mineral carbonates
41 Fibbed
42 Tangy
43 Declares
46 North Carolina university
47 Capture back
48 Lets off the hook
52 Venetian blind piece
53 Do it or
55 Post-crucifixion depiction
56 Overlook
57 At no time, in poems
58 Boredom
59 ___ a one (none)
60 Powerful blow
61 Made over

DOWN
1 Memorization method
2 "The Virginian" writer Wister
3 Supplicant's request
4 Turns away
5 Famous
6 Allure of perfume
7 Type of jump
8 Annex
9 Harassed
10 Nut that gets covered
11 Classic Preminger film
12 Cake topper
13 To the point
21 Sick
23 Take note of
25 Multiplication word
26 Flooring piece
27 Declare
28 Web location
29 Used the VCR
31 Shadings
32 Temperate
33 Opposed to
34 Part of CD
36 Military snack bars
37 Being in the principal position
39 Irish city
40 Dipper
41 Actor Warren
42 Capp and Capone
43 Fiery felony
44 Diamond of "Night Court"
45 Step
46 TV movie critic
48 On a cruise
49 Sail
50 Needle case
51 Uttered
54 Head of tennis

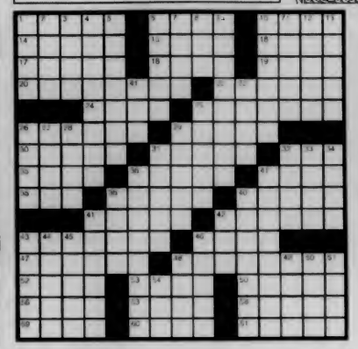
Find today's answers online

www.dailycollegian.com

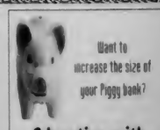
THE HARP

NEW!! Wireless Internet

OCMP & All Credit Cards accepted



Irish Pub



February Special!
$1.50 PBR Bottles; Honey Brown, Molson
$2.00 A pint / $6.50 a pitcher

WED. ·Busted Vaccum
THU. ·Apollo Sunshine
FRI. ·Irish Sesiun
SAT. ·Savoy Shuffle

"Come Party Like You're Irish!"

413-548-6900 www.theharp.net
163 Sunderland Rd. - N. Amherst
Just north of the apartments

Want to increase the size of your Piggy bank?

Aduertise with The Daily Collegian

and watch your profits grow

Contact our advertising dept 545-3500

H·O·R·O·S·C·O·P·E·S

aquarius • Jan. 20-Feb. 18
You need to start acting like you're part of a team.

pisces • Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Try to keep your life from getting any more complicated than it already is.

aries • Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Don't be late to class today. Your professor will give you an ugly frown.

taurus • Apr. 20-May 20
You did a nice job with your hair today. Kudos on the effort.

gemini • May 21-Jun. 21
You are a terrible person for abandoning your friend in a time of need.

cancer • Jun. 22-Jul. 22
You should have worn pants today. Anything would have been nice.

leo • Jul. 23-Aug. 22
This is not a good month for love. Other people are weird.

virgo • Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Perhaps you should keep some things a secret.

libra • Sept. 23-Oct. 22
It you're feeling low, go out and buy yourself a present.

scorpio • Oct. 23-Nov. 21
Don't be perplexed by all the abominable things that have been happening lately.

sagittarius • Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Socks with pom-poms don't last. Remember that for the future.

capricorn • Dec. 22-Jan. 19
You need to write down a list of a few of your favorite things.

$$$ Build your business with our business.

Place your ad here, in The Collegian. $$$

MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN MARKETPLACE

ANNOUNCEMENTS

Beach Club Tanning (413-549-4688): 20% Off any purchase on Tuesday, Feb 8th (Future sessions and packages included) Ask for the "Hockey Special" and help UMass Women's Ice Hockey team travel to Nationals!

APARTMENT FOR RENT

1 bedroom available North Amherst $425 includes heat & electric, bright, clean, washer/dryer in Condo on bus route 1 mile to UMass female preferred Call Liz 508-367-8893

Center of town, 1, 2, 3 bedrooms, hardwood floors. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

Hobart Condos 3 Bedroom, hardwood floors, study area in basement. Cable, telephone (internet access) in all bedrooms and study. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Amherst two bedroom condo on Pelham 575+. Call Paul 413-687-1416

AUTO FOR SALE

1993 Toyota Tercel Coup. Economical, reliable. $1275.00 592-9103

1994 Geo Prism Runs Well 123K Blue book $1450 Asking $1150 - 413-323-7692

1998 Pontiac Grand Prix 66,000K New Tires Excellent Condition $5000.00 256-3756

CHILDCARE

Babysitter 3 year old 6hr afternoon/evenings Amherst 413-256-3048

Early Riser Needed 7:30am to 8:15pm 2 to 4 days/week Occasional afternoon and Evenings. For 5yr old girl. $10.00 an hr. Please call 584-8312 maria.galli@umassmed.edu

EMPLOYMENT

Paid marketing internship Seeking highly motivated marketing/communications major Call Lindsey 800-769-3618

PCA needed in Northampton $10/hr. Reliable car necessary. Laundry, Shopping, Cooking, Cleaning. Please call Linda Gaffney at 586-2029

Prestigious Trail's End Camp- Pennsylvania Summer Camp Guaranteed Experience of a Lifetime; Limited openings for Sports Specialists, Crafts Specialists, Waterfront Counselors (Lake and Pool) and General Counselors; June 19th - August 14th Gain practical experience working with kids. www.trailsendcampjobs.com

Excellent Income! National Capital Funding Group Now Hiring Courthouse Researchers Will train to work from home on your computer. No Experience Necessary Call 1-800-443-7234

EMPLOYMENT

Movie extras, actors, models. Make $100-$300/day No experience required, FT/PT, All looks needed! 1800-340-9449 Ext. 1054

Zeta Outdoor is seeking applications for 2005 Seasonal raft guides. No experience necessary, will train weekends in Feb-May/June. A positive Customer Service attitude and knowledge of outdoor recreation a plus. Application deadline: Feb 9th call 413-339-4312 or see www.Zetaoutdoor.com/jobs.htm EOE

JV Lacrosse Coach Amherst mid-March to early June Playing experience required coaching experience preferred Pd Position Roger Jones 549-1093

Top Boys Sports Camp in Maine! Play & Coach Sports * Have Fun * Make $$$ Camp Counselor Positions Available Summer 2005 Apply Online www.campcedarcrest.com or call 1-800-473-6134

EMPLOYMENT

Companion for elder wanted, weekends and part-time Cheerful and light-hearted a PLUS! $12/hr. 413-268-2051

Drivers & Kitchen Help Wanted. Must be able to work 20hrs A week Apply at DP Dough, Amherst

"Parttending" $430/Day Potential. No Experience Nesc. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

HOUSE FOR RENT

South Deerfield Center on bus route newly renovated 2 bedroom $1000 per month plus utilities and security deposit 413-498-5148

MISCELLANEOUS

Earn $4000, become an egg donor www.reproductivesolutions.com or 413-341-9207

ROOM FOR RENT

Bedroom for rent in spacious house in Leverett Call Brett 413-219-5828

ROOMMATE WANTED

Roommate Wanted Preferably Girl Brandywine Apts. 495.00 a month + utilities Heat & Hotwater included Call Jess at 413-281-8097

Female Pittsfield 1 Room $420.00 Negs. 617-921-7746

SERVICES

Do you know your rights as a student, tenant, worker, and consumer? The Student Legal Services Office can help with your questions. Come to 922 Campus Center or Call 545-1995

Need Just Evacuation and Repatriation Coverage? Check out BETA! $250,000 Evacuation, $25,000 Repatriation COST is $18 for 6 MONTHS! Online enrollment, emailed verification of coverage www.betrus.com

Computer Consultants $20/hr we come to your dorm/house. Certified technicians. Call Kris (413) 253-0215

SERVICES

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth control and Emergency Contraception. Affordable and confidential. STI Screening and Treatment. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9882

TRAVEL

Spring Break 2005 Only 6 weeks left! Lowest Prices Biggest Parties Earn 2 Free Trips Exclusive with Sun Splash Tours www.sunsplashtours.com 1800-426-7710

Bahamas Spring Cruise 5 Days $299! Includes Meals Celebrity Parties! Panama City, Daytona $159! Cancun, Jamaica, Acapulco, Nassau $469! Award Winning Company SpringBreakTravel.com 1-800-678-6386

#1 Spring Break Vacations! Cancun, Jamaica, Acapulco, Bahamas, & Florida! Best Parties, Best Hotels, Best Prices! Limited Space! 1-800-234-7007 www.endlesssummer-sun.com

WANTED

Egg Donors Needed. Help make a couple's dream of becoming parents come true by becoming an egg donor. Very generous compensation and expenses paid. Ages 21-32. Non-smokers only. For more information please visit our website at www.eggmatchdonors.com or contact Christine or Liz at 781-769-6900

Screen/Script writers needed for local Film Company. Fifthsworn@hotmail.com

Snowboard events intern $50/day stipend. For job description email jfriends@deerfield.edu

Collegian Advertising

Reach thousands of readers! Call 545-3500 or stop by the Campus Center Basement for more information.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS WEDNESDAY

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 2005 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Owens soap opera continues

Stop the talk, and let him walk

Jeff Howe

Let him play.

Why not?

If Terrell Owens wants to play in the Super Bowl against doctor's orders to help his team try to win the biggest game the franchise has seen in the last quarter-century, who can even blame him?

And when it really comes down to it, when has Terrell Owens ever not had his way?

He had his way in San Francisco when he chased Steve Mariucci out of town due to a clashing of philosophies that put the team before the almighty power of T.O.

He had his way during his brief vacation in Baltimore when he refused to play for offensive-minded coach Brian Billick.

And he'll have his way now, as he'll risk permanent injury to his sprained right ankle when he takes the field on Sunday night in Jacksonville.

But once again, this is the Super Bowl.

There are no guarantees that he or the Eagles will ever make it back to the biggest sports stage on the entire planet.

Dan Marino knows that. Steve McNair is finding it out and if Peyton Manning could exorcise the demons from his statistically inflated head, he would understand exactly how rare and precious a Super Bowl appearance is.

Owens could turn out to be a hero. Is it likely? Doubtful.

But he could. Just ask Curt Schilling.

No, Schilling didn't have to play in the most violent professional sport in America with a sprained ankle and broken leg, but he did have to navigate his way through, historically, the most clutch lineup in baseball and then shut down the best offense of the year just days after undergoing surgery.

T.O. may just end up being a non-factor, seeing only a handful of plays and running out-routes to stay away from the Patriots' hard-hitting linebackers and safeties.

But in the grand scheme of things, everyone knows how unreliable Philadelphia's wide receivers are, especially Owens.

Donovan McNabb can tell the media he thinks the Eagles — his Eagles — can win without their stud

See HOWE on page 8

Terrell Owens has been making headlines for the last week because of his sprained right ankle and broken leg. He has decided to play in the Super Bowl against the favored Patriots despite the team doctor's advice.

Atlantic 10 tight

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

You can throw all predictions out the window about the Atlantic 10 this year. Every team has played at least six conference games, yet there is only one squad (St. Bonaventure, 1-17, 0-7 A-10), that is mathematically out of the race for a high tournament seed.

St. Joseph's (9-8, 6-1 A-10) leads the East Division, while the Dayton Flyers (12-6, 5-2 A-10) lead the way in the West Division. The Hawks have three teams within three games of them (Temple, Fordham and UMass respectively) and Dayton has two (George Washington and Richmond respectively).

Time to get SIRIUS

On Jan. 21, SIRIUS Satellite Radio agreed to a multiyear partnership with Atlantic 10 schools: University of Rhode Island, Temple University, Saint Joseph's University, and George Washington University. SIRIUS will broadcast selected games throughout the season and the A-10 conference tournament, starting during the 2005-'06 season.

"The Atlantic 10 Conference features key universities in the East," Steve Cohen, SIRIUS Vice President of Sports Program-ming said. "Year after year, Atlantic 10 schools have supplied fans with some of the most exciting college basketball action in the country. We're honored to add these Atlantic 10 teams to our lineup of schools."

SIRIUS currently broadcasting 26 schools, but has affiliation with over 120 schools. SIRIUS is also the only radio service to offer broadcasts from every conference championship, starting on March 15.

See ATLANTIC 10 on page 8

Looking for a repeat

By Mark Long
Associated Press

JACKSONVILLE, Fla. — Mike Vrabel has the football neatly displayed back home in Ohio. He carries the memory with him everywhere.

The New England linebacker caught a touchdown pass late in the fourth quarter that helped the Patriots beat Carolina in the Super Bowl last year. Vrabel also had six tackles, two sacks and a forced fumble — playing the game of his life on sports' biggest stage.

Now he wants a repeat performance.

"If I was lucky enough to go in there and get another one and help us win, then that would top it," Vrabel said Monday.

It could happen. Vrabel has two touchdown catches this season, including one in the regular-season finale against San Francisco.

Although receiver-turned-cornerback Troy Brown gets more attention for playing both ways, Vrabel might still be the team's most versatile player. After all, he makes tackles, covers receivers, rushes quarterbacks and lines up as a tight end in goal-line situations.

"He is very adaptable," coach Bill Belichick said.

A defensive end in college at Ohio State who moved to linebacker in the NFL, Vrabel is making plans for another transition.

He returned to college last summer to complete his degree in exercise physiology. He finished school because he wants to become a coach after his playing days are over.

"It's tough to recruit kids to come play for you and talk to their parents and say, 'I'm going to make sure your son goes to class and I'm going to make sure he graduates' when you don't have a degree yourself," Vrabel said. "It's tough to tell kids to go to class when they're looking at a coach who hasn't graduated."

Vrabel, who began college as a premed student but switched majors because of the demands of football, graduated in June after completing a Biochemistry course.

"I was in there with a bunch of nursing students," he said. "There were like 12 girls and me, which wasn't bad. Don't get me wrong. I didn't have to take a whole lot of notes."

Vrabel said his former classmates still keep in touch, writing letters and watching most of his games. They have high expectations for the Super Bowl, and so does Vrabel.

That's a big change from earlier in his career.

He spent four years as a backup with Pittsburgh because the team had so much depth at linebacker. Stuck behind Jason Gildon, Levon Kirkland, Greg Lloyd and Joey Porter, Vrabel appeared in 51 games with no starts from 1997 to 2000.

But everything changed after he signed with the Pats. Under the direction of Belichick, Vrabel has developed into one of New England's most productive players.

He had a career-high 76 tackles and 5 1/2 sacks this season. He has 279 tackles and 22 1/2 sacks in four years in New England, much more production that he had in four years in Pittsburgh, where he had 43 tackles and seven sacks.

"Mike has been very consistent for us for the last four years," Belichick said. "He does everything well that you want an outside linebacker to do. He's strong. He's physical in the running game. He can rush the passer. He pursues well. He's smart."

Mike Vrabel forced Jake Delhomme to fumble the ball in last year's Super Bowl. He also caught a touchdown pass during the Patriots' victory over the Panthers. Vrabel is looking for a repeat performance this year.

T.O. is making perfect practice

By Paul Newberry
Associated Press

JACKSONVILLE, Fla. — T.O.'s timeout is over.

Brushing aside his doctor's advice and — some might say — common sense, Terrell Owens returned to the practice field Monday, determined to pull off the most improbable play of his career by making it to the Super Bowl.

He ran the required routes. He made the necessary cuts. And — is this a sign of what's to come Sunday against the defending champion New England Patriots? — he caught the passes that were thrown his way.

Not bad for a guy who went down 43 days earlier with a grotesque injury to his right leg, apparently done until next season.

"I will play on Sunday," Owens said Tuesday. "I know the type person I am. I have a lot of faith in my ability. I feel great. I'm proving a lot of people wrong. The sky is the limit for me. There are no limitations."

C'mon, this shouldn't be all that surprising (though maybe it's a bit appalling to any parent who wouldn't dare let their kid go out to play with a skinned-up knee). And it's something Owens promised his teammates moments after he was injured.

"I told the guys in the locker room 'You guys just get us into the Super Bowl and I'll be there,'" he said. "They've done their job. Now it's time to do my job."

Owens' teammates were happy to hear the receiver's plans.

"That's great. He's another piece of the puzzle," defensive tackle Corey Simon said. "He's not the whole puzzle. And if he wasn't out there, he'd be on the sidelines cheering for us, but we're glad to have him."

The greatest showman in football was certainly meant for the grandest stage. The guy who pulled out a Sharpie after a touchdown and gawked at Nicollette Sheridan for a pregame spoof had to at least give it a shot.

"It's always a lift when you can get anyone out there, an added weapon," Eagles quarterback Donovan McNabb said. "He did make some big plays for us. He did an excellent job of coming in and presenting a different type of feel for our passing attack."

Just last week, Dr. Mark Myerson, the surgeon who operated on Owens' right ankle in December, said he would not clear the All-Pro receiver to suit up against the Patriots.

But there he was Monday, in uniform at the University of North Florida. While Owens took part in less than one-third of the team's 30 plays, he got a pass each time he ran a route.

"It's shocking when you see the injury he had and how far he's come," Pro Bowl safety Michael Lewis said.

In his first season with the Eagles after eight years in San Francisco, Owens led Philadelphia with 77 catches for 1,200 yards and 14 TDs.

Then came that horrific December day, when Owens severely sprained his ankle and broke his leg in a game against Dallas.

Myerson inserted two screws in Owens' ankle and a plate on the outside of the ankle three days after he was injured. Owens was told after surgery that he had only an outside chance of returning for the Super Bowl, which was 6 1/2 weeks away at the time. But he rehabbed vigorously, hoping to help Philadelphia win

See OWENS on page 8

Fan goes to extreme for tickets

By Michael Rubinkam
Associated Press

PHILADELPHIA — Kevin P. O'Donoghue is going to the Super Bowl. When he gets back, he'll worry about the house he mortgaged to watch his beloved Eagles.

He's not alone. Some championship-deprived Philadelphians are so desperate to get down to Jacksonville for the big game that they're borrowing against their homes to pay for the tickets.

O'Donoghue, who was 11 the last time his team made it to the Super Bowl, promised himself he'd be there if they ever made it again — no matter what it took.

After the Eagles advanced to their first Super Bowl in 24 years, O'Donoghue told his wife: "I don't care if we have to mortgage our house, I'm going."

She replied, "Wait a minute, maybe that's a good idea."

So O'Donoghue sunk $4,000 on a Super Bowl package that includes round-trip airfare, a four-night hotel stay and one ticket to Sunday's game. To pay for it, he applied for a home-equity line of credit, a way of borrowing money that required him to put up his house as collateral.

"Sometimes the cards are maxed out and you gotta do what you gotta do," said O'Donoghue, 36, an account executive from Glen Mills.

Mortgage bankers in Philadelphia and southern New Jersey say that Eagles fans have been inquiring about refinancing mortgages, or taking out home equity loans or home equity credit lines, to pay for what O'Donoghue calls "the chance of a lifetime."

Eric Reeber, a mortgage banker in Mount Laurel, N.J., said his office has gotten at least a dozen calls from Eagles fans looking for some quick cash. He said two couples have already been approved and were scheduled to close on their loans. He said they were too embarrassed to talk publicly about their borrowing.

"Some people don't care if it costs them $100 more a month," said Reeber, of Northern States Funding Group. "But I'll stand by it, if they want it."

Female gestures honored in short films

ARTS & LIVING, PAGE 6

TODAY: High: 40° Low: 19° | FRIDAY: High: 41° Low: 22° | SATURDAY: High: 43° Low: 18°

DAILY WEATHER FORECAST

Minutemen travel to Northeastern for important Hockey East showdown

SPORTS, PAGE 12

The Daily Collegian

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 2005 NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY • EST. 1890 VOLUME CXV ISSUE 72

Dining services makes Super Bowl bet with UPenn

By Jonathan Vega
Collegian Staff

Ken Toong, the University of Massachusetts food service director, should not be nervous about placing a friendly wager on Sunday's Super Bowl match up. The "destination dynasty" New England Patriots are scheduled to meet the Philadelphia Eagles in Jacksonville, Fla. this Super Bowl Sunday.

Toong's confidence stems from his 2-0 winning record from previous Super Bowl wagers. The UMass tradition of placing friendly bets against rival universities began in 2001 when Toong won his first bet against Washington University in St. Louis and was repeated in 2003 when Toong won a bet against Duke University.

"Really it's all for fun. There is rarely an opportunity to go to the Super Bowl, let alone three times in four years," said Toong.

This year, Toong's friendly wager is against the University of Pennsylvania and Penn State University. If New England wins the Super Bowl, Matt Smith, director of operations of dining services for the University of Pennsylvania and Barry Scerbo, Penn State's food service director, will be ready to send UMass plenty of Philly cheese steak grinders, pork rolls, soft pretzels and tasty cakes.

If that wasn't enough, Penn State's executive chef, Bill Lavelhut is so confident of an Eagle's victory that he is willing to visit UMass and prepare traditional Amish chicken corn chowder, oak lettuce salad with baby greens, venison loin steak and Philadelphia style cheesecake for Toong.

If the Eagles come up with a win, however unlikely, Toong is prepared to send ample quantities of New England staple foods to the Pennsylvania campuses. The baskets will include lobsters, clam chowder, baked beans, brown bread and a Boston cream pie.Furthermore, Willie Sng, the executive chef at UMass is willing to be photographed in an Eagles T-shirt and cap while preparing food for Eagles fans.

Toong hopes this year's Super Bowl festivities show a commitment to student activities at UMass. The UMass food service community is the nation's fifth largest and Toong points out that national rankings are dependent on, "population not revenue." The large student body at UMass presents challenges that Toong has always welcomed.

"[Since Tuesday] we've changed the Philly cheese steaks on the menu, to 'Pats' cheese steaks at all dining commons on campus," explained Toong. Additionally, dining commons on campus will be serving New England clam chowder, baked beans and brown bread from 3 p.m. to 6:30 p.m. on Super Bowl Sunday. Grab 'n' Go grinders and pizza will be available to all students who would rather eat while watching the big game with friends at the dorms.

"When the students eat their food, we want them to have some fun as well. That's really important to us," said Toong. "There will also be door prizes [for students wearing] Pat's gear."

"From our experience most students will come in and leave as soon as possible to watch the game with their friends," said Toong. "We're trying to cater to the students."

According to Toong, since 2001, crowds have increased on Super Bowl Sundays. Toong points out that in years past, "we did something [for the Super Bowl], but it was small. Now we know the crowds and we know what they want."

Four lucky students will also have a chance to win a fully catered party at the Top of the Campus restaurant and lounge. Grand prizes include a large-screen television and four commemorative Super Bowl tribute framed prints.

You can enter the raffle at any dining common or through a link at www.umass.edu/dineingservices/index.php. However, you must have a campus meal plan to be eligible for prizes.

For the record, Toong said his Super Bowl prediction is Patriots 17, Eagles 10.

UMass Dining Services Director Ken Toong has bet the dining services director of Penn State that the New England Patriots will triumph over the Philadelphia Eagles this Sunday.

Morrison may take Speaker position

By Julie O'Donnell
Collegian Staff

The Student Government Association announced big changes are going to be implemented this spring, including possible executive changes and fulfillment of student requests.

Newly appointed Associate Speaker Mark Morrison assumed duties of the Speaker position at the SGA meeting last night, as rumors floated around the Senate that current Speaker Seamus Brennan is planning to submit his resignation.

"Seamus is planning on resigning," Morrison said, "however, he couldn't be here because of an academic commitment."

According to SGA President Eduardo Bustamante, Brennan must submit a resignation in writing in order for the process to be complete, and although the resignation is still speculation, Bustamante expressed his gratitude toward Morrison.

"First of all, thank you Mark," Bustamante said. "This is a thanks in advance. I know that you will [do the job] a million times better."

Morrison was appointed during the last meeting of last year after the SGA met nearly the

See SGA on page 3

Worcester reporter taking heat for allegedly plagiarizing

By Jay Lindsay
Associated Press

BOSTON — The Telegram & Gazette of Worcester called home its New England Patriots beat writer from the Super Bowl in Jacksonville after he allegedly plagiarized parts of his Sunday column from a Sports Illustrated writer.

The newspaper published a correction Wednesday, saying "Substantial portions of a column originally written by Peter King and published Jan. 24 on the Sports Illustrated Web site were printed Jan. 30 in the Sunday Telegram under the byline of Ken Powers."

The newspaper also said that it was conducting a full investigation into the matter.

"We apologize to our readers and to Sports Illustrated," the newspaper said.

Questions arose about the column after a reader tipped off the paper to similarities between Powers' and King's columns. Both columns were about the success of the New England Patriots and Philadelphia Eagles, who play in Sunday's Super Bowl, after both lost their first games of the 2003 season.

Among the questionable passages:

In the second paragraph of his column, Powers wrote, "Each team was 0-1, and each had fallen to 0-1 in rather humiliating fashion. The Patriots had been shut out in Buffalo, 31-0, just four days after releasing very popular defensive captain Lawyer Milloy because he refused to take a substantial pay cut."

King wrote: "Each team was 0-1, and each had fallen to 0-1 in rather humiliating fashion. The Patriots got shut out in Buffalo 31-0, just four days after whacking very popular defensive captain Lawyer Milloy because he wouldn't take a major pay cut."

Another passage in Powers' column referring to ESPN analyst Tom Jackson's comment that Patriots players hated head coach Bill Belichick read: "Whatever has been said since that day about Patriots players just shrugging their shoulders over Jackson's statement is a bunch of bull. Many in the organization were surprised, and Belichick was stunned."

King's column read: Whatever has been said in the intervening time about the New England players just shrugging their shoulders over Jackson's statement is a bunch of bunk. Many in the organization were stunned, and Belichick was really surprised.

Near the end of the column, Powers wrote: "The Patriots will try to pound Corey Dillon. McNabb will move Brian Westbrook everywhere and try to get him to make plays in the open field. But the New England defense is as disciplined as a unit can be. Philly's defense is second in that category.

King wrote: "The Patriots will try to pound Corey Dillon. McNabb will move Brian Westbrook everywhere and try to get him to make plays in the open field. But the New England defense is as disciplined as a unit can be. Philly's defense is second in that category.

A message left at a Millbury listing for Ken Powers with a man who identified himself as Powers' father was not immediately returned. A request for comment to his work e-mail was not immediately returned. A Worcester listing for Kenneth Powers was disconnected.

Efforts to reach King in Jacksonville were unsuccessful. Allison Keane, a Sports Illustrated spokeswoman, said the magazine would not comment, citing the ongoing investigation.

Harry T. Whitin, editor of the Telegram & Gazette, did not immediately return a call from The Associated Press seeking comment.

The Telegram & Gazette, purchased by the New York Times Co. in 2000, is the third-largest daily newspaper in New England.

Sri Lankan pair begs for return of baby

By Dilip Ganguly
Associated Press

KALMUNAI, Sri Lanka — "Give us our baby!" a distraught Sri Lankan mother cried Wednesday after a judge kept her from the 4-month-old boy she says was torn from her arms in Asia's tsunami.

In the disaster zone's most heart-wrenching custody case, a court ordered Jenita Jeyarajah and her husband to undergo a DNA test to prove they are the parents of the child known as "Baby 81," triggering a melee at a hospital that led to the would-be parents' arrests.

The couple had hoped to take custody of the child at Wednesday's hearing, and became inconsolable when told the baby would be put back into hospital care until at least April 20 — the next available date on the court calendar when the judge will hear the DNA results.

Jenita Jeyarajah beat her chest and shouted she couldn't be away from her child that long. Then, accompanied by dozens of relatives and friends, she and her husband, Murugupillai, marched a half-mile to the hospital where the baby has been kept since the Dec. 26 disaster and forced their way into the pediatric ward.

"Here is my baby — look, look!" the 25-year-old woman screamed. "Please give us our baby!" she pleaded before dropping to her knees at the feet of the head nurse. She begged to take the child home.

The couple and two supporters were arrested and briefly held by police, then released and ordered to appear at a hearing on Thursday.

Besides the Jeyarajahs, eight other women have stepped forward to claim the boy, called Baby 81 because he was the 81st admission to the hospital the day the tsunami hit. The Jeyarajahs, however, are the only couple to file a formal custody claim. They say records proving they are the parents of the child were lost in the tsunami.

The couple and the baby will have to travel eight hours to the capital, Colombo, for the DNA test. Results will be available in less than a day.

Harendra de Silva, head of the government's National Child Protection Authority, said the authority was willing to conduct the tests — which could cost as much as $100 — for free. UNICEF has also offered to pay for the test.

In ordering the test Wednesday, Judge M.P. Mohaideen said "thousands of babies have died and maybe hundreds of them are missing. It's only after a DNA test that we can be sure that we are correct."

He said any one else who claims to be the child's parents should report to police and have DNA samples taken. "This is very important in case the DNA test does not match this couple," he said.

The Jeyarajahs say the child's real name is Abilass and he was born Oct. 19. A court ordered the hospital on Jan. 12 to give them temporary custody of the boy until his parentage could be determined, but the hospital refused, arguing he still required medical attention.

At the hospital after Wednesday's ruling, Jenita Jeyarajah, surrounded by her supporters, picked up the crying baby and held him in her arms before a nurse took him away.

Her husband, Murugupillai, threat-

See BABY on page 3

A time to reflect

Students walk by the Old Chapel at noon yesterday while bells rang, observing a moment of silence for the victims of the tsunami.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
113 Campus Center
University of Massachusetts
Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief Peter Fourlas
Managing Editor Mike Marzelli
Business Manager Rich Pacheco
Production Manager Cory Rosenberg
News Editor Meghan Healy
Associate Managing Editor Tiffany Sugalski
Editorial Page Editor Samantha M. Nielsen
Arts & Living Editor Michael Busack
Sports Editor Alyson Zillmann
Features Editor Yousef Munayyer
Photography Editor Alison Edles
Night Editor Erika Lorley
Photo Editor Alex Demosthene
Senior Editor Bob McGovern
Graphics Manager Kristen Weiss
Graphics Assistant Marta Pappas
Design Manager Josh Riggans
Finance Manager Birak Shah
Advertising Coordinator Virginie Frecaut
Human Resources Manager Sandra Marquart
Assistant Business Manager Linda Wallack
Assistant Advertising Manager Josh Greenberg
Assistant Business Manager Nathan Chomsky
Assistant Finance Manager Thomas Hecht
Advertising Production Manager Rachael Bruno
Graphics Assistant Charlie Higgins
Assistant Sports Editor Matthew O'Rourke
Assistant Arts & Living Editor Chris Gazzara
Assistant Night Editor Julie O'Donnell
Assistant Night Editor Dan O'Brien
Assistant Photo Editor Megan Brinster
Assistant Design Editor Jeff Howe

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts academic year. The Collegian is independently financed, advertising is solicited, and it is published in the interest of the students of the University of Massachusetts. The paper began as Alpha Tau Alpha in 1890, and the Collegian Society in 1903, but the Collegian in 1914 and the Massachusetts Collegian 1936. Printed since 1947. The Collegian has won numerous awards, including the Pacemaker, and Pinnacle. Publication days are Monday through Friday during the academic year, except during vacations and exam periods. Publication hours are 8 a.m. and 3 p.m.

Production Crew
On staff today

Night Editor
Michael Busack

Photo Technician
Megan Brinster

Copy Editor
Alyson Zillmann

Production Supervisor
Molly Eggleston

Production Staff
Meliah Natal, Lauren Egavian

policelog

Snowboarders create snow park on garage roof

Wednesday January 26

1:00 a.m. Following a traffic stop at the Southwest Mall, Enos Henry, 24, of Amherst, was arrested for operating a vehicle with a revoked license.

5:55 p.m. A person reported that someone was attempting to sell counterfeit coupons in John Adams Hall.

9:43 p.m. A person reported that a subject urinated outside of McNamara Hall in front of several students. An officer took a statement from the subject.

Thursday January 27

3:45 p.m. A person stated that their vehicle was backed into in the parking lot in front of Worcester Dining Hall.

4:41 p.m. A person reported that their vehicle was broken into in the Campus Center parking garage.

7:38 p.m. A person stated that their parked vehicle was hit by another vehicle in the parking lot across the street from Southwest.

Friday January 28

12:26 a.m. After a report of an intoxicated subject who refused to leave Brown Hall, an officer arrested the subject, who had an active default warrant, Henry O'Neal, 21, of Amherst, was arrested.

11:22 a.m. A person reported their vehicle's rear taillight was smashed out in the parking lot behind the Mullins Center.

Saturday January 29

1:48 a.m. After responding to a report of an accident near the Hagis Mall, an officer noticed the vehicle was stolen. Omyra River, 18, of Springfield, was arrested for receiving a stolen vehicle, operating a motor vehicle under the influence of alcohol, destruction of property, speeding, and reckless operation of a motor vehicle.

9:24 p.m. Following a traffic stop, Zachary McCann, 20, of Dedham, was arrested for, operating a motor vehicle with a suspended license and operating an uninsured motor vehicle.

10:25 p.m. A party detected an odor of marijuana in Baker Hall. A search warrant was issued and executed and Paul Caira, 19, of Waltham was arrested for possession of a class D substance and possession of a class C substance.

Sunday January 30

2:28 a.m. A person reported a door wide open in Pierpont Hall and a marijuana pipe and a bong were in plain view. An officer spoke with the residents and the items were disposed of.

3:27 p.m. A person stated that their vehicle's rear windows were broken in the parking lot across the street from the Hagis Mall.

Monday January 30

4:26 p.m. A person stated that a subject was throwing snowballs at vehicles driving on Massachusetts Avenue.

5:28 p.m. A person stated that snow boarders erected a slope with jumps off of the University Apartments' Garage. The physical plant was contacted to remove the slope and the jumps.

11:25 p.m. A person stated that a fire extinguisher had been stolen from Cashin Hall.

Tuesday February 1

2:20 a.m. Following a traffic stop, Ryan Murray, 19, of Stoughton, was arrested for operating a motor vehicle with a suspended license.

—Compiled by Brendan Heck

Schieffer to temporarily replace Rather

NEW YORK (AP) — Dan Rather will be temporarily replaced with veteran "Face the Nation" host Bob Schieffer when Rather steps down next month as "CBS Evening News" anchor, the network said Wednesday.

Schieffer will serve "for a short transition period" until the broadcast gets a new format, CBS News President Andrew Heyward said.

CBS chief Leslie Moonves said last month that he was probably going to install a multi-anchor format for the "CBS Evening News," which has been a distant third in the ratings behind NBC and ABC.

The Schieffer announcement confirms that new format won't be ready in time for Rather's exit March 9 — the 24th anniversary of when he took over from Walter Cronkite.

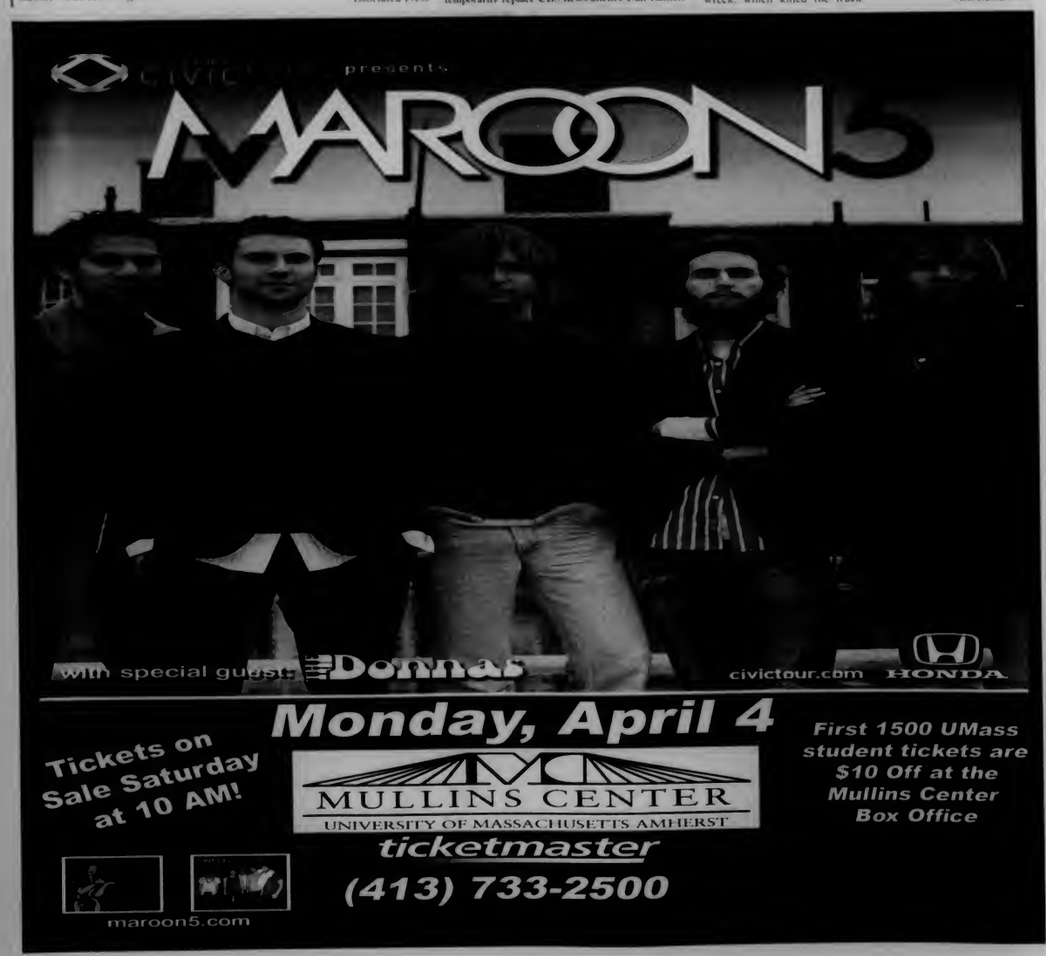
Schieffer, who joined CBS News in 1969 and has been chief Washington correspondent since 1982, will continue with "Face the Nation" during this period. He will anchor the evening news from CBS' New York studio.

-Associated Press

Bob Schieffer from 'Face the Nation' will temporarily replace CBS news anchor Dan Rather.

Bus driver kills four in charter bus crash

ROCHESTER, N.Y. — The driver of a charter bus that swerved off a highway and rammed a parked tractor-trailer, killing four people, was accused Wednesday of lying about the hours he worked in the days before the crash.



Ryan Comfort, 24, insisted he veered off Interstate 390 in rural western New York after striking something on the road, a claim supported by the bus company.

But state police said they didn't recover any object, and think driver fatigue might have contributed to the weekend wreck, which killed the truck driver and three bus passengers.

Another 19 people on the bus, which was chartered by a Canadian women's youth hockey team, were injured. After a morning game in Rochester, players, family and coaches were traveling to a ski resort Saturday when the crash occurred 27 miles south of Rochester.

Comfort was charged with misdemeanor violations of state transportation laws as well as failing to stay in the proper lane moments before the crash. He was ordered held on $25,000 bail.

—Associated Press

SGA is hopeful for changes this spring entire semester without an Associate Speaker. Senators were confident that Brennan would either resign or be impeached and Morrison had a possibility of resuming as speaker.

SGA from page 1

Morrison encouraged the senators to speak more at the meetings and to voice their opinions and ideas frequently.

"We can make the ideals real," he said. "We just have to work hard enough."

He told Senators that this semester is a time to make things happen, and noted that last semester there were not many motions passed that benefited students.

"We only passed like four motions," he said. "We worked hard for six months, all we got back was a bullet list [from the administration]. Lets make [administrators] start doing stuff."

Morrison also spoke about the newly revised picketing code and the Tasers that the University of Massachusetts Police Department recently began training to use.

"This is not about giving police all these non-lethal options. It's about the students being electrocuted. We are not cows, lets not be treated that way," Morrison said.

Executive cabinet member Barak Sared also reiterated how important it is for Senators to act out against the picketing code. As of Feb. 1, the new code stated that violent demonstrations will not be tolerated in any university building. Sared argued that the wording was too vague and using expulsion as a sanction for punishment was not constitutional.

"This is a pattern of militarization [at UMass]," he said. "First Tasers, the hiring extra cops for the Super Bowl and now the picketing code."

He also mentioned that he expects legal action to occur on behalf of the American Civil Liberties Union. Take Back UMass will hold a press conference today about the picketing code at 2:30 p.m. in the Graduate Student Lounge. Representatives from the ACLU will also be present.

Attorney General Craig Goldschmidt and Senator Erin Lemkey wrote a motion on the agenda that passed unanimously to back the ACLU as it will become the plaintiff in a civil suit brought against the university for unconstitutionally implementing the picketing code.

Goldschmidt additionally expressed his anger with the administration and its attempt to be proactive about sporting event celebration, specifically this Sunday's Super Bowl game.

He attempted to meet with members of the Student Activities Office and present a list of alternate ways to celebrate, however, he was denied, and instead shown a list of activities that will take place the week before the Super Bowl.

Megan Brinster/Collegian

Recently appointed Associate Speaker to the SGA, Mark Morrison assumed Speaker duties during last night's meeting.

"The University basically dropped the ball in making a proactive plan," he said. "Why aren't we doing something about this? We want to encourage students to go out and have a good time, be safe and have fun. I went to [the administration] last month and they said that they weren't even sure if the Patriots were going the Super Bowl, but then I found out they hired extra cops for that weekend."

Goldschmidt produced a list of options that might encourage students to celebrate rather than riot, like having a huge projection screen of the post game show. However, he said that none of those things were going to happen.

"I wanted to have an M.C. or a D.J., someone to focus chants or to tell students 'hey, there is an ambulance over there if you need help', or 'hey the police are coming'. If they have a friendly voice instead."

Fraud complaint filed against A.G. Edwards

By Mark Jewell
Associated Press

BOSTON — Massachusetts regulators on Wednesday filed a complaint against A.G. Edwards & Sons Inc., accusing the financial services firm of defrauding mutual fund shareholders by allowing market-timed trades by a now-suspended Boston broker involving billions of dollars.

The administrative complaint by Massachusetts Secretary of State William Galvin claims A.G. Edwards directed its representatives to get an indemnity agreement from favored clients who then were allowed to trade in and out of mutual funds "to the disadvantage of other shareholders."

"They knew it was wrong and they sought to avoid the consequences," Galvin said in a news release.

Market timing is the use of quick, in-and-out trades that skim profits from long-term shareholders and benefit favored short-term investors.

The secretary of state, Massachusetts' regulator of the financial industry, is seeking "fair compensation" for any losses incurred by mutual fund share holders, as well as an unspecified administrative fine.

The civil complaint triggers a process in which a state administrative hearing officer will review possible violations of state securities laws, in a hearing similar to a judicial proceeding. A.G. Edwards could seek court review of any judgment against it, which could include financial penalties.

A spokeswoman for St. Louis-based A.G. Edwards did not immediately return a call for comment.

The complaint alleges an A.G. Edwards representative at the firm's office in Boston's Back Bay section, Charles A. Sacco, engaged in illegal market timing for two offshore hedge fund customers, Headstart Asset Management and Atlantique Capital, between 2001 and 2003. Of the 35,000 trades executed in that office between Jan. 2, 2001, and Oct. 24, 2003, about 31,000 were mutual fund timing trades, Galvin said. The trades involved hundreds of mutual funds.

As a result of the alleged trading practices in the Boston office, market-timing activity in one London-based hedge fund alone was almost $2 billion, Galvin said.

Phone messages seeking comment were left at A.G. Edwards' Back Bay office and at Sacco's home.

The National Association of Securities Dealers ordered a one-year suspension of Sacco's brokerage license on Sept. 20 because of market-timing allegations, according to a list of disciplinary actions on the industry organization's Web site.

'Baby 81' a symbol of loss for tsunami victims

BABY from page 1

ened to commit suicide before two men stopped him from swallowing some white powder.

Authorities shut the hospital's gates and called police, fearing the group would try to take the child away. Police came and told the crowd to leave the hospital, which they did peacefully — without the baby.

The hospital's 200 staff then went on a brief strike, claiming two employees had been assaulted by the crowd. They resumed their duties when police promised to investigate, then arrested the Jeyarajahs and two supporters.

The battle over Baby 81 has become a symbol of the anguish of thousands of families who lost children in the disaster.

"This baby has suffered terrible losses — loss of familiar faces, familiar sounds and familiar smells," said Anula Nikapota, a child specialist who lives in London and has come to Kalmunai to help children recover from the trauma of the tsunami.

www.dailycollegian.com
Dance Stuff
Starting a dance class?
Go to Dance Stuff for all your dancing needs
220 N. Pleasant Street
253.5201

OPEN MONDAY, VALENTINE'S DAY 4-10
Goten
OF JAPAN STEAK HOUSE
FAMOUS FOR CAPTIVATING CUISINE PREPARED AT YOUR TABLE
RT. 116, SUNDERLAND 413-665-3628

Discover Your LOVER
The Collegian Dating Game
Sign Up Now!
Last Day to Sign Up
From 11-2 in the Campus Center Concourse
Win A Free Date!
3 lucky Men and 3 lucky Women will be selected to go on blind dates.
Collegian readers will vote online to select who will date whom!
Look in the Arts Section for:
The 3 Men on Monday, February 8th
The 3 women on Tuesday, February 9th
Start voting online Tuesday, February 9th at www.dailycollegian.com

Go Pats Go!
Sunday, February 6, 2005
At all DCs from 3:00 pm to 6:30 pm
Go Pats Go Specials
New England Clam Chowder
Boston Baked Beans and Brown Bread
Grab and Go Specials
Boston Cream Pie
Door Prizes for Pats gear
DINING SERVICES UMassAmherst
RESIDENTIAL
YCMP

ALUMNI
"Leaders in the Making" Scholarship
SOPHOMORE & JUNIOR STUDENTS
The "Leaders in the Making" Scholarship Program was created by the Alumni Association to support the academic and career pursuits of promising sophomores and juniors. Students from diverse campus populations whose records suggest that they will develop into alumni with admirable leadership qualities upon graduation are encouraged to apply.
Four recipients will be selected by the Alumni Association Student Affairs and Scholarships Committee based on their application and will be awarded $2,000 towards their Fall 2005 tuition bill and fees.
This multi-part application must be completed in its entireity and returned to the Alumni Association no later than 5 p.m. on Friday, February 11, 2005 for consideration. No exceptions will be allowed.
Don't pass up this great opportunity. Pick up an application today!

Officials say aid not reaching many victims

By Sumal Senanayake
Associated Press

COLOMBO, Sri Lanka — Bureaucratic bungling has blocked food, medicine and other necessities from reaching 70 percent of the 1 million Sri Lankans left destitute by the Asian tsunami disaster, a government official said Wednesday, as hungry and homeless survivors protested the lack of help.

Thilak Ranaviraja, chief of Sri Lanka's presidential task force coordinating relief, said the situation was "not satisfactory" and President Chandrika Kumaratunga "directed me to see that all families, or at least 70 percent to 75 percent of them, get relief by this weekend."

The Dec. 26 Indian Ocean earthquake and tsunami killed more than 30,000 in Sri Lanka, while another 960,000 people lost family members or their homes. Ranaviraja's figures excluded areas in the north and east under the control of Tamil Tiger rebels.

Hundreds of people protested outside the U.N. World Food Program office Wednesday in Colombo, complaining they had not received food rations. Demonstrators from the southern coastal town of Matara submitted a petition seeking U.N. intervention.

This was not the first sign of trouble with Sri Lanka's aid effort. On Tuesday, the government began investigating complaints that food aid intended for tsunami victims in eastern Batticaloa had disappeared and some of the homeless living in camps were being fed rotten supplies.

The WFP said it had donated some 10,000 tons of rice, lentils and sugar and had delivered the supplies to government stores island-wide.

"Food has already been sent. We can't understand why the people aren't getting it," WFP spokeswoman Selvi Sachithanandam said.

The World Bank, the Asian Development Bank and Japan's Bank for International Co-operation said Sri Lanka would need $1.5 billion to recover from the disaster. The government had estimated it needed $3.5 billion.

The cumulative death toll from 11 nations stood at between 158,000 and 178,000 Wednesday, with estimates of another 142,000 people missing.

The disaster has left many residents of the region jittery. A moderate earthquake of magnitude 5.2 Wednesday caused panic among residents and cracked some buildings on Indonesia's main island of Java. There were no immediate reports of casualties.

In a case that has captured the attention of Sri Lanka and the world, a judge ruled Wednesday that a couple must undergo a DNA test to prove they are the parents of the 4-month-old tsunami survivor known as "Baby #1," because he was the 81st admission to the hospital here on Dec. 26.

The couple, upset at the ruling, burst into the hospital where the baby was being held and pleaded with doctors to release the infant. They were arrested for assault and criminal trespassing but later were released on bail.

COURTESY CNN.COM

A mother who gave birth prematurely in the Indian jungle after fleeing her home on India's Hut Bay Island, holds her baby last month. She was originally due to give birth on Jan. 15.

Pope to remain in hospital care longer

By Victor L. Simpson
Associated Press

VATICAN CITY — Pope John Paul II's doctors were on guard for complications Wednesday, a day after the frail, 84-year-old pontiff was hospitalized with the flu and breathing trouble.

Pneumonia remained a potentially deadly threat, but the Holy See insisted there was "no cause for alarm." Roman Catholics from Poland to the Philippines prayed for his recovery.

The pope will be hospitalized for a few more days to afford "many means to stay ready for any complications," said Cardinal Javier Lozano Barragan, head of the Vatican's health care office.

The slumping pontiff also suffers from Parkinson's disease and crippling hip and knee ailments, and his inability to hold his back up straight has left his lungs and diaphragm in a crushed position, Barragan told Associated Press Television News.

Tests showed the pope's heart and respiration were normal, and he felt well enough to participate from his bed in a Mass celebrated by his secretary, said papal spokesman Joaquin Navarro-Valls.

He said John Paul was running a slight fever and would spend "a few more days" for treatment of respiratory problems at Rome's Gemelli Polyclinic, where he was taken by ambulance Tuesday night.

"There is no cause for alarm," Navarro-Valls said.

Cardinal Angelo Sodano, the Vatican secretary of state, also played down the severity of the illness Wednesday evening. The pope was "recovering well," Sodano told private Italian TV Canale 5, adding that he expected the situation to improve in a few days.

Still, American experts said a case like the pontiff's could lead to life-threatening pneumonia. "That's the complication of influenza that most frequently by far, carries people off," said Dr. William Schaffner, an infectious diseases expert at Vanderbilt University.

"I'm sure every physician (following news reports of the pope's case) is already worried that pneumonia might develop," Schaffner said.

Elderly men with long-standing, debilitating chronic disease like Parkinson's often die of pneumonia, which comes as "the final straw" in a long assault by disease on the body, said geriatrics specialist Dr. William Hall of the University of Rochester.

The pope's slumped posture would not only impede his breathing but also make it harder for him to cough normally, a reaction that in healthy people helps keep pneumonia bacteria from entering the lungs, Hall said.

Pneumonia is "often very difficult to treat because you have introduced bacteria that don't belong in the lungs," said Dr. Michael Freedman, head of geriatrics at New York University Medical Center.

"You usually need multiple antibiotics programs," he said. "The big danger is that if you are having trouble getting air into you, you can just tire out and you just can't keep up with it."

In St. Peter's Square, in John Paul's native Poland and in many of the 129 countries the pope has visited over a 26-year papacy, the faithful paused to pray for the spiritual leader of the world's 1 billion Catholics.

White House press secretary Scott McClellan said Americans' "thoughts and prayers are with the Holy Father," and in Rome, chief rabbi Riccarco Di Segni offered prayers for a quick recovery.

Maria Pasnik, 46, a housewife in the pope's hometown of Wadowice, Poland, expressed a simple, anguished wish: "I pray that we can see or hear him again."

In Mexico City, the Basilica of Guadalupe remained open during the night for anyone who wished to offer prayers. It was here, in 2002, that the pope canonized Indian saint Juan Diego during a fifth visit to the country, where he remains immensely popular.

"May he recover rapidly, because we need him," said Isabel Chavez, who attended Mass at the basilica.

Navarro-Valls insisted that John Paul did not lose consciousness or require the insertion of a tube into his windpipe to help him breathe — a procedure known as a tracheotomy — and he characterized the hospitalization as "mainly precautionary."

At one point, trying to appear reassuring, Navarro-Valls even joked that John Paul was taken by ambulance to a special papal suite on the 10th floor of the hospital because "the subway doesn't go that far."

But with the pope's advanced age and his health in steady decline for years, "this is just one of those warning signs that everybody's got to prepare for the inevitable," said the Rev. Thomas Reese, editor of the Jesuit magazine America.

"As Christians, death is not something we fear," he said. "It's a new beginning. But it's always disturbing."

Navarro-Valls, who has a medical degree, said the pope was suffering from flu and acute laryngeal tracheitis — inflammation of the windpipe — which created a "certain difficulty in breathing."

In a separate statement, the Vatican said the pope also had experienced a "larynx spasm crisis." Experts said it was possible his Parkinson's disease, which makes muscle control difficult, made it harder for him to breathe.

COURTESY CNN.COM

The Pope prays for victims of the Asian tsunami last month.

Prime minister says insurgents to be defeated

By Robert H. Reid
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Iraq's interim prime minister declared Wednesday that the success of the national elections had dealt a major blow to the insurgents — who have not carried out a major attack since the balloting — and he predicted they will be defeated within months.

But a major Sunni clerical group declared that Sunday's elections "lack legitimacy" because many Sunni Arabs did not participate, and said the new government would have no mandate to guide the nation's future.

That suggested problems remain in reconciling with the Sunni Arabs, who comprise about 20 percent of Iraq's 26 million people, but form the core of the insurgency.

Nevertheless, both Prime Minister Ayad Allawi and his major Shiite Muslim rivals reached out to the Sunnis, promising them a major role in drafting the new constitution even though many shunned the ballot — either out of fear of rebel attack or opposition to the electoral process.

"Definitely the Sunni Muslims will take part in the government and will have a role in the drafting of constitution," Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim, head of the main Shiite political faction, told The Associated Press.

Allawi, a secular Shiite backed by the Americans, told Iraqi television that the elections, which drew large turnouts except in Sunni insurgent strongholds, constituted a "major blow to all forces of terrorism."

He noted that attacks by Sunni insurgents had fallen dramatically since the elections but it was unclear whether the drop was the start of a trend. Insurgent activity also slowed after the transfer of sovereignty to the Iraqis in June, but picked up weeks later.

"They might be reorganizing themselves and changing their plans," Allawi said of the insurgents. "The coming days and weeks will show whether this trend will continue ... But the final outcome will be failure. They will continue for months but this (insurgency) will end."

COURTESY ASSOCIATED PRESS

Prime Minister Ayad Allawi believes elections were a success.

THE HARP
Irish Pub
First Annual Harp Mardi Gras Party!
Yeah, Yeah, We got beads...
Lots of them...You Decide Prizes
T-shirts
Koozees
Tons of Stuff
Monday 10pm-
Tuesday 1am
New Orleans Drink Specials
Abita Turbo Dog & Hurricane Cocktails
$3 each all night
Midnight Party Buffet
Honey Brown & Molson Pints $2.00 / Pitcher $6.50
PBR Bottles $1.50
Amherst's last great neighborhood pub!
163 Sunderland Rd. - N. Amherst
Just north of the apartments
413-548-6900

STUDENT LEGAL SERVICES OFFICE
UMASS, AMHERST
HELPING STUDENTS PROTECT THEIR RIGHTS FOR 30 YEARS
Free Legal Advice, Referrals, Representation and Counseling for UMASS Students
Student & Workers Rights, Family & Criminal Law, Landlord/Tenant & Consumer Disputes
CALL 545-1995
or stop in at 922 Campus Center

At Quinnipiac University School of Law, you'll find all the tools you need, in a setting you can appreciate. From rigorous academics to live-client clinics to real-world externships. From accessible and distinguished faculty to the most advanced technology. Everything you need to succeed. For more information, visit http://law.quinnipiac.edu or call 1.800.462.1944.
QUINNIPIAC UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF LAW
Application for Admission
Office of Admissions
275 Mount Carmel Avenue • Hamden, CT 06518-1948
E-mail: ladm@quinnipiac.edu
CRIMINAL | DISPUTE RESOLUTION | FAMILY | HEALTH | INTELLECTUAL PROPERTY | TAX
Seeking Admission to:
REAL-WORLD LAW EXPERIENCE
BEFORE I ENTER THE REAL WORLD.

Regency Hair Stylists
~ Hair Cuts ~
Regular $20
Special $15
*Call for an appointment with
Marna or Megan
Mention this ad Monday through Thursday
253-9526
189 North Pleasant Street Amherst
Marna Megan

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." -Voltaire
THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 2005 EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

What exactly is Black history?

Black history is the history of the people of African origins and their interactions with other people of the world. Black history is the Diaspora of African people who were forcibly sold into slavery to build the, "New World," which includes North, South, Central and South America as well as the Caribbean. Contrary to popular beliefs, black history begins in Africa, and thus the foundation of black history is African history.

Black history begins with the origins of humankind, which emerged from Africa millions of years ago. Dr. Louis Leakey found the remains of our human ancestors in Olduvia Gorge in Tanzania, East Africa in 1959. If Africa is indeed the cradle of humankind, it is also the birthplace of human culture.

Black history is the history of a people who built great civilizations along the Nile, the most prominent of which was in Egypt. The Egyptian Pharaohs were the world's first absolute monarchs with unlimited power. They founded the first bureaucracy. They also invented Hieroglyphic writing, one of the ancestors of the modern Latin alphabet. Furthermore, the Egyptians invented decimal numbers so they could make counting easier, as well as the calendar to keep track of the time and seasons. Lastly, Egyptian culture profoundly influenced Greco-Roman culture from which Western culture developed.

Black history is the history of a people who, through a Muslim caliphate, ruled Spain for 800 years. It is ironic that the Spanish King Ferdinand and Queen Isabella defeated the last Moorish stronghold of Grenada in 1492, the same year Columbus landed in the Americas.

Black history is the history of the great Western African empires of Ghana, Mali and Songhay. Timbuktu became the educational center for Mali and under the Songhay Empire, education continued to flourish. The great Moslem University of Sankore attracted scholars from North Africa, Egypt and Europe.

Black history is the history of a people who migrated to Asia and the Americas before Marco Polo and Columbus. Runoko Rashidi, a cultural historian, recorded that an African people known as the Khmers, built the kingdom of Funan in Southeast Asia in the countries that are now known as Burma, Thailand, Kampuchea, Malaysia, Vietnam and Laos. Furthermore, it has been documented that Africans traded with Asia before Europeans encountered Asia and Africa. The camel was introduced to Africa from Asia in 100 A.D. Also, fruits such as bananas, plantains, sugar cane and coconuts were introduced into Africa from Asia during the ancient trade period.

In addition, Ivan Van Sertima, an anthropologist at Rutgers University, documented the early presence of Africans in Central and South America before the coming of Europeans in his book, "They Came Before Columbus."

Black history is the history of a white woman, Margaret Douglas of Norfolk, VA, who served a month in jail in 1854 for teaching slaves how to read. Black history is the history of those whites that used their homes as way stations as part of the Underground Railroad to assist blacks in their escape from slavery to freedom. Black history is the history of a white woman, Viola Liuzio, of Detroit, MI, who was killed in the deep South in the 1960's while helping blacks register to vote.

Black history is the history of Presidents Abraham Lincoln and Lyndon B. Johnson, both of whom signed significant legislation that changed living conditions for black people across the nation. The Emancipation Proclamation of 1863 and the Civil Rights Act of 1964 knocked down the legal barriers of equality.

Black history is not only American history, but it is also world history. There are common threads that run through the diverse experiences of arriving, inhabiting, building and shaping of American culture. One of the common threads is that of early arrivals; the adventurer, the colonists, the slaves and later the immigrants that came by boat. America is a nation of people who arrived on boats seeking freedom. The adventurer wanted to be free to explore and search for prosperity. The colonist wanted to be free of religious and political persecution. The slaves wanted physical, political and economic freedom, and the immigrants wanted economic and political freedom.

Winder Alexandre is President of Iota Phi Theta.

Simplicity scores points

Ben Feder

It's finally the spring semester; a time when we can begin our academic quest with fresh insight. You can smell the renewal in the air. New classes, new friends, and new opportunities provide a completely different campus environment. Even the SGA has declared a mulligan and hit the proverbial reset button.

You've returned from your first winter break. You've reconnected with your high school friends and told of your collegiate exploits long into the night. You've hooked-up with your ex and are now ready to resume your path to upperclassman-hood. So what is there to look forward too next?

Valentine's Day!

That's right. It's approaching and everyone hates it. For us lucky single folk, it's just another day in the week. However, for you attached fools, you at least need to recognize it. Even though she says she doesn't want anything, she really does, and even though you have no idea what to get him, he still wants a token of appreciation.

You may be asking yourself, what do I do and who made me such an authority? Well, I was recently been in the company of four women in their living room, and I did some reporting on their thoughts on relationships and love as we watched "The Divine Secrets of the Ya Ya Sisterhood" (please don't judge; it was either that or "Pretty Woman"), and to my surprise, women, plus pajamas, plus emotional movie about womanhood, plus Oreo cookies, equals a whole lot of juicy info. So here it goes.

First, if you have a hook-up friend, don't give them anything. Why throw more confusion into your already bizarre relationship with this person? Giving a V-day gift will make the other person question whether you two are just friends with benefits, or something more. Unless that's the desired effect, don't waste your money or energy.

Even a pack of new socks is acceptable and in most ways, the best gift a man can receive. Men always need new socks, always.

Now, when for shopping for women, you have a couple of options. Avoid the cliché dozen roses and chocolate. Women find this tacky and overdone and apparently they know what we buy them at the 7-11 on the way to their house or dorm anyway. They do however find a single rose, preferably one in their favorite color, very endearing.

You can also spend some time with her doing something you both enjoy. It's a lot cheaper and you'll look better for it. Cook a meal together, work on a puzzle, or anything else that will earn you "quality time together" points. You could even watch some episodes of "Sex in the City" together. Just don't make any comments about it, laugh when she laughs, and try not to point out the audacity that what's-her-face is a sex columnist for the New Yorker. If that's the case, then I'm a sports writer for National Geographic.

If you have to buy her a gift, make it a practical one. If she likes building things, buy her a new drill. If she plays soccer, maybe she could use some new cleats. If painting is her thing, replenish her brush and paint supply. The point is to make it small, something that suits her and shows that you pay attention.

For the fellas, we are a simple people. If your guy is a Red Sox fan, buy him the "Faith Rewarded" DVD or any other Red Sox paraphernalia because yes, we are still not over the fact that they won. Otherwise, get the "Family Guy" DVDs. You can never go wrong with those. Even a pack of new socks is acceptable and in most ways, the best gift a man can receive. Men always need new socks, always.

Other than that, the same rules apply. Make it a small gesture and something practical. Even a card will do because, simply put, men hate Valentine's Day. We don't understand it. A small gesture takes the burden off our minds, and also makes the $200 diamond bracelet we bought look far better. So I hope this has helped some of you hapless love-struck kids in your search for the perfect Valentine's gift for that special someone. If you follow the "avoid the gaudy and stick to the simple," mantra, you'll be fine. If all else fails, you should try to convince your valentine to boycott Valentine's Day. It's a useless holiday really, and it'll save you from watching "Sex in the City" reruns.

Ben Feder is a Collegian columnist

Going beyond the classroom

Aaron Wodin-Schwartz

If you think about it, abstract concepts are ridiculous. Dedicating all of our time and energy to something that we can only assume mirrors a reality that we may experience one day, seems to be a bizarre choice of lifestyle. Can we really learn and grow under such circumstances or is knowledge more profoundly and effectively acquired as a full sensory process? How does our removal from the subjects of our discourse affect our solutions and allow us to move away from what is really important? Though a longtime advocate of alternative pedagogy and hands-on, personal learning, I would have paid little regard to these two very important questions, until recently.

I am a senior now and have buried my nose in the books, for the past two years or so, dedicating almost all of my life and my focus to scholarly pursuits. The progress I have made and the pains I have gone through has assured that my academic growth was qualitatively better than other forms of learning.

"My friends that chose to enrich their lives in other ways must not be growing as I am," I reasoned. Sure, they were growing, but without the sort of effort and dedication I was putting in at school, how far could they possibly have gotten?

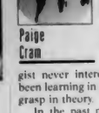
I was recently reminded of a little something that I once knew, but forgot: the classroom is worth nothing. We may impose value upon it if we decide to use it as a tool for something real, but otherwise we are likely to be whisked away into the academy and out of the real world. I have spent much of the past two years learning to speak and plan confidently about things that I've never seen and really know very little about. The politics of far away places, the pompous selection of an ideology, and the casual discussion of poverty alleviation vs. International credit ratings in LDCs are all important topics that I am versed in.

My recent travels have helped me realize that until you go stay in a neighborhood where children play in open sewage, and the freeways are horse-trodden dirt roads, you don't know anything about poverty. Until you live amongst people whose way of life hangs in the balance of an election, you really don't have much to offer in a political debate. Until you personally understand the culture of a place you may not discuss its political or marketable character.

That university bears such little resemblance to the real world and emphasizes so rarely the importance of praxis makes it one of the most destructive places in the world.

I mean not only that you shouldn't. You can't. Aside from our responsibility to know about something before we open our big traps, it is very difficult to educate a room full of kids about something that is not there. That is why higher education lacks practicality. Four years of hard studying and barely a useful quality attained outside of the classroom. Not only that, but information conveyed is much more rarely learned than you might think. Learning is a full-sensory experience and is inefficient in the absence of physical or erotic stimulation and the simultaneous mobilization of other types of thinking. Sitting at small plastic desks inside a plain, white room cuts out the personal experience that makes events important in our lives on an animalistic level. It is not conducive to acquiring individual pieces of information, much less any sort of passion for pursuing them. University education is a much more effective tool for organizing ideas than for acquiring them.

That university bears such little resemblance to the real world and emphasizes so rarely the importance of praxis makes it one of the most destructive places in the world. After all, it was here that I had forgotten the value of humanity. Life must come before all else, and therefore the discussion on social betterment programs in poor nations versus business-led growth is a ridiculous debate to have.



I used to argue that you must be pragmatic and work with what the international community offers you to bring about slow positive change, but have learned, or re-learned that this is an absurd proposition and that the poor cannot wait. If you've ever been to an area that is in need, you will agree with me. As the intellectual future of the world, we must be careful to always apply our lessons back to the real world and consider the effects of what we say on the people involved. Anybody can sound intelligent in their work, but we must be careful to keep it real and not get carried away by academic trends.

My point here is not to disqualify higher education; rather, I have qualified it as the important theoretical side of a praxis to live happily, respectively and constructively in the broader world. Do not suspend your moral values and your physical experiences while inside the classroom, simply use academia to augment your chances for effecting positive change in the world and to assemble into a workable scheme the diverse experiences that you must pursue beyond the classroom.

Aaron Wodin-Schwartz is a Collegian columnist.

I'm slowing down in Italy

World Perspectives

Paige Cram

About forty years ago, a man named Edward Lorenz began developing a theory to aid in his ability to predict weather patterns. His idea was that he could find an underlying order even in seemingly random data, and it later developed into what many scientists now refer to as "chaos theory." I've never been one for scientific concepts, so the ideas of an old meteorologist never interested me much, but lately I've been learning in practice what I was never able to grasp in theory.

In the past month I've had to make lots of adjustments, the hardest of which was learning to let go of my expectation that everything should follow standard rules of organization. Italy is known for its food, its beauty, and its romance, but certainly not for its ability to operate in a calm and rational manner.

Here the society is structured in such a way that even the foreigners who are obsessed with schedules are forced to let go, forced to live life one minute at a time.

Since I left the States, my life has seemed nothing but pure and utter chaos. Italians don't feel the need to explain their actions or their motives, and since my program is run entirely by native Italians, I have found myself in a constant state of confusion and bewilderment. We're generally not informed of plans or itineraries until minutes before we need to know them, and I still don't know the address of the apartment into which I'll be moving in just a few days. Museums and churches are sporadically closed, which often ends up throwing off our tour schedules, and store hours are about as easy to figure out as the Rubix cube (which I have never been able to solve).

For someone like me who functions best with a plan, the lack of information is maddening. It's nearly impossible to prepare for anything, and there seems to be no rhyme or reason to the mayhem. Why live in such chaos, when the rest of the world has figured out such a well-structured system for a functioning society?

The answer is that they simply don't care. Italians don't care about the rest of the world because they function in their own way, and while it is extremely difficult to get used to, you eventually discover that there is a method to the madness.

Shops open much later here, close for approximately three hours in the early afternoon, and reopen until dinnertime, which is around nine. Everything is closed on Sunday, and many places are also closed on Monday morning. Most of us are accustomed to using those hours to accomplish something, but here, that is not even an option.

Forced relaxation is a beautiful thing. At first it feels inconvenient and strange to do nothing with the middle of your day and half of your weekend, but after some observation, a leisurely lunch, an afternoon coffee and a stroll seem like excellent uses of time. The Italians really know how to enjoy and appreciate their days, and in a country this beautiful, with food this incredible, who can blame them?

I have yet to discover why public places shut down randomly or why my program directors insist on denying me the right to know what lies immediately in my future, but I'm beginning to appreciate my ignorance. Having days that start out completely unscheduled is truly blissful. If the church you wanted to visit is suddenly being restored (although it may have been open the day before), you simply find something else to do which usually turns out to be an even more incredible experience.

In the States, we focus so much on getting things done and fitting things into our schedules, that, too often, we don't even enjoy our own activities. Here, the society is structured in such a way that even the foreigners who are obsessed with schedules are forced to let go, forced to live life one minute at a time.

For those of us who are struggling to learn a new language and new customs, the chaos is a lot to handle at first. But Lorenz was right: as the days slip by, our vocabulary grows, our minds expand and our eyes can slowly begin to decipher a beautiful pattern beneath the mayhem in which we now live.

Is life chaotic here? Most definitely. Does it always make sense? Not necessarily. But I've learned to relax, take things as they come and appreciate everything as a new experience. Every day after school, I sit overlooking the Tuscan hills, sipping a cappuccino and wondering what will happen next, and for now, that's all the plan I need.

Paige Cram is a Collegian columnist. She is currently on exchange in Italy.

Write for EdOp.

Send submissions to editorial@dailycollegian.com

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 2005 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

FEMALE ART COMES TO LIFE AT WILLIAMS

'Liza Johnson: If Then Maybe'
Williams College Museum of Art
Williamstown

Still frames like the photo above, were used in "Liza Johnson: If Then Maybe." These short films are based on the gestures of real life women.

By Michael Busack
Collegian Staff

Pretty women are a must for most modern films. Williams College Professor, Liza Johnson examines the mannerisms of the Hollywood woman in her new piece titled "Liza Johnson: If Then Maybe."

Williams College Museum of Art (WCMA) is currently playing host to an exhibit created by their own resident professor, Liza Johnson. Her project, "Liza Johnson: If Then Maybe," is a multi-channel video installation that was created for the WCMA's rotunda gallery.

The film features five different video loops played on suspended screens. It also includes a group of photographs that are located in a related gallery. The amazing footage in the display examines the many gestures of a woman, especially those which are used a great deal in modern cinema.

The shots will move from the rosy cheeks of a blush, to shy glances. It is shot with such precision and in such diverse and eloquent landscapes that it allows the film to flow quite vividly. It is a powerful piece of media, despite the lack of storylines. Each film loop is very quick and perfectly mastered.

The museums curator, Lisa Dorin said in a press release that Johnson's work "beautifully and seductively addresses issues of gender, psychology, and film and art history. The piece makes us look at bad feelings in a constructive way."

Johnson chooses not to travel the typical route of feminist art. Rather than showing her women in roles of power and pride, she chooses to show the subjects at their very weakest moments. The images have a way of drawing the viewer in to gestures you may have never even noticed.

Liza Johnson is also an accomplished filmmaker. She was able to have her work shown at several different international recognized venues, including the Berlin and Rotterdam film festivals, New York Video Festival, as well as numerous gay and lesbian film festivals.

Also, her art has been displayed in different museums and galleries across the United States including Artists Space in New York and the Los Angeles Museum of Contemporary Art. Her other films include "(Good Sister/Bad Sister" (1996), "Fernweh/The Opposite of Homesick" (2000), and "Falling" (2003).

In 1999, Johnson received the DAAD Berlin Kunstler program Fellowship and Residency in Film. Today, she is in the process of creating her newest piece of cinema that has been slated for release, titled "Desert Hot Springs."

The creation of the video installation has been sponsored by the Williams College Center for Technology in the Arts and Humanities (CTAH). This exhibition was organized by Lisa Dorin, Assistant Curator, along with the artist.

The Williams College Museum of Art is open Tuesday through Saturday, from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. and on Sunday from 1 p.m. to 5 p.m. Admission is free and the museum is wheelchair accessible.

Domestic queen signs on with Trump for her own 'Apprentice'

By Derrik J. Lang
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Martha Stewart, you're hired.

The masterminds behind "The Apprentice" Donald Trump and Mark Burnett and NBC announced Wednesday that Stewart will host "The Apprentice: Martha Stewart."

"Mark and I have always admired her," Trump said. "She's a very brave woman. She's built a multimillion-dollar empire. It was an easy decision. We think this will be an absolutely tremendous success."

Burnett didn't reveal many details about the new version of the business-themed reality show, such as whether there will be a boardroom or when the show would begin taping.

But Stewart's take on "Apprentice" should be distinct, Burnett said. "Martha has her own empire, which has a different look and feel," he said.

Her show will film in either New York or Connecticut, where the Martha Stewart Living Omnimedia Inc. empire is located. Sixteen to 18 contestants will vie for a one-year job with her company and $250,000 salary.

Casting has already begun. Producers currently seeking applicants for the fourth edition of Trump's "Apprentice" will also search for Martha wannabes. And a graphic with Stewart's face touting "Apply now to be Martha Stewart's Apprentice!" has already sprung up on NBC's Web site.

Since Stewart is not allowed to conduct business while in prison, Burnett made it clear his deal with Stewart was completed before the domestic mogul entered prison, although he's made monthly visits to her.

She was convicted last year of lying about why she unloaded shares of ImClone Systems Inc. stock in 2001, just before the price plunged. Stewart began serving her five-month sentence in October, and is scheduled for release in early March from a prison in Alderson, W.Va.

"Since the last four months, Martha's been incarcerated and has given no input," said Burnett.

Wednesday's announcement means Stewart will have two shows. On Dec. 8 it was announced that she will revive her daily homemaking show next September, this time with a live audience, celebrity guests and with Burnett's help.

Filming on her "Apprentice" could begin as early as March when Stewart goes from prison to house arrest. Under her probation, she'll be allowed to work outside of her home, which Burnett said may include shooting the show.

Other moguls have attempted to walk in Trump's reality TV show shoes such as Dallas Mavericks owner Mark Cuban and Virgin owner Richard Branson, who starred in "Apprentice"-like shows. But both garnered low ratings.

Trump, who will stay in the boardroom for "Apprentice" seasons four and five, is ready to guide Stewart to success.

"With Branson and Cuban, I wanted them to fail," said Trump. "Fortunately, they did. Martha and I are teammates."

But just how far will the team mentality go?

Will Trump appear on her show or vice versa? Maybe, he said.

And will Stewart recite Trump's infamous phrase "you're fired" before eliminating contestants?

"She's probably going to use a different expression," said Trump.

COURTESY THEHOLLANDSENTINAL.NET

Although still in jail, America's favorite professional home-maker, Martha Stewart, has arranged for her own version of "The Apprentice." Filming most likely will not begin until she on house arrest.

Eve goes out, turns him down

Original Sin
Eve

Every year on Christmas eve, one of the largest night clubs in Boston opens its doors to resident Jews, hence why the night is titled "Matzah Ball". This year, I was invited. As I stood among the throng of old friends, new friends, and dozens of others gathered for the same reason, I noticed the scene was more like a matchmaking ball than it was a club, but then I realized she was still around in theory.

"Hi. Would you like to dance?"

I turned around to see a very good-looking man in an expensive suit staring directly at me.

"No thanks," I said.

I had come to have a good time, and no time is a good time looking for a quick fix.

"Oh, come on. I'll be nice, please?"

His eyebrows raised in a hopeful plea. I paused for a moment, trying to overlook his slight desperation, and replied, "You know what, I really want to spend some time with my friends. How about another time?"

I gave him a friendly pat on the back and slowly made my way to the other side of the room.

A few days later he called me and I had absolutely no idea how he was able to because I purposely failed to leave him my number, but any effort is appreciated, right?

"Hi, um, I don't know if you remember me, but, um, I was wondering if you wanted to go out, maybe next week sometime?" He was so shy, so harmless, and so adorable.

"Sure," I say, "why not? Give me a call next week." and it was set.

It was the first real date I had had in a very long time, and I'd never been more ready. I rummaged through my closet and found exactly what I was looking for; my only pair of very expensive black dress pants, and an only-on-very-special-occasions-sexy-black top, both folded perfectly on top of each other, both anxiously waiting for the perfect evening to come out of the closet. I was going on a date with a man, a real man who had a job, a salary, and a man who came to pick me up right on time.

"Hello," he said.

"Here let me get that for you."

He pulled open the door to the passenger side and I climbed in. As he shut the door behind me, I couldn't help but notice an overpowering stench that singed my nostrils. He sat down and began driving toward his chosen surprise destination.

"You look great," he exclaimed. The smell was unbearable. It was his breath, stale old-man breath that had the ability to absorb into my clothing, hair, and skin for a very long time.

"Hey, can I open a window? I'm so hot for some reason."

It was below zero outside. He smiled and said, "Actually, I'm really cold, can you just wait until we get there?"

I slid down into my seat and turned away from his mouth. At this unfortunate moment I noticed he was driving under the speed limit, and I am claustrophobic.

"You know, you can speed up, the roads aren't that icy," I said in a desperate attempt to keep myself from gagging.

"Oh, I prefer to drive extra carefully when I have a girl in the car. I take very safe precautions as if you were my own family," he said.

I felt a sudden urge to leap out of his car and never look back, but it was too late.

"Well, here we are," he announced. I looked up in horror. He had brought me to the Foggy Goggle, one of the trashiest bars in all of Boston. This bar mixes Coyote Ugly, Girls Gone Wild and Spring break all in one dirty STD infested room with cheesey music.

"Um, I'm sorry, do you mind going somewhere else? I dressed too nicely for a place like this and it's just really not my type of fun."

I was on the verge of tears. How could this night have gone so wrong? He looked confused for a moment then answered. "Come on, it'll be fun, I promise. If you hate it, we'll leave, ok? Just give it a chance."

He pulled me toward the door and I gave in. As we entered, two of the bartenders were on top of the bar performing their weekly wet t-shirt contests while drunken older men laughed out in delight. Beer was being thrown in every direction, and I noticed that in every corner of the room, retired men held their twenty-something girlfriends comfortably as if it were acceptable.

I needed a drink. After ordering for the both of us, I asked for the bill.

"After this drink I would like to go, ok," I said, pleading with him.

He nodded and realized that might be a good idea. He then looked at the bill and neglected to reach for his wallet. I was shocked. I pulled out my wallet hastily and turned to him.

"You know what? This is the worst date I have ever been on! Thanks a lot for being so generous. I am leaving now."

I took a last sip of my drink and walked out. Moments later, he caught up with me.

"At least let me drive you home. I didn't pay because I thought you were the type of girl that wants to take care of yourself."

I couldn't believe he said such a ridiculous thing. "Fine," I replied.

As he pulled up slowly to my house, I felt guilty for being so rude. He didn't know what to do, and for some reason I sympathized with him.

"Well, here we are," I said. "Thanks for the ride."

As I leaned over to give him a friendly hug, he pushed me away nervously.

"Wait, wait, I have to do something first," he cried.

He reached into his glove compartment and shuffled his hands around until he found what he was looking for.

"Tic-Tacs! I like to keep up with dental hygiene."

He put one in his mouth, swished it around for fifteen seconds, and cleared his throat.

"Ok, I'm ready!"

My mouth dropped open, and I was speechless. Was he serious? I looked at his face, distorted and posing for a kiss he was never going to get. Yes, I think he was very serious. I opened the door and said goodbye. I never answered his calls again.

Eve is a Collegian columnist.

FCC cracking down after Jackson Super Bowl drama

By Gail Pennington
St. Louis Post-Dispatch

When Justin Timberlake tore open Janet Jackson's blouse during the Super Bowl halftime show, exposing her right breast, broadcast television shivered. And now, almost a year later, TV producers are still feeling the chill.

"I don't think today we could launch or sell 'NYPD Blue' in the form that it launched 12 years ago," said Steven Bocheo, creator of the landmark police drama.

"It's kind of a tightrope," said Seth MacFarlane, whose cartoon "Family Guy" engages in "an ongoing conversation with Standards and Practices" at Fox. "All networks are under enormous pressure from the FCC, and we deal with that every day."

In the post-"Nipplegate" crackdown, the FCC fined CBS and its owned-and-operated stations a total of $550,000, even though the network protested that it was blindsided by the incident. Then, in October, the agency levied an even bigger fine, a total of almost $1.2 million, against Fox and all its affiliates over a scene in the reality series "Married by America."

Both networks are protesting the fines, and a coalition of broadcasters has asked the FCC to clarify its rules on content.

"Obviously, we're still very upset about the FCC's treatment of us on Janet Jackson," CBS chairman Les Moonves told TV critics meeting in Los Angeles earlier this month. "We're refusing to pay that fine, and we're going much further with it."

The end result will probably be a legal proceeding that could wind up before the Supreme Court, the first time the high court has taken up the matter of TV indecency since the George Carlin "seven dirty words" case in 1978. That case gave the FCC the right to regulate obscenity on television, citing a need to protect children.

Meanwhile, confusion reigns in TV land. Nobody would argue that broadcast television has shrunk from pushing the content envelope; on the top-rated new series of the season, ABC's darkly comic "Desperate Housewives," a wife carried on an affair with the teenage gardener while a husband paid for masochistic sex play. On CBS "CSI," the most-watched series on television, one plot turned on do-it-yourself transgender surgery, with one scene graphically showing the gory aftermath.

Jackson and Timberlake catalyzed a slew of changes in television programming after their infamous "wardrobe malfunction".

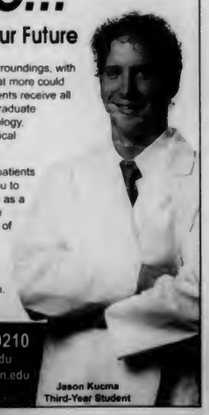
But Fox recently opted to hide the bare bottom of animated baby Stewie in a "Family Guy" repeat PBS blurred a picture of a naked man in the documentary "Auschwitz: Inside the Nazi State" after editing expletives from the British drama "Prime Suspect" and the play "Cop Shop." NBC's long-running "ER" opted to blur the breasts of an elderly female patient being administered CPR. Actors on Fox's "Arrested Development" were told to conceal their mouths when uttering curse words designed to be bleeped for comic effects.

"You do find yourself making decisions, second-guessing," said PBS president Pat Mitchell. "That's how you wind up with the 'Saving Private Ryan' situation," she added, referring to the decision by some ABC stations not to air an expletive-undeleted version of the war movie.

More confusion surrounds the fact that the FCC reversed its own decision on an expletive uttered by U2 singer Bono at the 2003 Golden Globe Awards, first ruling that his excited comment wasn't obscene, then deciding it was. What's more, the scene in



See FCC on page 8

Chiropractic...
The Right Choice For Your Future

Is your dream to become a doctor to study in beautiful surroundings, with a world-renowned faculty and state of the art facilities – what more could you want in a professional education? Logan College students receive all this and more! If you are ready to accept the challenge of graduate professional study in science, physiotherapy, nutrition, radiology, clinical sciences, chiropractic techniques and extensive clinical rotations, then Logan College is the place for you.

Logan College of Chiropractic gives you the skills to help patients get well through non-invasive healthcare while preparing you to earn a substantial income commensurate with your position as a Doctor of Chiropractic. Most DC's work in a private practice setting, providing time for family and other important quality of life priorities.

Contact Logan College at 1-800-533-9210 or at loganadm@logan.edu to receive an information packet describing the world's fastest growing healthcare profession. You can also visit our website at www.logan.edu.

Logan
College of Chiropractic
1-800-533-9210
www.logan.edu
loganadm@logan.edu

Jason Kucma
Third-Year Student

FOUR Seasons
WINE • LIQUOR • CIGARS
333 Russell St., Rt. 9
Hadley, MA 01035
584-8174
Sale date 02/03 - 02/09
responsible for typographical errors.

Beer

Wine		Liquor
Black Box 3 lt CA Chard, Cabernet, Merlot	$16.99	Johnnie Walker Black 750 ml	$26.99
Talus 1.5 lt CA Chard, Cabernet, Merlot	$10.99	Crown Royal Wiskey 750 ml	$20.99
Yellow Tail 1.5 lt Australian Cab, Merlot, Shiraz, Chard	$10.99	Bailey's Irish Cream 750 ml	$18.99
Little Boomey 1.5 lt Australian Cab, Merlot, Shiraz, Chard	$8.99	Romana Sambuca 750 ml	$18.99
Monkey Bay 750 ml New Zealand Sauvignon Blanc	$7.99	Jose Cuervo Tequila 750 ml	$16.99
Nardone Baker 750 ml Australian Shiraz & Chard	$7.99	Tanqueray Gin 750 ml	$16.99
Parallele "45" 750 ml Cotes du Rhone, France	$6.99	UV Vodka all flavors 1.75 lt	$15.99
Little Penguin 750 ml Australian Shiraz, Merlot, Chard	$5.99	UV Vodka all flavors 750 ml	$8.99
		Mr. Boston Peppermint Schnapps 1 lt	$6.99

Hours: Monday - Saturday 9am - 11pm, Sunday 12pm - 11pm

Need help mapping out a strategy for the career fairs?

Come to Career Services in 511 Goodell for...

Resume & Cover Letter Workshops
Career Counseling
Mock Interviews
and much, much more!

CareerServices

For more information call 413-545-2224 or go to www.umass.edu/careers

It's Super Bowl trivia time

Get to know Jacksonville

By Michael Precker
The Dallas Morning News

It's not enough to stand around the water cooler and discuss whether Philadelphia can stop New England from winning its third Super Bowl in four years. You ought to know a little about where the game is being played.

This year, for reasons nobody can figure out, that means Jacksonville, Fla., famous the world around as a good place to stop for gas when you're driving from New York to Miami.

Aw, we're just jealous because we won't be hosting or playing in Super Bowls for the foreseeable future. If you don't think of Jacksonville as a big city, you're wrong. The population is about 800,000, but the 1968 merger of Jacksonville and Duval County created the largest city, 841 square miles, in America.

To honor Jacksonville's big event, here's a trivia quiz to help you appreciate America's football capital for a day, and then put it out of your mind again.

For answers to trivia questions visit www.dailycollegian.com.

1. Originally known as Cowford, the town was renamed in 1822 for General (and later President) Andrew Jackson, although he:

A) Sunburned easily

B) Never set foot there

C) Hated the beach

2. The St. Johns River running through Jacksonville is one of the very few U.S. rivers that flows:

A) Different directions in summer and winter

B) Whichever way the City Flowmaster decides

C) South to north

3. During the Civil War, Union troops burned down most of the city:

A) Once

B) Twice

C) Three times

4. In 1954 Jacksonville bartender Ricardo Gracia made history by inventing:

A) The hose that spouts many soft drinks from a single nozzle

B) The Pina Colada

C) The Heimlich maneuver

5. Jacksonville hosts an annual meaningless college football classic called the:

A) Freedom Bowl

B) Atlantic Bowl

C) Gator Bowl

FCC still involved

FCC from page 7

the reality series "Married by America" for which the FCC fined Fox, involving strippers at a bachelor party, had been blurred, a practice that was previously acceptable.

The FCC's guidelines "are not clear, and we need clarity," Berman said. "We don't want to be irresponsible, but it is difficult, and we are attempting to do our best to find our way in this very complicated issue and very complicated landscape."

NBC Universal president Jeff Zucker also asked the FCC to "bring some common sense and some uniformity to the issues of indecency that just have not had any semblance of uniformity."

"Everything has been dealt with so indiscriminately and differently in each case," Zucker complained. "If everybody understood what the rules were, that would be a step in the right direction."

The resignation of Michael Powell as FCC chairman "gives us hope that there can actually be a new agenda" at the agency, Zucker told TV critics.

At this point, it's uncertain how much the networks are leaning on producers to clean up their act and how much the producers themselves are reacting self-protectively.

"Is there some chilling effect? I don't think we've seen it," WB chairman Garth Ancier said. "But we've always been a pretty conservative network."

Now, "we look at everything a little more closely, but we've always been very, very careful and very respectful, I think," said Dawn Ostroff, chief programmer for UPN.

"It's not having a chilling effect on our shows," CBS boss Moonves said. "What we're saying to our producers is, guys, let's not be stupid about this. Clearly, there's a change in how the FCC is looking at us. We're not changing our content. But by the same token, we have to be aware of what the world is out there."

"I don't want anyone angry, and I'm not sure we're looking to be naughty," said the WB's David Janollari. But "we're looking to continue to do kind of provocative, quality dramas ... I don't feel that we need to be naughty or risque in any way to attract an audience."

"We haven't really changed anything we're doing," said ABC Entertainment president Steve McPherson. "We have adhered to the same standards ... regardless of what the climate is. Obviously, there's a little bit more chatter about it, and maybe people get a little bit more worked up about it. But in terms of the way we do our business and the way we talk to our producers, nothing has changed."

But Bochco, whose "NYPD Blue" is wrapping up its 12th and final season on ABC, said the Super Bowl incident "certainly was a tipping point for what we were used to doing and, really, can no longer do."

"NYPD Blue" shook up broadcast television in 1992 by telling police stories with realistic violence and strong language. It quickly became famous, however, for featuring the most nudity ever seen in prime time, frequently showing its actors unclothed from the back or in bed scenes. Last season, a character played by Charlotte Ross was shown completely naked, covering herself only with strategically placed hands and arms.

Post-"Nipplegate," however, the show dropped what would have been the first sex scene and backside shot for Gordon Clapp, a 12-season regular as Detective Greg Medavoy. Both Clapp and Bochco laughed that decision off, but Bochco said, "We have fought with ABC broadcast standards in the past year over things we hadn't fought about for 10-plus years."

At issue, primarily, was nudity, he said.

"You know, scenes that were modified after the fact, and then at some point you're told you just can't do certain scenes the way you used to do them. So you stop doing them."

He had hoped, "and I think probably everyone in television had hoped, that 'NYPD Blue' would pave the way for a more open approach to programming, a more adult ... kind of programming," Bochco said. "But there's no question in my mind that ... the medium has become increasingly conservative."

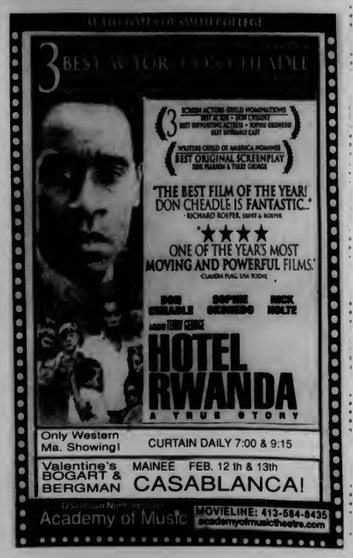
Asked about Bochco's contention that "NYPD Blue" couldn't get on the air today, ABC's McPherson said, "I hope that's not true."

Responded Bochco: "I'll call Steve and I'll go pitch him something next week with a lot of (bare backsides) and things, and we'll see."

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
NOW HIRING
WebMaster
The Collegian is looking for someone to maintain its website. If you have any experience with HTML, online advertising or web design apply now!
Freshman and sophomores strongly encouraged to apply
All applicants should call:
(413)-545-3500
Ask For Rich

Rent One of Ours
No additional fee for 21-25 year old drivers
POTTERS AUTO & TRUCK RENTAL
• Cars
• Passenger Vans
• Trucks
• Direct Billing to Insurance Companies
• Free Local Pick Up
• Locally Owned and Operated
at North Amherst Motors
Collision Repair Center
549-RENT (7368)
On Bus Route • One Mile North of UMass

Tired of the Dorms?
•It's never too early to look for an apartment with Lincoln Real Estate•
Lincoln Real Estate



STSTRAVEL.COM
Join America's #1 Student Tour Operator
CANCUN
ACAPULCO
JAMAICA
BAHAMAS
FLORIDA
SPRING BREAK 2005
Sell Trips, Earn Cash & Travel Free
1 800 648 4849 www.ststravel.com

BEHAVIORAL HEALTH NETWORK
HUMAN SERVICES
RESIDENTIAL STAFF
Direct care staff needed for all shifts, day, evening, weekend, overnight (asleep/awake), full, part time and relief positions available in Hampshire County and surrounding communities. Assist individuals with developmental disabilities in their homes, day/vocational programs, respite sites or residential programs. A High school diploma or equivalent, accesses to reliable transportation preferred. Experience helpful but not mandatory, on-going training available. Generous benefit package at 30 hours. Salary: $9.00- $9.73/hr
Please send cover letter and resume to:
Attn: Program Directors
Behavioral Health Network,
492 Pleasant St.
Northampton, MA 01060
AA/EOE

THE BARN
Discount Groceries
Great products. Great prices!

Hot Pockets & Lean Pockets (9 oz)	$1.50
Ore Ida & McCain French Fries (28-32 oz)	$1.00
Hood Ice Cream (1/2 gallon)	$1.99
Celeste Pizza (5-7 oz)	75¢
Totino's Pizza Rolls (7.5 oz box)	75¢
Pillsbury & Eggo Waffles & Pancakes (10 ct)	75¢
Green Giant Vegetables (7-10 oz)	75¢
Pillsbury Grands or Crescent Rolls (8ct)	50¢
Eggs (large or extra large, dozen)	$1.00
Dole Bananas (large!)	8 for $1.00
Mosey's Flat Cut Corned Beef (1 lb.)	$1.99
Armour Sliced Bologna (1 lb.)	99¢ pkg
Yoplait Nouriche Smoothie Drinks	50¢ each
Single Yogurt (Dannon, Columbo, etc.)	3 for $1.00
Frosted Shredded Wheat Cereal (20 oz)	$1.00 box
Bran Flakes Cereal (20 oz)	$1.00 box
Frosted Flakes Cereal (20 oz)	$1.00 box
M&M Candies (14 oz bag)	$1.00 bag
Raisins (12 oz box)	50¢
Kraft Macaroni & Cheese	50¢
Fudge Marshmallow Cookies (12 oz)	25¢

We have natural & organic foods, too!
95 River Street, Greenfield - 413-774-5599 - 8 AM to 10 PM Daily
(Route 116 to Deerfield, 91 North to Exit 26, right at Dunkin' Donuts)
~Credit cards, debit cards, cash & food stamps accepted!~

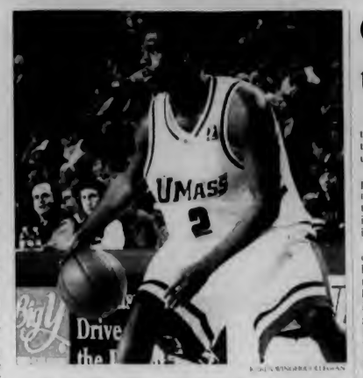
Looking for a larger victory

MEN'S HOOPS from page 12

ously. He had 10 turnovers, so that's something we have to keep thinking about."

After the Minutemen came home with the victory, there was much criticism from the UMass fan base.

People were puzzled with how a team that could beat UConn, George Washington and Xavier could let St. Bonaventure give them such a game.



Lappas was not entirely pleased with the way his team played that day but believes that the final score should garner more weight than the spread.

"I just think it's important to win, you know what I mean?" Lappas said. "It's like saying, 'What difference would it make if we beat UConn by two or by 20?' The object of the game is to win."

One concern going into Saturday's game is the status of Artie Bowers' right thumb. During Tuesday's practice, Bowers sprained his thumb and had it wrapped up on Wednesday.

The Minutemen have listed him as day-to-day and he could potentially make an appearance in Saturday's contest.

Bowers had eight points and four rebounds against the Bonnies last time, including going two-for-five from behind the arc.

Chris Chadwick and the Minutemen will try sweeping St. Bonaventure this season when they do battle tomorrow at noon.

Cahoon looking for team consistency that regard. We're kind of lax in that area, and we need to tighten it up."

HOCKEY from page 12

The Minutemen will put these philosophies to work against a much-improved Northeastern team that is having its best season in four years and sits in sixth place in Hockey East.

The Huskies have been led on offense by Jason Guerrero, who has scored 11 goals and notched a team-high 21 assists for a team-leading 32 points, and Mike Morris, who has a team-high 12 goals alongside 12 assists for 24 points. Their hottest player sits in net though, as Keni Gibson was just named Hockey East Defensive Player of the Week on Jan. 31, for the third time this season. Gibson stopped 57 of 60 shots during a pair of games against Maine over the weekend.

Cahoon acknowledged that Northeastern has already gone through the same growing pains that his team is currently battling.

"I'm sure that some of the things that we're talking about with our team right now, they've already gone through," Cahoon said. "They've made some assessments along those lines, and this has been a process for us; probably a good thing in some ways with the nature of injuries and everything that has happened. It just made us more aware what our needs are going to be."

The Minutemen split their early-season series with Merrimack, featuring an 8-2 victory over the Warriors at the Mullins Center on Nov. 5, and a 5-2 loss at Lawler Arena the following night.

UMass aims to stay perfect

By Eric Athas
Daily Collegian

Put yourself in the place of the Massachusetts men's swimming and diving team.

You've won the last four Atlantic 10 championships and seven in the past nine years.

You've competed in six dual meets this season and won them all.

You're nationally ranked. Your coach, Russ Yarworth, has been named Atlantic-10 Coach of the Year six times, with a record of 214-63.

With all of that piled on your shoulders, your focus is sharp and your goal is singular: win the 2005 Atlantic 10 championship.

"Even though we won every duel meet this season, our main focus is the championship," senior Justin Zeimetz said. "It's important to prepare mentally and to have confidence."

Despite its success, UMass had to first undergo a busy and strenuous schedule up to this point.

The bulk of the work came shortly after the holiday season when the team ventured to San Juan, Puerto Rico for a training session.

After arriving back from Puerto Rico, the Maroon and White attended meets over the course of three consecutive weekends, with virtually no time to rest in between.

Following their final meet of the regular season, a 175-120 win over Fordham, they finally were given some resting time to prep for the pivotal point of the season.

"They really have no rest after the holiday season," Yarworth said. "It is important to give them enough rest during this taper period so they're ready for the championships."

Preparation is not only physical for the swimmers, but also mental.

And while the upperclassmen on the team have experienced this portion of the season several times now, the freshmen have yet to be aquainted with the much-anticipated Atlantic 10 Championships.

"I've been thinking about the A-10's for a couple of weeks now," Derek Castellana said. "I'm really excited for it, and I know I have to get into the right mindset."

The motto for the team this season is "drive for five" in hope of that fifth championship. Although Castellana lacks experience in the Atlantic 10 Championships, he understands the magnitude of this meet and the legacy of the UMass swim team.

While the rookies have a lot on their mind, the veterans have even more to dwell on as they compete in their very last Atlantic 10 Championship meet. The seven seniors who are the leaders of the team are a close-knit bunch who view themselves as a family.

"The last four years went by really fast," Yarworth said. "I've been really lucky to get such good kids that buy into the UMass philosophy. These guys are really psyched and ready to attack when the time comes."

Yarworth, who is in his 26th season, is responsible for 15 titles and is in the midst of a possible 16th. As of now, however, he is focused on the task at hand and relies on his veterans to keep the newcomers ready.

"We really try to make sure that the freshmen take it seriously," Zeimetz said. "I haven't been on this team for all four years, but I still feel like these guys are like my brothers."

As the days count down to the big meet, anxiety is only matched by the amount of excitement that all of the swimmers are feeling.

"It's pretty exciting knowing that you're on a championship team," Castellana said. "Discipline and hard work are two things that are important at this time of the year."

The life of a Division I swimmer is a fast-paced one, with little time to stop or rest. In fact, after the Atlantic 10 championship last year, Yarworth gathered his swimmers together to tell them something.

"Now we need to start training for another championship next year," Yarworth said.

And so the "drive for five" began.

Jad Vonderheid helped UMass go undefeated this season. The Minutemen will try winning their fifth A-10 championship in a row.

Valentino's
Free Buffet
Pizza, Wings, Pasta
Pabst $1.25 Pints
20 Ounce Buds $2.00
Soco & Lime Shots $2.50
SUPER BOWL PARTY
Sun. Feb. 6th
Free Raffle for Patriots T-Shirts, Blankets
Buy a ticket for a chance to win a 27-inch TV
Don't Forget:
Thursday Night: Karaoke, Tuesday Night: Live Jazz and Blues with Good Puddin', Assorted Entertainment Fri, Sat
RT. 9 Hadley, Norwotuck Plaza, behind Lunar Tattoo Phone: 584-6095

No Cals
Last Call
anti-hangover & nutritional drink
No Carbs
No Hangover
All-Natural Anti-Hangover & Nutritional Drink
Last Call is available now at:
Liquors 44, Four Season's Liquors, Stoney's Pub, Holyoke Liquor Mart, Pop's Liquors, R&P Liquors and Niedbala's.
Ask for it at your favorite bar and restaurant
Campus Rep Opportunities Available, Call for more Information
Distributed By Baystate Beverage Distributors, Westfield, MA 413-642-0150
Please Drink Responsibly

This Weekend...
UMASS Basketball
UMASS BASKETBALL Vs. ST BONAVENTURE BONNIES
Saturday
12pm
Mullins Center
MASSACHUSETTS WOMEN'S BASKETBALL Vs. ST BONAVENTURE BONNIES
Sunday
2pm
Mullins Center
STUDENT TICKETS FREE!!

Minutemen ink 14 recruits on signing day

RECRUITS from page 12

CHRIS DIJAK
Defensive End/Offensive Line — Born April 23, 1987

Dijak started for three seasons on the defensive line at Lunenburg High School, while also starting two seasons of offensive tackle for coach Dale Diamantopoulos. Capable of playing on both lines in college, he made 104 tackles and nine sacks on defense as well.

BRIAN FREDERICK
Tight End — Born May 8, 1987

A Lowell Sun All-Star as a junior, and an All-Conference selection during his junior and senior seasons, Frederick caught 38 passes for 650 yards and six touchdowns this season. Another Shriners Game participant, he received the All-Scholastic Award as a senior, and also played hockey and track for three seasons at Dracut High School.

MICHAEL HANSON
Linebacker — Born November 5, 1986

Second Team All-New Jersey and a Bergen Country All Star at linebacker for Teaneck High School (N.J.), Hanson led his team in tackles with 103, including 70 solo stops. A three-time unanimous All-League choice, he played in the New York/New Jersey Governor's Bowl last season.

JOSH JENNINGS
Linebacker — Born January 7, 1987

Jennings had a solid season at Bridgton Academy (Maine), posting 11 sacks and two forced fumbles from his linebacker position. The 2003 Connecticut Defensive Player of the Year at New Britain High School (Conn.), he is the all-time state record holder in career sacks with 64 while also holding the record for sacks in a single season (27) and sacks in a single game (five).

TONY NELSON
Running Back — Born August 24, 1987

In leading Northwest High School to a Maryland State Championship in 2004, Nelson ran for 1,692 yards and 18 touchdowns on 213 carries as a senior. A top 44 recruit in Maryland, he recorded 33 touchdowns over his final two seasons in helping Northwest to a 32-6 record over his three seasons on the squad.

THELUXON PIERRE
Defensive End — Born October 13, 1986

Pierre was an All-Massachusetts selection as a senior at Everett High School, and was named as an All-Scholastic by the Boston Globe and Boston Herald after making 70 tackles and 12 sacks as a senior. He led Everett to a 36-1 record over his three seasons, and was named an EMass All Star in addition to playing in the Shriners Game.

MATT SILVER
Tight End — Born February 7, 1987

An All-Western New York selection who was chosen to play in the New York/New Jersey Governor's Cup, Silver had 25 receptions for 459 yards and 10 touchdowns as a senior, while making 64 tackles and 10 sacks on defense.

SEAN SMALLS
Defensive Back — Born April 20, 1987

An All-Dominion District, All-Central Region and All-Metro selection as a senior at Huguenot High School (Va.), Smalls recorded 16 career interceptions and set a national record with a 109-yard interception return for a touchdown. Also returned five kickoffs for 207 yards and a touchdown.

SCOTT WOODWARD
Quarterback — Born November 2, 1986

Woodward started three seasons under center for Mahar Regional, leading the Senators to consecutive Division III Super Bowl titles. A first-team All-State selection as a senior, he threw for more than 4,000 yards and 46 touchdowns in his career, while interceptiong 26 passes on defense and posting a 40-yard average as a punter.

CHRIS ZARDAS
Running Back — Born December 23, 1986

A four-year starter in the backfield at St. John's Prep in Danvers, Zardas ran for over 4,000 career yards and scoring 48 touchdowns leading D-I in scores in his last two seasons.

UM returns to court after a week off

WOMEN'S HOOPS from page 12

hopefully that will be a positive."

Dacko doesn't plan on making any dramatic changes to the line-up to try to jump-start the offense. She may look to some different players for more offensive contributions, but is more focused on getting consistent production on a daily basis.

One player Dacko said could add a lift to the offense is Ashley Sharpton. The junior guard is capable of scoring from the outside and Dacko may look to Sharpton for an offensive spark.

"I think we've really got to give Ashley Sharpton a good, hard look," Dacko said. "She's someone that can really shoot the three, and she's been practicing very well."

It's been a revolving door for us this year. I'd rather have seven or eight players to focus on, but we don't have that luxury. Whoever stands out is going to get the minutes."

Shooting woes hurt UMass

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

You don't need a Ph.D. to figure out what's been hurting the Massachusetts women's basketball team lately.

It doesn't take a whole lot to figure out why, in two crucial Atlantic 10 Conference games against two teams they stood more than a chance against last weekend, they have been dropped by double digits in each of their last two games.

All you need is a stat sheet, an opposable thumb and some common sense.

Last Friday at the Reilly Center in Olean, N.Y., the visiting Minutewomen shot a mere 27.3 percent from the field against the St. Bonaventure Bonnies, including a dreadful 6-for-19 (20.7 percent) effort from the floor in the first half that tied their season-low 14 points heading into the half.

Their second-half toils were a tad more respectable. They shot 34.6 percent, but it still amounted to just 35 points total, their lowest offensive scoring effort since throwing down a meager 35 against Rhode Island in 2001. The Bonnies and their notoriously noisy crowd took it to the women in maroon and white by two touchdowns.

Sunday's affair in the Bronx against Fordham — a team they owned in their first meeting — wasn't much better. This time, the Maroon and White had a 30.8 percent day from the field, but it was a 5-for-24, 12-point first-half effort — this time the lowest all season — that did them in, falling by ten to the Rams.

"When you look at our percentage right now, the kids have not been good, so we really have to reach deep down in our pockets and step up to the plate," coach Marnie Dacko said.

Overall, the Minutewomen shot just over 28 percent from the floor, a number that needs to improve vastly.

"You can't win ball games when you hold the team to 55 points, and you can't put up that much," Dacko said. "We've got to score."

And so it is that Dacko has adopted a new approach to coaching up the women on their shots. It shouldn't be grueling, she says, but a lot of fun. In practice Wednesday, she told her women to "lighten up" about their low-scoring efforts, and that it's "not the end of the world."

"I think what I'm trying to do is lighten the kids up a little bit, so that there's not so much emphasis on the ball going in the basket, but just that they're caught up with being able to catch passes," Dacko said. "I'm more concerned with our lack of execution on the offense, and not turning the ball over. So, if we can cut down on our turnovers, and get better attempts, get better looks, more looks, then we'll be better."

Brooke Campbell will try to lead UMass past the Bonnies on Sunday.

Which brings us to a certain demon the Minutewomen exorcised earlier in the season, but has come back to haunt them as of late. That demon, of course, is the dreaded turnover column.

The Minutewomen committed a whopping 30 turnovers (27 on Friday, 23 on Sunday), a number that obviously needs some serious downsizing if they are to stay in the hunt for a No. 5 seed in the Atlantic 10 tournament next month.

On Sunday, UMass will get its rematch with the Bonnies at the Mullins Center, where they are 5-2 in 2004-05.

BUCCI
HAIRCUTS always $10.
25 N. Pleasant St. Amherst 256.0733
145 Main St. Northampton 586.0155

SUPERBOWL SUNDAY SPECIAL
Large Cheese Pizza
$6.99 no limit
Toppings $1.50
THE SUB & PIZZA
Free Delivery
549-5160
EXPIRES 2/7/05

ALUMNI ASSOCIATION
ATTENTION FACULTY AND STAFF
Do you know a Senior that is deserving of the Alumni Association Senior Leadership Award? Please help us identify deserving students by nominating them today!
The Senior Leadership Award was established by the UMass Amherst Alumni Association to recognize graduating seniors at UMass Amherst who have demonstrated outstanding leadership and service to the campus. Seniors who have made major contributions in areas such as academic excellence, student organizations, athletics, campus jobs, or community and volunteer services are eligible. In addition to active involvement in the life of the campus, eligible candidates must demonstrate a serious commitment to their academic pursuit.
Nomination forms are available online at UMassAlumni.com/students. For any additional information, contact Melanie Corbeil in the Alumni Association at 545-2317.
Deadline: Wednesday, February 9, 2005 - 5 p.m.

STUDENT TRAVEL
MAKE YOUR BREAK
Spring Break '05
Beach
»Cancun $709 Air + 1 week at Club Verano Beat, located on the beach
»Jamaica $719 Air + 1 week at the Fun Holiday Beach Resort, located on the beach
Europe
»Amsterdam $432 Air + 6 nights at the Bulldog Hostel near central station
»Paris $515 Air + 6 nights at the Aloha Hostel
Alternative
»Costa Rica $688 Air + 6 nights at San Jose / Manuel Antonio
»Montreal $511 Air + 1 week at HI Montreal
Packages include roundtrip airfare from Boston and/or New York and accommodations. Subject to change and availability. Taxes and other applicable fees not included
(413) 256.1261
STA TRAVEL
www.statravel.com

ALL FIRED UP! creative FOOD & BEVERAGE
GRAND OPENING MONGOLIAN BARBEQUE ALL YOU CAN EAT BUFFETS
With Countless combinations of vegetables, poultry, fish, meats and sauces.
Great Live Entertainment on Weekends!
Friday 2/4: The Lonesome Brothers — Country Rock
Saturday 2/5: Vishnu Wood — Jazz Improv
A FANTASTIC FULL BAR!
OPEN 7 DAYS A WEEK FOR LUNCH AND DINNER
SUNDAY BREAKFAST
DESIGN YOUR OWN OMELETS AND PANCAKES
413-584-5155 • WWW.ALLFIREDUPHADLEY.COM • 48 Russell Street, Route 9, Hadley

The Area's Best Fitness & Health Club
UltimateFitness THE HEALTH AND FITNESS CENTER
Located in the Stop & Shop Plaza on Route 9
For more information call 253-7571
SEMESTER SPECIAL $165
FREE UNLIMITED TANNING!
First 100 to Join
NO ENROLLMENT FEE!!
Full Aerobics Program included with Membership:
-Cardio Kickboxing
-Yoga
-And Many More
• Body Masters and Icarian FreeWeights
• Stairmasters
• Cybex Circuit Training Equip.
• Precor Treadmills
• Lifecycle Recumbant Bikes
• Lifecycle Upright Bikes
• Precor Crosstrainers
Inquire About Pilates
Now offering Aerobics only memberships

QUOTE OF THE DAY

"The test of a first-rate intelligence is the ability to hold two opposed ideas in mind at the same time and still retain the ability to function."

-F. Scott Fitzgerald

ACROSS
1 Splinter group
5 Brogan binders
10 Cultivate
14 Reverberation
15 Hersey's bell town
16 In ___ of 17 Conveys
19 Rustic hotels
20 Sudden rush
21 Drive a dinghy
22 Rose and Rozelle
23 Careless
24 Stars over
26 Exist
28 Sports venues
29 Nincompoop
32 Landlord
35 Limit
37 Thorn apples
39 Oscar winner Norma
40 Worthy of penance
42 Weaser with a black-tipped tail
43 ___ Drago
44 British insurance syndicate
46 Recent
47 Brainy
48 Excess weight
50 Hatfield's enemy
53 Chicken ___ king
54 Be festive
57 Promissory notes
58 Florida swamp
60 Fruit pastry
61 Comic actress Zatzu
62 Ave's cousin
63 Alimony recipients
64 Out of style
65 "SportsCenter" spn

DOWN
1 Solidifies
2 Beige shade
3 South Carolina port
4 Country near Fiji
5 Human seal
6 Worshipper
7 Seasonal serenader
8 Twists together
9 Help!
10 Takes to the air
11 "___ Too Proud to Beg"
12 Philosopher Descartes
13 Rumpire
18 Gender
22 Nag
25 Brakes violently
26 Robert and Alan
27 Spanish cowboy's lariat
29 Fit for farming
29 Ventilation ports
30 Act division
31 Scatter about
33 Baltimore paper
34 Verbality
36 Aries image
38 Bratislava's country
41 Holes for laces
45 Air currents
47 Expenses
48 Team follower
49 Homemade brick
50 Speck
51 Wheedle
52 Make well
55 Cast from the hatchery
56 Gull relative
58 Arithmetic abbr
59 Map dir

Find today's answers online
www.dailycollegian.com

The Moan and Dove
Irish Car Bomb $7.00
PBR & Jager Shot $5.50
23 — World Wide Stout $12.00
Best friend puking in your backseat on his 21st...
...worthless
themoananddove.com
460 West St. • Rte. 116
Amherst, MA • 256-1710
3pm 'til 1am every day

Want to increase the size of your Piggy bank?
Advertise with The Daily Collegian
and watch your profits grow
Contact our advertising dept. 545-3500

H·O·R·O·S·C·O·P·E·S

aquarius • Jan. 20-Feb. 18
Make sure someone doesn't tie your shoelaces together while you're not looking.

pisces • Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Keep an eye on your fish. Flounder might be getting suicidal.

aries • Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Today you're going to get in the middle of an argument you tried to steer clear of.

taurus • Apr. 20-May 20
That pair of socks you've been looking for was eaten by the laundry machine.

gemini • May 21-Jun. 21
Without your hat, your hair is just way too big.

cancer • Jun. 22-Jul. 22
You are so adorable. Someone is just going to snatch you right up.

leo • Jul. 23-Aug. 22
Your chocolate stash is running out. You need to get more before it's too late!

virgo • Aug. 23-Sept. 22
The Blue Wall is a great place to people-watch. Just sit back and relax.

libra • Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Start planning alternative plans for Valentine's Day.

scorpio • Oct. 23-Nov. 21
Don't even attempt to do your reading in bed.

sagittarius • Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Today you will see your special friend all over the place.

capricorn • Dec. 22-Jan. 19
Don't let anyone doubt your dedication to the cause.

$$$ Build your business with our business. Place your ad here, in The Collegian. $$$

MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN MARKETPLACE

ACTIVITIES

Foam party Montreal weekends $89 Montreal Express.Net 1(781)979-9001

ANNOUNCEMENTS

Beach Club Tanning (413-549-4688): 20% Off any purchase on Tuesday, Feb. 8th (Future sessions and packages included) Ask for the "Hockey Special" and help UMass Women's Ice Hockey team travel to Nationals!

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Sunderland 2-bedroom townhouse on busline 830+ Call Erica 413-665-7794

1 bedroom available North Amherst $425 includes heat & electric, bright, clean, washer/dryer in Condo on bus route 1 mile to UMass female preferred Call Liz 508-367-8893

Amherst two bedroom condo on busline 875+, Call Paul 413-687-1416

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Center of town, 1, 2, 3 bedrooms, hardwood floors. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

Hobart Condos 3 bedroom, hardwood floors, study area in basement. Cable, telephone (internet access) in all bedrooms and study. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

AUTO FOR SALE

1993 Toyota Tercel Coup. Economical, reliable, $1275.00 582-9103

CHILDCARE

Early Riser Needed 7:00am to 8:15pm 2 to 4 days a week. Occasional afternoon and Evenings. For 8yr old girl. $10.00 an hr. Please call 584-8312 mmagalli@umassmed.edu

CHILDCARE

Babysitter 3 year old boy afternoon/evenings Amherst 413-256-3048

Nanny position for 2 boys ages 6 & 9. Perfect schedule for student. Part time Spring. Full time Summer. Prior experience necessary. 413-625-2288

EMPLOYMENT

Earn lots of $$ and have fun on the water this Spring & Summer. Raft guides needed at Crab Apple Whitewater in Charlemont, MA. Fun Summer job, no experience necessary. We will train. 413-625-2288.

Paid marketing internship Seeking highly motivated marketing/communications major. Call Lindsey 800-769-3618

Drivers & Kitchen Help Wanted. Must be able to work 20hrs A week. Apply at DP Dough, Amherst.

EMPLOYMENT

PCA needed in Northampton $10/hr. Reliable car necessary. Laundry, Shopping, Cooking, Cleaning. Please call Linda Gaffney at 586-0029

"Bartending" $300/Day Potential. No Experience Nesc. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

Zoar Outdoor is seeking applications for 2005 Seasonal raft guides. No experience necessary, will train (weekends in Feb-March). A positive Customer Service attitude and knowledge of outdoor recreation a plus. Application deadline: Feb 5th call 413-339-4010 or see www.zoaroutdoor.com/jobs.htm EOE

JV Lacrosse Coach Amherst it's mid March to early June. Playing experience required coaching experience preferred JH Position Roger Jones 549-3983

EMPLOYMENT

Top Boys Sports Camp in Maine! Play & Coach Sports * Have Fun * Make $$$ Camp Counselors Positions Available Summer 2005 Apply Online www.campvb-bussco.com or call 1-800-473-6104

Movie extras, actors, models! Make $100-$300/day No experience required, FT/PT, All looks needed! 1800-340-5939 Ext. 1054

HOUSE FOR RENT

South Deerfield Center on bus route newly renovated 2 bedroom $1000 per month plus utilities and security deposit 413-498-5148

MISCELLANEOUS

Earn $4000, become an egg donor. www.reproductiveassistance.com or 514-831-9207

ROOM FOR RENT

350 per month 413-335-5226

Bedroom for rent in spacious house in Leverett Call Brett 413-219-5808

ROOMMATE WANTED

Female Puffton 1 Room 340.00 Negs. 617-921-7740

SERVICES

Do you know your rights as a student, tenant, worker, and consumer? The Student Legal Services Office can help with your questions. Come to 922 Campus Center or Call 545-1995.

Need Just Evacuation and Repatriation Coverage? Check out BETA! $250,000 Evacuation, $25,000 Repatriation COST is $18 for 6 MONTHS! Online enrollment, emailed verification of coverage www.betins.com

SERVICES

Computer Consultants $20/hr we come to your dorm/house/certified technicians. Call Kris (413) 253-0215

PREGNANCY TEST ING, HIV TESTING, Birth control, and Emergency Contraception Affordable and confidential. STI Screening and Treatment. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 545-0832

TRAVEL

XXX Night Montreal Weekends $89 Montreal Expressnet 1(781)979-9001

Bahamas Spring Cruise 5 Days $299! Includes Meals, Celebrity Parties! Panama City, Daytona $159! Cancun, Jamaica, Acapulco, Nassau $499! Award Winning Company! SpringBreakTravel.com 1-800-678-6386

TRAVEL

Spring Break 2005 Only 6 weeks left... Lowest Prices Biggest Parties Earn 2 Free Trips Exclusive with Sun Splash Tours www.sunsplashtours.com 1800-426-7710

#1 Spring Break Vacations! Cancun, Jamaica, Acapulco, Bahamas, & Florida! Best Parties, Best Hotels, Best Prices! Limited Space! 1-800-234-7007 www.endlesssummertours.com

WANTED

Screenwriters wanted for local film Company Filthysuner@hotmail.com

Snowboard events intern $50/day stipend. For job description email jfriends@deerfield.edu

Your Ad Could Go Here
Call 545-3500 for details

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS THURSDAY

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 2005 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Fourteen officially commit to UMass

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

After adding seven players to its roster from the college and prep school ranks on Monday, head coach Don Brown officially announced the Massachusetts football team's 2005 recruiting class yesterday.

Fourteen players officially committed to UMass on National Letter of Intent Day, including six offensive players, six defensive players, one two-way player and one special teams player.

Six of the 14 players hail from Massachusetts while two come from New York and one apiece from Connecticut, New Jersey, Ohio, Florida, Virginia and Maryland.

The following is a breakdown of the 2005 recruiting class:

Stephen Babinski
Offensive Line
Born September 6, 1985

An All-New England first team selection after a stellar season as team captain at St. Thomas More (Conn.), Babinski was named team co-MVP after not allowing a sack during his senior season. Also a defensive end, he made 43 tackles and nine sacks while also scoring a touchdown on a blocked punt.

George Byrd
Linebacker
Born November 7, 1987

Ranked as the fourth-best linebacker committed to a I-AA school by Rivals.com after being honored as a two-time First Team All-County selection at Naples High School (Fla.), Byrd made 102 tackles and 10.5 sacks last season, while causing three fumbles and forcing 16 quarterback hurries.

Brandon Collier
Defensive End
Born September 27, 1985

A Second Team All-Ohio selection after a tremendous senior season that saw him post 107 tackles, including 75 unassisted. Collier was also selected to the county all-star team by the Cleveland Plain Dealer, and recorded 10 sacks and 19 tackles for a loss while playing at Western Reserve Academy (Ohio).

Armando Cuko
Kicker/Punter
Born May 2, 1987

A native of Albania and a team captain at Beverly High School, Cuko was a three-time all conference selection and was named Special Teams Player of the Week 12 times during his three-year career. He made five-of-six field goals, 16-of-17 extra points, posted a 38-yard average as a punter and has a career-long field goal of 40 yards.

2005 Recruiting Class
Massachusetts Minutemen

Name	Pos.	Height	Weight	Hometown
Stephen Babinski	OL	6-4	300	Southampton, N.Y.
George Byrd	LB	6-1	215	Naples, Fla.
Brandon Collier	DE	6-1	250	Hudson, Ohio
Armando Cuko	K/P	5-10	185	Beverly, Mass.
Christopher Dijak	DE/OL	6-4	255	Lunenburg, Mass.
Brian Frederick	TE	6-4	240	Dracut, Mass.
Michael Henson	LB	6-2	230	Teaneck, N.J.
Josh Jennings	LB	5-11	210	Windsor, Conn.
Tony Nelson	RB	5-10	210	Germantown, Md.
Theluson Pierre	DE	6-2	230	Everett, Mass.
Matt Silver	TE	6-4	235	Victor, N.Y.
Sean Smalls	DB	6-1	190	Richmond, Va.
Scott Woodward	QB	6-3	190	Wendell, Mass.
Chris Zardas	RB	6-1	215	Wakefield, Mass.

UMASS

See RECRUITS on page 10

Minutemen looking for more convincing win in rematch

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

In most college basketball circles, a conference win is seen as a positive.

However, when a team beats an under matched and undermanned team by four points in double overtime, some would say it's almost as bad as a loss.

This very instance occurred in Olean, N.Y., on Jan. 26, when the Massachusetts men's basketball team squeaked by St. Bonaventure 82-78, in a double overtime thriller.

The Minutemen take on the Bonnies again Saturday at 12 p.m. under much different circumstances. This time, St. Bonaventure must travel seven hours through the plains of western New York and into the farmland of western Massachusetts for a rematch that, on paper, appears to be in the Minutemen's favor.

However, there is one major intangible that UMass coach Steve Lappas sees as a definitive advantage: the comfort of the home court.

"Being home makes a big difference," Lappas said. "I know it's a lot easier being here than kind of being by yourself on the road out in Olean, and I think it will make a big difference."

In its last trip to Olean, UMass got a real ear full. The student section in the Reilly Center was packed and the Minutemen were never able to get past the noise and into an easy rhythm.

Aside from the crowd noise, the Minutemen were also very passive with their perimeter defense, letting St. Bonaventure's two premiere players, Wade Dunston and Patrick Lottin have open shots for the majority of regulation.

After the first five minutes of the game, it became increasingly obvious that UMass was not going to give the Bonnies any open shots from 3-point land. Sophomore Maurice Maxwell kept an eye on Dunston, and Lottin was pressured no matter where he was on the court.

St. Bonaventure coach Anthony Solomon saw the defense and made a quick adjustment that let the Bonnies go on a bit of a roll. Soloman told his team to penetrate and dish, a system that left bodies unguarded and let 3-pointers fall.

"I think we really need to step it up a notch defensively, that's what I want," Lappas said. "We really need to step it up a notch to stop their dribble penetration. I think they got to the basket on us a lot and they made a lot of those threes. They drove and they kicked."

Anthony Anderson and the Minutemen had a tough time with the Bonnies their first time around.

Dunston put together his best offensive game against the Minutemen and mentioned afterwards that it may have been the best game of his career. Dunston dropped 28 points that night, including going three-for-six behind the arc.

However, aside from his shooting prowess, Dunston felt the pressure of the stymieing UMass defense. After showcasing the fact that he had a touch, the Minutemen pestered him wherever he went on the court, eventually forcing him to make a game-high 10 turnovers.

"We knew he made three or four threes against Rhode Island. We knew that he was going to be a dangerous guy to play against," Lappas said. "Our pressure bothered him, obvi-

See MEN'S HOOPS on page 9

Former UMass QB Krohn signs with NFL's Steelers

Former Massachusetts quarterback Jeff Krohn has reunited with his former head coach Mark Whipple, signing a free agent contract with the Pittsburgh Steelers of the National Football League. The terms of the deal were not disclosed.

Krohn, who transferred to UMass from Arizona State and played two seasons under Whipple from 2002-03, was one of 14 players signed by the Steelers yesterday, and will play in NFL Europe this summer.

An All-Atlantic 10 performer who led the Minutemen to a share of the A-10 championship in 2003, Krohn threw for 4,994 yards and 44 touchdowns over the two seasons while completing 53 percent of his passes.

Prior to his time under Whipple, Krohn started two seasons for the Sun Devils, completing 240-of-467 passes for 3,693 yards and 31 touchdowns with 13 interceptions while leading the Pacific 10 Conference in passing efficiency in 2001 with a quarterback rating of 153.4.

Krohn, a native of Winnipeg, Manitoba, originally entered the Canadian Football League upon leaving Amherst, but eventually decided to pursue other ventures before finding his first NFL home in Pittsburgh. His father Jim was a four-year letterwinner as quarterback for the University of Arizona, where he captained the Wildcats' 1979 Fiesta Bowl team.

-Mike Marzelli

Another shot at SBU

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's basketball team returns to the hardwood this weekend after a week-long break between games. This Sunday at 2 p.m. the Minutewomen will host Atlantic 10 foe St. Bonaventure.

UMass will look to snap a two-game losing streak and exact some revenge on the Bonnies in the process. This current mini-slide for the Minutewomen began at St. Bonaventure on Friday when the Bonnies handed UMass a 49-35 defeat. UMass then fell at Fordham, 54-44 on Sunday.

The earlier meeting between UMass and St. Bonaventure resulted in record-setting performances for both teams. St. Bonaventure, which was ranked No. 11 in the A-10 in points-per-game-allowed at the time, held the Minutewomen to the fewest points it had ever allowed in an A-10 game. The offensive futility wasn't an all-time low for the Minutewomen, but it was the lowest point total during coach Marnie Dacko's two-year tenure. The 35 points were the fewest for the Minutewomen since Jan. 31, 2001, when they registered 35 in a loss to Rhode Island.

"I'm mostly concerned with our execution," Dacko said. "Our inconsistencies with shooting will happen. Our main concern is our lack of efficiency on offense."

Dacko's concerns are certainly warranted. UMass turned the ball over 27 times at St. Bonaventure and had 23 turnovers in the loss to Fordham.

"We're just throwing the ball away, unforced," Dacko said. "St. Bonaventure and Fordham didn't beat us. They got the wins, but they didn't beat us, we beat ourselves. It's much easier for a coach to accept the fact that we got beat. But we didn't get beat, we defeated ourselves."

The Minutewomen (11-9, 4-5 A-10) have completed just over half of their conference schedule and currently are in second place in the A-10 East Division. Sunday's game begins the final leg of the season for the Minutewomen as they will play seven games in the next four weeks, all against conference opponents.

Despite struggling through stretches this season, St. Bonaventure seems to be hitting its stride at the right time. The Bonnies come to Amherst riding the momentum of two consecutive wins against A-10 opponents.

The matchup with St. Bonaventure (8-12, 3-6 A-10) has added importance because the Bonnies have closed to within one game of UMass in the league standings.

Although St. Bonaventure is drawing nearer to UMass in the standings, Dacko is not ready to start checking the rearview mirror. "If we play our game, the standings will fall into place for us," she said.

Dacko believes that UMass is close is to turning the corner and is thankful to be returning to the friendly confines of the Mullins Center this weekend.

"It's great to be back here," Dacko said. "It's also great that the kids have started school. We got to a point where we were always on the road, and now there's a change in their day-to-day activities and

See WOMEN'S HOOPS on page 10

Katie Nelson will try to help the Minutewomen end their two-game losing streak when they take the court on Sunday against St. Bonaventure, their first game after a week-long layoff.

KAREN WINGERT/COLLEGIAN

Mass Attack just looks for consistency

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

The month of January wasn't very kind to Massachusetts.

Mother Nature dropped over two feet of snow in most areas throughout the Bay State, causing a state of emergency in many cities and towns and closing down schools for days.

The Massachusetts hockey team (10-15-2, 4-10-2 Hockey East) didn't have a kind month, either.

But after going winless in its six games (0-5-1),

KAREN WINGERT/COLLEGIAN

UMass will be without Mike Kostka due to his injured ankle tonight against Northeastern.

UMass is moving into a new month with a chance to garner some momentum heading into the Hockey East tournament.

That will all start tonight when the Minutemen travel to Matthews Arena to take on the Northeastern Huskies (9-13-4, 5-8-3 HEA) at 7 p.m. for the first time this season. UMass will then travel to North Andover to do battle with Merrimack (8-19-2, 1-15-1 HEA) on Saturday night at 7 p.m.

Northeastern won the last two meetings between the teams last year and has played the Minutemen tough during their games in Boston recently.

As the season winds down though, and conference games become increasingly important, UMass coach Don Cahoon has a more simplistic goal: to create some consistency and to keep the team moving in the right direction for next year.

"Every game in our league, from start to finish, counts for two points. When you get down to the end and there are only so many games left, each two points seems like they're a little bit bigger, and in the standings they probably are," Cahoon admitted.

"Our concern, though, more than points, is playing well. We haven't played well, consistently, throughout the year. We've had some good games, and then we've had some games that aren't so good.

"In order for us to walk away from this at the end of the year feeling like we're moving in the right direction, we need to create some consistency, so that's a bigger motivation than the points."

Noting that the team breaks down fundamentally when they fall behind, Cahoon has stressed individual accountability to get his players back to playing better, more organized, hockey.

"It's beyond [getting back to] basics," Cahoon said. "We're trying to create a scenario where there is more accountability so that everybody is aware of what they're supposed to be doing and that people are taking the responsibility to make other people accountable. We're leaning on the kids to police themselves in

See HOCKEY on page 9

Austrian artist gives new look to Hampden Gallery corridor
ARTS & LIVING, PAGE 5

TODAY • High: 37° • Low: 15° | SATURDAY • High: 41° • Low: 21° | SUNDAY • High: 39° • Low: 19°
DAILY WEATHER FORECAST

Check out what the sports staff has to say
SPORTS, PAGE 10

The Daily Collegian

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 2005 NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY • EST. 1890 VOLUME CXV ISSUE 73

UMass tightening security Sunday

By Nathan Chomsky-Higgins
Collegian Correspondent

With the distinct possibility of a Super Bowl victory on Sunday, and the memory of the Red Sox riots still fresh in people's minds, the University of Massachusetts administration is taking several steps to protect students and property to hopefully prevent a repeat of the previous championship celebrations.

Residence Life is taking a much more aggressive stance this time around, with many fliers and other information posted across campus. A door hanger, distributed to RAs to put on their floors, highlights exactly what can happen to a student who decides to participate in large celebrations is one example of these.

Resident Assistants in all the buildings will be kept at half staff and duty will be extended to avoid problems in the buildings. Extra money has also been set aside for Super Bowl-related programming in the residence halls to give students an alternate, safer way to celebrate and enjoy the game.

There is also going to be a much stricter guest policy implemented in every residence hall on campus. According to an e-mail sent to all students by Michael Gilbert, Director of Housing Services, "Beginning at 6:00 p.m., only UMass Amherst students with a valid ID will be allowed to register as guests in any of the residence halls on campus."

Jo-Anne Vanin, Dean of Students, does not anticipate any problems following the game.

"I think after what happened with the Red Sox-Yankees series that students have gotten the message," Vanin said.

During the several riots that occurred during the baseball playoffs, 85 students were arrested on various charges. One was expelled from school, 13 were suspended, and the other 71 received deferred suspensions, pending completion of their trials in court. There were also damages to campus property in excess of $100,000.

Police presence is expected to be comparable to what was seen at the Red Sox riots. Barbara O'Connor, Chief of the UMass Police Department has high hopes that the night will go over smoothly.

"Its important to emphasize that students can celebrate safely. What we get worried about is dangerous behaviors, the body surfing, the fireworks, bottles being thrown at the police... Most students come out to celebrate peacefully. It's the agitators who ruin it for everyone" she says.

Vanin is also very certain in the UMass Police Department.

"I am confident in their ability to assess the situation and respond appropriately" she said, adding that "It's not about stopping [the students'] celebrations, it's about protecting them and UMass property."

Many other university groups, including the Student Government Association, have stepped forward to denounce the rioting and other dangerous behaviors and their effects on the campus. They cite the costs to the campus, and therefore the students, and also the damage to the university's image across the country.

The university has stated that it will not tolerate any more rioting or disturbances on campus, and any students arrested at them will be punished severely, which may include expulsion under the university's Code of Student Conduct.

Sorority members searching for answers

Drug allegations help evict Delta Zeta members

By Dan O'Brien
Collegian Staff

Left with few answers, 15 residents of the University of Massachusetts chapter of the Delta Zeta sorority are looking for new housing after being abruptly evicted from their house.

The residence on 11 Phillips St. is currently under investigation by the national chapter of Delta Zeta after "unspecific drug allegations" surfaced, according to the national chapter's executive director, Cindy Mingas.

The national chapter sent a letter to Delta Zeta residents on Friday, Jan. 25 — one day before residents were expected to move back into the house — stating they had to move off the premises by 5 p.m. Tuesday, Jan. 29.

Some members of the UMass Delta Zeta chapter have said they are extremely upset with the national organization's decision to remove them from their house, while others some are questioning the legality of evicting residents without 30-days notice.

A Delta Zeta member who was evicted from the sorority's house spoke with the Daily Collegian on the condition of anonymity. She alleges that the president of the national chapter, Debra Rossiano, phoned the parents of the members saying the drug allegations stemmed from cocaine trafficking, something several of the sorority members have vehemently denied.

"I've never seen coke in my life," the anonymous member said. "[The national chapter] had parents doubting their own children ... [The parents] thought their kids were lying."

Several media reports have said allegations of illegal drug use at Delta Zeta surfaced when a maintenance worker took a photograph of a marijuana pipe in a member's bedroom. The photograph was allegedly sent to the national chapter.

Sorority members who the Collegian spoke with said they could not confirm if the worker had mailed the picture, but did say it was clear someone had gone through their personal belongings over the winter break. One member identified the worker identified as "Handyman Hank."

A junior who lived at Delta Zeta, Abby Marsh said nobody she spoke with from the sorority knows who was in possession of the alleged marijuana pipe.

"It's kind of sad because this has made people doubt their friends," Marsh said, adding that the allegations were "very surprising" to everyone.

The national chapter members flew into Massachusetts from Ohio Tuesday for a closed door meeting with UMass Delta Zeta members to discuss the current situation. The members told the Collegian that not much new information came out of the meeting.

"They told us they are shutting down the house and they're taking our charter away," said the anonymous source, who added that Delta Zeta officials will allow members to be given alumni status and be left with good standing.

The Office of UMass Amherst Fraternities and Sororities, Michael Wiseman said his office and the office of the Dean of Students has been helping several of the displaced residents to find new housing on campus.

"Every member had an option to move back and a few took advantage of that," Wiseman said.

Since the eviction notice was handed down, the national office issued a security guard to stand watch over the house. One was seen sitting in a car outside the house yesterday afternoon.

MATTHEW REILLY/COLLEGIAN

Delta Zeta sorority, shown above, remains vacated after the sorority's national chapter order members out last week.

Assunta DiMuro, a sophomore who lived at Delta Zeta, believed that the sorority was shut down because the national chapter was afraid of the reputation it would receive due to the allegations.

"I think that just knowledge of a fact — whether true or not — gives them good enough reason to take those actions," DiMuro said. "In our eyes, we think they should have proof."

Marsh claims that sorority members have been subject to harassment around campus since the allegations surfaced. In one instance, she claimed a group of males parked their cars outside the Delta Zeta house and began yelling obscenities and phrases such as, "coke heads!" while a security guard looked on, doing nothing to stop them.

DiMuro says this experience is not going to end the friendships the sisters have already made.

"It's sad that they did this because we all really did get along," DiMuro said. "We're all sticking together through this ordeal."

Marsh, who plans on filing a lawsuit against Delta Zeta, says this incident is sad because of all the good the sorority has done for the UMass Amherst community.

"It's unfortunate that something like this had to happen because of all the things our sorority has done for the community, such as philanthropy wise," Marsh said. "We stand by the university and support what is right. We're sorry that the proper due process was not followed in this case."

Pittsfield man fined after shooting eagle

By Adam Gorlick
Associated Press

SPRINGFIELD, Mass. — A 79-year-old World War II veteran was fined $5,000 and ordered not to hunt for two years Thursday after admitting he shot down a bald eagle.

Joseph Donohue of Pittsfield was sentenced Thursday in U.S. District Court for killing the federally-protected bird in October 2003. He pleaded guilty to shooting the eagle, which environmental officials say was younger than five years old.

Officials say it's only the third eagle to be shot down in Massachusetts during the past 20 years.

"I have to admit I made a mistake," Donohue told U.S. District Court Judge Michael Ponsor. "I know I would never in any way shoot at a bird I thought was an eagle."

Donohue, an ex-Navy pilot who spent four decades working for General Electric after WWII, shot the eagle while hunting in Cheshire. Donohue's lawyer, Mark Brennan, said his client caught a glimpse of the bird's shadow and mistook it for something other than an eagle. Brennan said Donohue heard other gunshots as the bird was flying by, and then fired his own shotgun at it.

Brennan said the killing has cost Donohue "many sleepless nights."

But Ponsor admonished Donohue for not taking better aim, a precaution he said his father instilled in him as a boy during hunting trips.

"He always told me that you don't shoot unless you know what you're shooting at," Ponsor said. "You don't shoot at a shadow."

Donohue faced up to a year in jail and $115,000 in fines, but prosecutors recommended fining him only $3,000 and having him stop hunting for two years. But Ponsor, calling the eagle shooting "a serious crime" that "needs to be dealt with seriously," imposed a $5,000 fine along with the hunting prohibition.

President Bush speaks to the nation

By David Espo
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — At the dawn of a second term, President Bush is campaigning again, this time for changes in Social Security that would combine reduced government benefits for younger workers with "a chance to build a nest egg" through personal accounts.

"We must make Social Security permanently sound, not leave that task for another day," Bush told Congress Wednesday night in a State of the Union address that elicited applause from Republicans and audible grumbles from Democrats in the audience.

With success in Congress far from assured, the president chose to follow up the prime time televised speech with trips over two days to four states. Each is represented in the Senate by at least one Democrat the administration hopes to sway on Social Security.

Bush's first stop was North Dakota, which he won heavily in last fall's election. Even so, early indications were not so positive this time.

"He's saying we've got to take more money out of Social Security to start private accounts and borrow the money," said Sen. Kent Conrad, D-N.D., a target of Bush's travels. "I just think it's very unwise."

Other Democrats said Bush's program could reduce guaranteed government benefits for younger Americans by 40 percent.

Bush offered no information on that point Wednesday night as he outlined his plans in broad strokes. Aides said that by leaving many key details vague, he intended to give GOP congressional leaders room to piece together legislation that can command a majority.

He laid down a few markers, though, saying he will not agree to increase payroll taxes and wants provisions to keep lower-income Americans above the poverty line during retirement.

"We must guarantee that there is no change" in current or promised benefits for anyone age 55 and older, he said in a move to neutralize opposition from older Americans.

COURTESY CNN.COM

President Bush addresses the nation Wednesday night in his State of the Union address from the Capitol Building in Washington, D.C.

In a 53-minute speech, Bush also blended the conservative with the compassionate, and gave no ground on his policy on the war in Iraq in which more than 1,400 American forces have died.

He renewed his call for a constitutional amendment banning gay marriage, and announced an increase in the use of DNA evidence to prevent wrongful convictions. "Soon I will send Congress a proposal to fund special training for defense counsel in capital cases," he added.

In an echo of his inaugural address pledge to promote freedom overseas, he called on the government of Iran to "end its support for terror. And to the Iranian people, I say tonight: As you stand for your own liberty, America stands with you."

The longest applause was

See ADDRESS on page 3

Insurgents strike back after elections

By Jason Keyser
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Insurgents struck back with a vengeance following a post-election lull, killing at least 26 Iraqis and two Marines in new attacks, and the first partial election results released Thursday showed the Shiite cleric-endorsed ticket running strong as expected.

The partial results came from 1.6 million votes counted so far in Baghdad and five others of Iraq's 18 provinces. The United Iraqi Alliance, which is backed by the country's most influential Shiite cleric, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, had 1.1 million votes, and the list led by interim Prime Minister Ayad Allawi's list was second with more than 360,500 votes.

The figures showed the alliance leading over Allawi in all six provinces but were too small to indicate a national trend. The results came from 25 percent of the votes cast in Baghdad and partial counts from five Shiite-dominated provinces, where the Alliance had been expected to do well.

The commission has said it could take up to seven to 10 days from Sunday's election to produce full official results. So far, tallies from 10 percent of the country's polling stations have been counted, it said.

Seats in the 275-member National Assembly will be allocated by the percentage of the nationwide vote that each faction wins. Around 14 million Iraqis were eligible in the election, but turnout is still not known, so it was not known what percentage of the total vote 1.6 million ballots would be.

Iraqi election officials said Thursday they sent a team to Mosul to look into allegations of voting irregularities in Ninevah province, a largely Sunni region. Complaints have included polling stations running short of ballots, confusion over the poll locations and ongoing military operations. It was not clear how many voters were affected.

Shiites turned out in large numbers in Sunday's balloting, eager to turn their majority into political power.

Many in the Sunni Arab minority stayed away, raising fears the outcome could further

See IRAQ on page 2

Former priest's fate in jurors' hands

By Denise Lavoie
Associated Press

CAMBRIDGE, Mass. — A jury briefly deliberated the fate of defrocked priest Paul Shanley on Thursday after hearing lawyers in the case clash over the validity of the repressed memories his accuser said came to him decades after the sexual abuse allegedly took place.

The jury deliberated for all of 30 minutes when the judge sent them home for the day. They were to return to Middlesex Superior Court on Friday to resume deliberations.

Earlier Thursday, Shanley's attorney in closing arguments contended the accusers allegations were orchestrated by personal injury lawyers, while a prosecutor argued the man's memories of the alleged rape and molestation were too agonizing to be lies.

See SHANLEY on page 3

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center
University of Massachusetts
Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief Peter Foundas
Managing Editor Mike Marzelli
Business Manager Rich Pacheco
Production Manager Cory Rosenberg
Night Supervisor Meghan Healy
Advertising Manager Tiffany Sugalski
Editorial Production Samantha M. Nielsen
Arts & Living Editor Michael Bissack
Comics Editor Alyson Zillmann
Editorial Editor Yousef Munayyer
News Editor Erika Lovley
Photo Editor Alex Demosthene
Sports Editor Bob McGovern
Circulation Manager Kristen Weiss
Classified Advertising Marty Pappas
Distribution Manager Josh Kiggens
Finance Manager Hirak Shah
Accounting Clerk Virginie Frecaut
Human Resources Sandra Marquet
Assistant Operations Linda Wallack
Assistant Advertising Josh Greenberg
Assistant Business Nathan Chomsky
Assistant Finance Thomas Hecht
Advertising Production Rachael Bruno
Graphics Adviser Charlie Higgins
Asst. Arts & Living Matthew O'Rourke
Asst. Arts & Living Chris Gazzara
Assistant Editorial Allison Edles
Assistant News Julie O'Donnell
Assistant News Dan O'Brien
Assistant Photo Megan Brinster
Assistant Sports Jeff Howe

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts calendar semester. The Collegian is independently funded, operating on advertising revenue. Founded in 1890, the paper began as Index Life became The College Signal in 1901, the Weekly Collegian in 1914 and the Bi-Weekly Collegian in 1956. Published daily since 1967. The Collegian has been printed sheet since January 1994. For advertising rates and information, call (413) 545-3500 between 8:30 a.m. and 5:30 p.m.

Campus Perspectives

By Matthew Reid

What are you doing for the Super Bowl, and what are your predictions?

sophomore
Computer Science major

"I have to work, so I can't watch. Besides, the commercials are the best part anyway."

Gabby Joseph

junior
English major

"I'm not a football fan, but I watch anyway. I have no prediction."

Karl Peters

sophomore
Psychology major

"Watching the game with my friends. The Patriots will win."

Lindsay Miller

senior
Accounting major

"I am going up to N.H. for a family Super Bowl party. I predict the Pats are going to win, 13-10."

Joshua Parker

junior
English and Art major

"Working security. My prediction is that half of the people in the dorms will forget they aren't allowed to bring guests in after the game, and then swear drunkenly at me. Oh ... and the Pats will win of course."

Carolyn Depp

Production Crew
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Matt Elder
PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Matthew Reid
COPY EDITOR
Monique Jemmott
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Alyson Zillmann
PRODUCTION STAFF
Amanda Allen, Tom Heslin

Pope's health improving

By William J. Kole
Associated Press

VATICAN CITY — Easing fears about Pope John Paul II's latest health crisis, the Vatican said Thursday he was improving and breathing more easily, but hinted the frail 84-year-old pontiff may have to spend up to a week in the hospital to fully recover.

Prayers and good wishes poured in from around the globe, including a hand-scribbled note from the imprisoned Turk who tried to assassinate the pope on St. Peter's Square in 1981.

John Paul has not suffered from any more throat spasms and spent a second restful night at Rome's Gemelli Polyclinic hospital, where a team of doctors was watching him carefully for any sign of complications from his flu.

See POPE on page 3

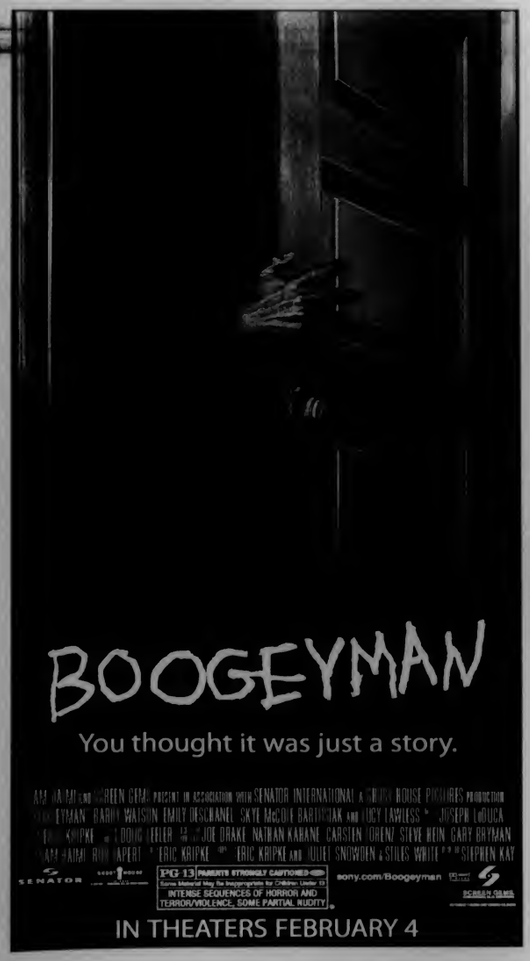
Iraq seeing increased attacks

IRAQ from page 1

Damage from an insurgent attack can be seen on this car in Baghdad. Insurgents have been on the offensive since the elections.

alienate them and continue to fuel the Sunni-led insurgency.

Insurgents had eased up on attacks following the elections, when American and Iraqi forces imposed sweeping security measures. But starting Wednesday night, guerrillas launched a string of dramatic attacks.



In the deadliest incident, insurgents stopped a minibus south of Kirkuk, ordered army recruits off the vehicle and gunned down 12 of them, said Maj. Gen. Anwar Mohammed Amin. Two soldiers were allowed to go free, ordered by the rebels to warn others against joining Iraq's U.S.-backed security forces, he said.

The assailants identified themselves as members of Takfir wa Hijra, the name of an Islamic group that emerged in the 1960s in Egypt, rejecting society as corrupt and seeking to establish a utopian Islamic community.

Elsewhere, gunmen fired on a vehicle carrying Iraqi contractors Thursday to jobs at a U.S. military base in Baqouba north of the capital, killing two people, officials said.

A suicide car bomber struck a foreign convoy escorted by military Humvees on Baghdad's dangerous airport road Thursday, destroying several vehicles and damaging a house, Iraqi police said. Helicopters were seen evacuating some casualties, witnesses said. There was no immediate comment from the U.S. military.

Insurgents ambushed another convoy in the area, killing five Iraqi policemen and an Iraqi National Guard major, police said.

Jurors deliberating in trial of former priest

SHANLEY from page 1

Shanley's lawyer said the alleged victim's 20-year-old memories of being raped by Shanley as a young boy were planted by a friend, who also had accused Shanley of abuse, and then exploited by attorneys who filed a lawsuit for him.

"The core facts in this case are just not true," said attorney Frank Mondano.

The man, now a 27-year-old firefighter in a Boston suburb, testified Shanley began raping him while he was in the second grade, taking him out of religious education classes for discipline and raping him in the confessional.

But Mondano pointed to the testimony of two of the man's Catholic religion instructors, who said they didn't recall Shanley ever pulling students from class, and that students didn't go to confession until fourth grade.

Mondano said the man contacted personal injury lawyers soon after he recovered his memories in February 2002. The attorneys filed a suit on his behalf three months later. The man received $500,000 in a settlement with the Boston Archdiocese in May 2004.

But prosecutor Lynn Rooney said the man received his civil settlement almost a year ago and had no reason to lie, particularly since he was required to endure three days of intense questioning on the witness stand.

"Is this all a lie - for what?" Rooney said.

School photographs of the accuser as a little boy were put on display as Rooney told jurors: "Remember what happened to him on Rising Sunday mornings."

"He told you he was taken out of class - he left the class - and he was raped by Paul Shanley," she said.

Rooney said the emotion the man displayed when he testified about the abuse showed he wasn't fabricating his claims. The man spent more than 10 hours on the witness stand and broke down and sobbed several times as he described the alleged abuse by Shanley.

"The emotions were raw. They were real. They were reflective of the pain he experienced," she said.

The jury of seven men and five women began deliberating around 3:30 p.m. The trial began last week, and the defense ended up putting just one witness on the stand - a psychologist who questioned the accuracy and validity of repressed memories.

Dr. Elizabeth Loftus, a psychologist from the University of California at Irvine, testified Thursday that her research shows implanted ideas or suggestions can end up being believed as real by people.

"Many people who have false memories have a lot of confidence and have a lot of detail about their memories," Loftus testified Thursday in Middlesex Superior Court in the trial against defrocked priest Paul Shanley. "False memories can be held with a lot of emotion."

The trial is one of a handful of criminal cases that prosecutors have been able to bring against priests accused of molesting young parishioners decades ago.

Most of the priests accused in lawsuits avoided criminal prosecution because the alleged crimes were committed long ago, so charges were barred by the statute of limitations. But Shanley moved away from Massachusetts, stopping the clock and allowing authorities to arrest him in California in May 2002.

Bush gives State of the Union

ADDRESS from page 1

COURTESY CNN.COM

Congress sits in the chambers of the Capitol Building as President Bush gives his fifth State of the Union Address Wednesday night.

when Bush recognized Janet and Bill Norwood, the parents Marine Sgt. Byron Norwood of Pflugerville, Texas, who was killed in the assault of Fallujah. In an emotional and symbolic moment, Mrs. Norwood and Safia Taleb al-Suhail, leader of the Iraqi Women's Political Council, held each other in a long embrace. The Iraqi woman had evoked her own protracted applause earlier when she stood and saluted Congress with an ink-stained finger and V-for-victory sign after the president had introduced her as a symbol of millions of Iraqis who voted in a free election for the first time last Sunday.

Social Security was the centerpiece of the speech, and Bush called for far-reaching changes in a program that was established in 1935 and remains one of the enduring legacies of Franklin D. Roosevelt's New Deal.

Republicans and Democrats in Congress must "strengthen and save" the program, Bush said, warning that without action, it was headed for bankruptcy. Official estimates predict that benefits will exceed tax receipts beginning in 2018. In 2042, these estimates predict the trust funds will be exhausted, and benefits will have to be cut to 73 percent of current levels.

The president noted that a variety of solutions have been proposed over the years — such as limiting benefits for wealthy retirees, raising the retirement age, indexing benefits to prices rather than wages, discouraging early collection of Social Security benefits and changing the ways benefits are calculated — and said all are "on the table."

"I know that none of these reforms would be easy. But we have to move ahead with courage and honesty because our children's retirement security is more important than partisan politics," Bush said.

"He made it clear to the American people why we must strengthen the Social Security system, and gave the American people a realistic plan for how to do it," Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., said.

"Before the president's opponents get too worked up solely to scare seniors and play politics, I would hope both parties take the details of tonight's speech to heart," added Rep. Dennis Hastert, R-Ill.

Democrats, who argue that Bush is depicting the problems as grimmer than they are, attacked as soon as he finished speaking.

"There's a lot we can do to improve Americans' retirement security, but it's wrong to replace the guaranteed benefit that Americans have earned with a guaranteed benefit cut of 40 percent or more," said Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid, who delivered his party's formal response along with House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi.

Pelosi, referring to Bush's travels over the next few days, said that "When the president goes out there to beat the drum for his privatization to undermine Social Security, I think he will be greeted throughout the country by people who are affected by it every day of their lives."

Pope's health getting better

POPE from page 2

COURTESY CNN.COM

Pope John Paul II holds his head during mass Saturday. Doctors now say the pope is recovering from a flu he suffered this week.

the Vatican said in a medical bulletin.

"The Holy Father's general and respiratory conditions show a positive evolution," it read. "The Holy Father spent a restful night."

Papal spokesman Joaquin Navarro-Valls suggested the pope might spend up to a week at the clinic's heavily guarded papal suite, telling reporters: "When I've had the flu, it lasts seven days."

Italy's ANSA news agency, citing medical sources at the hospital, said the pope had a few sips of water Thursday, which would suggest his throat was more comfortable.

Vatican officials said they were considering setting up an audio hookup Sunday so the pope can make his weekly address from the hospital, rather than from his usual perch at a window overlooking St. Peter's Square.

The pope, who suffers from Parkinson's disease as well as crippling hip and knee ailments, has been in weak health for many years. But the Vatican took pains to play down the latest crisis.

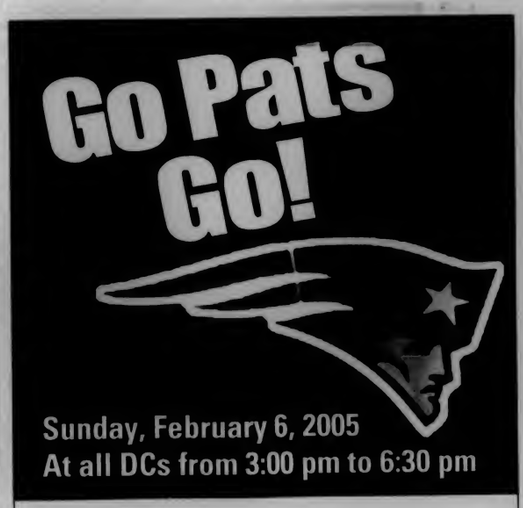
"All he's got is the flu, which has become dangerous because of the Parkinson's," Cardinal Giovanni Battista Re, who heads the Vatican's Congregation of Bishops, told the newspaper Corriere della Sera. "But now the danger is over."

Newspaper found 'not libel'

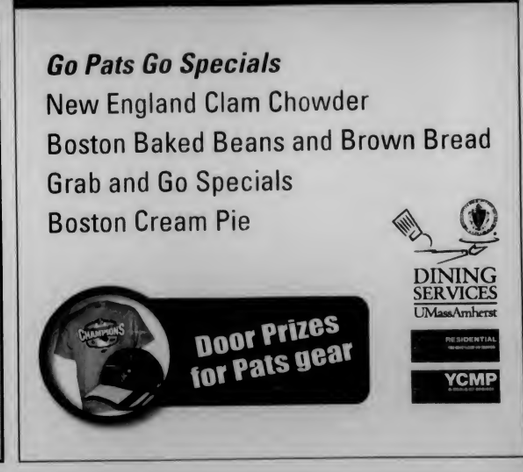
BOSTON (AP) — A jury found The Boston Globe did not libel a man when it reported in 1999 that he used political connections to qualify for a free-labor homebuilding program operated by a vocational high school.

Stephen H. Columbus, a lawyer from Stoneham, had claimed the story by Walter V. Robinson, now editor of the newspaper's Spotlight Team, made false statements about him, causing him to lose business and suffer depression.

The Middlesex Superior Court jury, which deliberated about four hours, also found on Wednesday that Robinson and the newspaper were not responsible for Columbus's emotional distress.



"We're certainly pleased with the outcome," said Jonathan M. Albano, the Globe's lawyer. "From our perspective, the article always was about the local government process and flaws with that process. We never believed it was an attack on Stephen Columbus."



Columbus' lawyer, Jeffrey A. Gorlick, said he is considering an appeal.

—Associated Press

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 2005

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." -Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Lofty goals surface in State of the Union

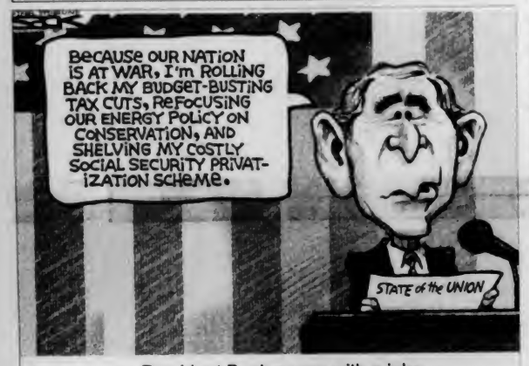
President Bush addressed the nation Wednesday evening in the annual State of the Union Address in which he outlined his intentions for his coming term. The speech drew applause, and at times jeers, from a divided crowd. Scenes of a nearly evenly divided room were abundant on all the major networks which covered the speech.

Little has changed after an extremely close election last fall in which the nation was split in two, as the line of division was clearly marked by the aisle at the center of the congressional hall. Issues like Social Security and the war in Iraq drew mixed reactions while other less frequent moments hinted at bi-partisanship and cooperation.

Also, for the first time in the post-9/11 era, the speech was centered on a domestic issue — that being Social Security. Bush's contention, which was welcomed by many members and affiliates of his party, is that there is an urgent need for Social Security reform. While many Republicans agree with this, there is some disagreement about how to go about this reform.

Central to the President's outlined and ideological proposal is the creation of private accounts, which would put taxpayer money into the money market of private corporations. Republican's have argued that such a proposal would create a possibility of higher growth whereas Democrats have argued that the principle of placing public money in private hands is dangerous.

Still, the Social Security issue is far more complex. Some Republicans disagree on the issue of benefits and where they would fall into the plan. In the near future, when the Administration outlines a clear plan for reform, we will have a more refined idea of where representatives will fall. Democrats have voiced direct opposition, for the most part, claiming that there is no emergency when it comes to Social Security and that the crisis is being exaggerated for political motives.



Security was the dominant theme of the President's speech. Aside from Social Security, the President spoke of national security and the mission in Iraq. He clearly sent a message to Iran's government as well as its citizens and reiterated the importance of the dismantlement of Iran's alleged weapons programs. He also targeted Syria and urged congressman to pursue the Syria Accountability Act. Bush also shared his vision of free and democratic states of Israel and Palestine coexisting side by side.

Calling the recent Iraqi elections historic, the President voiced a message of freedom and recognized the men and women who are serving in Iraq and Afghanistan. He also made it clear that the United States would not leave Iraq until it accomplished its goal of creating a democratic nation at peace with its neighbors, capable of defending itself.

The President has shown a trend of setting lofty goals for the country. Echoing his inauguration speech, he repeated the idea of freedom as a force, which would bring down the evil of despotism and global terror. He also pledged to work for educational grants, permanent tax cuts, social security reform estimated in trillions of dollars, in addition to providing adequate materials for the defense of the nation, increasing the efforts to rid the world of aids and finally eliminating the deficit.

While the issue of Iraq will stretch into the future, the debate over economic policies is here and now, and great questions remain about where all the money to achieve these lofty goals will come from.

Unsigned editorials represent the majority opinion of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian Editorial Board.

President Bush opens with a joke....

Cheney's wardrobe disgrace

Erin McNamee

Last week, Vice President Dick Cheney attended the service commemorating the 60th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz, the Nazi death camp. This would have been a noble gesture on Cheney's part, had he not been dressed like the ceremony interrupted his ski holiday.

In case you didn't catch any news coverage of Cheney's "Wardrobe Malfunction Debacle," let me paint you a picture, starting at the bottom. Cheney's feet were clad in rugged brown hiking boots. Moving up, he wore a puffy green parka with a fur-lined hood. Oh, the hood also had his name embroidered on it. And to add insult to injury, he wore a woolen ski cap with "Staff 2001" inexplicably inscribed on the front.

Some of you may be saying to yourselves, "What's wrong with that? It was in Poland for Pete's sake and was probably freezing cold and snowing! Of course he would want to dress warmly." Well, my friends, let me paint you another picture: the other dignitaries in attendance, including French President Jacques Chirac and Russian President Vladimir Putin, were dressed in respectable dark formal overcoats and tasteful dress hats. Can you now see why Cheney stuck out like a sore thumb and suffered ridicule from the world's media?

Hmm. Could it be that Cheney, when presented with the idea of attending a cold outdoor ceremony in Krakow not to be held in the Bush Administration's honor, protested so strongly that he had to be tricked into thinking he was being flown to the Swiss Alps for a ski holiday? After all, we know how much President Bush and co. love their vacations.

Or perhaps Cheney's formal coat was still at the cleaner's after the inauguration? I saw him during the swearing in ceremony and he was dressed in a respectable manner. As Washington Post writer Robin Givhan points out, "Would he have dared to take the oath of office with a ski cap on? People would have justifiably considered that an insult to the office, the day, the country." So why didn't the remembrance of the end of the world's biggest human tragedy deserve as much, if not more, respect than the Administration's excessive celebration of itself?

This isn't a matter of clothes or fashion; it's a matter of representing our country to the rest of the world in a way that shows respect and decorum for the world's people.

For anyone who still doesn't get it, this isn't a matter of clothes or fashion, it's a matter of representing our country to the rest of the world in a way that shows respect and decorum for the world's people. With foreign affairs in a dire state, it would seem a no-brainer for Cheney to at least put a little effort into his appearance. Did he not know why he was at the ceremony? Did he not know of the suffering that the prisoners of Auschwitz endured during Poland's cold winters with little or no clothing to speak of?

I think another reason Cheney's attire ignited such an uproar is because the Bush Administration hadn't even made it through the first week of its second term and already they managed to screw up a valuable foreign relations opportunity. The rest of the world is as apprehensive and dubious of Bush's second term as many Americans are, so shouldn't the Bush Administration do something to reach out, to make a wholehearted effort to mend foreign ties? Because of Cheney's snafu, the Bush Administration is once again the subject of ridicule and it can't afford that kind of negative attention at such a crucial time as the beginning of a new term.

After all the harsh criticism it drew over the inauguration week's tasteless excess in a time of war, it would seem natural for the Bush Administration to strive extra hard to present itself and America in a favorable light. The rest of the world really is watching, and sometimes it appears that President Bush and co. either don't realize just how critical this is or simply choose to ignore it altogether as some kind of juvenile act of defiance.

To some, this may seem like just another opportunity for the media to pounce on scandal and milk it for all it's worth, but in this case it's not. In any other situation, it would certainly be an overreaction, but considering that the Bush Administration is skating on thin ice already, it's only natural to lambaste them for yet another gross breach of dignity. As a country, we deserve more respect than that and we have the right to demand that respect. But if the souls of the Jewish Holocaust cannot be granted that respect, then who can?

Erin McNamee is a Collegian columnist.

Free speech needs aid

Mike Anmuth

In a recent poll by the University of Connecticut of more than 100,000 high school students, most students didn't care about the First Amendment or knew very little about it, according to the Associated Press. These students were quoted as saying that the first amendment goes "too far" in protecting free speech, but by contrast they incorrectly identified the government as having the power to censor material on the Internet. Perhaps the portion of "too far" to which these students were referring was burning the flag; the students identified it as illegal when it is protected by First Amendment rights.

The problem is both that these students are not only incorrectly identifying what can and cannot be controlled by government in terms of speech, but they do not have a fundamental basis of their own in terms of how they can express themselves based in the Constitution. As young people reach adulthood, the rights established in the Bill of Rights are more important than ever before. Many rights that we take for granted on this campus alone, such as free speech and freedom to assemble, are things that these high school students surveyed might not know even exist.

If these intrinsic rights are not respected, known and used, they might well disappear. I think I can arguably say that the majority of people would not enjoy living in a world where they are censored and cannot express themselves, cannot gather freely for assembly or cannot protest. On this very campus alone, we protest for and against many things, but the high school students who will soon be in colleges all around the country, including this one, are identifying that the freedoms we enjoy are going "too far."

Too far for what, I ask? Too far to protect our student media outlets from demise? The same article by the AP cites that, "More than one in five schools offer no student media opportunities." This is easily conceivable seeing that students may not know that newspapers are protected under first amendment rights. School newspapers follow a different set of rules.

Teachers and principals surveyed both cited close to 100 percent agreement with the statement that people should be allowed to express unpopular opinions, while the same teachers and principals only agreed 39 percent and 25 percent respectively that students should be able to publish stories in their student newspapers without approval of school authorities. For the record, the AP surveyed nearly 8,000 teachers and more than 500 administrators for the results.

As we live in contemporary society that has opinions for everything, it is important that our high school students and even younger are aware that they are given the rights to have those opinions and express them due to the first amendment.

It would be a very one-sided presentation to say that this is a plaguing problem and that's all there is to it. This is definitely a plaguing problem and the only way to solve it is by teaching high school students about the first amendment, and the rest of the amendments for that matter.

As we nationally teach towards achievement tests due to the No Child Left Behind Act, we are losing sight of the basic tenets of society that need to be passed from generation to generation. I remember learning about the Constitution in high school, and the Bill of Rights, and what it meant to me as an American.

These are unalienable rights that this columnist would not want to compromise, not only because this column directly reflects the freedom of speech and freedom of the press but because as a free citizen of the United States, it is important to me to retain those freedoms.

If a history or government teacher is pressed for time (as we all are these days in every facet of life), then some material must be skipped or just glazed over in class. The problem is figuring out what to leave out, but the Bill of Rights should not be included in that list that gets a precursory glance and is left just on the pages of a history book. As we live in a contemporary society that has opinions for and against virtually everything by different interest groups, it is important that our high school students and even younger are aware that they are given the rights to have those opinions and express them due to the first amendment.

The students surveyed by the AP gave the first amendment a "second-rate" status in their knowledge and in their caring. These students are the college students and adults of tomorrow, and there are 100,000 of them armed with this opinion. I don't know about you, but I believe that 100,000 students who don't care or don't know about the first amendment is 100,000 students too many.

Mike Anmuth is a Collegian columnist.

Id, ego and Cookie Monster

Amelia Sabadini

My all-time favorite Sesame Street skit features Cookie Monster (hereby dubbed CM) in pajamas and a nightcap staring out the window looking up at the moon in adoration. As CM gazes at the moon, he begins to sing a song with the refrain "If moon were cookie." In the song, CM fantasizes that the moon is a cookie made specifically for him and he flies up to it in a rocket and commences chowing down with his usual endearing abandon. However, amidst the imagined flurry of cosmic crumbs, CM suddenly realizes that if he eats the moon, he'll be all alone at night. He thinks of how much he'll miss the moon, how dark and scary it will be. CM reconsiders his fantasy and decides that it's best not to eat the moon.

Dearest CM has never had much shame about heeding the call of the id. He has just barely developed an ego and has only the most tentative preliminary traces of a superego. His arrested development is part of his appeal because CM's relatively simple psyche lets us view the demands of the primal life force without any obstructions from complex ego defenses. Of course I know CM isn't real; he's a character created by someone, but aren't creations reflections of their creators? Isn't the id basically the same in all of us? Doesn't everyone have the drive to feel absolutely and constantly secure, sated and pleased? CM's unabashed expression of his id allows us an opportunity to examine the true contents of our own unacknowledged desires.

[Cookie Monster's] unabashed expression of his id allows us an opportunity to examine the true contents of our own unacknowledged desires.

I believe CM's dalliance with the moon illustrates an agenda of the id that is especially significant. In this particular skit, CM is entertaining thoughts of treating a companion (CM starts out referring to the moon as his friend) as food. Disturbing as this impulse may be, it seems to be rooted in the natural predisposition of all mammalian infants to seek nourishment from their mothers. Regardless of whether a human infant is breastfed or bottle-fed, they are born with the rooting and the sucking reflexes. The goal of these reflexes is to help the infant find latch onto its mother's breast.

Also, pioneering child psychoanalyst Melanie Klein stated in her paper "A Study of Envy and Gratitude" 1956 "... the first object to be envied is the feeding breast, for the infant feels that it possesses everything that he desires ..." Given this, the idea that people may have unacknowledged propensities for treating each other like consumable resources doesn't seem so far fetched. In fact, the existence of such propensities would explain many of our sins against each other from obsessive love to thoughtless exploitation to outright premeditated oppression. In all of these crimes, the perpetrators are behaving as though their victims are sources of sustenance to which they're entitled.

Arguably, all the various forms of oppression, from military conquest to domestic violence, from impeding people with stereotypes to actual enslavement, could be considered acts of a sort of social cannibalism.

It's of special note that this proposed social cannibalism originates from our very first relationship with another human and that this human is, for most people, a woman. Is it any wonder that the female body is treated like a controlled substance? Only certain people are allowed to make money with it. Anyone who has one is considered suspect and subject to scrutiny.

The oppression of women has been nearly unicultural for all known time. Even today here in America, feminism, the movement which advocates for equality of the sexes, is openly vilified and ridiculed. Yet the motives of those who slander feminism are seldom examined in the public forum. When justifications are given they're often contradictory, i.e. "girls are innately nurturing," "girls are innately mean."

I believe the real reason that the oppression of women has been so widespread and enduring is this social cannibalism. Misogyny is the fundamental manifestation of our ids' drive to consume the other.

Incidentally, this also goes along way toward explaining the unfortunate minority of women who salivate at the prospect of knocking down other women. The id isn't shameful in and of itself. It's quite like fire in that it can either serve or destroy, which one it does depends on how well we control it.

However, when we deny it, we reduce our chances of being able to achieve and exert control over it. More over, so long as people continue to unthinkingly indulge their id's primal hungers via the oppression of women in any way, there will always be a ready foundation for all forms of oppression against any and all people. After all once you've devalued people who're probably living in your home with you, it's going to be even easier to devalue strangers.

If you let your id keep rolling like this, eventually you'll feel like you're the only real person on the planet. CM took time out from his high carb fantasy to consider the repercussions of his plan; specifically he thought about how he had a need for companionship that would no longer be met if he went ahead and gluttonously destroyed the moon. I think CM showed us that the temperance we so desperately need in this world can be found not through a denial of our needs but rather through a fuller and more conscientious appreciation of them.

Amelia Sabadini is a Collegian columnist.

Write for EdOp.

Send submissions to editorial@dailycollegian.com

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 2005

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

By Mackenzie Issler
Collegian Correspondent

Austrian artist Heimo Wallner has catalyzed much dialogue amongst the UMass community in regards to his provocative and shocking mural in the lobby of the Hampden Gallery's located in Southwest.

The current mural consists of figures that Wallner refers to as the "everyman." The figures do not have pupils, and are naked in order to represent the humanity as whole, rather than focusing on a particular individual or specific group.

The entire mural is drawn with one medium, a black magic marker. Each figure is a contour drawing, consisting simply of a series of lines. Through the numerous positions, actions and expressions of the figures, Heimo Wallner creates what he refers to as "a vocabulary of emotions." The mural is done in a very linear fashion.

According to a statement from the artist, he says, "the important aspect of my art is drawing imagery away, banning it into wallpaper."

"My work is better when I'm drawing faster than I can think," Wallner said, noting that the entire piece is improvisational. He has been drawing in this manner for the last fifteen years.

The composition of the mural is meant to reflect the artist's own internal feelings and processes, as well as to encompass some of the world's external circumstances. Wallner grew up influenced by American pop music and movies. However, he says, there are still issues and cultural differences that the artist has problems coming to terms with. His art is a way he can express these internal and external conflicts.

Wallner was born in Salzburg, Austria in 1961. He attended the Vienna Academy of Art, where he studied sculpture. His work has been show in Mexico, Italy, Croatia, and throughout the United States. This is not Wallner's first experience in an academic setting either. He has also shown his work at Columbia University in New York City.

Wallner was brought to UMass by Line Bruntse and Steve Buddington, two junior faculty members of the Art Department's Foundations program. Bruntse, a native of Denmark, has traveled around the world, participating in different art residencies. It was on one of her residences, that she met Heimo Wallner. Bruntse and Buddington later agreed that

See ART on page 6

Organ and drums duo refuses to conform to a label

By Bradley Farberman
Collegian Staff

Labels make us feel safe. It's not very dangerous to tuck yourself away behind words like white, male, or heterosexual.

Likewise, labels can be weapons. Slapping people with words like slut or any number of racial slurs can prove detrimental to one's image, inside and out.

So where does it end? Must everything and everyone be tagged and titled? Is there nothing that can stand on its own, without labels?

How about music?

The answer, of course, is yes, music needs no label, no title, no nametag, but ask any marketing exec or record company CEO and you'll get a different story.

John Coltrane is jazz. The Sex Pistols are punk. Bjork is... okay, bad example, but there are lots of bad examples, and the Benevento/Russo Duo are no exception.

Check them out tonight, at the Iron Horse, and you'll see what is meant. What do you call a band that tosses out tunes by Thelonious Monk and The White Stripes in any given performance? And are they even a band (does a band consist of two dudes, or more than two dudes)?

Oh yeah, and they don't sing. Brooklyn, NY ne'er-do-wells Marco Benevento and Joe Russo get their rocks off on organ and drums, respectively, and they don't use a bass player. Marco handles the low end with his left hand.

And they rock. So what are they? Jazz (does instrumental music constitute jazz)? Rock (does one's ability to rock make them a rock artist)? Polka? Well, they're definitely not polka, that's for sure. In short, they're two musicians making music, and take it or leave it, they're two of the best cats out there, and they've taken the national club/theatre scene by storm.

In just under five years they've toured with live music luminaries like Charlie Hunter, The Slip, Robert Walter's 20th Congress, and most recently, they knocked out four dates as a trio with Phish's Mike Gordon on bass. They'll be gettin' their trio on again this summer, at the fourth annual Bonnaroo Music and Arts Festival, in Manchester, TN.

So what's next for these guys? For starters, they'll be traveling to Japan later this month for four dates in support of New Orleans stalwarts The Dirty Dozen Brass Band, and as if that weren't cool enough, they'll be releasing "Best Reason to Buy the Sun," their debut album for Ropeadope Records, on April, 5. The disc engineered by former Beck drummer Joey Waronker and MMW cohort Danny Blume, features guest spots by Skerik and Mike Dillon of Critters Buggin, and guitarist Smokey Hormel).

In the meantime, however, they'll be dropping jaws at Northampton's comfy Iron Horse Music Hall tonight, at 10 p.m. following the Sonya Kitchell Trio and NYC guitar phenom Kaki King. So get there early, stay late, and don't label the Benevento/Russo Duo. Just enjoy their big, funky sound, and think about how incredible it is that two musicians can make such a ruckus.

COURTESY SILVERKAPTEST '04

The duo of Benevento and Russo have an eclectic style that is able to strech the gamut of popular music, but despite comparisons to many other groups, the band would rather critics not to label their style.

Politically charged art poses questions

ART from page 5

Wallner would be a great artist to expose to the UMass community.

Anne Tapscott, the Hampden Gallery director, refers to the lobby where the art is displayed as the "incubator." She says the artwork that is housed in the lobby is there to break down the barrier between the formality of the gallery, and the informality of the lobby. The artwork creates dialogue and invites viewers to talk and interact with the art in front of them.

As many already know, this piece has caused some controversy due to its provocative manner. A complaint has been made, and representatives of the gallery have said they do not wish to offend anyone. Since then, a corridor has been installed, creating a hallway for students who want to get to the convenience store without fully seeing the mural.

Director Anne Tapscott said that for students who plan on seeing Wallner's mural, and to those who are trying to avoid it, it is very important to know that "it is not promoting, just presenting." The artist has backed up this statement by saying "I don't consider myself a missionary."

Heimo Wallner emphasized if the viewer is willing to go into a dialogue. It is always possible to explain to your point of departure." He understands the discussion will not necessarily end in agreement. Dialogue between the viewer and the artist will promote a more profound understanding of the [illegible] intentions and motives [illegible] explain the process of making the mural. Wallner carried on dialogue with passerbys who wanted to know more about it. Wallner said he willingly responded to the inquiries, as well as received input from the bystanders.

The figure depicted in the mural personifies the sexuality and violence that the artist sees in this world. It is true that the images can be seen as disturbing, but no less disturbing than those seen on the daily news and the front pages of the newspaper.

Art is about expression, as well as inspiring. Heimo Wallner's mural has done just this. Through the use of just a black marker, the artist has transformed the empty walls of the lobby into a work of art.

MATT BRIM / COLLEGIAN

The work of artist Heimo Wallner has been created in various different countries, as well as for campuses across the United States. His recent piece, "SAU AUS USA" adorns the walls of the Hampden Gallery.

The 'Godfather' of video game releases

Press Start to Play

Reid Davenport

Gaming giant Electronic Arts announced that they will be putting one of the most popular mob movies into video game form. "The Godfather" is set to come to home consoles in the fall of this year.

The game will be based on both the book, written by Mario Puzo, as well as the 1972 film that has remained popular for over three decades. Gamers will create their own mob character to put themselves within action-packed moments and projecting themselves into memorable moments from the films.

Set in 1945-1955 New York City, the game starts the players off by creating their own mobster. Your character will start off doing petty jobs and small time thefts until you become accepted as a member of the Corleone family. From there you will begin taking orders from the Don, doing large scale bank heists, sorting out issues between mob families using a blunt object, and earning the respect of the Corleone family by giving them complete rule over New York City.

Begin a mobster-based game, there will be no shortage of bloodshed for the bloodthirsty gamer, but you will be expected to sort out some problems without violence such as problems between the Corleone family and an allied mob family. You may be put into situations where you have to intimidate a street thug for information or bribe someone to come to your side.

Details about the game are not going to be released to the public until February 10 in New York City, but EA appears to be firm about making gamers feel like they are in the movie's setting. There is no detailed information on exactly how the game will look, what sort of missions will be involved, or what weapons you will have at your arsenal, but expect "The Godfather" to be EA's big hit this fall.

"Godfather" fans will also be pleased to find characters from the movie will be found within the game. Actors James Caan and Robert Duval will be voicing their characters. Sonny Corleone and consigliere Tom Hagan, which they played in the films. Also appearing will be the voice of actor Marlon Brando, who granted EA the rights to use his voice as Don Vito Corleone before his passing.

"We are thrilled to partner with Electronic Arts to bring the exceptional content into the interactive world," said Saadi Isaacs, Vice President of Interactive from Nickelodeon & Viacom Consumer Products to eagames.com. "The Godfather is a crown jewel of Paramount Pictures. We are confident this game will deliver the depth of the experience expected by The Godfather movie fans around the world."

The Godfather is being developed by EA Redwood Shores, where such hit franchises as Lord of the Rings, James Bond, and Tiger Woods PGA TOUR games are made. The game has not yet been rated by the ESRB.

Information from eagames.com and gamespot.com was used in this column.

Write for Arts

Call Mike: 545-1361

DWIGHT CHAPEL

Need a Ride to Church?

Just beat UMASS Haigis Mall at 10 AM

For the Free Sunday Shuttle to Dwight Chapel

FREE Bible with your first ride! See you there!

885 Federal Street Belchertown, MA 01007 413 256 8059 www.dwightchapel.org

Surfer dude rocks Iron Horse

By Dan Terk
Collegian Staff

'Donovan Frankenreiter with State Radio'
Iron Horse
Northampton
Feb. 7

A former pro-surfer and long-time musician, Donovan Frankenreiter has just found himself and is ready to share his unique, mellow sound with the world.

Born in Downey, CA, Frankenreiter got his first sponsor, Billabong, at the age of 13 as a free surfer, someone who is paid to ride the waves and does not have to compete. It was two years later that Donovan got his first guitar. He never really took music seriously until he was 18 when he formed a band in high school called "Peanut Butter and Jam."

"The surfing keeps me alive," said Donovan on his website, "and the music keeps me grounded."

Frankenreiter signed with Jack Johnson's label, Brushfire records in 2003. He released his self-titled debut album in May of last year. Teaming up with Jack Johnson and Mario Caldito Jr., the album was recorded at The Mango Tree studio in Hawaii.

The album is wonderful in its simplicity. The first line of the first song titled "It Don't Matter" really sets the mood for what is to come. Frankenreiter sings, "Everyday people like you and me, just want to live naturally." This music is for everyone, it's light and natural sound rushes over you like a calming wave.

"Free" featuring Jack Johnson is another song on the album that encapsulates Frankenreiter's style. He is free when he is riding a wave and free when he writes his music. While listening to the album, you might as well be sitting with friends around a campfire on the beach feeling like you don't have a care in the world.

Frankenreiter said on his website that making the album "was one of the most memorable experiences of [his] life." He now lives in Laguna Beach, California with his wife and son.

Frankenreiter will be making his Northampton debut at the Iron Horse this Monday. His live shows have been critically acclaimed as welcoming, comedic, and full of great music. You can learn more about Donovan Frankenreiter, hear his music, and buy apparel at www.Donovanf.com.

Opening for Donovan Frankenreiter will be State Radio, a band whose front man is Chad from Dispatch. State Radio, formally Flag of the Shiners, released there first album, Flag of the Shiners II last April. The politically driven lyrics hope to encourage activism and an awareness of social issues with songs like "State Inspector" that deals with deinstitutionalization of the 1970s.

Information from www.thatradio.com and www.donovanf.com were used in this report.

Former surfer, turned acoustic singer/songwriter musician Donovan Frankenreiter has recieved great critical acclaim for his first release.

"HOT" YOGA

BIKRAM YOGA AMHERST

www.bikramyoga.com
665-yoga

The room is heated to open you...
The series is powerful to challenge you...
The yoga is BIKRAM to change you...

Designed for all levels, BIKRAM yoga will challenge you physically...focus you mentally..and allow you to relax on a very deep level.

TRY IT FOR 10 CONSECUTIVE DAYS FOR ONLY $20!!!

On Rt. 116 across from Cliffside Apts.
Open 7 Days with generous student rates.

SUPERBOWL XXXIX BASH

at the Amherst Brewing Company

recliner raffle
free prizes
lobster giveaway every quarter
BEER! special menu
MENTION THIS AD AND RECEIVE 2 RAFFLE TICKETS TOWARDS PRIZE GIVEAWAY EACH QUARTER. DOES NOT INCLUDE CHAIR RAFFLE. YOU MUST ARRIVE BEFORE THE END OF THE FIRST QUARTER TO BE ELIGIBLE FOR CHAIR RAFFLE! appetizers $2 pints!

Sports staff calls the game

PREDICTIONS from page 10

Belichick's tenure in New England will go down as one of the greatest stretches by a coach in NFL history.

Eric Athas, Sports Staff
Patriots 24 - Eagles 17

Look for this Super Bowl to be similar to the previous two the Patriots played in, with the game being relativily close. Special teams will be a big factor, with Adam Vinatieri coming up big, but kick returner/wide receiver Bethel Johnson could be the X-Factor that gives New England the edge.

Dan Hillman, Sports Staff
Patriots 21 - Eagles 10

It's as simple as this: if Michael Westbrook can gain over 100 all-purpose yards, the Eagles have a good chance of winning this game. The problem is Belichick and Co. will do everything in their power to cut down Westbrook's touches and by doing so will leave McNabb with little-to-no weapons. T.O. will be near a non-factor, and look for Corey Dillion to get the MVP.

Rob Greenfield, Sports Staff
Patriots 24 - Eagles 17

After watching Terrell Owens run his mouth all season and hearing Freddie Mitchell bash the Patriots' secondary, I just want someone to put them in their place, and the Patriots are the team to do it. It is hard to bet against these guys after beating the best offensive team and the best defensive team on their way to Jacksonville. I believe that it is safe to say that if the Eagles had to go through the Colts and the Steelers to get to the Super Bowl, they never would have made it. In the Super Bowl the Patriots like to keep things close, and after two heart stoppers, I don't see things being much different. The Eagles will pose some new challenges for them — as every team does — but in the end the Patriots always seem to find a way.

Ian Kilpatrick, Sports Staff
Patriots 23 - Eagles 20

The Pats will win again this year by three but not on a last-minute drive commanded by Brady or on another clutch field goal by Vinetieri. It will be an ugly game highlighted by just a few big plays that will make the difference, the biggest coming on the Eagles' last drive when someone will step up for the pats D and secure a spot in NFL history as a dynasty.

Mitchell not making any friends

By Jim Litke
Associated Press

JACKSONVILLE, Fla. — Old-timers argue that running your mouth was a lot more dangerous back in the day.

As if the bumps and bruised egos hurt any less today.

"Freddie Mitchell doesn't know how hard he would have gotten hit if he said that in the '60s," tough guy and former Bears coach Mike Ditka said Wednesday. "He'd still be looking for his head."

We'll get to exactly what Mitchell said in a moment. But first, a reminder for anyone who thinks speech is free and football can't be educational: The most famous spelling lesson in American history took place at the Super Bowl.

That was in 1979, when Cowboys linebacker and confirmed party animal Thomas "Hollywood" Henderson said Steelers quarterback Terry Bradshaw was so dumb, "he couldn't spell cat if you spotted him the 'c' and the 't.'"

Bradshaw wound up throwing for 318 yards and four touchdowns in a 35-31 win, forcing Henderson to scramble to cover his tracks.

MICHAEL PEREZ/THE ALLENTOWN MORNING CALL

Freddie Mitchell was swarmed by a group of Vikings' defenders. He may want to get used to it.

"I didn't say he couldn't play," Henderson said afterward, squirming all the while, "just that he couldn't spell."

Talking smack is usually a waste of good breath, but rarely so much as during the run-up to the Super Bowl. Keep that in mind Sunday, when the pregame shows keep hyping the skirmish that broke out last week between Mitchell, the Eagles' receiver, and Patriots safety Rodney Harrison.

It began innocently enough, with Mitchell admitting during an interview that he couldn't name any of the players in the Patriots' secondary, except for Harrison, and that he had "something" planned for him. Harrison responded by labeling Mitchell a "jerk," then ratcheted up the war of words the other day.

"I think any time you send a message, sometimes people listen and sometimes they don't. It just depends on how hard you send the message," said Harrison, already the most-fined player in the NFL.

Get off a good quote at the expense of an opponent just before the Super Bowl and immortality — but more likely, notoriety — won't be far behind.

"That's the thing about this week," Bradshaw said. "You say something in week two, and it doesn't even hardly get in the paper. But say it in the week of the Super Bowl and suddenly, 'It's lookee here.'

"This," he added, "is not the time to shoot your mouth off."

Everyone remembers a cocky young quarterback named Joe Namath guaranteeing a victory over the Colts, 17 1/2-point favorites at the time, then pulling it off and never getting stuck with a bar tab for the rest of his life. What most people forget is for every Namath, there's been a handful of Hendersons.

The very first Super Bowl in 1967 featured Chiefs cornerback and B-movie action star Fred "The Hammer" Williamson promising to drop so many forearm shivers on the Packers that they'd "go back to the huddle with their heads ringing." Instead, it was Williamson who wound up being carried off the field in the fourth quarter of Green Bay's 33-10 win.

"I laid him out like a bear rug, too," a Packer official would recall more than three decades later. "Some hammer."

A half-dozen years ago, Atlanta cornerback Ray Buchanan began the week guaranteeing a win over Denver, then got personal with Broncos receiver Shannon Sharpe.

"You can't tell me," Buchanan said, "that he doesn't look like Mr. Ed."

JERRY LUDEK/COURTESY PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER

Freddy Mitchell has used his 15 minutes of fame for many self-promotions, including his "frohawk".

"Tell Ray to put the eyeliner, the lipstick and the high heels away," Sharpe sniped back. "I'm not saying he's a cross-dresser; that's just what I heard."

Buchanan's reputation and his ego were smudged in the Broncos' 34-19 win, but he was otherwise unharmed.

Considering the run the Patriots are on — two Super Bowl victories in the last three years — Mitchell will count himself lucky to get away as cleanly.

"We don't play tennis. This is football, and I'm not going to back down from anything. Like I said earlier, it started off as just being funny," he said, "and it's still funny to me."

Small wonder. Mitchell's teammates have been following him around with video cameras all week, joking and playing at being reporters. They keep asking him if he's worried because of the things he said.

"But they're also telling me," Mitchell said, " 'We don't care what you said. We've got your back.'"

They'd better.

Write for Sports!!!

Come down to the Collegian and talk to Jeff or Bob!

VISIT US ON THE WEB AT WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Style 101

Favorite Jeans
The ultimate jeans by Citizens of Humanity.

Best Sweater
Flattering style and easy to wear.

Hot Boots
Boots with attitude by Chinese Laundry.

ZANA

SUPERBOWL SUNDAY SPECIAL

Large Cheese Pizza
$6.99
two topping limit

Toppings
$1.50

THE SUB & PIZZA
Free Delivery
549-5160

EXPIRES 2/7/05

THE BARN
Discount Groceries
Great products. Great prices!

Hot Pockets & Lean Pockets (9 oz)	$1.50
Ore Ida & McCain French Fries (28-32 oz)	$1.00
Hood Ice Cream (1/2 gallon)	$1.99
Celeste Pizza (5-7 oz)	75¢
Totino's Pizza Rolls (7.5 oz box)	75¢
Pillsbury & Eggo Waffles & Pancakes (10 ct)	75¢
Green Giant Vegetables (7-10 oz)	75¢
Pillsbury Grands or Crescent Rolls (8ct)	50¢
Eggs (large or extra large, dozen)	$1.00
Dole Bananas (large!)	8 for $1.00
Mosey's Flat Cut Corned Beef (1 lb.)	$1.99
Armour Sliced Bologna (1 lb.)	99¢ pkg
Yoplait Nouriche Smoothie Drinks	50¢ each
Single Yogurt (Dannon, Columbo, etc.)	3 for $1.00
Frosted Shredded Wheat Cereal (20 oz)	$1.00 box
Bran Flakes Cereal (20 oz)	$1.00 box
Frosted Flakes Cereal (20 oz)	$1.00 box
M&M Candies (14 oz bag)	$1.00 bag
Raisins (12 oz box)	50¢
Kraft Macaroni & Cheese	50¢
Fudge Marshmallow Cookies (12 oz)	25¢

We have natural & organic foods, too!

95 River Street, Greenfield - 413-774-5599 - 8 AM to 10 PM Daily
(Route 116 to Deerfield, 91 North to Exit 26, right at Dunkin' Donuts)
-Credit cards, debit cards, cash & food stamps accepted!-

AT THE GATES OF SMITH COLLEGE

3 BEST ACTOR · DON CHEADLE

"THE BEST FILM OF THE YEAR! DON CHEADLE IS FANTASTIC.." - RICHARD ROEPER, SUNTIMES & ROEPER

"★★★★ ONE OF THE YEAR'S MOST MOVING AND POWERFUL FILMS." - CLAUDIA PUIG, USA TODAY

DON CHEADLE SOPHIE OKONEDO NICK NOLTE

HOTEL RWANDA
A TRUE STORY

Only Western Ma. Showing!
CURTAIN DAILY 7:00 & 9:15

Valentine's BOGART & BERGMAN
MAINEE FEB. 12 th & 13th
CASABLANCA!

Academy of Music
MOVIELINE: 413-584-8435
academyofmusictheatre.com

HAMPSHIRE FITNESS club

JOIN NOW!

WINTER SPECIAL
15 Week Student Special $179
What do you get?

*New Indoor Cycling
*Full sized indoor pool
*Aqua aerobics
*Cybex Nautilus circuit
*Cybex free weights
*Full court Basketball
*Volleyball
*Indoor Tennis
*Cardio
*Saunas
*Jacuzzi
*Yoga/Pilates
*Aerobics/Step/Bosu

COMPETITIVE BASKETBALL
MON. & THURS. EVENINGS
COMPETITIVE VOLLEYBALL
WED. & SAT.

ON THE BUS ROUTE

BEHAVIORAL HEALTH NETWORK
HUMAN SERVICES
RESIDENTIAL STAFF

Direct care staff needed for all shifts, day, evening, weekend, overnight (asleep/awake), full, part time and relief positions available in Hampshire County and surrounding communities. Assist individuals with developmental disabilities in their homes, day/vocational programs, respite sites or residential programs. A High school diploma or equivalent, accesses to reliable transportation preferred. Experience helpful but not mandatory, on-going training available. Generous benefit package at 30 hours. Salary: $9.00- $9.73/hr

Please send cover letter and resume to:
Attn: Program Directors
Behavioral Health Network,
492 Pleasant St.
Northampton, MA 01060
AA/EOE

KAREN WINGER/COLLEGIAN

Marvin Degon and the Minutemen will take the ice again on Saturday night against Merrimack.

Huskies defeat Minutemen during Hockey East clash

By Andrew Merritt
Collegian Staff

BOSTON —It wasn't quite a shutout, but nevertheless, the Massachusetts hockey team struggled to score once again last night.

Northeastern	2
UMass	1

Northeastern took care of every goal — that's every goal— as the Huskies beat the Minutemen 2-1 in front of 2,228 at Matthews Arena.

The lone goal for UMass (10-16-2, 4-11-2 Hockey East) came off of a Northeastern defender in a fluky play by the NU goal. Otherwise, the Huskies (10-13-4, 6-8-3 Hockey East) took care of business on the offensive end, and goaltender Keni Gibson was excellent, making 28 saves.

The only "shot" that got past Gibson was the first goal of the game, at the 4:03 mark of the second period. NU defenseman Donny Grover tried to advance the puck from behind the Northeastern net, but instead banked it off teammate Brian Deeth's leg, and when Grover retried his clear, he accidentally swiped it past Gibson, giving UMass an unexpected 1-0 lead.

It didn't last long though, as the Huskies bounced back with two goals in the second and held off the Minutemen, who travel to Merrimack Saturday night (7 p.m.).

"It was a pretty good hockey game," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "We had a lot of high quality chances. Gibson was very good, and I think we just have to start praying to the hockey gods."

The Huskies, who exited the ice to chants of "we want the Beanpot" coming from the Dog Pound fan section, created a little more of a cushion in the Hockey East standings, bumping their advantage over seventh-place UMass to five points. In what might be a sign of the times, NU coach Bruce Crowder wasn't paying much attention to the lead after the game.

"We're worried about the guys ahead of us," Crowder said.

After a goalless, penalty-free first period, things got a little more interesting in the second. Though Grover's own-goal put the Huskies behind, they scored again just 1:14 later, this time on the right net.

Jared Mudryk fired a shot toward Winer's net, and the goaltender stopped it, but Jason Guerriero was on the spot to bang the rebound home and tie the game at one.

"It totally erases [Grover's] goal," said Gibson, who had an unfortunately perfect view of the mistake. "There's nothing bigger than that. We just kept going from there. I thought we played really well."

The Huskies seemed to officially get over their early miscue with 33 seconds to go, when Mike Morris redirected Guerriero's cross from the left wing past Winer to take a 2-1 lead.

Guerriero's goal held on as the game winner, but not until after Gibson made his mark in the third.

The senior netminder made the finest two of his 28 stops late in the third period, starting with a stunning save on UMass' Tim Vitek. Vitek played a quick game of catch with Stephen Werner across the low crease, and on the return pass looked to have plenty of net. Gibson covered the area quickly, though, and stoned Vitek with 4:24 to go.

Gibson repeated the feat just over a minute later, when Dan Gordon went in alone on him, and he made a slightly less spectacular save, but one that was just as important.

"Keni was a lot of the difference tonight," Crowder said.

Breaking down the two teams

SUPER BOWL from page 10

problems with punt coverage.

Bethel Johnson had the Patriots' only kickoff return for a score; the Eagles had none.

INTANGIBLES

Philadelphia has been trying oh so hard to get here. Now that the Eagles are in the Super Bowl, will they be satisfied with the trip, or will they be loose and confident and play their best football?

Andy Reid has turned around this franchise and the Eagles have been the NFC's best in this decade — until late January, or course. They are over that hump because Reid never panicked, never wavered from his approach. Players appreciate and respond to that.

An Eagles victory would be their first in a Super Bowl and Philly's first NFL title since 1960. New England has a slightly different resume.

The Patriots seek their third Super Bowl championship in four years, something only Dallas of the early 1990s managed. Such a feat would measure up with the greatest in sports because of the difficulty of keeping a roster together in the current NFL.

Bill Belichick is a mastermind, and even with a string of injuries to his defense, he's never backed off. The subs simply come in and play well, as he expects.

Belichick is losing offensive coordinator Charlie Weis to Notre Dame and probably will see defensive coordinator Romeo Crennel get the head coaching job in Cleveland, where Belichick himself once was head man. Will the Patriots give them a championship send-off?

Dynasty term will last awhile

HOWE from page 10

press room or the coolest team with the kids playing street ball.

The Patriots are role models, and role models succeed in the long run. Charles Barkley didn't want to be a role model, and he could never get over the hump that was known as Michael Jordan.

They were a long-term team at the beginning of the season, as the common pick to repeat as Super Bowl champs, and they are the long-term team now, as they are being tabbed as the newest dynasty in professional sports. They were not a short-term team, as they didn't stand a chance against the Colts or Steelers. In fact, they weren't even supposed to beat the Jets in Week 16.

So whether everyone is at it again, as the consensus favorite over the last 12 days has been for the Pats, or we are once again being fooled (remember, today is Friday, the first day of final predictions), still remains to be seen.

They have put together another spectacular season, set ironically with short-term goals, and by taking thing step-by-step.

So as the Patriots try to knock off the Eagles on Sunday night amidst whatever predictions, setbacks, short-comings, disrespect, Freddie Mitchell's magic, little "somethings" they have coming for them, or however "ripe for the picking" they are, they can, in just a short time, become one of the few dynastys in NFL history.

And in the long run, that doesn't sound all that bad.

Jeff Howe is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at JeffHowe@DailyCollegian.com.

CINEMARK

CINEMARK AT HAMPSHIRE MALL

Schedule for 2/4 - 2/10 ONLY

Purchase Tickets Online @ cinemark.com

Boogeyman (PG13) 1:15 4:15 7:40 10:00*
Racing Stripes (PG) 1:45 4:20 6:45
The Wedding Date (PG13) 1:25 4:30 7:30 9:50*
Coach Carter (PG13) 1:10 4:10 7:10 10:15
Meet the Fockers (PG13) 1:05 4:05 7:15 10:10*
Finding Neverland (PG) 2:00 4:25 7:15 9:45
Hide & Seek (R) 1:20 4:20 7:05 9:40*
The Aviator (PG13) 1:00 4:40 8:15
A Lot Like Love (PG13) 10:20*
Million Dollar Baby (PG13) 1:05 4:05 7:15 10:10*
Are We There Yet? (PG) 1:50 4:40 7:00 9:30
Man Of The Year (PG13) 1:10 4:35 7:25 10:05
Alone In The Dark (R) 1:30 4:35
Ladder 49 (PG13) Starsky & Hutch (PG13) Diary of a Mad Black Woman (PG13) Meet the Fockers (PG13) Million Dollar Baby (PG13) Are We There Yet? (PG) Boogeyman (PG13) Racing Stripes (PG) Coach Carter (PG13) Finding Neverland (PG) The Aviator (PG13) Man Of The Year (PG13) Alone In The Dark (R) Are We There Yet? (PG)

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SUPER SPORTS WEEKEND

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 2005

SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

New England Patriots vs. Philadelphia Eagles

February 6, 2005 6:30 p.m. Jacksonville, Fla.

The sports staff picks the NFL's champion

MIKE MARZELLI, MANAGING EDITOR
Patriots 30 - Eagles 17

The game itself won't be quite this close, as the Iggles will answer the Pats last touchdown — caught by Mike Vrabel, of course — by getting T.O. in the end-zone with under a minute remaining. However there will be none of Owens' trademark celebrating this time; instead of pulling a Sharpie out of his sock, he'll need both hands to help pull Rodney Harrison's head out of Freddie Mitchell's sternum 20 yards behind the play. Corey Dillon will run hard and gain 80-plus yards against an underrrated Philly front seven, and while David Givens and Deion Branch will undoubtedly make plays, old reliables Troy Brown and David Patten will play more of a role in the offense than you might expect. In the end, however, it will once again be the Tom Brady show, as "Glory Days" will be blaring from the shores of Cape Cod to the northern woods of Maine and half of the UMass campus will journey to Boston on Tuesday for a third victory parade in four years.

BOB MCGOVERN, SPORTS EDITOR
Eagles 3 - Patriots 2

Game? What game? Oh that's right my two least favorite teams in football are playing eachother on Sunday. Well I think David Akers will kick the initial three points of the game after T.O. catches a 80 yard pass from McNabb. However, before blowing the gates open with a touchdown he'll start doing the Macarena three yards before the endzone and halfway through the routine Rodney Harrison will gently push him out of bounds. The Eagles will be forced to settle for the field goal, much to the chagrin of every disgusting Philadelphia fan this side of the Mason-Dixon line. The Patriots will try to return a deep kick, take it three yards out, and Bethel Johnson will run it back 98 yards before he fumbles the ball on the one yard line. Akers will pick up the fumble, run into the endzone and kneel the ball, causing the safety. After this play everyone leaves the stadium and asks for their money back. HENCE, they cancel the rest of the game giving the championship to the Eagles. Go Giants!

JEFF HOWE, ASSISTANT SPORTS EDITOR
Patriots 31 - Eagles 10

I can see the next Chunky Soup ad now. Mrs. McNabb is in the trainer's room soothing Terrell Owens with his broken leg alongside Freddie Mitchell, who incidentally mistook his helmet for a top hat right before his all-too-fortunate run-in with a herd of New England linebackers accompanied by Rodney Harrison during Philadelphia's opening drive. Tom Brady will throw a pair of touchdown passes on his way to winning his third Super Bowl MVP trophy, and the game will be an afterthought midway through the third quarter. Congrats to the Pats, who know that you can't spell "dynasty" without the letters. "N-A-S-T-Y."

ANDREW MERRITT, SPORTS STAFF
Patriots 16 - Eagles 13

This one won't shock anybody. One touchdown for each team, and the Pats win it via the field-goal battle. Vinatieri three, Akers two, with the defending champs happy to win their third Super Bowl in four years in a defensive battle. Terrell Owens makes an appearance, catching two passes before leaving the game. Freddie Mitchell refuses to go across the middle on the first try, and after getting up the courage to do it in the second half, falls down before catching the ball because he sees Rodney Harrison coming. Hail to the champs!

BRENDAN HALL, SPORTS STAFF
Patriots 41 - Eagles 17

Freddie Mitchell gets knocked stupid by Rodney Harrison in the first quarter, causing him to have a memory lapse on the next series and pull a Jim "Wrong Way" Marshall. Eagles fans will still shimmy down Broad Street like they just won the powerball.

DAN DUGAN, SPORTS STAFF
Patriots 27 - Eagles 10

Don't expect any late-game heroics from Tom Brady or Adam Vinatieri this time around. The key to the game won't be stopping Donovan McNabb because it's more likely that Belichick and Co. will scheme to shutdown his weapons. The Pats' linebacking corps will limit the production of the tight ends and Brian Westbrook. If T.O. even ends up playing, he'll be a non-factor. And I guarantee that Rodney Harrison will "have something" for Freddie Mitchell. The bottom line is that by the time Sunday night's game is over, Brady will have secured his spot in the pantheon of all-time great quarterbacks and

See PREDICTIONS on page 7

Breaking down the two title contenders

By Barry Wilner
Associated Press

How the New England Patriots (16-2) and the Philadelphia Eagles (15-3) match up in the Super Bowl:

WHEN THE PATRIOTS HAVE THE BALL

Unlike in their previous two Super Bowl wins this decade, the Patriots have a stud running back, Corey Dillon. Although the Eagles easily handled Atlanta's top-ranked rushing attack in the NFC title game, they'll be hard-pressed to hold Dillon in check because of what QB Tom Brady can do as a complement.

Not that Brady, the MVP of the last two Super Bowls and 8-0 in the postseason, can be considered anything but a star. But New England will seek to minimize Philadelphia's superb secondary by regularly shoving Dillon at the defense. If Dillon forces All-Pro safety Brian Dawkins and the other DBs to crowd the line, then Brady will turn to the deepest receiving corps in the league: Troy Brown, Deion Branch, David Givens, David Patten and speedster Bethel Johnson.

As they proved against Pittsburgh for the AFC championship, the Pats can dismantle even the best defenses. Philadelphia needs the kind of brilliant performance from middle linebacker Jeremiah Trotter that it got the last two weeks, plus a steady pass rush. Jevon Kearse has been dominant in spurts and must be more consistent. Hollis Thomas, Derrick Burgess and Corey Simon all have taken turns being the main guy up front.

Philly had 47 sacks in the regular season, but the Patriots yielded only 26. If there is no pressure on Brady, thanks to that unheralded offensive line, New England should score plenty of points.

WHEN THE EAGLES HAVE THE BALL

Unless All-Pro WR Terrell Owens makes a miraculous recovery from his ankle and leg injuries, his role in the game will be mostly cheerleading. That hasn't put a crimp in Philadelphia's offense so far in the playoffs — but they haven't played the Patriots yet.

Donovan McNabb has matured into one of the league's best quarterbacks and leaders. He hurt the Eagles with some bad decisions in big games in the past, but not this season. McNabb has been dynamic in every facet.

Now, though, he faces the mysteries of the New England defense, where anyone can pop up anywhere at any time. Just ask Peyton Manning and Ben Roethlisberger.

While All-Pro DT Richard Seymour might not be a factor, he's hardly been missed. LBs Tedy Bruschi, Ted Johnson, Mike Vrabel and Roseveli Colvin, linemen Willie McGinest and Ty Warren, and safeties Rodney Harrison and Eugene Wilson lead the big-play defense that has more looks than even a veteran like McNabb can imagine.

Unlike against NFC opponents, RB Brian Westbrook will not be a matchup problem as a receiver. He should, however, find some running room behind OT Tra Thomas and center Hank Fraley.

Philadelphia's ordinary group of supporting receivers for T.O. has played well in the postseason, particularly Freddie Mitchell and the emerging Greg Lewis, a deep threat. The loss of TE Chad Lewis will hurt, meaning second-year player L.J. Smith must step in.

SPECIAL TEAMS

The biggest edge is at PK, but only because Adam Vinatieri has made so many pressure-packed kicks, including two to win Super Bowls. His range is not much longer than David Akers for Philadelphia, but All-Pro Vinatieri simply doesn't miss important kicks.

New England's Josh Miller and Philly's Dirk Johnson are middle-of-the-road punters.

Unlike against NFC opponents, RB Brian Westbrook will not be a matchup problem as a receiver. He should, however, find some running room behind OT Tra Thomas and center Hank Fraley.

Philadelphia's ordinary group of supporting receivers for T.O. has played well in the postsea-

See SUPER BOWL on page 8

CARY B. GREEN/ORLANDO SENTINEL

Andy Reid has a large task at hand when it comes to knocking off the favored Patriots.

GARY B. GREEN/ORLANDO SENTINEL

The Patriots biggest intangible is Bill Belichick, who has two weeks to prepare for Sunday.

UMass athletes stay loyal to their teams

Taking a break for their normal routine of practice after practice with games hidden in the middle, the student/athletes at the University of Massachusetts can unite the way the rest of the world will on Sunday: watch the Super Bowl with a group of friend or teammates.

Well, maybe "unite" isn't the appropriate word, especially looking at Zech Klann and Tim Warner's responses.

But nonetheless, they get a break from action to once again become fans, just like they were before sport became a serious, everyday duty.

It wasn't too surprising to see each athlete stick to the team they have been raised to root for. This is what they have to say:

STEVE LAPPAS, MEN'S BASKETBALL COACH, JETS FAN/EAGLES SUPPORTER

"My son is a big Eagles fan, but I'm a big New York Jets fan ... I am rooting for the Eagles this weekend only because my son, who is insane right now. He grew up in Philly and spent his early years there, so that's all he cares about. He has an Eagles everything: McNabb this, T.O. that, so I've got to go with the Eagles.

"I think the Eagles are going to win, I really do. I don't know why I would go against Bill Belichick, who will be like Vince Lombardi if he wins this one. I just have a feeling the Eagles will end up on top. I'm going to go with 24-17."

TIM COLLINS, MEN'S BASKETBALL, SENIOR, PATRIOTS FAN

"I'm kind of nervous because the Pats are always he underdogs. I've got to go with the Patriots, I've been a Patriots fan my whole life. It kind of scares me because I don't like them going in as such a big favorite, but I still think they'll win in the end."

ZECH KLANN, HOCKEY, FORWARD, FRESHMAN, EAGLES FAN

"I think the Eagles are going to take it. I think it's the best thing to happen to Philly since Rocky Balboa beat Apollo Creed in Rocky II. Eagles by seven."

TIM WARNER, HOCKEY, GOALIE, SENIOR, PATRIOTS FAN

"The Pats are going to win. Obviously, they're building a dynasty. There is no better team, and that is the key word — team.

That's why they are going to beat the Eagles. They've got Owens running his mouth, and we're just going to have Rodney Harrison step and drill him and put him back on the bench. I don't have a score, but I say [the Patriots] are going to win by 17."

Best Patriots' memory: "My freshman year, we were on our way back from UNH. We got beat pretty bad up there. It was during the Raiders game, the snow game. We had about 20 guys in the back of the bus huddling around this little radio, and Vinatieri made that kick in the snow when he couldn't even see. The whole bus just erupted. That was just the best moment."

Message to Klann: "He better hide because he is going to be pretty embarrassed after the game on Sunday."

DON CANOON, HOCKEY, COACH, PATRIOTS FAN

"I'm a big-time Patriots fan. I used to watch the Patriots play at Fenway Park in 1965 so I love the Patriots. I like the Eagles, too, but I love the Patriots."

EORIS BAILEY, WOMEN'S BASKETBALL, FORWARD, SENIOR, PATRIOTS FAN

"Of course [I want the Patriots to win]. I hope so."

PAM ROSANIO, WOMEN'S BASKETBALL, SHOOTING GUARD, FRESHMAN, EAGLES FAN

"I think it's better [that the Eagles are underdogs]. I want them to win more than anything. Of course, they're going to win. I'm just flat out saying it; they are going to win."

JUSTIN ZEIMETZ, SWIMMING AND DIVING, SENIOR, PATRIOTS FAN

"There's a few Eagles fans on the team that like to talk trash about the Patriots, but most of us know that the Patriots will win."

COLLEEN WASSON, SWIMMING AND DIVING, SENIOR, EAGLES FAN

"I am from Philadelphia, so I'm going there this weekend and watching the game

Pats aren't the favorites on gamedays

Jeff Howe

The New England Patriots have been successful over the years by keeping things simple and boring. Their coaches, players, practices and media sessions trudge along in a monotonous fashion; everyone knows their role.

Things are just always, well, plain and simple.

Just as the Patriots have patterns, though, so do many members of the national media. It's been pretty routine; for the better part of the last four years, Mondays have consisted of the usual hype. "The Patriots are the best team in football," the media crowd would agree, and so on and so on and so on.

The week would continue predictably, as always. The Patriots are the best franchise in sports Mondays through Thursdays, and if they are lucky, sometimes on Fridays.

Things change when the weekend nears, though. The experts' short-term memories would kick in and, suddenly, the Patriots weren't that good anymore. It would be as if Drew Bledsoe had replaced Tom Brady in the starting lineup, and Bill Belichick decided to let Pete Carroll fill in just for kicks.

But those things don't happen, so why must we constantly listen to these hypocritical media hounds bash a team they once loved just hours ealier? It's been a neverending cycle, except now, it has ended.

These types of bandwagoners are about as sports savvy as the Red Sox faithful who have free-loaded off the team's recent succes. They are along for the dynasty ride. They want their place in history.

Just ask Sean Salisbury, who kicked the Pats around during the week leading up to the notorious Colts' game that was supposed to be Peyton Manning's Hall-of-Fame enshrinement party. He at least manned up to admit he was wrong, and he has also stated that he will never pick against the defending champs again.

The Patriots are a long-term team. They aren't the best team on paper, the flashiest team in the

See HOWE on page 8

Controversial director Spike Lee coming to UMass

ARTS & LIVING, PAGE 5

DAILY WEATHER FORECAST

TODAY	TUESDAY	WEDNESDAY
• High: 55° • Low: 30°	• High: 46° • Low: 31°	• High: 44° • Low: 28°

Patriots land Eagles; take home Super Bowl

SPORTS, PAGE 10

The Daily Collegian

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 2005 NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY • EST. 1890 VOLUME CXV ISSUE 74

Doing the dynasty dance

ANDREW TAM/COLLEGIAN

Students in Southwest Residential Area celebrate the victory of the New England Patriots over the Philadelphia Eagles in Super Bowl XXXIX last night. Students threw flaming rolls of toilet paper and set off fire works. There were no known injuries at press time.

Super Bowl Champs

Pats rank among the all-time greats

By Barry Wilner
Associated Press

JACKSONVILLE, Fla. — Dynasties don't have to be perfect or pretty. They just have to win — like the New England Patriots.

The Patriots won their third Super Bowl in four years with a dominant second half Sunday night, wearing down the Philadelphia Eagles 24-21.

It wasn't overpowering, and at times it was downright ugly. But it was more than enough to match the Dallas Cowboys' run of the 1990s and certify the Patriots of Bill Belichick and Tom Brady as the NFL's latest dynasty.

"To me this trophy belongs to these players," Belichick said. "They met all comers this year, a very challenging year. We're thrilled to win. These players played great all year, their best in the big games and they deserve it, they really deserve it."

With MVP Deion Branch tying a Super Bowl record for receptions with 11, Brady efficiently running the offense and Rodney Harrison sparking a smothering defense, the Patriots (17-2) won their ninth successive postseason game. That ties the record of Vince Lombardi's Packers of the 1960s, and there's hardly any better company a team can keep.

The difference once again was an Adam Vinatieri field goal, this one a 22-yarder with 8:40 to go. New England won its other two Super Bowls by the margin of Vinatieri's last-second kicks.

This time, the Patriots sealed it with a stop.

Philadelphia (15-4) got the ball back at its 4 with 46 seconds remaining. It was hardly enough time and far too much territory to cover against such a formidable foe.

Harrison got his second interception with 9 seconds remaining to end it.

Playing before a sea of mostly green jerseys in the crowd of 78,125, the Patriots made sure Philadelphia would not get its first pro sports title since 1983. Indeed, it's been 45 years since the Eagles won the NFL crown. And even though they made it to the Super Bowl for the first time in 24 seasons — after three straight conference championship flops — their season still

See SUPER BOWL on page 10

Commission hears campus concerns with diversity issues

By Casey Novak
Collegian Staff

Various members of the University of Massachusetts community gave their personal recommendations to the Commission on Campus Diversity at a public forum last Thursday.

The forum, which was held in the Campus Center Auditorium, was held for those who could not attend a Dec. 9 forum.

Many topics were brought up at the forum, including the recent decision to purchase tasers, or the new picketing code, which no longer allows protests inside a University building if it is considered disruptive.

However, many speakers went far beyond that.

As Andres Gomez, from the student group Take Back UMass, stood before the Commission, he ripped his nametag, saying that who he is does not matter.

"I stand before you blindfolded and gagged with my hands tied behind my back. You are my blindfold and this microphone is my gag," he said.

"We do not need a commission of outside experts to tell us what the problems of our University are. We know, but we are not being heard. When [the University] says they are color-blind in the admission process it is true — they only care who can pay and who can pay the most," he said.

Erin Naomi Lemkey, also of Take Back UMass, asked the commission to think about the two words quality and agency and what they have to do with this University.

"What you see here is university administration with a long-term plan to unhinge itself from its community in its statewide obligations to provide affordable, accessible and supportive education to poor and working class students of all races," she said. "UMass is stuffing this campus to the gills with as many out-of-state and full fee paying students as possible. It is no secret they are acting more like consumers than clients."

Lemkey requested that the Commission formulate a document to be signed by the Board of Trustees, the president, and every chancellor. The document, she said, would commit them to the protection and continuous funding of all cultural agencies.

See DIVERSITY on page 3

Explicit Hampden Gallery mural creates campus buzz

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts students have found themselves stopping in at the Hampden Gallery to view a mural that has the campus talking. The mural, which stands at 1,100 square feet, was drawn in black marker by Austrian artist Heimo Wallner, who was given a $1,200 grant from the UMass Arts Council to express his artistic insight.

Since arriving at UMass, Wallner worked everyday for numerous hours to create this 8-foot mural that has caught the eyes of the UMass community and has created a buzz all around campus.

"There are certain things I have heard about since being here. Student troubles, student conflict," Wallner said. "[The mural represents] life. Life in general, life in the United States and life in UMass."

The mural depicts drawings of characters that are involved in several violent, coarse, and sexual activities, with the genitalia of these characters represented in detail. The people illustrated on the mural have a deranged, monstrous look to them as they are engaged in several actions that represent smoking, drinking, hunting and other controversial acts. Many believe that it represents the existence of humans in today's modern world, or the problems that America is faced with everyday.

Due to the explicit material, large dividers were set out in front of the mural shortly after it was put on exhibit so those who wish not to see the drawings. A few formal complaints have been issued. Overall, the feedback has been mostly fascination, with a little bit of shock.

When asked about the controversial material that some may find offensive, Wallner was open to any discussion.

"When I realized how many sore spots I hit, I was really amazed," Wallner said. "First thing I would say is talk to me, speak to me, enter a dialogue, we might not leave the dialogue as friends, but not as enemies."

If not for a friendly connection, Wallner would most likely not have ended up at UMass. Professor of Art Line Bruntse met Wallner while living in Boston. After visiting Austria and working on a few projects with Wallner, Bruntse decided to contact Wallner in hopes that he would be willing to add his own personal insight to UMass.

"I thought he would be the perfect person to come in to work with my students and having his work out in this scale is really impressive," Bruntse said. "And probably it thought would spark a discussion of awareness of things that people don't normally talk about."

With Wallner in the United States at the time, Bruntse, along with colleague Steve Buddington, worked on a grant that would enable him to come to UMass. The two art professors also have their own artwork in the gallery, which has an overriding theme that displays the contrast of materials and demonstrates a certain unbalanced feeling.

"It's the beginning to question things. Question whether the structure or images is a contradiction of materials. There's an element of fun, but also seriousness, and there are other implications as well

The portrayal of "life" was constructed using Wallner's artistic abilities, which he attributes to everything he does.

"It's how I process the world, how I digest external and internal process," Wallner said. "My insight I carry with me, my emotions, my fears, obsession, all that."

Following his time spent at UMass, Wallner left campus last Friday and returned to his home country of St. Lorenzenbei Scheifling, Austria, where he works as a curator. He plans to finish a project over the next month in Austria and travel to Japan.

MATTHEW REISCOLLEGIAN

A UMass student observes the controversial 8-foot mural by Austrian artist Heimo Wallner. The mural depicts violence, sexual activities, and vivid genitalia of gruesome characters.

MATTHEW REISCOLLEGIAN

Characters engage in disturbing activities in Wallner's mural.

Professor and student study evaluates new pedometer

By Katie Huston
Collegian Correspondent

Doctor Patty Freedson, a University of Massachusetts exercise science professor, is currently conducting a study with three UMass students to evaluate a new pedometer.

The study's goal is to determine the accuracy of a new type of pedometer manufactured in Japan. Although some initial tests on the product were done in Japan, this is the first study that has been conducted in the United States.

Pedometers are small devices worn on the hip and measure how many steps a person takes. They also estimate how many calories are burned. According to Freedson, they are helpful for people trying to increase their exercise and set goals.

COURTESY UMASS-FYI

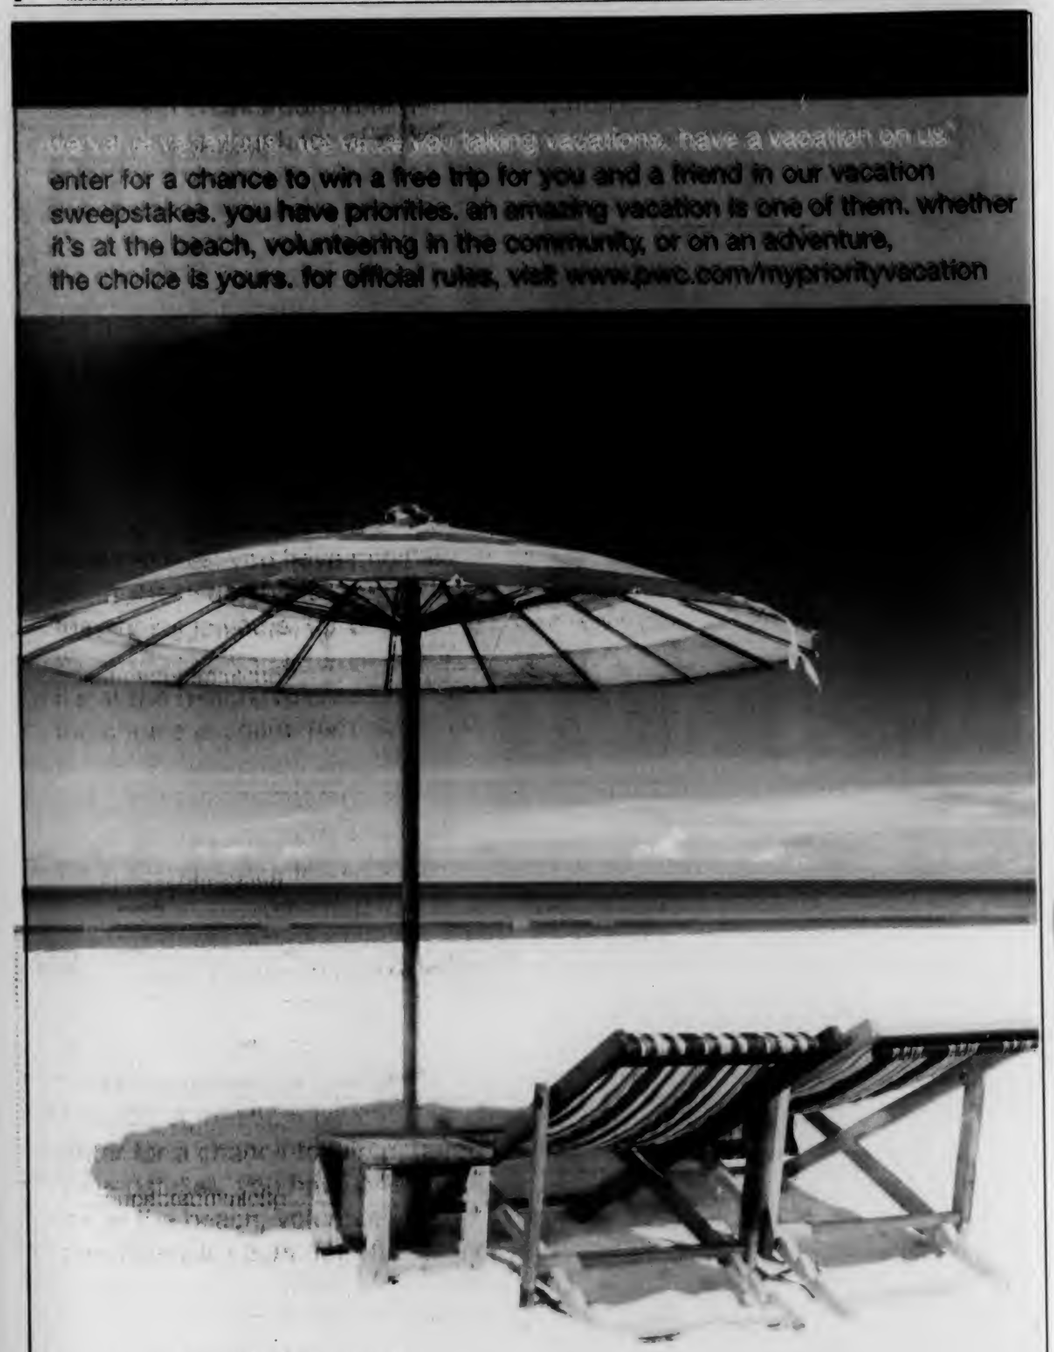
Professor Patty Freedson

"It's an objective way that people can get an idea of how active or inactive they are, in the same way that you might get on a scale or take your blood pressure," said Freedson. "When you see those numbers, it gives you a handle of [whether] you're in a good range or an unhealthy range."

The new pedometer is being tested against the Yamax Digiwalker, a more established model. The Japanese pedometer has advantages over the Digiwalker and other models currently on the market, including more advanced technology for measuring steps. The Japanese model counts regular steps, aerobic steps, calories, and the distance a person walks. It can also store information for longer periods of time.

Graduate student Rebecca Hasson and undergraduate exercise science majors Jaylynn Lawerdure and Amanda Dahlberg are working with Freedson on the project. Dahlberg is also using the project as the basis for her senior honors thesis.

In addition to testing the pedometer's accuracy, Dahlberg is focusing on the difference in accuracy between short and tall people. "People in Japan tend to be shorter, so [the pedometer] could be more inaccurate for taller people," Dahlberg said.



Freedson cited the current media emphasis on exercise to highlight the importance of a properly working pedometer.

"Everybody's talking about the concept of 10,000 steps a day. That's what you need to do exercise-wise for health," she said.

The study is being conducted on a diverse group of 50 subjects, including many UMass students. Freedson believes participation in the study has been a valuable learning experience because students got to see firsthand how studies are conducted.

"Traditionally, students go into classes and take exams and take notes, and this is another type of learning experience that's beneficial to students — real life experience," Freedson said.

The study began in October and will finish in March.

1. No purchase necessary.
2. Must be at least 18 years of age, a student attending this school and legal U.S. resident.
3. Must enter by 2/22/05 at 11:59 PM EST.
4. See Official Rules at www.pwc.com/mypriorityvacation

"connectedthinking

PRICEWATERHOUSECOOPERS

© 2005 PricewaterhouseCoopers LLP. All rights reserved. "PricewaterhouseCoopers" refers to PricewaterhouseCoopers LLP (a Delaware limited liability partnership) or, as the context requires, other member firms of PricewaterhouseCoopers International Limited, each of which is a separate and independent legal entity. "connectedthinking is a trademark of PricewaterhouseCoopers LLP (US). We are proud to be an Affirmative Action and Equal Opportunity Employer.

Speakers say efforts for diversity on campus poor

DIVERSITY from page 1

President of SEIU, Thomas Coish, expressed his dissatisfaction with how the University functions.

"It seems that sometimes the University has to be dragged kicking and screaming to do the right thing during situations far too often," he said.

Coish also said that the Stonewall budget has been slashed by 40 percent.

"There is an administration here that is not only anti-students of color, but also anti-youth."

Jaminah Whitney, who has a disability that affects her mobility, brought up handicap accessibility.

She said that due to construction around the W.E.B. DuBois library, construction trailers have blocked off the handicap accessibility to the building.

Whitney also said that 100 percent of the computers on this campus that are intended for public use could not be used by someone with hand tremors or arthritis.

"If these problems don't affect you or someone around you, then you probably have not noticed," she said. "I've been roundly treated as if my needs are bazaar and completely unreasonable."

"As a community, do we need to educate ourselves more on diversity issues?" Whitney asked the Commission. "Yes, because the University does a very poor job of self-monitoring."

Megan Bronster/Collegian

Speakers address the Diversity Commission in the Campus Center Auditorium last Weds. on issues such as the new picketing code and the University Police Department's acquisition of tasers.

Joanne Levenson spoke on behalf of the student family population at this University, saying that although a small population, they are a significant one.

"There are approximately 600 of these students on campus, and about 450 meet the rank of so-called high priority needs. And we believe out of that population around 40 to 60 percent are also members of ALANA," she said.

Although Levenson said she did not think this is typical treatment of a student parent, she told the story of one young mother who came to her after she had been living in her car with her two year old.

"Her apartment with family housing wouldn't be ready for a month so she was told to get a hotel until they had room. We figured out that getting a hotel would cost approximately $1,000 for a month," she said. "This should not happen."

Levenson said that if this was an undergraduate without a child that came to the school, housing would have been found for her. She added that many of the young women and men who are parents are on welfare and have to work 20 hours a week in order to preserve that stipend as well as take a full course load.

"This is a huge burden on our students. I hope that [the commission] recognize the position of these students."

Nora Ritchie, a SGA senator, told the commission that students are what make this University possible. She asked them to demand that the University live up to it's past promises and current obligation.

"We need to be in this for the long haul. This is critical for the success of the university."

At the close of the forum, Commission Chair Orlando Taylor said a public statement will be made on March 1.

Shall we dance?

Students waltz during the UMass Ballroom Dance Team tryouts last Weds. night in Totman Gym. The team participates in an average of four competitions per semester and is coached by the Ballroom Fever Dance Studio.

Thousands to be hired for clean-up

By Christopher Boeren

BANDA ACEH, Indonesia — Tens of thousands of Indonesian workers will be hired for $4-a-day jobs cleaning up the disaster's debris, the United Nations' chief relief official said Sunday, as income to people whose livelihoods were swept away along with their homes.

The relief operation struck a snag on the other side of the tsunami zone, however, where the Sri Lankan government suspended three village officials in charge of aid deliveries for abusing their positions, and said it was investigating 10 other cases of possible misappropriation.

Governments and international and private aid groups were reassessing their operations to help more than 1 million people left in need by the Dec. 26 earthquake and tsunami as the U.S. military began scaling down its emergency relief effort, and other nations' forces prepared to follow suit.

President Bush on Friday announced he is sending a second delegation to visit the Indian Ocean region, this one made up of two former presidents, his father and former President Clinton. The pair will visit tsunami-affected countries Feb. 19-21.

George H.W. Bush and Clinton are to stop in the hardest-hit nations, including Indonesia, Sri Lanka, Thailand and the Maldives, the White House said. Clinton also has been designated by the United Nations as a special envoy to help promote reconstruction and oversee cleanup in the affected areas.

In a previous delegation, Bush sent his brother, Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, to survey the region alongside then-Secretary of State Colin Powell.

The confirmed death toll across 11 tsunami-struck countries edged higher — to between 159,976 and 178,115 — after Indonesia's National Disaster Relief Coordinating Board said its workers had found and buried 1,108 more bodies in Aceh province on Sumatra island.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
113 Campus Center
University of Massachusetts
Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3698 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief Peter Foundas
Managing Editor Mike Mazzelli
Business Manager Carlos Palacios
Production Manager Cory Rosenberg
Advertising Manager Maggie Healy
Operations Manager Tegan Bielski
Editorial Production Samantha M. Nielsen
Arts & Living Editor Michael Busack
City Editor Alyssa Zilnanon
Editorial Editor Yousef Munayyer
News Editor Erika Lovley
Photo Editor Alex Desmonthene
Sports Editor Bob McGovern
Circulation Manager Kristen Weiss
Classified Advertising Marty Pappus
Distribution Manager Josh Kiggans
Finance Manager Hirak Shah
Accounting Clerk Virginie Frecaut
Human Resources Sandra Marquez
Assistant Operations Linda Wallack
Assistant Advertising Josh Greenberg
Assistant Business Nathan Chomsky
Assistant Finance Thomas Hecht
Advertising Production Rachael Bruno
Graphics Adviser Charlie Higgins
Asst. Arts & Living Matthew O'Rourke
Asst. Arts & Living Chris Gunzaru
Assistant Editorial Allison Edles
Assistant News Julie O'Donnell
Assistant News Dan O'Brien
Assistant Photo Megan Bronster
Assistant Sports Jeff Howe

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts Amherst academic semester. The Collegian is independently funded, operating on advertising revenues. Founded in 1890, the paper began as Index. It became the College Signal in 1901, the Weekly Collegian in 1914 and the Tri-Weekly Collegian in 1936. Published daily since 1967. The Collegian was given Honorable Mention by the Associated Collegiate Press in 1994. For advertising rates and information, call (413) 545-3500 between 8:30 a.m. and 5:30 p.m.

Production Crew

On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Mike Mazzelli

PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Alex Desmonthene

COPY EDITOR
Matt Eder

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Cory Rosenberg

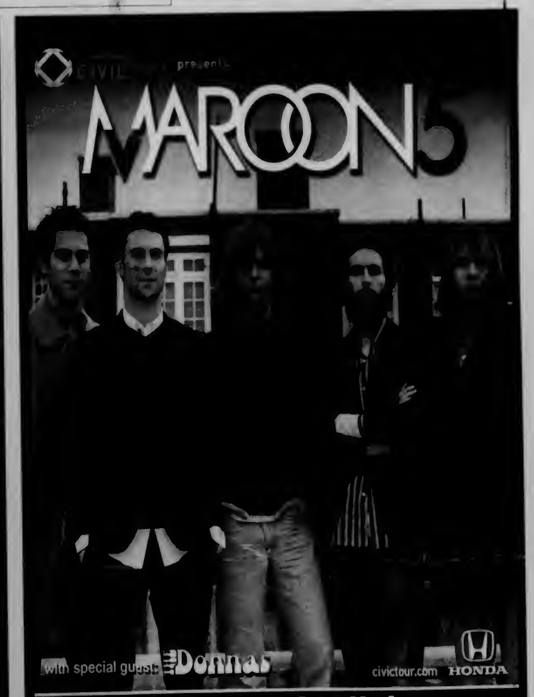
PRODUCTION STAFF
Samantha M. Nielsen, Jameson Melbourne

Coors LIGHT presents

Rascal Flatts
Here's to You Tour 2005

with special guest Blake Shelton

"Feels Like Today" » In Stores Now



Tickets are On Sale Now!
Saturday, February 26 at 8 PM

ticketmaster (413) 733-2500

MULLINS CENTER
University of Massachusetts Amherst

Joe Fletcher Presents

Tickets are available at the Mullins Center Box Office

Monday, April 4

TICKETS ON SALE NOW!

MULLINS CENTER
University of Massachusetts Amherst

ticketmaster
(413) 733-2500

First 1500 UMass student tickets are $10 Off at the Mullins Center Box Office

maroon5.com

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 2005

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it" -Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Drafting via education

S.J. Port

There is a form of draft in effect in the United States of America today. There is, of course, no literal draft. The government got too smart for that. Instead of forcing men and women to serve, they began a system of benefits if you served — more specifically, a shot at higher education.

The college degree is fast becoming what the high school degree once was. A bachelor's degree has become a standard requirement, especially in the Northeast region, to gain employment with benefits and pay enough to (hopefully) live on. As the level of specialization has increased in the workplace, the cost of education has increased. As this happened, the government wisely realized where to find their next generation of soldiers: wannabe college students without the dough to cover tuition.

The government promises to pay a portion of your tuition in exchange for your service. This is not a literal draft but a way to secure troops for the military while creating the image of a generous government dedicated to education. But why not just give larger financial aid packages to those students that need it?

The government promises to pay a portion of your tuition in exchange for your service. This is not a literal draft but a way to secure troops for the military while creating the image of a generous government dedicated to education.

The answer: you can't get something for nothing. But why does that "something" (money for school) have to be in exchange for military service? Where are the bills that support financial aid in exchange for teaching in disadvantaged school systems, or working as a public defender or as an engineer for the state?

ROTC and other military sponsorships of educationally-based service programs are in essence indentured servitude. The government has the right to ask something of students in exchange for financial assistance, but what they are asking for is limited and offensive in its short sightedness.

It is, perhaps, a misleadingly idealistic liberal agenda to think that a government that endorses education sanctions only freedom and liberty. The reality is that there is a dearth of teachers, public defenders and civil service people, as well as other socially imperative professions. Legislation to enlarge — or in some areas establish — programs equivalent to ROTC that create a force of these types of needed professionals would not only help students, the majority of whom cannot afford higher education public or private, but in very few years supply need to the most critically in need areas of our own communities — not those over seas.

Alas, instead we spend close to a billion dollars a week on war, while education falls under the wheels of the government's military machine.

A military machine that even often turns over costs of "security" to the student. International students on the University of Massachusetts campus were shocked when they were asked to pay a $65 fee, so much so that they overturned the fee. That fee was put in place to cover the costs of the Homeland Security Act's SEVIS program, a system that logs all data on international students studying in the United States. When international students didn't want to pay for SEVIS, the University added the fee into everyone's student fees; so now all students pay a part of it (admittedly a small part since it is so well spread out).

To put the nail in the coffin, consider this: during this, President Bush's Administration's students, also referred to as cadets, at West Point have received three pay raises. Currently the average senior at West Point receives a sum of about $500 a month for miscellaneous expenses, in addition to their free education in exchange for service post graduation — because in addition to being students, they are on "active duty for the military."

Yet in the same time frame, the Commonwealth of Massachusetts has been unable to come through on the raises promised in contracts for members of the higher educational community — such as any and all employees of the University of Massachusetts, from employed student tutors at the Writing Center to tenured professors. The Commonwealth has also cut programs that supply scholarships to students who promise to teach in poor Massachusetts' public schools following graduation.

You can argue the funding originates from different budget line items - but it doesn't matter where the money comes from, it matters how we dole it out and we've definitely made our priorities clear: there is money for war, but not for education — unless you want to serve in our military in exchange for your education.

As one popular bumper sticker aptly asks: "why is there always money for war, but not for education?" And why do we allow our government to focus their efforts on exchanging financial aid for military service instead of for civil service?

S.J. Port is a Collegian columnist.

Operation: Metrosexual

Zach Oelschlegel

I'll be honest with you, UMass. I choked.

Big time.

In the article I used to kick start my journalistic endeavors for the year, I lamented to you all regarding my inability to bench press more than my little sister can, which ultimately led to further demise with the women I was attracted to. Thus, the goal for last semester was to work my way up to merely being able to pick up the 25-pound dumbbell at the gym, and therefore the thinking would conclude with me being be able to carry at least a couple of a girl's books, who I presumably would have been walking to class.

Alas, I blew it.

Not only did I fail to make it to the gym more than once last semester, but also the one time I did show up, I was the only person there to work out. I also had the privilege of all the beefed-up trainers watching my every move, laughing amongst themselves as I opted for the seven-pound dumbbells to work my lats.

I've come to the conclusion that I can't make a muscle. Often times, women will ask men to make a muscle, and some meathead whose intelligence is equivalent to a box of Cracker Jack will pull up his sleeve and flash all the women his biceps. As they ooh and ah I think to myself about making a hilarious joke regarding this man's brainpower, and ditch the idea remembering he could beat me senseless using only his index finger if he felt like it.

Normal people make muscles. I make fats. I've even found a way to congeal my stomach fats into looking like a six-pack. Unfortunately, I'm still trying to find someone who thinks that's attractive.

Normal people make muscles. I make fats. I've even found a way to congeal my stomach fats into looking like a six-pack. Un-fortunately, I'm still trying to find someone who thinks that's attractive.

So, I must turn to plan B. I will always be one of those guys who can make heads turn by simply taking off his shirt, but it will be due to a lack of muscle instead of an abundance of it.

I think I'll have to go with the "Queer Eye for the Straight Guy" method and make my jubilant return to UMass this semester as a metrosexual. After careful analysis of my other options, I think that's the only one that could work.

For instance, I could go the other route and try and go for the things "on the inside of a person" that women like, such as honesty and humor. Unfortunately, my speaking abilities are terrible, as I tend to mumble just about all of my words, meaning a situation could arise where I'd make a side-splitting joke on par with something Jerry Seinfeld would say. A woman would slap me for thinking I told her she needed a nose job.

Naturally, there's also the time and a place factor for good humor, as this column is from the same guy who decided to lighten the mood during his prom by asking his date "why Rhode Island was neither a road nor an island." I'm still wondering why Cecilia isn't returning my calls.

The honesty method would eventually screw me over, too. I can already envision myself trying to buy a girl a drink at the Monkey Bar.

"Hi, my name is Zach. I still live with my parents. I don't have a job, and I recently began showering regularly at the age of 18. I'm also handy when it comes to making Rhode Island jokes."

It would never work. The metrosexual route is clearly my only option due to a total lack of other options. Unfortunately, you tend to eliminate about a third of all available women; women who think that metrosexuals aren't real men, but you're still able to attract the rest of the female species who appreciate a sense of style.

There are a few caveats to this whole operation. There is the money factor, as this mission to dress like a stud will hit me hard in the wallet. There's also the part about me tripping over myself, to the point where I could potentially destroy my clothes by trying to walk up steps. Finally, my Bud Light drinking, NASCAR watching uncle might disown me for not being a real man in his eyes. Sadly, sacrifices need to be made, as desperate times do call for desperate measures.

It'll take a while to get this whole mess figured out. It's not exactly an overnight process where someone just becomes a metrosexual. So in the mean time, have you ladies heard the one about the Rhode Island policeman who ran over the Chihuahua?

Zach Oelschlegel is a Collegian columnist.

Volunteering in dire need

Becky Martins

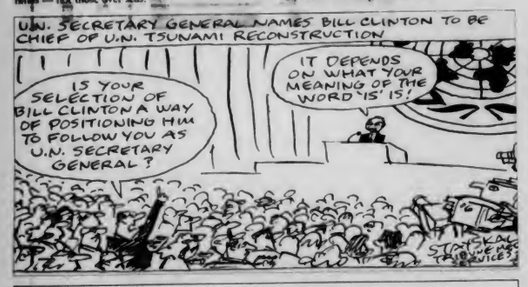
Volunteerism may be becoming as old fashioned as chivalry, but is it possible to reverse this growing trend?

Helping others is one of the most unselfish acts a person can take part in. Whether it comes in the form of donating money and belongings, sharing our free time or spreading love and compassion to fellow human beings, any type of generosity can be appreciated. Some people live life too self-obsessed and with an extreme lack of concern for others. Taking the time to aid our peers can prove to be both a humbling and rewarding experience.

In high school, many volunteered their time without the incentive of a paycheck. But were our intentions genuine? For some, spending time at local soup kitchens, senior centers, etc. may have been for heartfelt reasons. But personally, I did not put in numerous hours during my junior and senior years just for fun. Instead, and sadly enough, volunteering had stood for a requirement or obligation. If I wanted to get into college or stay in my high school's National Honor Society, a specific amount of hours needed to be completed. Though I was not getting paid for my work, my intentions were not solely in helping others either.

Bettering society should rank high on the list of things we aim to accomplish with our lives. Oftentimes, however, our busy lives cause us to put less emphasis on the important things than is deserved.

In my post-graduation years, I look back and wish my high school volunteerism had been more sincere. Had my tutees learned anything from the help I provided in math and Spanish? Did the World War II Veterans I awarded high school diplomas to for my senior project appreciate their long-awaited certificates? The work I took part in may have been enjoyable and hopefully the efforts had some effect on others, but sometimes our priorities are not what they should be. Bettering society should rank high on the list of things we aim to accomplish with our lives. Oftentimes, however, our busy lives cause us to put less emphasis on the important things than is deserved.



Today, there is more reason than ever to volunteer. Earlier this month, the world experienced one of the worse calamities it had ever seen when Asia was hit by multiple earthquakes and tsunamis. Countless people lost their lives. Survivors lost loved ones, their homes and belongings, and any sense of security they had ever felt in the past. Filled with so much despair, those affected turned to others to get them through the difficult times. Westerners and many individuals around the world suddenly found themselves being asked to help.

In the case of the Tsunami relief, there is a myriad of things people can do to lend a hand. The easiest way to help is to send donations through organizations like the Red Cross, such as money, clothing or any other non-perishable item that could prove useful. Since individuals lost all possession during the disaster, very little would go unappreciated. If people really wish to make a difference, the option even exists to adopt orphans from the affected areas.

As for UMass Amherst, we could run our own supply and fund drive and send contributions. By doing so, the campus could come together under a common cause, as well as help do our part in light of the tragedy. Whatever individuals decide to do, helping in whatever way possible is better than ignoring the situation overseas. The damage may be thousands of miles away, but this does not put us above the situation.

In the future, and in a perfect world, we would have successful careers, loving families, and still have time to give back to society. As good as that looks on paper, however, reality often proves differently. For this reason, people should volunteer their time in whatever way possible. Some may put in countless hours helping peers, while others may not do more than donate money or belongings to a specific cause. Either way, we as people need to start remembering our fellow human beings and become active in others' lives. It should not take an enormous tragedy to remind us of our duties within our communities, this nation and in the world as a whole. For without conscious effort, no differences will be made.

Becky Martins is a Collegian columnist.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

ISRAEL STANDS FOR PEACE

It is quite an outrageous claim that Yousef Munayyer makes in his column "Different Leader, Same Struggle." He writes as though Israel takes pleasure in this atrocious situation. He could not be more wrong. Israel is a nation dedicated to the peace process, and it may be the only one striving for peaceful resolution to this conflict.

As can be read on CNN.com, "An Israeli Cabinet committee on Thursday approved the release of at least 500 Palestinian prisoners, a military withdrawal from five West Bank cities — and an end to targeted killings of suspected Palestinian militants." Israel is moving forward in its attempt to resolve the conflict, with or without a partner, and as proven so repeatedly, Munayyer believes that Israel has failed to make any serious concessions. But let's be straight, Israel is indeed making significant concessions and what have the Palestinians offered? Israel has asked for only one thing — a cease-fire. The Palestinians can't even handle that.

Munayyer continues with his accusations, saying Israel "prefers" armed struggle and that it has "only gained land from it in the past."

He must be referring to the many times Israel was attacked by its Arab neighbors with provocation. This first occurred in 1948, the day after declaring its independence, when six Arab nations simultaneously attacked Israel. Israel did gain land from these attacks, but I would venture the guess that Israel would have preferred not being attacked at all and sticking with their original land mass.

Or perhaps Munayyer is talking about the time Egypt called for a war of complete destruction of Israel in 1967. Once again, Israel was resilient, even after Jordan and Syria attacked. As the outcome of this war, Israel gained control of much land from its aggressive neighbors. Since this time, Israel has returned nearly 90 percent of this land in return for peace. This is like the United States returning the land it acquired in the U.S. - Mexican War. Can you imagine the U.S. giving California, New Mexico and Texas back to Mexico?

Both the Israeli government and the majority of the Israeli people are invested in making great strides, and great sacrifices, for peace. It is unjust to ignore these intentions and to accuse Israel of enjoying the situation. Israel wants to protect its citizens and to stop the mass murder of Israelis via bombings and attacks. Israel wants to end the years of fighting and create a lasting peace. Now it's up to the Palestinians. I sincerely hope that unlike Munayyer's assertion, they are willing to give "more" to achieve a peaceful resolution.

Talya Mazor
UMass student

STEREOTYPING KILLS 'GAY BEST FRIEND' MESSAGE

In regards to the editorial, "End of the 'Gay Best Friend'," I have to ask Thomas Naughton how he dares to complain about any stereotypes women or straight men have about gay men and then proceed to stereotype women as vapid creatures, his girlfriends excepted of course, and straight men as ignorant jerks?

But, maybe I have no right to complain; I'm not one of the smart girls. My response to any men thinking women are stupid is not along the lines of "dressing cuter" as Naughton suggests. Of course, I'm not even sure where Naughton gets the assumption that "straight men may think women are stupid." Yes, some men may, but the majority that I've met have very different thoughts and I'm sure they don't appreciate being lumped in a stereotype.

As for Naughton's stereotyping of women as shopaholics, desperate for a gay best friend to tell her how good she looks, I have to say I'm very offended. Does Naughton seriously believe that we women wake up in the morning any differently than he and his friend, Airline? My first thoughts aren't really along the lines of "oh gee, when will my gay best friend call? I desperately need to go shopping." Does he really think that women value their friends solely on their advice on what summer lipstick shade looks the best? Does he really think that so many women even care about summer lipstick shades?

I'm sure that Naughton didn't mean to say that all women are the shallow morons he is portraying here. I'm also sure that there are women who wish they lived a life like Grace on "Will and Grace" and had all sorts of gay men to befriend them and tell them how fabulous they are, but those women are in the minority. Don't write about them as if they are indicative of the rest of us. Words must be weighed. Naughton may have been trying to get across a point, but I'm afraid it got lost in the sea of stereotypes.

Megan Daley
UMass student

SUBMIT A LETTER OR OPINION

In order to be considered for publication, all submissions must include the writer's name, address, and telephone number or e-mail address. Letters should be no longer than 450 words in length and addressed as 'Letters to the Editor.' Commentaries should be no more than 750 words and addressed as 'Editorial/Opinion.' Submissions may be edited for clarity and condensed. You may write, fax, or e-mail your submissions to:

editorial@dailycollegian.com | 413-545-3500 | Letters to the Editor, 113 Campus Center, Amherst, MA 01003

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 2005

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Talking history

Spike Lee speaks to UMass

By Matthew M. Burke
Collegian Staff

February is Black History month. Its importance in terms of freedom can never be overlooked as it is celebrated all over the nation in February to remember those courageous enough to stand up and stare down oppression in its worst form. UMass and the surrounding areas have put together an exciting lineup of jazz music and guest speakers for this month of somber celebration. It will be capped off when filmmaker Spike Lee visits on the 17th to celebrate Black History with us.

There are many heros from the civil rights movement. Members of the S.N.C.C. (Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee) dealt with Klu Klux Klan reprisals while registering blacks to vote in the South. The typical black family - in the south and in other parts of the country, as well - had to deal with the everyday hardships associated with racism and discrimination. These members of the black movement passed on a long and rich living legacy that still reverberates across this country today.

The civil rights movement of the sixties may have ended, but many visionaries continue on today in the spirit of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., Malcolm X, Thurgood Marshall, Kwame Ture, and other leaders whose sole purpose was stomping out inequality and poverty. Their job is still not done.

Love him or hate him, actor/director Spike Lee operates in the spirit of that legacy. His films "Do the Right Thing," "Malcolm X," and "Bamboozled" have struck a chord in the African American community and serve as an excellent learning tool for

See LEE on page 6

Lee has created many successful films in his storied career. He will be speaking to UMass students on Feb. 17.

Spike Lee
Curry Hicks Cage
UMass
Feb 17

Got the 'Blues'

Miles Davis collection hits stores

By Michael Busack
Collegian Staff

A legend in many respects, Miles Davis was a true music revolutionary.

With the new release "Kind of Blue" on Columbia records, Davis' style, a manner that included a tireless approach to jazz music, is on display at it's best. Many college students may not understand the significance of Miles Davis, but to many, Davis helped to shape popular music

"Kind of Blue" is what many jazz fans consider to be one of the best executed sessions ever completed. Today, Columbia records has set to established the record as a classic, by re-releasing it in the Columbia/Legacy Jazz Masterpiece series as a dual disc. The 20-bit digital remastered and remixed version of Davis' 1959 album speaks volumes of the musical accomplishment that the artist was able to achieve before his passing in 1991.

The disc is still in the same format it was 46 years ago. It has perhaps one of Davis' more mainstream classics "So What," along with the great jazz sessions that brought us "Freedie Freeloader," "Blue in Green," and "All Blues."

The CD does, however, include one sincere deviation from the original. Though the original has the epitomy of Miles Davis-esque tunes, "Flamenco Sketches," we see that the new disc has

See MILES on page 6

Many of the original songs that jazz legend Miles Davis created are showcased on "Kind of Blue".

Miles Davis
'Kind of Blue'
Columbia

'The Making of America'

By Janice Rhoshalle Littlejohn
The Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — The names Colonel Tye, Robert Smalls and Harriet Jacobs aren't as familiar as George Washington, Thomas Jefferson and Betsy Ross, but they, too, are the forefathers and foremothers of America.

They also were slaves.

So were Denmark Vesey, Mum Bett, Emmanuel and Frances Driggus, and millions of other black pioneers instrumental in building a barely charted territory into one of the strongest and richest countries in the world.

Yet their stories have been largely ignored in U.S. history.

"The reason we don't know what we ought to know about them isn't because these people haven't been telling their stories," says George Washington University historian James Horton.

He's among 25 scholars who provide an unparalleled look at slavery and the remarkable stories of individual slaves in "Slavery and the Making of America," airing on PBS Feb. 9 and 16 at 9 p.m. EST.

"The diaries, the novels, the letters that we are finding now have been there for a couple hundred years. How come we didn't find them before?" Horton questions. "Part of the reason has to do with what we thought worthy of looking for."

Narrated by actor Morgan Freeman, the unique, four-hour series is told through a collage of filmed re-enactments, providing a detailed visual history of American slavery.

From the early 17th century when English settlers in Virginia purchased Africans from Dutch traders, and through the next two centuries with the Civil War and Reconstruction, the documentary explores slavery as more than just an institution of evil and persecution.

Rather, the film shows how slavery became the central economic base for the entire country's development _ a base that was dependent on the labor and know-how of generations of black Americans.

"This is not African American history, it's American history. It's the history of all of us," notes executive producer William R. Grant, director of science, natural history and feature programs for WNET in New York, which produced the series.

And while the documentary ends in late 1876, Grant contends that the story of slavery is extremely relevant today.

"President Bush said recently that Americans do not like to look in the rearview mirror, that we are a forward-looking _ not backward-looking _ people," Grant says of the president's inaugural address.

"However, as Peter Wood, one of the historians from Duke University, said in the show, 'Slavery is ground zero for race relations in America.' If you don't understand that, it's hard to get a grip on what's going on today. Or as Jim Horton said, 'Slavery wasn't the sideshow in America, it was the main event in American history.'"

Grant and his team of historians and production people spent two painstaking years piecing together the documentary _ defining the thematic elements for each hour and finding the stories to support them based on newly uncovered historical data.

The project also "brought out an enormous amount of emotion," Grant said in a telephone interview.

"The actors who played people like Harriet Jacobs found it extremely emotional," he explained. "All of us on the production team found an emotional connection with our past, whether we were white or black. And, secondly, it's just such a huge, huge story."

So enormous that Horton along with his wife, historian Lois E. Horton, penned the companion book featuring additional details and narrative stories.

"I hope people can look at this project in a holistic context and keep going back to it," said series producer Dante J. James.

"African Americans have the right and, armed with the necessary knowledge, can take pride in the way that enslaved people maintained, as best they could, their families, their spirituality, developed a new culture, brought new technology to this country and were an essential element in this nation becoming the economic and culture power that it is today."

Curry Hicks hosts Spike Lee

LEE from page 5

the white community. Like Bill Cosby, Spike Lee has angered some blacks who see him as too critical when it comes to social issues. Even basketball superstar Reggie Miller has engaged in Spike bashing (in response to Spike's critical comments on the Pacers). He has spoken out against "Gangsta Rap" and the values behind the music, which he calls counterproductive.

Spike told Well Rounded Entertainment in 2000 that television sitcoms are today's "21st century mistrel show" for the way blacks are portrayed. He is seen, to some whites, as a racist due to inflammatory comments made about NASCAR, country music, and a range of other cultural institutions. Spike has cultivated critics of all races and classes.

Whatever one believes about Spike Lee and his films, there is no denying that he has tried to educate people about racism and the struggle for freedom. He has, at the very least, raised awareness. For this reason, the Student Activities Center, Students Affairs, and Campus Life are proud to present Spike Lee, one night only.

Spike Lee was born in 1957 in Atlanta. He briefly lived in Chicago until his family moved to Brooklyn, New York, where he attended high school. Upon graduation, Lee showed much promise and attended Morehouse College, where he developed a passion for film.

Two years after he lost his mother to cancer, Spike graduated with a degree in Communications and received a prestigious internship at Columbia Pictures. He received his master's in Film from NYU in 1982. His career took off soon after. In 1986 he released the critically acclaimed "She's Gotta Have It." Spike Lee was now a star.

His celebrated Nike commercials and a growing popularity, however, could not stop Lee from speaking his mind and being passionate about the struggle for equality.

He has called the Screen Actors Guild racist and criticized popular, mainstream movies like "Back to the Future" and "Forrest Gump" for being racist, as well.

Some think Lee looks for racism. People logging on to Internet Movie Data Base website (www.imdb.com) have been debating this issue. One individual said "This guy couldn't stub his toe without blaming the white power establishment." A typical rebuttal said "Until people like you change, the things Mr. Lee talks about will not change." These statements are perfect examples of the way that Lee is still able to stir polarizing opinions.

It is not clear how Lee will approach the evening, but it promises to be informative, entertaining and maybe even a little bit controversial as we celebrate the struggle for freedom and equality in a time when these values are more important than ever.

COURTESY WARNER BROTHERS

Denzel Washington played the title role in Lee's "Malcom X".

'Blue' disc remembers Davis

MILES from page 5

the song with an alternate take. This is legend to be the only alternate take every made during these sessions.

Columbia really does a great job at keeping the original product, and making an improvement without taking away from Davis' intended work. Miles Davis fans will note that the cover art is the same as the original, however, New York Times chief pop critic Robert Palmer has added a set of commissioned liner notes, but yet again, for those old souls, there remains pianist Bill Evans' original notes from the 1959 release.

"Kind of Blue" is historic in the same sense that any crossover disc has been a historic album for many recording artists. It has happened many times — music attracting fans from different genres — but until Miles Davis, it was unheard of for mainstream kids to be listening to jazz. He, along with the album "Kind of Blue" helped to introduce jazz to a new market, earning himself a place in jazz history, and rightfully so.

Another gigantic selling point to this disc is the all-star lineup. There are few people that most jazz fans can agree are jazz legends. This album, however, consists of all greats that could earn the title of legend including: Cannonball Adderley on alto saxophone, John Coltrane on tenor saxophone, Paul Chambers on bass, Jimmy Cobb playing drums, and of course, Bill Evans tickling the ivories. Evans had quit the group but returned for these sessions.

A Columbia records press release discusses the longtime controversy of the disc. For years many musicians tried to play along with the recording, and were amazed with the ability of the artists to play the first three tracks. Apparently, the recording session used a slow 3-track tape machine during the recording sessions. "This tape, when remixed and played at the correct speed, pitched the music sharp on the first three tunes which comprised side one of the LP," reads the release.

Though the album had it's original record flaws, Columbia has helped to restore the first three tracks to what they have dubbed "real life."

Whether you are a jazz fan or just a fan of music itself, this album is worth looking in to. The sounds make great thinking music, inspirational to all scholars, as well as great background music. It is a good way to study for a test, but an even better way to enjoy an afternoon stuck in your dormroom during a Massachusetts winter.

Information from milesdavis.com was used in this report.

STUDENT LEGAL SERVICES OFFICE
UMASS, AMHERST
CALL 545-1995
or stop in at 922 Campus Center

OPEN FORUMS

Candidates for the position of Director of Undergraduate Admission

Dewey Holleman, University of South Florida
February 8, 2005, Campus Center 101

Ed Escalet, Director of Minority Admissions and Community Affairs, Pennsylvania State University
February 10, 2005, Campus Center 163

Marc Harding, Director for Admissions, Iowa State University
February 11, 2005, Campus Center 163

Forums will be held at
3:00 - 4:30 P.M.

Resumes will be available in 319 Whitmore and at the Open Forums.

The Area's Best Fitness & Health Club
Ultimate Fitness
THE HEALTH AND FITNESS CENTER
Located in the Stop & Shop Plaza on Route 9
For more information call 253-7571
SEMESTER SPECIAL $165
FREE UNLIMITED TANNING!
NO ENROLLMENT FEE!!
Full Aerobics Program included with Membership!
-Cardio Kickboxing
-Yoga
-And Many More
• Body Masters and Icarian FreeWeights
• Stairmasters
• Cybex Circuit Training Equip.
• Precor Treadmills
• Lifecycle Recumbant Bikes
• Lifecycle Upright Bikes
• Precor Crosstrainers
Inquire About Pilates
Now offering Aerobics only memberships

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
NOW HIRING
FOR
Special Issues Coordinator & Promotions Manager
...ur resume, get real business ... earn cash, and have some fun!
...ssibility of receiving internship credits*
Now accepting applications. Come to the Campus Center Basement Rm 113 or call 545.3500 and ask for Tiffany.

Men's track team places fourth despite individual achievements

By Daniel Hillman
Collegian Staff

Facing a tough field on Saturday in Kingston, Rhode Island, the Massachusetts men's track team finished fourth overall at the "Rhody Mega Meet" and boasted several big performances from many members of the team.

Once again Senior Captain, Joe McCormack impressed the competition. He finished 1st place, and notched his fastest time of the season in the 55 Meter Dash with a time of 6.46.

"He continues to lead by example," Coach O'Brien said after the meet. "For McCormack this is another 1st place finish and impressive run so far in 2005.

"He's picked up right where he left off last spring." O'Brien mentioned. McCormack beat out Eric Huskes (6.51) and Eric Grece (6.58).

Also finishing in 1st place was John Korhonen. Korhonen placed 1st in the 3,000 Meter Run, with a time of 8:24.00.

"John basically sat on the shoulders of the pack for the first mile and a quarter and then he was ready to run," O'Brien said.

Korhonen, who's run in several different long distance events this season, beat out 2nd place finisher Anthony Traux of UNH, by more then six seconds.

The Minutemen also got strong performances from members of their team who are beginning to hit their stride late in the indoor track season. Performing in his first college meet of the year, freshman Sean Callicchio impressed the field. His throw of 15.24 meters was good enough for 4th place in the Shot-put competition. Andre Reed of URI finished 1st with a throw of 17.40 meters.

Corey Draffen also had a day worth attention. Draffen, who had been away from competition for a year going into this season, finished 11th in the priliminaries of the highly competitive 55 Meter Dash, only .03 seconds away from qualifying for the finals.

Draffen also notched the fastest time in the 4x400 relay, helping the Minutemen's place 3rd in that event. The Minutemen were beat out in the 4x400 relay by URI, who finished first, and Southern Connecticut State, second.

Another key performance came from Wes Jones. Wes placed 4th in the 500, and O'Brien sees him improving week by week.

"He's really beginning to hit his stride," O'Brien said.

When the day of competition was over, The University of Rhode Island had once again outshined the competition. It scored 214 points, and finished the Regular Season at a very impressive 28-0. Finishing 2nd was Southern Connecticut State, with 131 points and New Hampshire rounded out the top three with 102 points. UMass finished fourth with 82 points.

Overall the Minutemen had a successful day out in Kingston. "I felt like 75 to 80 percent of the team had good days out there," O'Brien said. "We'll take that, but we'd like the other quarter of the team up to par".

The next meet for the Minutemen track team is the FastTrack Invitational on Saturday, February 12th, in Boston. There the Minutemen will hope to continue their progress and prepare for the Atlantic 10 Championships the following week.

Minutemen outlast Warriors

HOCKEY from page 8

"It was just one of those things where you just to try extend for something, and [you get hurt].

Cahoon simply called the injury "a pull" and didn't specify how much, if any, time his goalie may miss.

"It's frustrating any time you get hurt. You want to try to finish the game and you want to see if I can push off and stay in there, but I knew if I tried to stay in there, I'd just end up hurting the team."

Warner was happy to welcome the challenge to get past his rough night against Boston College on Friday night when he let up five goals in just two periods.

"I was really excited, actually," Warner said. "I really wanted to get a chance to play after the last game against BC. I didn't play well, I guess is all I can say. I really wanted a chance to get back [in net], and I didn't know if I was going to because the playoff stretch, every game is so important, so obviously Gabe was going to get into all of those games."

It took six minutes for the Warriors to crack Warner when they worked the puck from Brent Gough to Steve Crusco to Rob LaLonde, who snuck his redirection past Warner to tie the game at one.

With their backs against the wall on the road, the Minutemen shook off any tightness that they had admittedly played with in similar situations during their winless streak and answered the Merrimack goal at the 18:05 mark of the second period.

With heavy traffic in front of MC goalie Jim Healey, UMass had several chances to knock the puck home and converted when Tim Vitek was able to do just that.

They upped their lead to 3-1 just 28 seconds into the third period the same way they scored to end the second period.

With the puck bouncing around in front of Healey, Matt Burto was able to collect the rebound from Craig MacDonald's shot and just flipped the puck into an open net.

With the two-goal advantage, Warner contributed his best relief work, making equally tough saves that Winer was making earlier to close out the win.

With Merrimack on the power play, LaLonde shot the puck from just inside the blue line that was tipped and found its way to Warner's glove.

"LaLonde's shot was really weird. It wasn't that hard of a shot, and then it changed directions," Warner said.

COURTESY KARIN WINEGAR

Kevin Jarman had an assist for UMass on Saturday against Merrimack. The Minutemen won the game 3-1.

World Series ball coming to UMass

According to popular Boston Red Sox fan website Boston Dirt Dogs, the now-infamous baseball that was used to record the final out of the 2004 World Series will be making a stop at the University of Massachusetts on February 23.

The ball, which for now is the property of New York Mets and former Sox first baseman Doug Mientkiewicz, has been loaned to the team for one year by Mientkiewicz for the purpose of allowing it to go on tour along with the World Series trophy. The schedule for the tour is posted on the Dirt Dogs website, and lists Amherst as the February 23 stop.

Created and run by a Red Sox fan, Boston Dirt Dogs was recently purchased and is now run by the Boston Globe. The site has been credited with breaking numerous baseball-related stories over the past year, and is considered a reliable source for Red Sox-related news.

UMass media relations director Jason Yellin did confirm that the trophy will be on campus on the 23rd – the night the Massachusetts men's basketball team hosts Rhode Island – but could not confirm whether or not the ball will accompany the hardware.

While the trophy has been on tour since the Sox won the World Series on Oct. 27, the ball has been a recent addition to the traveling exhibit. Team officials obtained the ball for the first team earlier this week, and Dirt Dogs lists UMass as one of only three stops on the ball's tour that are open to the public.

The ball is scheduled to hit the road on Feb. 9, and return to Fenway Park following its last stop on April 24. For a full listing of all the stops, visit www.bostondirtdogs.com.

—Mike Marzelli

COURTESY KNIGHT-RIDDER PHOTOS

The ball that Doug Mientkiewicz caught to end the 2004 World Series is supposedly making its way to the University of Massachusetts on Feb. 23. UMass is one of only a handful of stops for the ball.

Minutewomen down the Bonnies

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

Finally.

Twenty-one games into the 2004-2005 season, the Massachusetts women's basketball team didn't just put themselves in good standing within the Atlantic 10 with a 69-58 win over the St. Bonaventure Bonnies (8-13, 3-7 Atlantic 10) — as well as find an answer to hot-handed guard Stefanie Collins — but the Minutewomen (12-9, 5-5 A-10) look to have finally found a solid starting rotation.

UMass	74
St. Bonaventure	58

Case in point: the starting five of Katie Nelson, Pam Rosanio, Brooke Campbell, Kate Mills and Tamara Tatham all notched double figures in scoring and accounted for all 69 of the Minutewomen's points yesterday at the Mullins Center.

"I tell my assistants that we've tried the open door policy and that hasn't worked and I want to go with some continuity, make the kids earn their playing time," coach Marnie Dacko said. "Not that they didn't earlier, but it was a crapshoot as far as who I was going to start in the fifth position, it was another crapshoot as far as who was coming in and when.

"I just want people coming in a little more hungry. They worked really hard this week [in practice], and they made it through some tough competition today."

Mills (11 points, six rebounds) was as dazzling as she was poised in her first career start at center, providing a physical presence down low — in one of the most physical games of the year — that kept forward Tory Vyborny from sneaking around with another lights-out performance.

While the stat line for Stefanie Collins (13 points, three assists) read almost identical to the numbers she put up against the Minutewomen a week ago, she didn't receive nearly as much support from the inside game of Vyborny (nine points, four rebounds) this time around.

"I think last game we played pretty well against her in the first half, but in the second half we weren't really going with our game plan," Nelson said. "Our game plan is to just trail her and not let her get a shot open instead of getting caught on three's.

"We knew we had to do that the whole game this time, and I think we did a pretty good job of it. She had a few open shots, but for the most part I think we were pretty successful."

Very early on it looked as if UMass was going to continue their recent slump. They committed three turnovers on their first three possessions, allowing the Bonnies to get off two quick treys. But as soon as the Bonnies abandoned their full-court press and slid back to a wide zone, the Minutewomen shifted gears and blazed out a 19-7 run. After Rosanio (15 points) laid in a long pass from Nelson (15 points, 5 assists) to make it 19-13, St. Bona coach Jim Crowley called his girls over.

But the bleeding continued, as Nelson nailed two three pointers en route to a 7-0 run.

Collins and Priscilla Edwards (13 points) worked the Bonnies into a halftime tie, contributing to an 11-5 run, but once again the second half belonged to UMass.

The Bonnies struck first again in the second, the third of Collins' three treys on the day, but a 10-3 run by the Minutewomen put them in the lead for good. Rosanio sealed the lead with a three-point play that put them up 41-37.

UMass hung on despite a heap of foul trouble. The Minutewomen worked themselves into the bonus by the halfway point of the second half (eight fouls in seven minutes, to St. Bona's two), but none of the Maroon and White players fouled out. Campbell (13 points, six rebounds) and double-doubler Tamara Tatham (15 points, ten rebounds) tinkered at four fouls, but stayed calm.

The Maroon and White were also able to hang tough despite a St. Bona squad that was absolutely dead-on with foul shots, as they went 90.5 percen from the line (19-for-21), compared with UMass's 64.5 percent (18-of-28).

Dance Stuff
Starting a dance class?
Go to Dance Stuff for all your dancing needs
220 W. Pleasant Street
253.5200

Regency Hair Stylists
~Full Highlights~ $20 Off
Call for an appointment with Marna, Megan, or April
Mention this ad valid Mon-Thurs
253.9526
189 North Pleasant Street
Amherst
Marna
Megan
April

Rent One of Ours
• Direct Billing to Insurance Companies
• Free Local Pick Up
• Locally Owned and Operated
549-RENT (7368)
No additional fee for 21-25 year old drivers
• Cars
• Passenger Vans
• Trucks
POTTERS AUTO & TRUCK RENTALS
at North Amherst Motors
Collision Repair Center
On Bus Route • One Mile North of UMass

Natural, Healthy, and Smart!
Dr. Lee Kane
Chiropractic Physician
Amherst Family Chiropractic
549-1500

THE BARN
Discount Groceries
Great products. Great prices!

Hot Pockets & Lean Pockets (9 oz)	$1.50
Ore Ida & McCain French Fries (28-32 oz)	$1.00
Hood Ice Cream (1/2 gallon)	$1.99
Celeste Pizza (5-7 oz)	75¢
Totino's Pizza Rolls (7.5 oz box)	75¢
Pillsbury & Eggo Waffles & Pancakes (10 ct)	75¢
Green Giant Vegetables (7-10 oz)	75¢
Pillsbury Grands or Crescent Rolls (8ct)	50¢
Eggs (large or extra large, dozen)	$1.00
Dole Bananas (large!)	8 for $1.00
Mosey's Flat Cut Corned Beef (1 lb.)	$1.99
Armour Sliced Bologna (1 lb.)	99¢ pkg
Yoplait Nouriche Smoothie Drinks	50¢ each
Single Yogurt (Dannon, Columbo, etc.)	3 for $1.00
Frosted Shredded Wheat Cereal (20 oz)	$1.00 box
Bran Flakes Cereal (20 oz)	$1.00 box
Frosted Flakes Cereal (20 oz)	$1.00 box
M&M Candies (14 oz bag)	$1.00 bag
Raisins (12 oz box)	50¢
Kraft Macaroni & Cheese	50¢
Fudge Marshmallow Cookies (12 oz)	25¢

We have natural & organic foods, too!
95 River Street, Greenfield – 413-774-5599 – 8 AM to 10 PM Daily
(Route 116 to Deerfield, 91 North to Exit 26, right at Dunkin' Donuts)
-Credit cards, debit cards, cash & food stamps accepted!-

Minutemen crush Bonnies

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

This time around, the Massachusetts men's basketball team got what it expected out of a matchup with Iowa St. Bonaventure. No nail biting, no heart attacks and no double overtime – just a win.

In a game that featured no lead changes or ties, the Minutemen surged out to a 14-point halftime lead, pushed the lead to as many as 28 in the second half and overcame some sloppy play over the final seven minutes to blow out the Bonnies 74-58 before 3,733 at the Mullins Center.

UMass	74
St. Bonaventure	58

The Minutemen returns to action on Wednesday night, when they will hit the road in A-10 play and head to Kingston, R.I. to face Rhode Island. Tip-off is set for 7:30 p.m. at the Ryan Center.

Senior captain Anthony Anderson led UMass (11-8 5-4 Atlantic 10) with 15 points and nine rebounds, while sophomore forward Rashaun Freeman added 14 points and nine rebounds.

Sophomore Maurice Maxwell chipped in with 10 points and five assists as well, while classmate Stephane Lasme posted six points, nine rebounds and four blocks.

Ahmad Smith led the Bonnies (1-19 0-9 A-10) with a game-high 16 points, and Brian Gibbs and Kern Carter tossed in 11 apiece.

"This win felt good," Anderson said. "I was asking the guys all year, 'when are we going to finally blow somebody out? When are we going to be comfortable with ten minutes left in the game knowing that we are going to win?' We finally got one, and now we are looking to build on that.

"I just told the guys let's go. The game is forty minutes long. We always preach about playing forty minutes in the locker room and in the huddle and there was still three minutes left to go in the game. I was just trying to tell the guys that forty minutes were not up yet."

"I was getting headaches from all those two-point games," Freeman said. "It was nice to look up in the second half and see that we were in control ... we came out looking to play our game and take over, and we did that by moving the ball around and executing our game plan."

Leading 36-33 at the 12:43 mark of the second half, the Maroon and White put together a dominant 22-5 run and took their largest lead of the game when an Art Bowers' layup pushed the score to 64-36 with 7:22 to play. St. Bonnies then cut the lead to 25 with just under six minutes to play, before embarking on an 11-0 run of its own to close the gap to 68-54 just before the two-minute mark. SBU got as close as 13 just seconds later, before eventually running out of gas.

"I applaud our guys for going out there and competing every day, regardless of our situation," St. Bona. Coach Anthony Solomon said. "They fight hard and play with passion every time they are out there, and I'm proud of them for that.

UMass coach Steve Lappas was also pleased with his team's effort, despite some careless play over the final stretch.

"I thought that our guys did a very good job, especially coming off a week layoff," Lappas said. "I thought that we were focused on both ends of the court. I was pleased with our overall effort as well as our effort on the glass. I wasn't pleased with the last seven minutes of the game, but at that point ...we had Deli (Jeff Salovski) out there with Lawrence Carrier for a significant amount of time. That helps them get the experience that they need because they're a big part of what we're doing."

"We talked about making more passes per possession in practice, and we did that today. I thought we took all good shots, the only negative is the turnovers. We're shooting 45% in the league as a team. Instead of 20 turnovers we should have 12. Those eight extra shots are eight to 10 points that we need. We've got to take care of the ball."

The Minutemen were able to erase the memories of a difficult trip to Olean, N.Y. right off the bat, as they jumped out to an early advantage on the strength of a 17-4 run to open the game.

The lead grew to as many as 18 in the first half, before the Bonnies were able to cut into it and narrow the gap to 14 at the break.

Currently sitting with a winning record and in third place in the A-10 East, the Minutemen now must take care of business over the season's final month if they hope to earn their first post-season bid under Lappas – something the veteran head coach is keenly aware of.

"Last year, I told our guys I just wanted them to get better in each game, because we were out of contention at this point," Lappas said. "Now, I want them to keep getting better still, but we also have to be aware of the fact that we're fighting for a spot in the postseason, and we have to be aiming for that with each game."

GAME NOTES: Junior forward Jeff Viggiano left the game in the first half after coming down awkwardly on his injured ankle. Lappas said after the game that the team doctor said Viggiano had "tweaked" the ankle, but that it wasn't in the same spot as the previous injury and the extent of the injury is unknown at this point ... The win was UMass' 11th on the season; one more than it had all of last year ... This is the first time since 2000-01 that the Minutemen have swept an A-10 team in a two-game series during the regular season ... UMass is now 8-0 this season when it scores 70 points, and 25-9 under Lappas when scoring 70-plus ... First-year walk-on Nana Ampim saw his first collegiate action, playing the final 12 seconds of the contest. Fellow walk-on Drew Rossi also saw the floor for the final 59 seconds, and did record a shot clock violation.

Sophomore forward Rashaun Freeman dunks during the Minutemen's 74-58 victory over St. Bonaventure on Saturday.

UMass topples over Merrimack on road

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

NORTH ANDOVER — It had been awhile for the Massachusetts hockey team.

The Minutemen (11-16-2, 5-11-2 Hockey East) had been losers of five straight and winless in seven before their 3-1 triumph over Merrimack (8-20-2, 1-16-1 HEA) at J. Thom Lawler Arena on Saturday night.

UMass	3
Merrimack	1

They hadn't won a Hockey East game since their 3-2 victory over Providence on Dec. 3, a stretch of nine conference games.

And it was, for the first time all season, a victory on foreign ice.

"We're happy to get our first road win of the year," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "It's been a long time coming. Obviously, it lifts everybody's spirits up."

Nothing had been coming easy for the team for two months now, and that did not change last night.

Clutching to a tight 1-0 lead just 6:50 into the second period, Massachusetts goalie Gabe Winer left the game with an apparent right leg injury.

Winer had been playing very well, making 15 saves during his short appearance in net, just two minutes before the injury, he made a tough glove save to stop Matt Byrnes' breakaway opportunity, and right before Winer left the ice, he made a couplet of acrobatic saves to diffuse another Merrimack scoring attack.

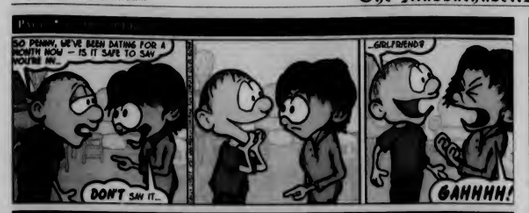
During a whistle for Brent Gough's tripping penalty, backup Tim Warner replaced Winer, who skated off the ice favoring his right leg.

"I didn't have [anyone come in] contact with me," Winer said.

See HOCKEY on page 7

P.J. Fenton was one of the three stars of the game in the Minutemen's 3-1 victory over Merrimack on Saturday. Fenton had two assists.

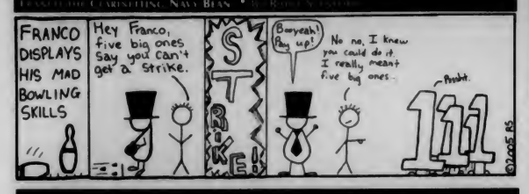
Discover Your LOVER
The Collegian Dating Game



HERE'S YOUR CHANCE TO PLAY

MATCHMAKER!

We've rounded up 3 Men and 3 Women.
You will decide who will date whom!
Get to know these single people in the Arts & Living Section
Look for them on:
Tuesday, February 8th (Men)
Wednesday, February 9th (Women)



You pair them up...
We'll send them on their dates and let you know how it goes!

Pair them up online at www.dailycollegian.com

Quote of the Day

"My life is spent in one long effort to escape from the commonplace of existence."

—Sherlock Holmes

ACROSS
1 Gangster's gun
4 Pipsqueak
9 Kukla's pal
14 Raw mineral
15 Horse opera
16 Tecosomes
17 Gore and Hirt
18 Ordinary writing
19 Entrance looring
20 Styles
22 Okinawan port
24 Laertes or Hamlet
25 Made haste
26 Bibb and Iceberg
28 Sch. near Harvard
30 Made a parody of
31 Film clips
34 Amoral deed
35 Gershwin or Lavin
38 Actor McKellen
39 "... Clementis
40 Coat a cake
41 Concur soundlessly
42 Half a bikini
43 Writer Grafton
44 Religious congregations
46 Bob Marley's tuna
48 Writer Hentoff
49 Of an ear part
52 Itemization
55 Simply 56 Body loss
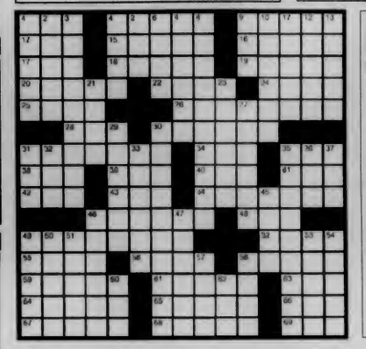
58 Actor Reeves
59 Paper measures
61 Wear away
63 Light brown
64 Blender setting
65 Woodland deity
66 Stretch of time
67 Tire in a trunk
68 Old anesthetic
69 ... Monies



DOWN
1 Wanders
2 Lowest deck
3 Othello's love
4 Surpasses
5 Children's card game
6 Harrow's rival
7 Secondhand deal
8 Adapted for grasping
9 Decide
10 In one's sick bed
11 Pastel shade
12 Dunne or Ryan
13 Back-and-forth curves
21 Check prose
23 New York prison
27 Select a channel
29 Mortarboard's ornament
30 Dakar populace
31 Little while lie
32 Scull propeller
33 Measurement instruments
35 Began
36 Caviar
37 Want
45 "The ... of Genji"
46 Doggerel writer
47 Noah's peak
49 Part of USMC
50 A point ahead
51 Nurse Barton
53 Kind of drum
54 Albacores and bluefins
57 Night-flying insect
58 John or Deborah
60 Observe
62 Coloring agent

Find today's answers online
www.dailycollegian.com

UMASS YOGA
Starts January 31*
Monday/Wednesday
12:30 – 1:45 pm Power Yoga (1-3)
2:00 – 3:15 pm Restorative (1-2)
Tuesday/Thursday
1:00 – 2:15 pm Yoga Basics (1-2)
2:30 – 3:45 pm Intermediate (2-3)
4:00 – 5:15 pm Yoga Basics (1-2)

TAI CHI
Starts February 8
Tuesdays 7:30 – 8:30 pm

*ENROLL BY JAN. 31 AND SAVE $$!
TO REGISTER
Campus Recreation, Boyden 215
413-545-0022
www.umass.edu/umim

H·O·R·O·S·C·O·P·E·S

aquarius • Jan. 20-Feb. 18
Watch out for the black ice because it could cause a break.

pisces • Feb. 19-Mar. 20
If you watch a movie before bed, you will have sweet dreams.

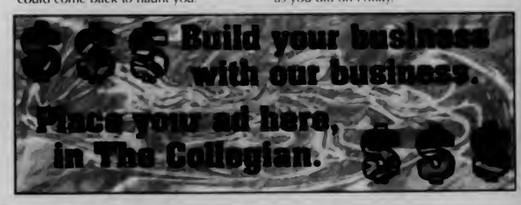
aries • Mar. 21-Apr. 19
You drank too much beer yesterday. Go get some exercise.

taurus • Apr. 20-May 20
Go talk to your new crush. Keep your head up and your hopes high.

gemini • May 21-Jun. 21
It might be a good time to do laundry since it's starting to stink.

cancer • Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Don't neglect your friends because it could come back to haunt you.

leo • Jul.. 23-Aug. 22
Think outside the box and inside your soul.



virgo • Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Don't rely on the bus system to be on time.

libra • Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Don't give away the secrets that friends want you to keep.

scorpio • Oct. 23-Nov. 21
Keep up the discipline. You have been doing really well so far.

sagittarius • Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Now that you have wasted your entire weekend, it's time to open the books.

capricorn • Dec. 22-Jan. 19
Try not to hit the snooze button as often as you did on Friday.

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

Activities

Foam party Montreal weekends $89 Montreal Express.Net 1(781)979-9001

Announcements

$600 Group Fundraiser Scheduling Bonus 4 hours of your group's time PLUS our free (yes, free) fundraising solutions EQUALS $1,000-$2,000 in earnings for your group. Call TODAY for a $450 bonus when you schedule your non-sales fundraiser with CampusFundraiser. Contact CampusFundraiser, (888)923-3238, or visit www.campusfundraiser.com

Beach Club Tanning (413-549-4688): 20% Off any purchase on Tuesday, Feb. 8th (Future sessions and packages included) Ask for the "Hockey Special" and help UMass Women's Ice Hockey team travel to Nationals!

Apartment for Rent

Amherst two bedroom condo on busline 875+, Call Paul 413-687-1416

Sunderland 2 bedroom townhouse on busline 830+, Call Erica 413-665-7794

1 bedroom available North Amherst $425 includes heat & electric, bright, clean, washer/dryer in Condo on bus route 1 mile to UMass female preferred Call Liz 508-367-8893

Center of town, 1, 2, 3 bedrooms; hardwood floors. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

Hobart Condos 3 bedroom, hardwood floors, study area in basement. Cable, telephone (internet access) in all bedrooms and study. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

Auto for Sale

1994 Toyota Camry fully loaded, 75K, Mint condition. Call 413-345-4191

1993 Toyota Tercel Coup. Economical, reliable, $1275.00 582-9103

Childcare

Babysitter 3 year old boy afternoon/evenings Amherst 413-256-3084

Early Riser Needed
7:00am to 8:15pm 2 to 4 days a week. Occasional afternoon and Evenings. For 5yr old girl. $10.00 an hr. Please call 584-8312 maria.galli-8@umassmed.edu

Employment

Top Boys Sports Camp in Maine! Play & Coach Sports * Have Fun * Make $$$ Camp Counselor Positions Available Summer 2005 Apply Online www.campcobbossee.com or call 1-800-473-6104

Employment

Prestigious Trail's End Camp- Pennsylvania Summer Camp– Guaranteed Experience of a Lifetime; Limited openings for Sports Specialists, Crafts Specialists, Waterfront Counselors (Lake and Pool) and General Counselors; June 19th – August 14th – Gain practical experience working with kids. www.trailsendcampjobs.com

Earn some money! Rent us your cars! Lowering expenses $$!!! Jr 413-545-6837 phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu

Make money taking online surveys earn $10 to $125 for surveys. Earn $25 to $250 for focus groups www.cashforstudents.com/umass

Nanny position for 2 boys ages 6 & 9. Perfect schedule for student. Part time Spring. Full time Summer. Prior experience necessary 413-625-2288

Employment

Earn lots of $$ and have fun on the water this Spring & Summer. Raft guides needed at Crab Apple Whitewater in Charlemont, MA. Fun Summer job, no experience necessary. We will train. 413-625-2288.

PCA needed in Northampton $10/hr. Reliable car necessary. Laundry, Shopping, Cooking, Cleaning. Please call Linda Gaffney at 586-0029

Movie extras, actors, models! Make $100-$400/day. No experience required, FT/PT, All looks needed! 1800-340-5939 Ext. 1054

"Bartending" $300/Day Potential. No Experience Nesc. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

House for Rent

South Deerfield Center on bus route newly renovated 2 bedroom $1000 per month plus utilities and security deposit 413-498-5148

Miscellaneous

Earn $4000, become an egg donor. www.reproductiveassistance.com or 513-831-9207

Room for Rent

350 per month 413-345-5226

Bedroom for rent in spacious house in Leverett Call Brett 413-219-5808

Services

Need Just Evacuation and Repatriation Coverage? Check out BETA! $250,000 Evacuation, $25,000 Repatriation COST is $18 for 6 MONTHS! Online enrollment, emailed verification of coverage www.betrns.com

Services

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance 549-1906

Computer Consultants $20/hr we come to your dorm/house Certified technicians. Call Kris (413) 253-0215

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth-control, and Emergency Contraception. Affordable and confidential. STI Screening and Treatment. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992

Travel

XXX Night Montreal Weekends $89 Montreal Express.net 1(781)979-9001

Spring Break 2005 Only 6 weeks left... Lowest Prices Biggest Parties Earn 2 Free Trips Exclusive with Sun Splash Tours www.sunsplashtours.com 1800-426-7710

Travel

Bahamas Spring Cruise 5 Days $299! Includes Meals, Celebrity Parties! Panama City, Daytona $159! Cancun, Jamaica, Acapulco, Nassau $499! Award Winning Company! SpringBreakTravel.com 1-800-678-6386

#1 Spring Break Vacations! Cancun, Jamaica, Acapulco, Bahamas, & Florida! Best Parties, Best Hotels, Best Prices! Limited Space! 1-800-234-7007 www.endlesssummertours.com

Wanted

Snowboard events intern $50/day stipend. For job description email jfmeds@ckcertified.edu

Discover Your Lover: The Collegian Dating Game

Vote online beginning Feb 9th to determine which men and women are paired together for their blind dates!

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SportsMonday

Monday, February 7, 2005 Sports@dailycollegian.com

TEAM OF THE MILLENNIUM

Clockwise: Tom Brady, David Givens, Deion Branch, and head coach Bill Belichick were all important cogs in the New England Patriots' 24-21 victory over the Philadelphia Eagles. The win gave New England its third Super Bowl in four years, all were won under Belichick and with the arm of Tom Brady. Brady had two touchdowns on the game and connected with Super Bowl MVP Branch a record-tying 11 times.

Patriots outlast Eagles and win their third Super Bowl ended in disappointment.

SUPER BOWL from page 1

Corey Dillon, a newcomer to the championship game, scored the go-ahead points on a 2-yard run early in the fourth period. And when Branch wasn't running free and catching passes, the Patriots flaunted their versatility by again using linebacker Mike Vrabel to find the end zone.

Patriots	24
Eagles	21

Vrabel has caught TD passes in two straight Super Bowls and has five TDs in as many career catches, not bad for a linebacker — or anyone else.

Brady wasn't as fluid as he was when he won the MVP awards in the 2002 and 2004 games, but he was on-target much of the time, finishing 23-for-33 for 236 yards and two TDs.

When the offense bogged down or turned over the ball, Harrison and his mates forced four turnovers, including a goal-line interception by the veteran safety. The Patriots also had four sacks, making Donovan McNabb look ordinary, even skittish at times.

And while Terrell Owens' return from a seven-week injury layoff was an individual success — he had nine catches for 122 yards — it was not nearly the star turn that Branch made.

Branch's 11 catches covered 133 yards as he victimized one of the league's best secondaries. He was most instrumental on the opening drive of the second half, which set the tone for New England's 57th victory in its last 74 games.

While New England handled frequent blitzes, Branch caught four passes for 71 yards on the series that ended with Vrabel's TD.

"We did a great job of adjusting during the game," Branch said. "It was physical; a lot of guys were bumped and bruised."

The Eagles showed resilience by responding with a 74-yard drive on which Brian Westbrook accounted for 39 yards, including the 10-yard score. McNabb whipped a pass over the middle between two defenders for the TD.

Still, as winners always do, the Patriots reasserted themselves, effectively using screen passes against a tiring defense. Even when Eagles defenders shouted to each other to watch for the screen, New England made it work, particularly on Kevin Faulk's 14-yarder that preceded Dillon's 2-yard run to make it 21-14.

Vinatieri hit his chip shot to make it 24-14. When the Eagles came back on Greg Lewis' 30-yard TD reception with 1:48 remaining, things got tight.

Not that it bothered the Patriots. Not that anything ever bothers these Patriots, who will lose offensive coordinator Charlie Weis to Notre Dame and expect defensive coordinator Romeo Crennel to become Cleveland's coach.

COURTESY ASSOCIATED PRESS

Tom Brady and Corey Dillon celebrate after Dillon scored a touchdown in the Super Bowl last night.

Fans rejoice as New England becomes pro football capital

By Theo Emery
Associated Press

BOSTON — It didn't look quite as easy as a lot of the other games the New England Patriots put in the win column this season, but their fans didn't mind.

Stumbling through penalties and missed opportunities, the Patriots still managed to come away with a Super Bowl win — their third in four years — by beating the Philadelphia Eagles 24-21. And fans yet again found themselves celebrating a team that has managed to win without much flash or bravado.

"Pats did it again, did it again! I love to be a part of the New England Patriots," said Nillou Tabibi, a 24 year old pharmacy student, who watched the game from a bar in Boston's Kenmore Square.

Her companion, Tom Ambrose, also a 24 year old pharmacy student, said the Patriots deserved the win.

"There was a little bit of doubt there. There were a lot of turnovers they went through," he said. "But they kept it together and they pulled through."

The Patriots lost just two games in the regular season but kept plowing through the playoffs with ease. This time, the Eagles put up a fight and made it a squeaker.

Still, Patriots fans were anything but bored by yet another win that made New Englanders marvel at a possible dynasty in the making.

"It never gets old," said Josh Canning, 29, a Charlton resident who hosted about 20 friends to watch the game on his 55-inch high-definition television. "You come up with new things — it's back to back, or dynasty, or best team ever, something to pull for."

Canning has been a Patriots fan since the "Squish the Fish" days, a reference to the 1985 playoff victory over the Miami Dolphins. The Chicago Bears beat New England 46-10 that season in the Patriots' first Super Bowl, when current Patriots quarterback Tom Brady was all of 8 years old.

Now, it's different. The Patriots were favored to win Sunday and their fans were confident going into it, probably never imagining what a nail biter it turned out to be.

For the less subdued, Boston police had a plan of their own: 1,000 officers were on city streets to keep the peace. In western Massachusetts, at the flagship campus of the University of Massachusetts, students blasted "We are the Champions" from dorm windows but were mostly muted in their celebration.

"The end was very stressful but we worked through it," said Brian Kiesman, a freshman from Hopedale.

COURTESY GETTY IMAGES

Rodney Harrison (37), Asante Samuel (22) and Mike Vrabel of the Patriots celebrate after beating the Eagles 24-21 in the Super Bowl.

Motley Crue comes back with mediocre album

ARTS & LIVING, PAGE 5

TODAY • High: 47° • Low: 30°
WEDNESDAY • High: 45° • Low: 30°
THURSDAY • High: 37° • Low: 21°

DAILY WEATHER FORECAST

Freshman Kate Mills dominates in the post

SPORTS, PAGE 10

The Daily Collegian

Tuesday, February 8, 2005 New England's Largest College Daily • Est. 1890 Volume CXV Issue 75

Take Back UMass angry with code

By Julie O'Donnell
Collegian Staff

Members of the University of Massachusetts remain enraged about the actions that the top administrators have taken regarding the legality and the vagueness of the picketing code.

Members from the proactive student group Take Back UMass, Student Government Association, distinguished faculty members and a representative from the American Civil Liberties Union all expressed anger and frustration with the administration's inability to prioritize student's rights.

Recently, top administrators at UMass changed the student code of conduct after a committee of student and faculty representation unanimously rejected the change last January. Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Michael Gargano and Chancellor John V. Lombardi implemented the plan despite the opposition. The initial change stated that students were not allowed to picket inside any university building, citing that it would be disruptive to faculty. After campus-wide controversy began to rise, Gargano and Lombardi revised the newly written code on Feb. 2. Although changes were made that stated only disruptive picketing was a violation of the code, the ambiguity of the code has left students and faculty questioning the administration.

Bill Newman, the representative from the ACLU, emotionally expressed his negative thoughts on not only the code, but also the administration.

"This is the kind of regulation that has an enormous, it chills your rights as members of this community, particularly to see at a public educational institution," Newman said, "as students you have to say, 'don't impose thosechilling effects, don't take aways our First Amendment Rights."

Newman also spoke about the discrepancies and ambiguity of the revised code. "There are inconsistent sentences, this is still a significant issue, its isn'treally about the picketing — it arguably applies but, mostly it applies to demonstrations and rallies."

He also attempted to dissect the newly written code. "There

See PICKET on page 3

Celebration results in four arrests

The University of Massachusetts campus stayed fairly quiet Sunday night, despite a crowd of approximately 300 students that gathered in the Southwest residential area to celebrate the New England Patriots' victory over the Philadelphia Eagles in the Super Bowl.

Cheers of "Dynasty" could be heard as students threw burning rolls of toilet paper. Several rounds of fireworks were set off.

Only four arrests were made, according to Sgt. Michael Ross of the University Police Department. No injuries were reported. He said UMass police had no problems clearing students from the area. The crowd was dispersed by about 10:45 p.m.

"People basically were there for the moment and left on their own," said Ross. "It was just a peaceful celebration for the most part."

During the Patriot's Super Bowl victory last year, over 2,500 students crowded into Southwest to celebrate, resulting in four arrests. Police dispersed the crowd with several rounds of pepper balls.

—Erika Lovley

Silent Night

Relaxed UMass police officers gear up for a potential disturbance in Southwest Residential Area after the Patriots' Super Bowl victory Sunday night. Police arrested four students out of approximately 300.

Suicide car bombing kills 30 outside main police headquarters in Baghdad

By Mariam Fam
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Insurgents struck at Iraqi police with a suicide bomb, a car bomb and mortars in the cities of Mosul and Baqouba on Monday, killing at least 30 people as they pressed their campaign to undermine the fledgling security forces.

The deadliest attack came in Baqouba, where a car bomb exploded outside the gates of a provincial police headquarters, killing 15 people and wounding 17, police Col. Mudhahar al-Iubouri said. Many victims were there to seek jobs as policemen, al-Iubouri said.

In the northern city of Mosul, a suicide bomber blew himself up inside the compound of Jumhouri Teaching Hospital, killing 12 policemen guarding the site and injuring four others, hospital officials said.

The bomb went off outside the hospital building, hospital Director Tahseen Ali Mahmoud al-Obeidi said. Witnesses said the bomber called the police officers over to him and then blew up among the crowd.

"I heard an explosion. When I went to check, I saw bodies everywhere," al-Obeidi said.

The ground was soaked with blood. Nurses collected body parts, putting them in bags.

In a posting on a Web site, the al-Qaida in Iraq group, led by

See IRAQ on page 3

Iraqis flee from chaos caused by a car bomb that killed 30 people. Yesterday's attack was one of Baghdad's deadliest.

Bromery appointed to science committee

By Jonathan Vega
Collegian Staff

President George W. Bush recently reappointed Randolph W. Bromery, who was once chancellor and Commonwealth Professor Emeritus of geophysics at the University of Massachusetts Amherst, to a three-year term on the President's Committee on the National Medal of Science. Bromery had originally been appointed to the 12-member panel to complete the remainder of an unexpired term in 2003.

Established in 1959 as a presidential award, the National Medal of Science has recognized the scientific contributions of 386 American scientists and engineers since its inception. Potential medal recipients are evaluated based on the total impact of their work in respect to the present state of physical, chemical, biological, mathematical, engineering, behavioral or social sciences.

According to the web site, the mission of the National Science & Technology Medals Foundation is, "to increase public awareness that [American] economic strength, competitiveness, and high standard of living depend on our nation's ability to lead the world in scientific discovery and technological development."

"What the [White House] tries to do is pick people in scientific disciplines that cover a fairly broad range of natural science and mathematics," Bromery explained. "I represent geology and geophysics." The 12-member panel includes biologists, computer scientists, mathematicians and astrophysicists who all must be approved by the White House.

Bromery's has worked in the field of geophysics for 56 years and served as chancellor of UMass from 1972 to 1979. Bromery also served as president of Westfield State College, Springfield College and Roxbury Community College from 1988 to 2003, respectively. Additionally, Bromery is the recipient of nine honorary degrees from colleges and universities around the world; including John Hopkins University where he received his Ph.D. in geology and continues to serve as a trustee emeritus on the Board of Trustees.

Potential medal laureates are not directly selected by the committee, rather they are nominated by their respective university or scientific institution. Bromers is quick to point out that, "the Nobel Prize is very restrictive because it only covers chemistry and a couple other disciplines, we cover all the scientific disciplines." In the United States, the National Medal of Science is the highest possible distinction for

See SCIENTIST on page 2

Defrocked priest guilty of molestation

By Denise Lavoie
Associated Press

CAMBRIDGE — Defrocked priest Paul Shanley, the most notorious figure in the sex scandal that rocked the Boston Archdiocese, was found guilty Monday of repeatedly molesting a boy at his church during the 1980s.

The conviction on all four charges gives prosecutors a high-profile victory in their effort to bring pedophile priests to justice for decades of abuse at Roman Catholic parishes around the country.

The victim, now 27, put his head down and sobbed as the verdicts were announced after a trial that turned on the reliability of what he claimed were recovered memories of the long-ago abuse.

COURTESY CNN.COM

Paul Shanley was found guilty of child molestation yesterday.

The jury of seven men and five women deliberated about 13 hours over five days before reaching its verdict. Shanley showed no emotion as he stood next to his attorneys.

Shanley, 74, faces up to life in prison for two counts each of child rape and indecent assault and battery on a child. He is to be sentenced Feb. 15. Judge Stephen Neel immediately revoked Shanley's $300,000 bail.

After Shanley was led away from the courtroom, his niece, Teresa Shanley, told reporters: "There are no winners today. There are only losers. We're no closer to finding out the truth about this scandal or finding out what happened."

During the trial, the accuser broke down on the stand as he testified in graphic detail that Shanley pulled him out of Sunday morning catechism classes and raped and groped him in the church bathroom, the rectory, the confessional and the pews starting when he was 6.

The man, now a firefighter in suburban Boston, said that he repressed his memories of the abuse but that they came flooding back three years ago, triggered by news coverage of the scandal that began in Boston and soon engulfed the church worldwide.

"It felt awful," he testified. "He told me nobody would ever believe me if I told anybody."

The defense called just one witness, a psychologist who said that so-called recovered memories can be false, even if the accuser ardently believes they are true. Shanley's lawyer argued that the man who accused Shanley was either mistaken or concocted the story with the help of personal injury lawyers to cash in on a multimillion-dollar settlement resulting from the sex scandal.

The lone accuser in the crimi-

See SHANLEY on page 2

Journalists killed after reporting in Pakistan

By Paul Haven
Associated Press

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan — Gunmen fired into a small bus filled with journalists on their way back from covering the surrender of a suspected militant in a lawless tribal region Monday, killing two reporters and wounding two others, security officials said.

The journalists were on a road near Wana, the main town in South Waziristan, when their bus was overtaken by the assailants about 7:30 p.m., said Brig. Mahmood Shah, chief of security for Pakistan's tribal areas along the frontier with Afghanistan. The gunmen sprayed the bus with AK-47 assault rifles, then fled, he said.

Killed were Mir Nawab, a freelance journalist who worked as a cameraman for Associated Press Television News and as a reporter for a local newspaper, and Allah Noor, a reporter for The Nation, an English-language Pakistani newspaper.

The wounded journalists were identified as Anwar Shakir, who works for Agence France-Presse, and Zardad Khan, a freelancer. Both were taken to a hospital in Wana, where Shakir was reported in stable condition with a back wound. Khan was less seriously injured.

Malik Hassan, another journalist, said there were at least two attackers. He said the bus stopped when the shooting started and its occupants took shelter by a wall next to the road. The two slain journalists apparently died instantly on the bus, he said.

"They were shooting at us from just a yard away and they were trying to kill us. We were very scared," Hassan told The Associated Press.

See JOURNALIST on page 3

NATO sifts through remains of crash site

By Amir Shah
Associated Press

CHINARI, Afghanistan — Security forces Monday turned back relatives trying to get to a freezing mountain where NATO soldiers found human remains but no survivors in the wreckage of an Afghan airliner four days after it struck a snowbound peak with 104 people on board.

NATO helicopters spotted parts of the wreckage some 11,000 feet up Chaperi Mountain on Saturday, but freezing fog, low clouds and up to 8 feet of snow had prevented teams from reaching the site.

Clear weather Monday allowed a Spanish Cougar helicopter to drop five Slovenian mountain troops onto the mountain top 20 miles east of Kabul, where they toiled through the deep snow to inspect several pieces of fuselage.

"They did find human remains," NATO spokeswoman Maj. Karen Tissot Van Patot said. It was impossible to say how many bodies the remains belonged to, she said. The troops were lifted out again as visibility deteriorated.

A team of 100 Afghan soldiers who go within 150 yards of the crash site were going to spend Monday night there ahead of medical teams that

See AFGANISTAN on page 2

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center
University of Massachusetts
Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief Peter Foundas
Managing Editor Mike Marinelli
Business Manager Rich Pacheco
Production Manager Cory Rosenberg
Night Supervisor Meghan Healy
Advertising Manager Tiffany Sugalski
Editorial Production Samantha M. Nielsen
Arts & Living Editor Michael Busack
Comics Editor Alyson Zillmann
Editorial Editor Yousef Munayyer
Editorial Editor Allison Edles
News Editor Erika Lovley
Photo Editor Alex Demosthene
Sports Editor Bob McGovern
Circulation Manager Kristen Weiss
Classified Advertising Marty Pappas
Distribution Manager Josh Kiggans
Finance Manager Hirak Shah
Accounting Clerk Virginie Frecaut
Human Resources Sandra Marquez
Assistant Operations Linda Wallack
Assistant Advertising Josh Greenberg
Assistant Business Nathan Chomsky
Assistant Finance Thomas Hecht
Advertising Production Rachael Bruno
Graphics Advisor Charlie Higgins
Asst. Arts & Living Matthew O'Rourke
Asst. Arts & Living Chris Gazzara
Assistant News Julie O'Donnell
Assistant News Dan O'Brien
Assistant Photo Megan Brunner
Assistant Sports Jeff Howe

Production Crew
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Erika Lovley
PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Megan Brunner
COPY EDITOR
Mike Busack
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Samantha M. Nielsen
PRODUCTION STAFF
Jean Heslin, Matt Reed, Nick Belanger

Write for News
Ω Ω Ω Ω
Call 545-3500
and speak with
Erika, Julie or Dan.

Bromery reappointed

SCIENTIST from page 1

Courtesy UMass Rec.

Randolph W. Bromery

scientists who might not qualify for the Nobel Prize. "If you are a geologist or a geophysicist you probably won't get the Nobel Prize because there is no area in the Nobel Prize for that [field]."

In his next term Bromery is pushing for the recognition of recent advancements in the field of geophysics. Ocean plate tectonic theory is generating lots of interest after the recent tsunami disaster in Southeast Asia that has killed at least 240,000 people. "Almost every geologist in the world could have predicted that [the tsunami disaster] was going to happen, we didn't know when, but it was going to happen," says Bromery.

However, "The committee always disagrees," says Bromery, "the biologists want to get their folks in, I want to get my people in. I have a dozen people I'd like to see get [the award] but I'm sure the biologists have got a dozen." In a given year ten medals may be awarded to individuals who began in an initial pool of fifty or more potential medal recipients.

"The president has sent a mandate down that pushes for minorities and women to be represented. He wants them to have comparable merit but he wants to make sure we open up the net and let them in," says Bromery. The medal ceremonies usually take place in March and consist of a black tie dinner at the White House, concluded by a presidential ceremony where the National Medal of Science is awarded to laureates.

No survivors found after airline crash hope to reach it Tuesday to collect bodies, Defense Ministry spokesman Gen. Mohammed Zaher Azimi said.

AFGANISTAN from page 1

"A hand might be here and a foot somewhere else, so it will very difficult," Azimi said. "As well as the cold and the snow, there could be mines up there. It will take weeks to complete our job."

Down below, Afghan soldiers and police manned checkpoints to stop family members and media from approaching the area — to the fury of dozens of men eager to observe Muslim custom by quickly burying their dead.

Relatives fretted that wolves and vultures could feed on the victims and rumors spread of looters answering calls made to their mobile phones. One man brandished a tattered Kam Air ticket he said he found in a nearby village.

Some evaded the checkpoints but returned disheartened as even their sport utility vehicles proved no match for the deep snow.

"How can I look at this white mountain, where part of my heart lies?" said a man named Azizi, whose uncle, Shafa, took the doomed plane on the way back from a business trip to Iran. "I have to move, I have to try."

The Boeing 737-200, flown by Kam Air, Afghanistan's first post-Taliban private airline, vanished Thursday as it approached Kabul airport in a snowstorm from the western city of Herat. There were 96 passengers and eight crew aboard.

Bush proposes $2.57 budget

By Martin Crutsinger
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Bush sent Congress a $2.57 trillion budget plan Monday that would boost spending on the military and homeland security but seeks spending cuts across a wide swath of other government programs. Bush's budget would reduce subsidies paid to farmers, cut health programs for poor people and veterans and trim spending on the environment and education.

"It is a budget that sets priorities," Bush said after a meeting with his Cabinet. "It's a budget that reduces and eliminates redundancy. It's a budget that's a lean budget."

Bush acknowledged that it would be difficult to eliminate popular programs but he said programs must prove their worth. "I look forward to explaining to the American people why we made some of the requests that we made in our budget," the president told reporters.

Joshua Bolten, Bush's budget director, said, "Are we going to get everything we asked for? No." But he predicted Congress would likely accept the administration's broad priorities. He said he entered the upcoming congressional budget battle with a "happy spirit."

Democrats immediately branded the budget a "hoax" because it left out the huge future costs for the war in Iraq and Afghanistan and did not include the billions of dollars that will be needed for Bush's No. 1 domestic priority, overhauling Social Security.

Bolten said the administration would soon be coming forward with a supplemental request for an additional $81 billion for operations in Iraq and Afghanistan. He said that request was reflected in the overall spending projections in Bush's budget for the current year and into 2006.

But he said including further additional spending for Iraq and Afghanistan "wouldn't be responsible" because it would represent guesses on what will be needed. Bolten also said that even if transition costs for Social Security had been included, the president would still be able to meet his goal of cutting the deficit in half by 2009 as a percentage of the total economy.

The budget — the most austere of Bush's presidency — would eliminate or vastly scale back 150 government programs. It will spark months of contentious debate in Congress, where lawmakers will fight to protect their favored programs.

Courtesy CNN.com

House Budget Committee Chairman Jim Ryun stands outside the White House after President Bush made his budget plan.

Shanley found guilty of rape

SHANLEY from page 1

nal trial was one of at least two dozen men who claimed they had been molested by Shanley, who was a parish priest in Newton, a suburb about 10 miles west of Boston. The archdiocese's own personnel records showed that church officials knew Shanley publicly advocated sex between men and boys, yet continued to transfer him from parish to parish.

Prosecutors said the accuser had no financial motivation in accusing Shanley of rape in the criminal case because he received his $500,000 settlement with the archdiocese nearly a year ago. They also cited his three days on stand, during which he sobbed and begged the judge not to force him to continue testifying.

"The emotions were raw. They were real," prosecutor Lynn Rooney said in closing arguments.

The verdict brought relief to victim advocates, who have spent the past several years exposing the habit of church officials to transfer priests accused of sexual misconduct from parish to parish.

"This shows that when survivors find the strength to speak up, sometimes, sometimes, kids are protected, and justice can happen," said David Clohessy, the national director of the Survivors Network of Those Abuse by Priests. "When survivors stay silent, nothing changes.

"We're very grateful for and proud of all the Shanley victims, because they all played a role here."

Shanley, once a long-haired, jeans-wearing "street priest" who worked with Boston's troubled youth and was considered a cool guy, sat stoically for most of the trial, listening to his accuser's testimony with the help of a hearing aid.

Shanley is one of the few priests prosecutors have been able bring charges against. Most of the priests accused in lawsuits avoided prosecution because the alleged crimes were committed so long ago that the statute of limitations had run out. But shortly after leaving the Newton parish in 1989, Shanley moved out of state, effectively stopping the clock.

University Health Services
Mental Health Groups Spring 2005

COED SELF-EXPLORATION GROUP FOR UNDERGRADUATE STUDENTS
Mondays, 2:00-3:30 pm -or- Wednesdays, 3:30-5:00 pm
For college men and women who experience difficulties in interpersonal connections or who have concerns about their relationships.

WOMEN'S EATING ISSUES GROUP
Tuesdays, 3:00-4:30 pm
This is a group for women who are interested in changing negative eating patterns, decreasing food and weight concerns and enhancing self-acceptance. Members will have an opportunity to learn about the underlying dynamics contributing to eating issues and to develop coping strategies.

COED BEREAVEMENT GROUP FOR UNDERGRAD & GRADUATE STUDENTS
Tuesdays, 3:45-5:00 pm
A support and exploration group for college men and women who have experienced the death of a close family member, friend, or intimate partner within the last several years. Members will have an opportunity to share experiences of mourning, support one another's grief process, and develop new ways of living with loss.

COED SELF-EXPLORATION GROUP FOR GRADUATE STUDENTS
Thursdays, 3:45-5:00 pm
For graduate men and women who experience difficulties with interpersonal connections or who have concerns about their relationships. Members will have an opportunity to explore personal relationships, work, studies, and other relevant concerns.

INTERPERSONAL RELATIONSHIPS FOR GAY/BISEXUAL/QUESTIONING MEN
3:45-5:00 pm - Day to be announced
For gay/bisexual/questioning men who experience difficulties in interpersonal connections.

MINDFULNESS-BASED STRESS REDUCTION (MBSR)
Thursdays, 3:30-5:00 pm
Mindfulness is a particular way of paying attention:
- with mindful intention
- in the moment
- without judgement

Although MBSR embraces the acceptance of things as they are without striving, research has shown that, with regular practice, it has the potential to lower stress, anxiety, and depression. It can promote relaxation, improve concentration, raise self-awareness, and enhance the immune system. Referrals and inquiries may be made to Kathryn Proulx at 545-2337.

Groups are conducted by Mental Health Division staff. Payment is deducted from your UHS Basic Plan, Student Health Insurance Plan, GIC, or Health New England plan subject to plan limitation and co-pays.

Groups require an initial screening that can be arranged by calling 545-2337 or stopping by at 126 Hills North, Monday - Friday 8 am-5 pm.

AUBUCHON HARDWARE
HardwareStore.com
We'll fix you right up!
www.aubuchonhardware.com
•Glidden Paint •Plumbing
•Tools •Electrical
•Phone - Cable Supplies
•Hanging Hardware
•Concrete Rock
Open: 8 - 7 Weekdays
8 - 6 Sat. 9 - 5 sun.
Campus Plaza
near Stop & Shop
458 Russel Street
(413)256-3000

University of Massachusetts/
Five College
Annual History Lecture

WHY WRITE HISTORY FOR THE PUBLIC?

Dennis McNally

Best-selling author of Desolate Angel: Jack Kerouac, the Beat Generation, and America and A Long Strange Trip/The Inside History of the Grateful Dead. McNally is also the longtime publicist for the Grateful Dead.

Wednesday, February 9, 2005
7:30 p.m.
Memorial Hall
University of Massachusetts

Panel criticizes Gargano

PICKET from page 1

Matthew Bright/Collegian

Members of Take Back UMass speak at a press conference about their frustration with the administration's decision to change the picketing code.

are inconsistent sentences. All students have the right to demonstrate on university premisses."

All panelists agreed that there is no definitive term for what disruptive behavior is. "[The students] lend themselves to the discretion of the administration. [Disruptive behavior] could be a button, a pin or a sign — any of these can be demonstrations."

Barak Sared, a member of the SGA's executive cabinet, said that he feels that this decision is a step to create "increased militarization on this campus. It goes beyond this one issue," he said, "we have yet to see any proactive steps to a peaceful aftermath."

Jeff Napolitano, Secretary of Public Policy and Relations for the SGA called his statements about the code as ironic. He said that it was ironic how he would be commenting on an issue by Gargano, "the same man who runs the Student Affairs Office, which the voice of the student body, overwhelmingly voted no confidence' in...In the words of a professor who recently testified at the Diversity Commission, it is a black mark on this University that this man still has a job here."

Professor of Germanic Languages and Literature's Sara Lennox also released a statement on behalf of the panel alluding that the new policies have some questioning whether this may be the new "University Patriot Act."

"Some have called this new policy the UMass Patriot Act, and it is indeed difficult not to connect these policies and procedures on the part of the University with what seem to be related threats to democracy at the national level."

In closing, Lennox wrote that this policy should raise questions and concern that need to be voiced. "The University of Massachusetts has a long and proud tradition of allegiance to the principles of liberalism. We call upon the University administration to reconfirm its commitment to the principles for which the University has always stood."

Gargano announced that these policies are strictly to enhance the educational mission of the University. He and Lombardi maintain that this is an academic institution and disruption of faculty, workers and students will not be tolerated.

One of the deadliest insurgent attacks kills 30 in Baghdad

IRAQ from page 1

Jordanian militant Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, said "a lion from the Martyrs Brigade" wearing an explosives belt managed to get inside a police post at the Mosul hospital. The claim could not be verified.

There was no claim for the Baquuba attack.

Also Monday, insurgents shelled a police station in Mosul with more than a dozen mortar rounds, killing three civilians, a police official said.

The violence and kidnappings raise new concerns about security following a brief downturn in violence after the Jan. 30 elections, when Iraqis chose a new National Assembly in the first nationwide balloting since the fall of Saddam Hussein in April 2003.

A final tally was expected by Thursday, but initial returns point to a landslide by Shiite Muslim candidates endorsed by their clerics. Shiites are believed to comprise about 60 percent of Iraq's 26 million people.

Many Sunni Arabs are believed to have stayed home, either out of fear of rebel reprisal or because of a boycott call by Sunni clerics.

In the Mosul area, 15,188 were unable to vote because of irregularities, Iraqi election commission officials said Monday. Gunmen looted some polling places, stealing ballot papers, commission official Izzedine al-Mahmoudi said.

Officials also said first returns showed that Sunnis stayed away from the polls in Salahedin province, a mostly Sunni area north of Baghdad that contains Saddam Hussein's hometown of Tikrit.

With results in from 80 percent of the province's polling stations, the largely Shiite United Iraqi Alliance had the most votes with 27,645.

Pope John Paul II remains hospitalized

ROME (AP)— From inmates in prisons he has visited to diplomats from one the few countries he hasn't, get-well messages and gifts have been pouring in for Pope John Paul II, who the Vatican said Monday will stay longer in the hospital as a precaution.

Papal spokesman Joaquin Navarro-Valls told reporters that the pope continued to get better a week after his emergency admission to the Gemelli Polyclinic with breathing problems that developed with the flu, but that "his doctors have advised him to stay a few more days."

Navarro-Valls refused to be pinned down on a discharge date for the 84-year-old pope, who is also weakened by Parkinson's disease. "Doctors have suggested several more days," he said.

The next medical bulletin from the Vatican is scheduled for Thursday.

The good wishes started flooding in at Gemelli last Wednesday, when pilgrims from John Paul's native Poland brought red and white flowers in the colors of their flag.

Hard to miss was a nearly 6-foot-high arrangement of roses in yellow and white, the official colors of the Vatican, sent last week by the Libyan Embassy. Libya is one of the few nations that the pope hasn't toured in his papal globe-trotting, which has taken him to 104 countries.

Hospital staff quickly dispatched overflow floral arrangements to Rome churches. Flowers from the governments of Libya and Qatar decorated the hospital chapel.

The tributes were testimony to the special regard much of the world holds for the pope, among both Catholics and non-Catholics, as well as to the widespread concern for his health.

— Associated Press

Gunman opened fire on journalists

JOURNALIST from page 1

He said he did not know who might have been behind the attack.

Nawab was not sent by APTN to cover the surrender ceremony, but he had worked extensively with the TV news agency covering an 18-month crackdown by Pakistan's military in the region, which is considered a likely hiding spot for al-Qaida chief Osama bin Laden and his top aides.

Shah said militant tribesmen were believed responsible for the attack and authorities would question elders from the tribe in whose territory the attack was carried out.

"This was an act of sabotage. These are elements that don't want peace in South Waziristan and the tribal regions," Shah said.

The journalists were coming back from a ceremony in Sararogha village, about 50 miles northeast of Wana, that was held to formalize a promise by militant leader Baitullah Mehsud to surrender and lay down his weapons in return for government amnesty.

Mehsud had been on the run since October after he was accused of being behind attacks on security forces and leading a band of local and foreign extremists in South Waziristan.

Standing before more than 2,000 tribesmen, Mehsud and about 35 supporters shook hands with senior government administrators to make peace, local cleric Maulana Ainullah said.

Lawyers suing Herald

BOSTON — Lawyers for a judge suing the Boston Herald for libel rested their case against the newspaper on Monday after a morning of emotional testimony by the judge's 17-year-old daughter.

Jessica Murphy, the daughter of Judge Ernest B. Murphy, broke down several times while testifying about the aftermath of the articles that depicted her father as lenient, and resulted in death threats and a chatroom posting that suggested that Murphy's daughters should be raped.

She said that after her parents warned that she and her then-10-year-old sister might be in danger in the wake of Herald stories, she had nightmares and believed that someone was breaking into their house.

"I was dreaming a man was sitting on my chest and not allowing me to wake up," she said.

The Herald has stood by its reporting.

Because he is a public figure, Murphy's attorney must prove the Herald maliciously reported material its reporters knew was false; a higher standard than the requirement a nonpublic figure must meet to win a libel case.

After Jessica Murphy's testimony, the defense asked Judge Charles R. Johnson for a "directed verdict" dismissing all or some of the charges against the newspaper and four of its writers. They argued that Judge Murphy's lawyers, among other things, failed to prove the paper acted with malice.

The judge said he will announce his ruling on the defense motion Tuesday morning.

Elizabeth A. Ritvo, one of the Herald's four lawyers, focused on Murphy's allegation that the paper relied on biased information from the Bristol County District Attorney's office to verify that Murphy told attorneys to tell a 14-year-old statutory rape victim "to get over it."

—Associated Press

NEW Click and Waive!

Beginning this year, students can waive the Student Health Insurance Plan (SHIP) Online

All undergraduate and graduate students taking 5 or more credits are automatically enrolled in the University of Massachusetts Amherst Student Health Insurance Plan, in compliance with Massachusetts State Law. This charge appears on your tuition bill.

You may waive participation in the Student Health Insurance Plan if you have comparable insurance coverage. Visit the Chickering web site at www.chickering.com for detailed plan information. If you are eligible, you must submit a waiver request each academic year.*

The deadline to waive the Student Health Insurance Plan is February 28, 2005 (the last day of the add/drop period).

TO NAVIGATE AND SUBMIT YOUR WAIVER REQUEST:

1. Go to www.spire.edu
2. Select the online waiver request link
3. Click on "2004-2005 waiver request"
4. Complete and submit the online waiver request form

OR

1. Go to www.chickering.com
2. Click on "Student Connection"
3. Under "Find Your School" enter 100106 as your Policy Number
4. Once at the UMass Amherst web page, click on the tab "Waive"

PLEASE NOTE: Part-time students as defined by the university may voluntarily enroll themselves through UHS. Enrollment is not automatic. Newly registered part-time students must take action to enroll themselves by the published deadline.

*If you waived the Student Health Insurance Plan in the Fall, your plan will automatically be waived for the Spring 2005 semester. You do not need to submit a new waiver request.

UNIVERSITY HEALTH SERVICES
ENROLLMENT DEPARTMENT • 413.577.5192

No Stamps! No envelopes! Online confirmation of request sent within minutes of completion

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 2005

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." -Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

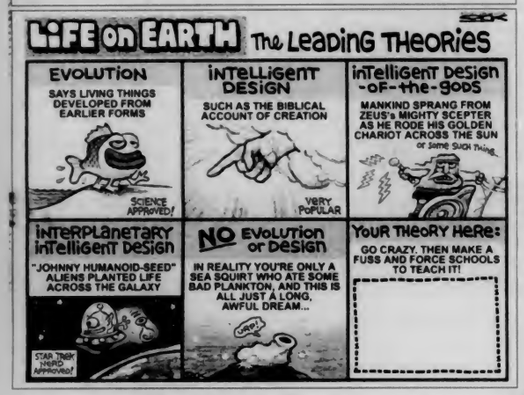
Student behavior following Super Bowl commendable

Following the New England Patriots' victory over the Philadelphia Eagles in Super Bowl XXXIX on Sunday, celebration was not at a loss throughout New England. However, as opposed to last October's World Series riots following the Red Sox's win, the atmosphere, particularly around campus, was a lot more toned down.

The University of Massachusetts student body showed maturity evolving from good sportsmanship on Sunday night. By celebrating in an appropriate manner, students proved that they were able to show the administration, as well as parents and authorities, that they were capable of acting like proper functioning members of the UMass community.

For the Patriots', the Super Bowl marked their second win in row, their third in the past four years. When the Red Sox won the World Series, it was their first time in 86 years. The importance of the two games varied greatly. The Red Sox win meant a whole lot more to Boston's adoring fans. It carried more clout. Consequently, when students all over New England felt the need to incite riots, the behavior was not condoned in any way, but the reasons behind them were more understandable.

This Super Bowl win, given the Patriots' previous winning record over the past four years, didn't hold as much weight. The head coach of the Patriots, Bill Belichick, is considered by many to be one of the greatest coaches of all time. He also has been the coach for New England for the past five years.



Terry Francona, the coach that led the Red Sox to victory, has only been coaching the team for one year — the year that they won the World Series. The two victories New England shared are measured on two different levels, which explains the differences in the level of celebrations for each.

Something that may have added to the decrease in destructive celebration following the Super Bowl was the UMass Police Department's recent announcement of Tasers being added to their department equipment. While the police department does not currently possess Tasers and won't be expecting them until the fall of 2005, students appeared to take no chances this time around.

In lieu of the Red Sox victory prompting riotous celebration, we cannot forget Victoria Snelgrove, the Emerson College student who died in the game's aftermath as a result of being hit in the head by a non-lethal weapon fired by a Boston police officer. Snelgrove's death may have also been a contributing factor in the comparatively peaceful celebrations following the Super Bowl.

The UMass student body, as a whole, chose to celebrate wisely after the Super Bowl. Hopefully, the conduct that the students demonstrated that night will speak volumes to the administration and to the UMass Police Department. Perhaps this will now allow room for the decisions regarding non-lethal weapons being purchased by college campus police to be reconsidered, given the potential students have to remain civil.

Unsigned editorials represent the majority opinion of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian Editorial Board.

Convenience is a vice

Stacy Kasdin

The other day, I pulled into a parking lot in town and there were no available spaces. There was also a line of people waiting to park, blocking any hope I had of backing out of the lot. Thus, everyone had to go to the end of the row and make a three-point-turn.

People sat leaning on their horns. I decided the best course of action was to let the guy in front of me turn around and pull out before I tried to go. He was driving a large SUV and having another car taking up space would have probably made his attempt to turn around far more difficult. Unfortunately, my kindness was in vain, because the driver of the car behind me took it upon himself to pull around me and block the SUV into its spot.

His impatience ended up making the whole situation substantially more difficult for everyone. Had he waited, it would have taken the SUV 30 seconds to turn around and then I would have followed. Instead, the SUV had to maneuver around the car, which took at least an extra minute. It seems to me that our society is losing patience by the second.

People can't seem to afford a little common courtesy if it means inconveniencing themselves in the slightest way. I think a lot of this impatience can be attributed to our technology, and our privilege of being able to get what we want when we want it most of the time.

Recently, I was discussing research papers with a friend and we began to think back to the papers we wrote in elementary and middle school. Hard to believe as it was, we actually had to go to the library and read encyclopedias and reference books to research our paper topics. Now, thanks to the Internet, there is a lonely set of red "'New' World Book Encyclopedias" gathering dust in my basement.

The Internet has brought forth instant gratification of more kinds than seem imaginable. You can find information on any subject you might want to research. Weather reports, stock and sports updates are available and regularly revised. You can purchase nearly any item fathomable from a first edition book to a plane ticket to a new pet to a new wife on the Internet.

The downfall of this plethora of information and shopping is that you need to sit down at a computer in order to take advantage of it. Thanks to Verizon Wireless, this is no longer the case. With Verizon's new V CAST, one can not only sign on to the Internet from their cell phone, but also watch live video of news, sports, music videos, weather and entertainment news. Fox is creating a spin-off of their series "24" with action-packed five minute episodes just for these phones. There's even Sesame Street for the kids! They call these "Next generation" phones.

It seems to me that our society is losing patience by the second. People can't seem to afford a little common courtesy if it means inconveniencing themselves in the slightest way.

We can also see our pictures without developing them thanks to digital cameras, and record and watch our favorite shows without VCRs thanks to Tivo and other similar products. We can listen to the latest music without ever buying a CD again now that we have Napster and iTunes. If people wanted to, they would really never have to leave their houses again.

Groceries and medication can be ordered online and delivered to one's home. Students of elementary age through college age can complete coursework on the Internet. Plenty of companies offer positions working from home now that it's so easy to stay in touch, send files, etc. No more waiting for that pesky SUV to turn around in the parking lot. No more need for cars at all.

I figure it won't be too much longer before we can get little satellite dishes implanted in our bodies that come with little remote controls. We'll be able to press a button and the latest sports scores will be reported directly into our ears. We'll blink our eyes to a take a picture. The stock updates will scroll across the palm of our hands and the latest music video dance moves will be shot down to our feet.

The sad part is that even then we won't be happy. We will want to figure out a way to make it work without pressing the buttons. We will want to create a system that can read our very thoughts. We will turn ourselves into robots. Convenience is nice, but there is such a thing as too much convenience and we are getting dangerously close to it.

Stacy Kasdin is a Collegian columnist.

Appreciating our troops

Dan McDonnell

It's time for me to admit something about myself that a lot of people don't know. I am 20 years old and I still watch professional wrestling on a semi-regular basis. I admit it. I am guilty. Make fun of me all you want, I don't really care.

I fully understand that wrestling is fake; it's something that 12-year-olds watch, etc. Say whatever you want about it. It will not change the fact that I am still a wrestling fan.

Around Christmas time of 2003, Vince McMahon, the owner of World Wrestling Entertainment had the idea of visiting our American troops over in Iraq and putting on a show for their entertainment. It was a way of thanking the troops for what they are doing for our nation and the entire world.

The WWE wrestlers were given the option of attending and performing, or staying home. Every member of the company jumped at the chance to make the trip overseas to show their support and gratitude for the work of our soldiers. They understood that they would be in the middle of a war with high chances of an enemy attack. But regardless, everyone was thrilled about the opportunity to visit our troops and put on a show for them.

The trip in 2003 was so successful and well received that they did the exact same thing in 2004. The wrestlers spent a few days visiting troops, signing autographs, taking pictures, etc. They visited bases in 16 different locations via Blackhawk helicopters to raise the troops' spirits.

During one afternoon lunch, the mess hall actually had a threat of attack. A loud explosion was heard coming from a rocket that was fired by insurgents causing troops to leave lunch and wrestlers to scurry for safety. This shows just how dangerous the trip to Iraq was for the WWE.

On their final day in Iraq, they put on the show in an old broken down soccer stadium just north of Tikrit, the hometown of Saddam Hussein. The show went on with no problems, and was a complete success in all manners of speaking. The wrestlers had a great time entertaining the soldiers, and the soldiers had a great time cheering on their favorite wrestlers.

The biggest thing that came out of this trip actually came from an interview with WWE owner, Vince McMahon, which appeared on the WWE's website last Christmas. He said that the trip was intended to raise the spirits of the troops, but it instead "raised our spirits." He said that the morale of soldiers is surprisingly very positive.

The general belief in America seems to be that the troops are completely miserable and want no part of this war. The media has focused on only the negative aspects of the situation in Iraq, causing U.S. citizens to show their disapproval for both the war and our government as a whole.

This is a time where we need to drop the titles of 'Democrat' and 'Republican' and all unite under the titie of 'American.'

According to McMahon, many soldiers that he spoke with actually take exception to the media's portrayal of the conflict in Iraq. They feel that they are doing a great job in their efforts and the media is not giving them the credit they deserve.

I understand that many people disagree with the War in Iraq, and disagree with everything George W. Bush does as our leader. You are entitled to your opinion and I respect that fully.

But whether or not you agree or disagree with this war, you should support our soldiers for what they do for every one of us. They risk their lives to ensure our safety. As evidenced by the trip to Iraq by the WWE, they are proud of what they do, and we should be even more proud of them.

I went to high school with a few soldiers that are currently in Iraq. Occasionally I get the chance to speak with them either online or during a visit home. They have called Iraq a "hell hole" and these soldiers are happy to be over in Iraq making a difference in the world. And last time I checked, there's no draft in effect right now, so these soldiers are all volunteering their services to our nation and the world.

I understand that many differences in opinion occur because half of us support the Democratic beliefs and half support Republican beliefs. This is a time where we need to drop the titles of "Democrat" and "Republican" and all unite under the title of "American." Even John Kerry said this exact thing during his congratulatory speech to George W. Bush after losing the election.

It's not easy for our soldiers to be away from home in the middle of a war. The last thing they need is for our media to focus on only the negative aspects of their work. Focus on the positives. Show the progress that they have made since Operation: Iraqi Freedom began. Let's show our appreciation for our troops on a regular basis rather than question why our government has sent them to Iraq to fight.

Let's all show our gratitude, just like Vince McMahon and the WWE did on Christmas. Let's show that we are proud of the work that our soldiers do and that we support them through thick and thin. The WWE not only made me proud to be a wrestling fan, but it made me even more proud to be an American.

Dan McDonnell is a Collegian columnist.

Israel's culture of racism

Yousef Munayyer

Buried under a story about Israeli naturalization and Ethiopian Jews in last weeks New York Times was a four-sentence blurb. The first sentence: "An 11 year-old Palestinian girl was killed Monday by a gunshot to the face while she stood outside her school in the southern Gaza Strip."

Four sentences. The reader does not even get to know the girl's name. I will share her name; Ghadir Mukhaimar. May she rest in peace.

This is a sample of the brutal occupation. Every day it continues and the signs of hope, which are boasted, get shot down on a school yard's step. Ghadir's story can bring anger to the most peaceful of men, yet it was the story above her empty blurb that inspired this column.

The State of Israel has decided to expedite the naturalization process for certain Ethiopian Jews. Since its inception, the State of Israel hoped to be a home for all Jews.

At some point in history, these Ethiopian Jews had converted from Judaism to other religions. Now, back to their Jewish ways, they are seeking refuge in Israel. Initially Israel was skeptical about the authenticity of the "Jewishness" in question. Most recently, however, they have come to a decision to make the process easier.

The theme here is "anyone but the Palestinians". Israel has been engaged in a campaign to take as much land as possible from the Palestinians who have been living on it for centuries.

Israel has been engaged in a campaign to take as much land as possible from the Palestinians who have been living on it for centuries.

The lax immigration laws for non-Palestinians are not the only instance. Several months ago, when I arrived in Ben Gurion Airport in Lod, I noticed something different. Next to the word "welcome", written in English, Hebrew and Arabic, it was also written in Russian. The population of Russians in Israel totals near one million, many of which falsify their "Jewishness" for entry to Israel.

The local experts, surprisingly enough, are gravediggers. Christian Arabs who remained in Israel during the expulsion in 1948 have their own cemeteries because non-Jews cannot be buried in Jewish cemeteries. (Inequality in Israel continues even beyond death.) The Arab Orthodox cemeteries, which used to be less active, are beginning to fill up with Orthodox Christian Russians.

The Russians also introduce a more dangerous element. Many supporters of Israel will be quick to tell you about how western the "only democracy in the Middle East is" but recent human rights reports show appalling contradictions. Just last week, news surfaced about possible U.S. sanctions against Israel for human rights abuses. Not for shooting at schoolgirls, but for trafficking women!

Amnesty International reported, "in many instances, women trafficked from [Former Soviet Union] countries are literally bought and sold for large sums of money, often in auctions where they are purchased by the highest bidder." The horrifying report also states that in Israel "slavery and the buying and selling of persons are not criminal offences."

It was also recently exposed that Israel had been using a 55 year-old law to steal land in East Jerusalem. The law provides that any land from which the owner is absent becomes property of the state's custodian. Arabs in the West Bank, whose livelihood is brought to a stand still by the racist apartheid wall, cannot get to their farmlands. Israel would then declare them absent and confiscate the land. Fortunately, this secret policy has recently been exposed and this practice was supposed to cease in East Jerusalem, but it has not stopped everywhere.

On my last trip to Israel, I met a remarkable old man, Abu George is a devout Arab living in Israel. He used to reside in a village in the Galilee, near the Lebanese boarder, and travel to work his fields a few miles south. Now, because of the absentee law, he has moved to a shack on his farmland so Israel will not declare him absent.

Yet this is just a sample of the racist policies which exist in Israel. A shockwave was sent through Israel recently when the Attorney General changed policy regarding the Jewish National Fund. The function of this organization is to manage land in Israel and sell it to Jews only. It is the principle force behind the systematic eth-nic cleansing which Israel has legalized and embraced since its inception. Land which the JNF obtains can only be sold to Jews. Attorney General Meni Mazuz recently said that this policy was illegal and against the democratic ideal.

Though this seemed like a step in the right direction, he also added that land, which the JNF ends up selling to non-Jews, would be compensated for with other land. So the JNF will continue its goal of wiping Arabs out of their lands completely.

Israel's policies are saying "anything but Palestinians" in an effort to change the demographic catastrophe it is facing. They are willing to permit human rights abuses, accept quasi-Jews and confiscate Palestinian land so they can put off a reality that any educated person can understand: racism can not coexist with peace.

Ghadir was trying to get an education. At 11 years old, she too could have understood that simple human principle.

Why can't Israel?

Yousef Munayyer is a Collegian editor.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 2005

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Return of the Crüe

By Michael Busack
Collegian Staff

After all of the drugs, glam, girls, drama, and restraining orders, the Crue is back and with a little bit of patriotism, with their new release "Red, White and Crue."

Six years ago, the band Motley Crue decided to call it quits for good when an argument between lead singer Vince Neill and drummer Tommy Lee resulted in fisticuffs.

Today, after several failing solo careers and the stench of washed up rockers filling the air, Motley Crue has decided to stage a comeback, world tour and all. The action will begin on Feb. 17 with a show at the Office Depot Center in Ft. Lauderdale FL.

In order to pump up for all of the excitement, the band thought the best idea would be to also release a action-packed greatest hits disc as well. Included on this piece of hair band memorabilia are 20 crispy Crue classics including "Girls, Girls, Girls," and "Don't Go Away Mad (Just Go Away)." It even includes the love ballad "Kickstart my heart," and the newly revamped remix "Too Young to Fall in Love." Altogether, it is truly great listening material if you are preparing for a class reunion or a cruise in your El Camino.

In 1984 Motley Crue opened for the legendary Ozzy Osbourne. Now Osbourne is starring in yet another season of his family-friendly reality show on MTV, and Vince Neil is spending his days on a VH1 plastic surgery special titled "Remaking Vince Neil". Not exactly like the old days. The new material is not so appealing. Everything on this Earth has a time and a place, and Motley Crue had a time, that time was called the '80s.

"Red, White, and Crue," the second disc is quite watered down. None of the members sound as sharp as they once did. Vince Neil sounds as if he has almost completely lost any ability to sing. Although, I guess a reality show can makeover your face, but not your voice.

The tour however, may be worth some laughs at least. Shows, brought to you by VH1 and VH1 Classic, will be titled "Motley Crue: Red, White, and Crue Tour 2005... Better Live than Dead."

Although Vince Neil, Tommy Lee, Nikki Sixx, and Mick Mars have a combined 9 divorces between them, they all claim that they are happily tied up in their current relationships and this tour will be void of any groupie shannigans. Yeah, and Michael said no to plastic surgery.

A feature film is also in the making for the Crue. Based on their successful biography titled "The Dirt." Meanwhile Tommy Lee is riding the success of his autobiography in which he spilled dirt about fellow band members, including calling bandmate Vince Neill ugly and bloated.

Luckily, UMass fans can catch them at the end of this month at the Hartford Civic Center in for an entertaining show, to say the least.

Discover the Bachelors of U.Mass

Silk Johnson

Bachelor #1: Silk Johnson, aka "The Nice Guy with 14 Cats"
Major: Communications
Age: 21
Year: Senior

Personality Type:
Silk describes himself as a hopeless romantic, "I've always been waiting for that special someone," he says.

Relationship Experience:
Silk has had two previous relationships, both serious. Unfortunately, his last girlfriend broke his heart. "I don't mind being single, really. It's just that I love to cuddle up and be committed to one woman."

What he looks for in a girl:
"I don't really discriminate," says Silk, "but I like a woman to be physically fit, confident, trustworthy, open-minded and non-judgmental." Good job being indiscriminant!

Biggest Turn-ons:
"I like nice calves," he says, "[I like] women who are into me and are natural looking."

Biggest Turn-offs:
"I hate moustaches, women who spit, liars and ignorance."

His Flaws:
According to Silk, he can do some "immature things" once in a while.

Favorite Alcoholic Drink:
Silk prefers not to drink. "I know it sounds funny, but I prefer water," he says.

Hobbies:
Silk works with the Not Ready For Bedtime Players, a sex education theater troupe and the University of Massachusetts football team. And don't forget his ferret, talking teddy bear and his 14 cats.

What type of animal he would be:
Silk says he would be a cheetah. "I just want to run full speed to my potential across the lands of an open country and feel the wind rush by my ears."

The Bottom Line:
There you have it, girls. This man is definitely a unique find among the many at UMass. He is undeniably compassionate, sweet and romantic. Maybe he will set aside his talking bear for the night?

Tom Harwood

Bachelor #2: Tom Harwood aka "The Typical College Guy with Nice Eyes" Major: School of Management
Age: 21
Year: "I'm kind of a junior"

Personality Type:
Tom seems emotionless, insensitive but really quite funny ... if you have his humor.

Relationship Experience:
He once dated a girl for three months but then got bored. "I haven't been on a date in years," he says. "I guess I'm cheap."

What he looks for in a girl:
"I like lively, outgoing, simple, flirty girls. It's easier that way."

Biggest Turn-ons:
Tom likes high maintenance women with nice eyes, nice legs and good teeth.

Biggest Turn-offs:
"I dislike slobs, messy girls, body hair and she has to have both hands with ten fingers. I can't stand girls when the toe next to their big toe is longer, either."

Flaws:
Tom says he's really shy and terrible at answering questions.

Favorite Alcoholic Drink:
Jack and a splash of water.

Hobbies:
"Um...I dunno."

What type of animal he would be:
An ape. "So I know where I came from." Maybe his date can help him with that!

The bottom line:
This guy can easily drive a woman mad ... but that might not be such a bad thing! He is screaming for a woman to sensitize him and shake things up!

But what does he think? "Don't save her, she don't wanna be saved." With such words of wisdom could he be right?

Be sure to check out www.dailycollegian.com for more Discover Your Lover

Jarret Marcoux

Bachelor #3: Jarret Marcoux aka "The Strictly Business Man"
Major: Chemical Engineering and Economics
Age: 23
Year: Super senior

Personality Type:
Jarret is a straight-shooter. "I say what's on my mind," he says. "I work hard, I play hard. What's so hard to understand? I am not cocky, but I know I am quite smart — smarter than most people I meet. I have a lot of energy and I like to have a good time." This guy has too much energy! Is there a girl that can keep up?

Relationship Experience:
"I have yet to break the two month threshold. I just get bored quickly," says the energetic bachelor. "Plus, women don't seem to get my ambition."

What he looks for in a girl:
"I like an aggressive woman that loves to surprise me."

Biggest Turn-ons:
He likes a woman with goals, ambitions and a great work ethic. (Perhaps he's looking for a female Jarret?) He also likes girls who are hygienic.

Biggest Turn-offs:
Punctuality is key. "I can't stand tardiness. It drives me crazy." He adds, "I also hate smoking, laziness, lying and pushovers. But the most annoying thing is when women put their hands over their mouth while they are eating and continue to talk. Do they really think their hand hides the fact that they have no manners?"

Flaws:
"I guess I can say I am competitive and I always think I'm right."

Favorite Alcoholic Drink:
"I am the king of girly drinks and I'm not afraid to admit it."

Hobbies:
The usual breed of 'Frat Boy,' he belongs to Sig Ep. Enough said.

What type of animal he would be:
A bear. "Go watch 'Swingers' for an explanation," he says.

The Bottom Line:
Well, this man sure is entertaining. He seems cocky and arrogant but once you get past it, he's quite a character. He has stated his intentions clearly: "I don't mind high maintenance girls, as long as she's high performance." Can there be such a woman for Jarret?

Paris and Anna return to reality

Reality TV

Mike Busack

It has been another slice of reality pie this week.

First, Martha Stewart is the only celebrity on Earth that can be imprisoned, yet still be prospering more than ever. Mogul turned television star, Donald Trump announced this week that Stewart has signed on to host the next apprentice.

The new show titled "The Apprentice: Martha Stewart" will be filmed during a portion of Martha's house arrest. Producers claim that even though Stewart will be technically under prison supervision, she is grantted the right to make a living. Is this a little freaky to anyone else?

Fresh off of a Trim Spa binge, Anna Nicole will be returning to the E! network with a second season of the heavily-medicated reality/comedy "The Anna Nicole Show." The network has taken a daring plunge by letting the loose cannon air her first episode of the second season completely live. I think Anna Nicole needs to take some advice from Geraldo, and learn that going live doesn't exactly work for some people.

It wasn't shocking that American Idol had amazing ratings this week, what was shocking however was that on Wednesday night, the President's State of the Union Address had a significantly lower rating than an episode of the fourth season of American Idol. You draw your own cultural conclusions.

A petty theft case brought up against Simple Life star Paris Hilton has been dropped. The television diva allegedly stole a copy of her very own sex tape off a newsstand. The case was reportedly dropped due to a lack of evidence.

Media little guy Bravo is experiencing some big time success with their series "Project Runway." Lauren Zalaznick, President of Bravo announced that the show will run a special episode due to the high ratings and demand for previous episodes of the show. Supermodel Heid Klum is both the host and Executive Producer for the show. Project Runway is hall competition, half documentary on the ins and outs of the most elite business in entertainment, the fashion business. This is truly a pearl in a sea of outrageous reality television oysters. Next week's episode will announce the shows winner with New York's Fall Fashion Week.

Finally, in maybe the most odd report of the week, according to the Philadelphia Inquirer, MTV's Real World Philadelphia is endorsing a more gay friendly Philly. Staff writer, Michael Klein says that if "the city is not the gay capital, it's at least a welcoming outpost on the gay travel scene, and it wants the world to know. The city tourism campaign's spring-summer advertising blitz uses the catchy slogan "Come to Philadelphia — get your history straight, and your nightlife gay."

Klein attributes some of this new found gay pride to the fact that gay themes "permeate this newest version of the MTV series which, in a first, has two gay members in the seven-person household."

It has been another interesting week in the reality TV land. Stay tuned.

Michael Busack is a Collegian Editor

Watson's 'Boogeyman': so bad, it's scary

By Ryan Aubert
Collegian Staff

Towards the middle of the film "Boogeyman" the main character played by Barry Watson turns to one of his imaginary apparitions and says, "When you get scared, just count from one to five." The ghost of a girl responds, "But what happens when you get to six?" With the same quizzical look that he holds throughout the movie, Watson shrugs his shoulders.

Most viewers would probably count to five in hopes that this horrible and conventional film might soon end. They might even just shrug one's shoulders because the film is too puzzling and begs the question during the end credits — "did that make sense?"

Riding on a wave of similar films containing scary monster-like beings and small children, "Boogeyman" attempts to win over scary movie viewers around the country. Relatively new director Stephen Kay is probably best known for "Get Carter," a flick that is rather telling of his body of work because who remembers that movie? In the future, nobody will remember "Boogeyman" either.

Barry Watson stars as Tim Jenson, a 20-something magazine editor who was terrified by a monster when he was younger. This monster, or "Boogeyman," emerges from under his bed and closet. Most everybody has their own scary memories provided by their imaginations running wild when they were children. Jenson's imagination is different though, and his monster is real. So real, in fact, that the thing from the closet devoured Jenson's father while he looked on as a child.

This event leaves Jenson understandably horrified by the sight of closets.

The swamp of a story becomes muddled though as the line between Jenson's craziness versus reality is blurred. Normally, this would be scary and frightening. In "Boogeyman" though, the problematic plot overshadows the moments of fright. Shrugging and shaking one's head becomes a repetitive action. At the end of the film, Jenson is so crazy that he walks through a closet that leads to the space beneath a bed a few miles away. These and other reality defying feats cheapen the film and become laughable. Given no context, events in this film don't make sense.

"Boogeyman's" main problem lies in the fact that it is too conventional. Nothing is original about the film. In fact, instead of improving upon the formula of a scary movie, it makes it worse. Most of the movie is spent watching a closet door, or an open dark closet. The tension then rises with the music, and then cuts to Watson's look of terror. Then something else happens (a noise, usually) and everybody jumps. Watson realizes it is his imagination. Then wash, rinse and repeat. Quite literally, the majority of the movie is spent like this. Add these features to the usual weird looking house and lighting storm, and a recipe for deja-vu is ready.

Barry Watson is one of those actors that seems like he would be good in another film, but is misplaced in this role. The potential is there but unfortunately it is squandered throughout the mess. He seems to be overacting and is overly emotional. There is no drive to overcome the "Boogeyman" nor is there any courage within the character. Craziness and insanity reign instead.

Much like it's title, the film "Boogeyman" is difficult to take seriously. The contents of this boring story amount to nothing. Thankfully, the monster from the closet isn't real… too bad the movie on the screen is.

'Boogeyman'
Directed by Stephen Kay
Starring Barry Watson, Emily Deschanel
Sony
Rated PG-13
89 mins.
Grade D-

COURTESY SCREENGEMS

Watson's flick "Boogeyman" is typical in the sense that it uses small children and invented demons for cheap scares. The film runs in the same vein as recent movies like "The Ring" and "The Grudge".

Hit Factory closes after years of success

Industry reps say old school out, digital in

By Rivka Bukowsky and Tracy Connor
New York Daily News

NEW YORK — The Hit Factory, the famed Manhattan music studio where John Lennon spent his last hours, Bruce Springsteen laid down tracks for "Born in the U.S.A.," and Whitney Houston hit her highest notes, is shutting its doors.

Doomed by the digital revolution, the rock 'n' roll temple's owners said on Thursday that they will move their West 54th Street headquarters to a smaller facility in Miami within a month.

The news saddened industry veterans and employees of The Hit Factory, which for three decades has been home to music royalty from Barbra Streisand to Beyonce.

"Every major artist has worked here," studio tech Luis Ghigliotty, 52, said outside the building, where the hallways are lined with platinum records.

Music producer Jerry Ragovoy opened the studio on West 48th Street in 1968, initially as a place in the city where his own artists could record.

Pretty soon, other musicians were clamoring to work there, and Ragovoy began renting the room to the likes of Roberta Flack and Iron Butterfly.

"The studio was a Who's Who of rock 'n' roll," Ragovoy said. "Before you knew it, the calls were coming in all day long, and I found it difficult to book time myself."

In 1975, he sold the place to Ed Germano, who eventually moved it six blocks uptown to a plush 100,000-square-foot facility with seven recording rooms and five mastering suites.

Under Germano's ownership, the studio lived up to its name.

Stevie Wonder, his first customer, recorded some of "Songs in the Key of Life" there. Springsteen, Eric Clapton, Paul Simon, Madonna and David Bowie were regulars.

Lennon and Yoko Ono set up shop at The Hit Factory when they recorded "Double Fantasy." The ex-Beatle was on his way home from the studio when he was murdered in 1980.

In 1994, The Hit Factory made musical history when it collected 41 Grammy nominations for songs recorded, mastered or mixed there, including Houston's soundtrack for "The Bodyguard."

Germano believed the key to his success was his willingness to cater to any artist, unknowns and superstars alike.

He would fly equipment across the Atlantic on a day's notice or rip up a carpet if a singer didn't like the color. He once put 40 bales of hay in a studio to make a country singer feel comfortable.

The Hit Factory's streak was hottest in the 1970s and 1980s, but it remained one of the top studios in the hip-hop era even becoming a battlefield in the rap wars when 50 Cent was stabbed outside in 2000.

Germano, who died in 2003, also expanded to Miami, merging with Criteria Studios, which will be the company's new base.

Big-name studios like The Hit Factory once had a lock on the recording industry, but technological advances have made it cheaper and easier for stars to build their own state-of-the-art facilities, often in their homes.

In a statement, The Hit Factory acknowledged the industry is moving away from large-scale studios to "destination" locations like Miami that offer sunny weather and a hot nightlife.

COURTESY OF WIKIPEDIA.ORG

John Lennon was one of many artists to record at the Hit Factory. He was shot and killed after leaving the recording studio in 1980.

HAMPSHIRE FITNESS club
JOIN NOW!
Winter Special
15 Week Student Special $179
What do you get?
*New Indoor Cycling *Indoor Tennis
*Full sized indoor pool *Cardio
*Aqua aerobics *Saunas
*Cybex Nautilus circuit *Jacuzzi
*Cybex free weights *Yoga/Pilates
*Full court Basketball *Aerobics/Step/Bosu
*Volleyball
Competitive Basketball
Mon. & Thurs. Evenings
Competitive volleyball
Wed. & Sat.
ON THE BUS ROUTE

Discover Your LOVER
The Collegian Dating Game
HERE'S YOUR CHANCE TO PLAY
MATCHMAKER!
We've rounded up 3 Men and 3 Women.
You will decide who will date whom!
Get to know these single people in the Arts & Living Section
Look for the Men today & the Women tomorrow
You pair them up...
We'll send them on their dates and let you know how it goes!
(Pair them up online at www.dailycollegian.com)

$2.50 Bacardi Drink Specials
BACARDI GRAS
1/2 Price on All Appetizers!
MAXIMUM Capacity SPORTS BAR
TONIGHT Bacardi Girls & Giveaways!!
Only 20 Minutes From Campus
WWW.MAXIMUMSPORTSBAR.COM
1970 Memorial Drive Chicopee, MA

Pats will face challenges of change next season

By Dave Goldberg
Associated Press

JACKSONVILLE, Fla. — Deion Branch needed just five little words to explain why the New England Patriots have won three of the last four Super Bowls.

Asked Monday if he had any thoughts of leaving the team when he becomes a restricted free agent, the Super Bowl MVP replied: "My home is in Foxboro."

Then, referring to team owner Robert Kraft, Branch added: "I'm proud of the family that Mr. Kraft has built."

An emphasis on winning over money is what drives the Patriots to success in an era when free agency and the salary cap force major turnover at most teams each season.

Next season's Patriots certainly will be different than this season's. The biggest losses are not players but coaches: Offensive coordinator Charlie Weis is the new head coach at Notre Dame, and defensive coordinator Romeo Crennel accepted the Cleveland Browns' head coaching job immediately after Sunday night's game.

Crennel's move, which gives the NFL a record six black head coaches, was hardly a secret. As the Patriots' 24-21 win over Philadelphia was ending, coach Bill Belichick put his arms around his two top aides in a gesture of affection and appreciation.

They will be hard to replace.

"Romeo and Charlie have done a great job. A lot of the success we've had should go to them," Belichick said Monday. "I've been with them both a long time. I go back to 1981 with Romeo and I'll miss both of them a lot."

The Patriots might, too.

Next season, they will be seeking to become the first team to win three straight Super Bowls and the first to win four in five seasons.

The San Francisco 49ers came closest to three NFL titles in a row, winning the 1989 and 1990 Super Bowls, then losing the next NFC championship game on a last-second field goal by the New York Giants' Matt Bahr.

That New York team, which went on to beat Buffalo in the 1991 Super Bowl, had a coaching staff headed by Bill Parcells and including Belichick, Crennel and Weis, along with future NFL head coaches Tom Coughlin, Al Groh and Ray Handley. Two of the players on that team are also coaches and are reportedly on Crennel's wish list for his staff with the Browns: Pepper Johnson, New England's defensive line coach, and Maurice Carthon, the offensive coordinator in Dallas under Parcells.

Belichick's first order of business, therefore, is rebuilding his coaching staff, although he will take at least a week off, traveling to California for the AT&T Pebble Beach National Pro-Am.

Most of the core players, however, should be back, although some are getting up there in age, notably linebacker Willie McGinest and safety Rodney Harrison, both of whom have played major roles in the team's success. Harrison, who had two interceptions in Sunday's game, will turn 33 next December, when McGinest will turn 34.

One member of the Patriots unlikely to return is cornerback Ty Law, who missed the second half of the season with a broken foot after quarreling with the team over his contract in training camp.

And while Belichick indicated that the team will spend the next few weeks renegotiating contracts for salary-cap purposes, Law's deal is unlikely to be among them. With rookie Randall Gay and second-year player Asante Samuel at cornerback, the Patriots obviously did well without him; after Eugene Wilson left the Super Bowl just before halftime with an arm injury, they played the second half with Harrison as the only regular starter in the secondary.

Terrell Owens exhibits humble attitude in loss

By George Diaz
Knight Ridder Newspapers

JACKSONVILLE, Fla. — A man sometimes viewed as an egotistical, insufferable lout stepped onto the biggest sports stage in America and praised an unlikely source of inspiration: God.

"I just want to thank God for this opportunity," Owens said after a superb game in Super Bowl XXXIX, his first action in six weeks. "He allowed me to come back and play this game when nobody in the world gave me a chance. He put me on the biggest platform ever. I tried to tell a lot of people from Day One that I was going to be able to come back."

Besieged by negative chatter speculating he would not play, Owens caught nine passes for 122 yards in a 24-21 loss to the New England Patriots. Owens' recuperative powers had been the subject of much conjecture during Super Bowl week. Owens had not played since suffering a severe high ankle sprain and fractured fibula Dec. 19 against the Dallas Cowboys. At the time of the injury, Owens had 77 receptions and an NFL-leading 14 touchdowns.

The T.O. factor was significant moments after kickoff.

Donovan McNabb broke out of the pocket, scrambling to his left before throwing his first pass to Owens, but it was out of bounds.

Set on the far left against corner Randall Gay, Owens went into motion and caught his first pass for 5 yards. He then caught a 9-yard reception during Philadelphia's second possession.

In the fourth quarter, Owens caught a 10-yard slant route, cut up the field and gained 36 yards. But on the next play, Ted Bruschi intercepted a McNabb pass, effectively ending any comeback hopes for the Eagles.

"We came up short," Owens said. "Obviously we had a lot of turnovers against a good defense. My hat goes off to the New England Patriots."

Although he participated in only light drills in practices, Owens missed Saturday's walk-through. Normally not a big deal-he was kept out for precautionary reasons-it raised the rabble-rabble level again.

Dr. Mark Myerson, the surgeon who operated on Owens' right ankle in December, did not give him clearance to play.

Owens would have none of that, insisting he was going to suit up, assuming he felt no significant physical limitations.

"The doctor-I give him all the respect in the world," Owens said. "You guys believed what he said that I couldn't play. A lot of people in the world didn't believe I could play, but my faith all alone-the power of prayer and the power of faith carried me all the way. Nothing is impossible when God is one your side."

Although the Eagles offense averaged 25.4 points in 14 games with Owens in the offense, they scored 27 points in their two playoff victories without Owens.

The Patriots would not be nearly as accommodating defensively, but Owens pushed on despite gaining even more attention when wide receiver Todd Pinkston went out because of leg cramps in the third quarter.

"You have to tip your hat off for a guy with that kind of toughness," teammate Lito Sheppard said of Owens. "He made the plays when we went to him."

Miller running the show for U.S. skiing skiing's five disciplines. He won combined and giant slalom gold medals two years ago in St. Moritz, Switzerland, to go with his super-G and downhill titles in Bormio.

MILLER from page 8

Fans felt a mix of horror and amusement upon learning the 27-year-old lost his gold medal for the combined from the 2003 worlds after using it to hold up the toilet seat at his apartment in Patsch, Austria.

Hours after winning the super-G gold in Bormio, he lost that one, too. The medal was in the pocket of his jacket, which apparently was taken while he was celebrating his victory at USA House - where American team members go for recreation and publicity events. The medal was returned to the bar staff there, but his jacket is still missing.

"I think in some ways Bode's in a lot of people's heads because he operates a little differently," said U.S. men's speed coach John McBride. "He's not your standard person or athlete. He operates in his own way, and his view on things is a lot different. It's skewed a little differently."

Miller again was the center of attention when he and Rahlves played up their Super Bowl rivalry, with the New Englander cheering on the Patriots and Californian Rahlves supporting the Eagles, and USA House was the place to be in Bormio early Monday morning.

With a red baseball cap perched on his head and a beer in his hand, Miller sat up front, oblivious to the hundreds of people crammed inside. The game didn't start until after midnight.

"Yeah, I was there until the end, and then a little more. I was out pretty late," Miller said.

Miller likened his ability to perform under pressure to that of Patriots quarterback Tom Brady.

"You can't see that he has good focus, good intensity, he's good at executing and he's one of the guys you'd like to take the pressure," Miller said. "He wants the responsibility of deciding whether his team wins or loses, but at the end of the day he's really doing it for himself, too. He's trying to lead his team.

"That's sort of what I was talking about with Darun and myself," Miller said. "We're probably two guys you would pick to take that pressure and execute."

BOB JORDAN/SUN VALLEY WORLD CUP SKIING

Bode Miller, America's top skiier, is tryng to do what no American has done since 1983, win the World Cup of skiing. Miller already leads in the standing and most recently won gold in the slalom event.

Dillon finally silences his critics

By Fred Goodall
Associated Press

JACKSONVILLE, Fla.— Selfish. Malcontent. Troublemaker.

Corey Dillon has heard all the critical words used to describe him during seven productive, but mostly unfulfilling years in Cincinnati.

After one season with the New England Patriots, he's added a more appealing moniker.

"They can call me whatever they want to. Right now I am a Super Bowl champion," Dillon said after Sunday night's 24-21 victory over the Philadelphia Eagles.

Labeled a bad teammate with the Bengals, Dillon proved his critics wrong this season by being a perfect fit for a New England team that has thrived on unselfishness while becoming the second franchise to win three Super Bowl in four years.

Many questioned the wisdom of trading for Dillon during the offseason, however the eight-year pro never considered the possibility he and the Patriots might not be a good match.

Dillon set out quietly to repair his reputation, and wound up posting a Patriots record and career-high 1,635 yards rushing. He did his part against the Eagles, too, gaining 75 yards on 18 carries and scoring on a 2-yard run.

The seven-time 1,000-yard rusher also had three receptions for 31 yards.

"This is what I came here for," Dillon said, struggling to find the words to describe his feelings.

"It really hasn't hit me yet. Maybe in a couple of days. ... It has been a long, long time since I felt like this. I have been in a lot of championship games from Pop Warner to junior college to high school, and never won the big game. Tonight, we won the big one."

Dillon rushed for over 100 yards in nine of 15 regular season games he played. He averaged 4.2 yards per carry against the Eagles, combining with backup Kevin Faulk (eight carries, 38 yards) to give the Patriots just enough of a running attack to take some of the pressure off quarterback Tom Brady.

"I'm so happy for him," said Patriots safety Rodney Harrison, who sealed the victory with an interception.

Dillon earned the nickname "Clock-Killin' Dillon" when he ran for 144 yards in New England's second-round playoff victory over Indianapolis. He didn't dominate the Super Bowl, however his TD finished a long drive that snapped a 14-14 tie less than 2 minutes into the fourth quarter.

"I was thinking we need some more points. They (Philadelphia) are a threat to score at any time. The only thing that was on my mind was trying to get the points to help the team win," said Dillon, who had never appeared in a playoff game before this season.

The 30-year-old said all he needed was the right situation to bring out the best in him.

"God put me in a good place and surrounded me with good people. This whole thing has been a true blessing. ... This is what it is all about," Dillon said.

"I had fun. For the first time in my career, I enjoyed every minute of the season. To actually come here and be the Super Bowl champions is awesome."

Somebody asked where he was a year ago, when the Patriots were winning the second of their three titles and he had just finished one of the most frustrating seasons of his career.

STSTRAVEL.COM
Join America's #1 Student Tour Operator
CANCUN ACAPULCO JAMAICA BAHAMAS FLORIDA
SPRING BREAK 2005!
Sell Trips, Earn Cash & Travel Free
1-800-648-4849 www.ststravel.com

THE ATLANTIC 10 SHOOTOUT
WIN $10,000
QUALIFYING EVENT THURSDAY, MAR. 3 6:00 PM CURRY HICKS CAGE
CO-ED CHAMPIONSHIP SATURDAY, MAR. 5 2:00 PM MULLINS CENTER
FREE to STUDENTS
Free: Food, Drinks, T-shirts and more...
Win Airline Tickets!
Firestone GMAC Pontiac XBOX
WWW.ATLANTIC10.ORG/SHOOTOUT
or visit the Intramural office for more details
COLEBRAN SPALDING

Dance Stuff
Starting a dance class?
Go to Dance Stuff for all your dancing needs
220 Pleasant Street
253.5201

UMASS HOCKEY vs. UNH WILDCATS
Saturday • Feb. 12th
7:00pm
Mullins Center
Big Y
Show your BIG Y Express Savings Club Card and Receive a FREE Program
MULLINS CENTER
MASSACHUSETTS MINUTEMEN
STUDENT TICKETS FREE!

Mills works her way to start

MILLER from page 10

made sure I was ready to play and I think that showed in how we came out today."

Mills hard work in practice obviously was recognized by Dacko, but it also did not go unnoticed by her teammates.

"Kate's been working really hard lately," guard Katie Nelson said. "She definitely earned her spot in the starting lineup."

While Sunday's game may have cemented Mills' role on the team, it is not as if she hasn't been contributing all season. She has logged substantial minutes in a number of games and has been a consistent scoring threat off the bench.

"It's something I took on," she said of her role as a bench player. "Everyone coming off the bench is just as important as the starting five. I'm just lucky I could contribute today and in previous games."

On Jan. 4 Mills was named the A-10 Rookie of the Week for her play during two league games. Mills scored a career-high 14 points in a loss to Temple and contributed six points in a win over LaSalle.

"She's come off the bench in some big games and given us some points and some rebounds and toughness," Nelson said. "She's a hard worker and I'm glad to have her on the team this year."

Mills acknowledged the difference from being a reserve and a starter, but said she embraces either role as long as the team is winning.

"There's definitely a difference," Mills said of being a starter. "When you're on the bench you get to see how the game's going. When you start you have to get the game going. It's definitely a different mentality. I'm just happy we're winning. As long as that continues that's all that matters to me."

It took Mills 21 games to break into the starting lineup, but her track record indicates that she is likely there to stay.

Mills joined UMass after an outstanding high school career at Ursuline (Del.) Academy. During her senior year, Mills was named the Delaware Gatorade Player of the Year and received honorable mention as a McDonald's All-American. With a resume like that it was clear that Mills would become a key component of the UMass squad. That day seems to have arrived, and now that she has assumed a larger role, Dacko doesn't expect her to relinquish it.

"I expect a lot from her," Dacko said. "Recruiting her she was one of the players I wanted on this team and in the program. She's got a nose for the game and she's a competitor."

Freshman Kate Mills braces for a layup against St. Bonaventure on Sunday. Mills, who has been a contributer off the bench, had her first start.

Miller dominates skiing world

By Erica Bulman
Associated Press

BORMIO, Italy — Bode Miller has turned the Alpine Skiing World Championships into his personal playground.

Hailed by Italian newspapers as the "Cowboy of the Snow," he already has two golds and the chance for more medals in the next few days. In the only event he failed to win, he lost a ski - and then thrilled fans by sliding down the course on just one ski.

"Bode, we're crazy for you," proclaim banners draped on homes here.

Miller came into the world championships leading the World Cup standings, vying to become the first American since Phil Mahre in 1983 to win the overall title. And his dominance in Alpine skiing has grown during the past 1 1/2 weeks in Bormio.

Miller shocked the powerful Austrian team by winning gold in the super-giant slalom to open the world championships. And he won the downhill this weekend, with U.S. teammate Daron Rahlves second.

"Obviously I'd love to have as many medals as events I'm skiing in," Miller said. "I know myself. When it comes to the big day I don't mess it up. If I do mess it up, it's because I was going for it."

Even when he messes up, Miller is still the story.

In Thursday's combined event, he lost a ski just 15 seconds into the morning's downhill leg, but turned catastrophe into comedy, stealing the spotlight with a rollicking one-legged descent. The following day, European papers ran full-sequence photo spreads of his stunt.

"This is great for the sport. Bode is exciting, dominant, good-looking," said former downhill racer Ken Read, a Canadian who won five World Cup events. "He's the best skier in the world and for all of us on that side of the ocean it's nice to see that."

If Miller can add Saturday's slalom title, he would become the first skier to win a world title in each of

See MILLER on page 7

MacArthur finishes record-setting sail

By Krystyna Rudzki
Associated Press

LONDON — Ellen MacArthur has endured stormy seas, 65 mph winds, a broken sail, burns, bruises and exhaustion - even a close encounter with a whale. The payoff: a solo around-the-world sailing record.

The 28-year-old Englishwoman completed the 26,000-mile circumnavigation at 5:29 p.m. EST on Monday by crossing an imaginary finish line between Ushant, France, and the Lizard peninsula in Cornwall on the south coast of England.

Her final time was 71 days, 14 hours, 18 minutes and 33 seconds, her control team said.

Her 75-foot trimaran B&Q broke the record set by Francis Joyon, who set the mark of 72 days, 22 hours, 54 minutes and 22 seconds, in February 2004.

MacArthur, who planned to come ashore in Falmouth later, where a large media group was waiting, told supporters she was physically and mentally exhausted.

"I can't wait to get in. It's been a very, very long trip and an exceptionally hard one," she wrote on her Web site early Monday. "I'll be glad to be crossing that finish line and finally feeling a little bit of relief."

When she was done, MacArthur was congratulated by Prince Charles and British sailing great Sir Robin Knox-Johnston.

"We have all watched your progress with the greatest possible excitement over the last 71 days ... the whole of the United Kingdom is, I know, delighted by your success," the prince said in a statement.

"Ellen has done superbly, it is an outstanding effort," said 65-year-old Knox-Johnston, who made history in 1969 when he became the first person to sail single-handedly around the world nonstop in 312 days.

"When Francis Joyon beat the record last year he took three weeks off the old time and that was mammoth. Then I thought that record would stand for years and now Ellen has come in and broken it," Knox-Johnston said.

MacArthur's journey began Nov. 28. Since then, she has slept an average of 30 minutes at a time and four hours in any day. She has reheated freeze-dried meals on a single burner stove while living area measuring 5 feet by 6 1/2 feet. Her water supply is desalinated from the sea.

She spent Christmas Day in a storm, but after crossing the halfway mark at Cape Horn on New Year's Eve she built a four-day lead on the pace set by rival Francis Joyon. A week later, during the worst storms of MacArthur's career, she badly burned her arm on a generator. MacArthur twice had to climb the 98-foot mast to repair mainsail damage.

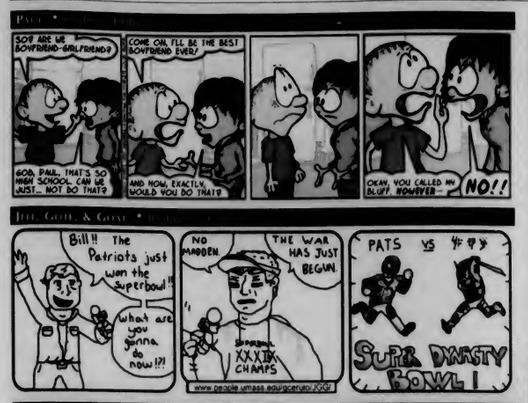
"What I have done wrong to deserve this?" she wrote in an e-mail Jan. 20. "Everything we worked so hard for we are losing. It is so unfair. It has never been so hard."

Struggling in bad weather, MacArthur fell a day behind Joyon. By late January, she was back in contention after crossing the equator. Her 75-foot boat hit a large fish and nearly struck a whale, and then light winds threatened. A storm helped push her back in the lead.

The around-the-world record has been attempted only five times in a multihull, the fastest and most extreme class of boats on the ocean. Only one person has been successful - Joyon, who set the mark of 72 days, 22 hours, 54 minutes and 22 seconds, in February 2004.

Joyon, a Frenchman, set his record in a 90-feet trimaran, IDEC. He broke the record of 93 days, 3 hours and 57 minutes set by Michel Desjoyeaux in the 2000-01 around-the-world Vendee Globe race, which is contested by 60-foot monohulls.

MacArthur grew up in landlocked Derbyshire in northern England. Her love of the sea began when she went sailing with her aunt in a dinghy at age 4. She then spent years reading about sailing while saving money from her school lunches to buy her own dinghy at 13. By 18, MacArthur had sailed solo around Britain, the stepping-stone to competitive sailing.



In February 2001, MacArthur became the fastest woman and youngest person to sail alone around the world. She finished second in the Vendee Globe race, taking just more than 94 days.

She was greeted in France by 35,000 people lining the coast. British Prime Minister Tony Blair called to congratulate her and she finished second to English soccer star David Beckham in a sports personality of the year award.

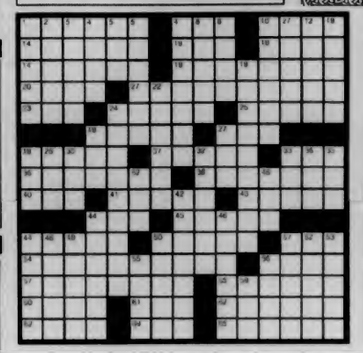
In 2003 MacArthur failed in a bid to set the fastest nonstop circumnavigation of the globe when her mast broke in the Indian Ocean. Last June, shortly before embarking on her latest venture, MacArthur fell 75 minutes short of a solo trans-Atlantic record.

Now a record of a different sort belongs to her.

Quote of the Day

"Cinema is the most beautiful fraud in the world."

—Jean-Luc Godard



ACROSS
1 Picturesque
7 Horned viper
10 Slovenly one
14 Extravagant
15 Type of shooter
16 St. Petersburg's river
17 Perplexing puzzle
18 Forgave
20 Engrave
21 Light dusting
23 Small child
24 Transmission components
25 Feel
26 Hospital staff member
27 TV adjunct
28 Follow immediately
31 Stan's partner in comedy
33 Easter treat
36 Programming language
38 Loss of memory
40 Tango number
41 Steps element
43 Lees
44 Disencumbered
45 Sights setter
47 Ruthless
50 Pixel
51 Aussie bird
54 Fabric treatments
56 Scent
57 Two-handed praise
58 Numero uno
60 Unrestrained
61 Ave. crossers
62 Whole
63 Mary ___ Lincoln
64 Successor of FDR
65 Sow anew

DOWN
1 Frozen raindrops
2 Pound poem part
3 Kick out
4 Close by, old-style
5 Decline
6 Shot follower
7 Attire
8 Resting spots
9 Separate
10 Noisy sleeper
11 Last name in Communism
12 Stoves compartments
13 Sherrill's ID
19 Came down
22 Stonecutters
24 Type of warfare
26 Eccentric person
27 ___ and vigor
28 Immature newt
29 Immediately
30 Full house sign
32 Lassie
33 Wind dir.
34 Young of Hollywood
35 Argon or neon
37 Assist
39 Blunder
42 Seriously determined
44 Staggered
46 Man's title
47 Vessel
48 Camera-ready proof
49 Raised, as the ante
50 Outerwear
51 Fisher or Murphy
52 Actress Dern
53 Recommended strongly
55 Opulent
56 Makes a choice
58 Small bill

Find today's answers online
www.dailycollegian.com

THE HARP
NEW!! Wireless Internet
OCMP & All Credit Cards accepted
Irish Pub
February Special!
$1.50 PBR Bottles; Honey Brown, Molson
$2.00 A pint / $6.50 a pitcher
TUES. ·Tonight is Trivia Night! starting @ 9pm
WED. ·Busted Vacuum
THU. ·Apollo Sunshine
FRI. ·Irish Sesiun
"Come Party Like You're Irish!"
413-548-6900 www.theharp.net
163 Sunderland Rd. · N. Amherst
Just north of the apartments

Want to increase the size of your Piggy bank?
Advertise with The Daily Collegian
and watch your profits grow
Contact our advertising dept. 545-3500

H·O·R·O·S·C·O·P·E·S

aquarius • Jan. 20-Feb. 18
The camera loves you. You are a ginger god/goddess.

pisces • Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Your mind is all over the place. You won't be getting any reading done.

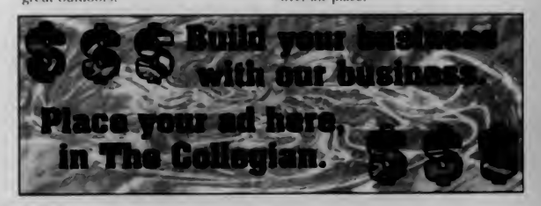
aries • Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Don't knock something until you've tried it. Put some ketchup on those eggs.

taurus • Apr. 20-May 20
Today you might just see your favorite person in the DC.

gemini • May 21-Jun. 21
Your cell phone is going to die midday, and you'll miss so many phone calls.

cancer • Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Go hiking. Follow the call of the great outdoors.

leo • Jul. 23-Aug. 22
Laugh at your little inner secret. Everyone will think you're crazy, but who cares?



virgo • Aug. 23-Sept. 22
It's time to stop singing Coldplay, even though you love it.

libra • Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Spend your whole paycheck on a new spring wardrobe.

scorpio • Oct. 23-Nov. 21
You can control the pain with your mind, if you want to.

sagittarius • Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Don't worry about you new haircut. You totally rock the fringe.

capricorn • Dec. 22-Jan. 19
You can't go around spilling granola all over the place.

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

ACTIVITIES

Foam party Montreal weekends $89 Montreal Express.Net 1(781)979-9001

ANNOUNCEMENTS

$600 Group Fundraiser Scheduling Bonus 4 hours of your group's time PLUS our free (yes, free) fundraising solutions EQUALS $1,000-$2,000 in earnings for your group. Call TODAY for a $450 bonus when you schedule your non-sales fundraiser with CampusFundraiser. Contact CampusFundraiser, (888)923-3238, or visit www.campusfundraiser.com

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Center of town, 1, 2, 3 bedrooms; hardwood floors. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Brandywine Apts. Now Leasing, 1&2 bedroom apts. Leases begin Jun, July, Aug or Sep. First come, first serve. Get them while they last. www.brandywine-apts.com stop by or call 549-0600

Amherst two bedroom condo on busline. 875+. Call Paul 413-687-1416

1 bedroom available North Amherst $425 includes heat & electric, bright, clean, washer/dryer in Condo on bus route 1 mile to UMass female preferred Call Liz 508-367-8893

Hobart Condos 3 bedroom, hardwood floors, study area in basement. Cable, telephone (internet access) in all bedrooms and study. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Sunderland 2 bedroom townhouse on busline 830+, Call Erica 413-665-7794

AUTO FOR SALE

1999 Toyota Camry fully loaded. 75K, Mint condition. Call 413-348-4191

1993 Toyota Tercel Coup. Economical, reliable. $1275.00 582-9103

CHILDCARE

Babysitter 3 year old Ivy afternoon/evenings Amherst 413-256-3084

Early Riser Needed
7:00am to 8:15pm 2 to 4 days a week. Occasional afternoon and Evenings. For 8yr old girl. $10.00 an hr. Please call 584-8312 maria.gallo@umassmed.edu

EMPLOYMENT

Earn some money! Rent us your ears! Listening experiments $8/Hr 413-545-6837 phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu

Make money taking online surveys earn $10 to $125 for surveys. Earn $25 to $250 for focus groups www.cashforstudents.com/umass

Nanny position for 2 boys ages 6 & 9. Perfect schedule for student. Part time Spring. Full time Summer. Prior experience necessary. 413-625-2288

Earn lots of $$ and have fun on the water this Spring & Summer. Raft guides needed at Crab Apple Whitewater in Charlemont, MA. Fun Summer job, no experience necessary. We will train. 413-625-2288.

EMPLOYMENT

PCA needed in Northampton $10/hr. Reliable car necessary. Laundry, Shopping, Cooking, Cleaning. Please call Linda Gaffney at 586-0029

Movie extras, actors, models! Make $100-$300/day. No experience required. FT/PT. All looks needed! 1800-340-5949 Ext. 1054

"Bartending" $300/Day Potential. No Experience Nes.. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

HOUSE FOR RENT

South Deerfield Center on bus route newly renovated 2 bedroom $1000 per month plus utilities and security deposit 413-498-5148

MISCELLANEOUS

Earn $4000, become an egg donor. www.reproductivequestamx.com or 513-831-9207

ROOM FOR RENT

350 per month 413-335-5226

SERVICES

Have you been ripped off by a retailer? Contact the Student Legal Services Office Regarding Your Rights as a Consumer. 922 Campus Center, 545-1995.

Need Just Evacuation and Repatriation Coverage? Check out BETA! $250,000 Evacuation, $25,000 Repatriation COST is $18 for 6 MONTHS! Online enrollment, emailed verification of coverage www.betins.com

SERVICES

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst-area for free testing and assistance 549-1906

Computer Consultants $20/hr we come to your dorm/house Certified technicians. Call Kris (413) 253-0215

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth control, and Emergency Contraception. Affordable and confidential. STI Screening and Treatment. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 549-0992.

TRAVEL

#1 Spring Break Vacations! Cancun, Jamaica, Acapulco, Bahamas, & Florida! Best Parties, Best Hotels, Best Prices! Limited Space! 1-800-234-7007 www.endlesssummertours.com

TRAVEL

XXX Night Montreal Weekends $89 Montreal Express.net 1(781)979-9001

Spring Break 2005 Only 6 weeks left. Lowest Prices Biggest Parties Earn 2 Free Trips Exclusive with Sun Splash Tours www.sunsplashtours.com 1800-426-7710

Bahamas Spring Cruise 5 Days $299! Includes Meals, Celebrity Parties! Panama City, Daytona $159! Cancun, Jamaica, Acapulco, Nassau $499! Award Winning Company! SpringBreakTravel.com 1-800-678-6386

WANTED

Snowboard events intern $50/day stipend. For job description email jfriends@deerfield.edu

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS TUESDAY

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 2005 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

A fresh look in the post

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

Talk about making the most of an opportunity.

Freshman Kate Mills got her first career start for the Massachusetts women's basketball team on Sunday and made an immediate impact in a 69-58 win over St. Bonaventure.

Mills was among the five starters in double figures for the Minutewomen, tallying 11 points while manning the low post for UMass. Mills played 33 minutes, the most she has all season, and delivered a solid all-around performance. Along with the 11 points, Mills registered six rebounds, three steals, three assists, and a block.

Mills' playing time has varied game-to-game so far this year, but UMass coach Marnie Dacko believes moving Mills into the starting lineup gives UMass (12-9, 5-5 Atlantic-10) its best starting five.

"I think she did an admirable job inside (against St. Bonaventure)," Dacko said. "She's got a great post presence, she can finish inside, and she can finish outside. She's done a great job at practice everyday. She's very coachable and she's just going to get better everyday."

If Mills continues to perform as she did on Sunday she can expect to continue to see expanded playing time.

"I think it has to," Dacko said when asked if Mills will continue to see an increase in playing time. "Early on she didn't get the minutes because she wasn't in physical shape. Now as she plays more she's in better physical shape and that's why she warrants the minutes."

Mills got her break by working hard in practice, which is something she will continue to do as she looks to secure her spot in the starting lineup.

"Everyone's been practicing really hard," Mills said. "We had a great week of practice so anybody could have stepped up in that spot. I was just privileged to get in there. All my teammates supported me and

See MILLS on page 8

Freshman forward Kate Mills tries to make an entry pass during the Minutewomen's 69-58 victory over St. Bonaventure on Sunday afternoon. Mills had 11 points and six rebounds in her first start for UMass.

Rudy signs on two of nation's best recruits

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

There's no doubt that last season's recruiting class was going to be a tough act to follow for Massachusetts women's soccer.

UMass women's soccer Class of 2008 has everything. It's got some of the fastest legs in the Atlantic 10 (Britt Canfield), a hard-nosed and gritty defender (Tina Rodriguez), a sniper of a midfielder (Jenny Roehrig), plus a score of potential in the backfield (Kaelyn Caldwell, Caitlin Footit, Christina Nunes, Vanessa Lima). Moreover, they've got plenty of time to not only mesh as a unit, but alot of room to improve their already-stellar skills.

Nonetheless, the Class of 2009 will surely be bringing more firepower to a squad that is returning ten of its starters.

Coach Jim Rudy continued to bring in the cream of the crop last February 2, signing two nationally-heralded elites to National Letters of Intent.

"I feel we've brough in blue chip material with this recruiting class," Rudy said.

And it'd be tough to argue against, considering the prestige these two athletes carry with them. On one there is Vanessa Patry, an All-American and member of the Olympic development team; on the other is Melissa Toulouse, captain of the No. 1 high-school team in the nation.

A native of Delmar, N.Y., Patry is a versatile forward/midfielder that can play anywhere—literally. When she was moved from forward to center midfield her senior year at Bethlehem High School, Patry responded with an amazing 15 goal, 21 assist season. A National Soccer Coaches Association of America (NSCAA)/Adidas All-American, and the Troy Record's Offensive Player of the Year, Patry is a member of the Region I U.S. Olympic Development team—as a defender.

A five-year member of the team's varsity, Patry also leaves Bethlehem as the all-time leader in points, goals and assists. She was also a member of the Capital United, a club team.

Standing at 5-foot-9, she is a great player in the air, something UMass was missing in 2004.

"Looking back at the goals we gave up this year, there was an inordinate amount scored from crosses and balls that weren't cleared," Rudy said. "Vanessa's a versatile player, we like her as a frontrunner. She's a good-sized kid, I found her to be an excellent target player, and she is very good in the air."

As captain of the Bishop O'Connell High School Lady Knights, the top-ranked team in the nation, defender and Arlington, VA. native is a hard tackler, and brings alot of intensity to a defense that showed waves of fury in 2004.

"Melissa reminds me alot of T-Rod [Tina Rodriguez]," Rudy said. "They're similar in the way they attack the ball. She's got size, fighting power, tenacity, and quickness. She's got a bit of a bite to her."

A four-year letterwinner at Bishop O'Connell, the gritty defender was also a member of the Braddock Road Attack, a club team that was state champion in 2004 and Director's National Cup Champion. Like Patry, Toulouse is yet another tremendous air player.

While Rudy will be looking for Patry to help fill the shoes of departing senior Lindsay "Stormy" Fairweather, Toulouse adds depth to a defense that gained alot of experience as a young core in 2004.

So what brought such nationally-acclaimed talent to an up-and-coming program like UMass?

With local schools such as Richmond and American looking into her, there was something Toulouse loved about UMass.

"It was a perfect fit for me," Toulouse said. "The coach is a great guy, my hosts on my official visit [Roehrig and Rodriguez] made me feel really welcome, and it's a larger school, something I wanted.

"I read about the players, about the team, all the amazing players...Rudy is a great coach, they've had a few setbacks but they've got alot of potential, and I want to be a part of that."

Ski team off to hot start

By Eric Athas
Daily Collegian

As the heart of the winter season descends upon New England, the Massachusetts Men's skiing team is involved in one of its own. With a team built primarily of underclassmen, UMass looks to add to the success already accomplished up to this point in the season. Although skiing is not the primary focus on most peoples sports list, the team's talent and success speaks for itself.

The season began on January 14 when the team took part in the UMass and Smith Carnival, in which they placed first out of a total of ten teams.

Sophomore Rush Hawkins led the team by placing first with a time of 1:55.03. Following Hawkins was Patrick Bachant (1:59.08) and Marc Epstein (1:59.09) who pulled in at ninth and tenth place.

Between sixteenth and twenty-seventh place fell four UMass skiers who added a stable consistency to the meet. Those four skiers consisted of Jason Small (1:40.13; 16), Patrick Hofer (1:41.50; 19), James Green (1:42.60; 22) and Kevin Collins (1:43.90; 27).

The following week the team traveled to Waterville Valley in New Hampshire to participate in the Plymouth Carnival. Although the team did not match its first place finish the week before, they did manage to place second overall behind Plymouth State and ahead of Colby/Sawyer, Boston College and Babson. Once again it was Rush Hawkins who finished first with a time of 1:28.17 and finished ahead of sixty-five other skiers.

After Hawkins, Jason Small, Patrick Bachant and Patrick Hofer put in a respectable finish at 11th, twelfth and fifteenth. Kevin Collins finished at sixteenth place and James Green rounded out the top twenty. UMass came away with seven points, just one point behind Plymouth State.

The team is guided by three seniors, John Gray, Collins and Hofer, but is made up of five freshman, two sophomores, three juniors and three seniors. Hawkins has finished first overall three times this season and is the anchor of the team. With consistency and dependability following him, the team looks to have a respectable season. Former Maroon and White skier Ken Thoman leads this pack in his second season and hopes that he can keep his squad on their same path of success that they have experienced so far.

Thoman is currently in the midst of completing his bachelor's degree in exercise science at UMass and was an all-conference selection as a skier when he attended UMass as an undergraduate.

Next up, UMass heads to Ascutney, Vermont on February 12 to take on a number of schools at the Boston College Carnival. Last year, the team came away with a third-place finish at the USCSA National competition.

Women's track finishes fourth

By Ian Kilpatrick
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts women's track team bounced back from a sub-par performance at last week's meet with a strong team effort this past Saturday in Kingston, RI.

The Minutewomen placed fourth with a score of 98.9 and despite a fading chance at the conference title, it is clear that the team is headed in the right direction. Both the University of Rhode Island's men's and women's team defended their home track by coming in first place overall, the women's team winning by the slim margin of 2.5 points over in-state rival, Brown University. Coach Julie LaFreniere offered her optimistic words following the meet.

"I felt the team really turned things around and hey were much more competitive and much more willing to work as a team on Saturday," LaFreniere said. "I thought they all performed very well, which is good because that [Kingston] is where A-10 conference meet is going to be in two weeks."

Along with a satisfying team outcome there were many individual performances that stood out and gave LaFreniere good reason to stay positive. The individual accomplishments were highlighted by Christina Huff and Christina DeRosa.

Not only did Huff, a senior, come in first place in the 55 meter dash, but she qualified for the area's most elite post season tournament, the Eastern College Athletic Conference Championships (ECAC) with a season's best 7.24 second sprint. Huff scored a team high 16.5 points for the minutewomen. DeRosa, a freshman, ran away with an inpressive win in the 3000 meter event, while beating her career best by almost a full 5 seconds with a time of 10 minutes and 25 seconds.

The 3000 meter race was by far the teams strongest event as four in the maroon and white placed in the top five.

Another ECAC qualifier on Saturday was freshman Kristen Bakanowski who vaulted 3.60 meters, which was good enough for second place. Bakanowski tied the school's record earlier this season vaulting a stunning 12 feet. After being disappointed with her team's display last week LaFreniere expressed her satisfaction with the women's promising turnaround.

"I was pleased with the overall attitudes, the overall performances, and their hard work," LaFreniere mentioned.

The Minutewomen will have to continue with their hard work with the biggest meets of the year coming up in just a few weeks. Next week will be the last chance for individuals to qualify for the All-New England tournament held in Boston on Feb. 25 and 26, and the ECAC championship also in Boston on March 5 and 6.

Although not completely appeased with the results of the season so far, Coach LaFreniere maintains her upbeat outlook on the rest of the season and the years to come.

COURTESY KAREN WINGER

Freshman pole vaulter Kristen Bakanowski has been huge for UMass this year. Bakanowski has already tied the school vaulting record at 12 feet.

Boston set for Super Bowl parade today

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

FOXBORO — The New England Patriots will be welcomed back in Boston after their third Super Bowl title in four years with a "rolling rally" fashioned after a similar parade last fall for the World Series champion Boston Red Sox.

As the Patriots returned to suburban Foxboro and Gillette Stadium, Boston Mayor Tom Menino announced plans to parade Patriots players and coaches through city streets on Tuesday.

The victors in Sunday's Super Bowl in Jacksonville, Fla., will be on board a dozen World War II-era amphibious "Duck Boat" vehicles normally used to haul tourists around Boston. But with the Charles River [illegible] the parade route and [illegible] the streets and will run [illegible] the water-borne route that the Red Sox enjoyed after their [illegible] win.

"We can't use [illegible] at the Ducks," Menino said.

And, unlike the parades that followed the Patriots' Super Bowl victories last year and in 2002, the celebration of the Patriots' 24-21 victory [illegible] Philadelphia Eagles will not conclude with a stationary rally in City Hall Plaza.

The "rolling rally" concept that Menino described gives the public closer access to the players than a stationary rally the mayor said.

The [illegible] will begin in Boston's Back Bay section at the Hynes Convention Center. It will continue eastward along Boylston and Tremont streets before concluding near City Hall in downtown.

Audio equipment will be synchronized so that individual players can speak to the crowd from the parading vehicles, with that player's voice amplified from speakers on each duck boat.

The event is expected to last about two hours. The mayor did not offer a projection of the crowd size.

"We'll have a great celebration in the city of champions," Menino said.

The projected $100,000 cost to the city from security and other parade-related costs is expected to be defrayed in part by corporate sponsorships that city officials were lining up Monday, Menino said.

The Daily Collegian

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 2005 NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY • EST. 1890 VOLUME CXV ISSUE 76

Discover your lover: bachelorette's of UMass
ARTS & LIVING, PAGE 5

TODAY • High 44° • Low 29° | THURSDAY • High 33° • Low 18° | FRIDAY • High 35° • Low 18°
DAILY WEATHER FORECAST

UMass heading down to Rhode Island
SPORTS, PAGE 10

Author to speak about time with Grateful Dead

By Katherine Sullivan
Collegian Correspondent

He is the man behind the music ... actually he is the man in front of the music. Or, better yet, he is the man who pushes the band in front of the music. Either way, Dennis McNally spent 11 years pushing around the likes of Jerry Garcia and he has a thing or two to say about beatniks, the Grateful Dead, LSD and history.

The best-selling author and publicist for the Grateful Dead has tracked the radical subculture known as the "beat generation" from its beginnings in 1950's San Francisco to its unofficial end in a rehabilitation clinic with the death of Dead front man Garcia in 1995.

McNally will be visiting the University of Massachusetts, his alma mater, on tonight at 7:30 p.m. in Memorial Hall where he plans to discuss "Why Write History for the Public?"

With a Ph.D. in American History, McNally stands out from many of his colleagues in that he records history for the public, rather than comprising volume upon volume of history solely for other academics. This is evident in the New York Times Best-selling success of his second biography, "A Long Strange Trip: The Inside History of the Grateful Dead in 2002." Twenty three years earlier, McNally, published Desolate Angel chronicling the life of beatnik forefather and poet Jack Kerouac.

He has linked the poetic stature of Kerouac and the psychedelic era of the Grateful Dead, to compose a two volume history documenting the journey of Post WWII bohemian culture in America.

Young people of the early 1950s waded in the desperation left by WWII in which, according to John Cellon in his 1952 article "This is the Beat Generation," "the peace they inherited was only as secure as the next headline." What emerged from this feeling of being "beat" was a bright, exploratory cultural group called the Beatniks, who challenged established social constructions in their quest for a more spiritually intense experience.

McNally feels that studying his generation is more important now than ever in our culture marked by an "entire wave of oppression...that is similar to the fifties."

McNally says that you know you are a beatnik if "your library is bigger than your bank account" and "your annual clothing bill is somewhere around fifty bucks" yet "you do know how to drink red wine." More seriously, he said he believes that people live the beatnik mentality when "you decide that your life is about living and growing rather than getting money and spending money."

He set out to capture the essence and history of this generation using the life of Kerouac and The Dead to exemplify the culture of the time.

Newman Center continues to undergo massive renovations and improvements

By Allison Edles
Collegian Staff

The Newman Catholic Center began undergoing renovations three weeks ago to improve its facility, which will include a complete revamping of their cafeteria, installing an elevator and making the building more easily accessible for people with disabilities.

The Newman Center has served as a staple in the Roman Catholic Community at the University of Massachusetts and the town of Amherst for the past 40 years.

One main focus of the renovations is bringing the building up to code. "The building, which currently has 40-year old transformers, will be receiving an entirely new electrical system," said David Rondina, the Center's Business/Property Manager.

In addition to the electrical system, Rondina went on to add that "[the Center] will be receiving new boilers for heating. We recently got rid of those 45-year old monsters and received three new electronically-controlled boilers. It's a big capital improvement."

The renovations also include installing a new lighting system and setting up wireless Internet for the entire building. Fire doors, emergency lighting and new fire alarms will furthermore be set up in another attempt to help bring the building up to code.

The new features designed to help those members of the community with disabilities are also much-needed effects that the new building will have. "These days, we need good visual and audible systems for those with disabilities. Plus, we're adding a handicapped bathroom downstairs," said Rondina.

The renovations are estimated to cost around $1.3 million and will be highly funded by the Diocese of Springfield and private donors to the foundation of the Newman Center. The planning, funding and design for the restorations on the building have been under consideration for three and a half years.

"We encountered standard delays in acquiring a permit," said Rondina. "The Amherst Fire Department needed everything spelled out very intricately with regards to the electric plans and the designs of the hoods for cooking.

See NEWMAN on page 2

Construction work in and around the Newman Center is nearing completion. The revamped Center will feature an entirely new electrical system and cafe for visitors and students.

The Newman Center plans to re-open an improved Snack Bar.

Campaign for Amherst sets goals

By Brian Castro
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts at Amherst has launched its largest private fundraising campaign to in response to years of budget cuts from Beacon Hill.

Over the past several years UMass, lost over 100 professors and raised tuition in order to cover the budget shortfall.

The Campaign for Amherst, as it's called, aims to raise $350 million in seven years. The campus is still significantly below the level of state funding from where it was before the series of budget cuts that took place through last year.

While increases in student fees helped cover some of the loss of state dollars, the University also reduced spending by $20 million in order to balance its budget.

"Our budget is now balanced, but to maintain and enhance quality, we must increase our support from all sources, especially private gifts," Chancellor John Lombardi said.

Currently, UMass raises $25 to $30 million a year. The campaign hopes to double that amount. There will be a lot of priorities in the campaign, such as building the integrated science building, and new arts building and renovate the school of nursing. Those are being planned and a lot of support for that is going to be raised through the campaign.

The campaign is in its third year. Along with the campaign, Lombardi formed The University of Massachusetts Amherst Foundation, a private board of administrators faculty, alumni and donors who will advise and guide campaign efforts. Many of its members are all people who have made significant contributions to the campus which include Eugene Isenberg. The campaign for Amherst is raising money only for the UMass Amherst campus and not the rest of the UMass system.

"We want people to know that it's only for our campus. We're the flagship campus. We want to make sure that everybody is associating the campaign with us," said Jospeh Bartolomeo an English professor.

The campaign hasn't officially started yet. The Campaign for Amherst is in its "quiet phase," when there's mostly planning and larger donations. The public phase will start when more than half of the fundraising goal is met. In the public phase, the University will solicit smaller gifts and endowments from a larger group of donors. Part of the campaign will look to get more support from Alumni.

"We have a very good participation rate in alumni contributions but we just haven't asked them for money," said Bartolomeo.

"It's going to take a while to get to level of places like Michigan, California, and Virginia. We're not going to get there right away but it was certainly boost the University's profile," said Bartolomeo.

This is UMass' second major campaign. Former Chancellor David K. Scott led a previous campaign that raised about $130 million.

"The last campaign was successful. The problem was is that there wasn't any follow-up," said Bartolomeo.

UMass is getting into this business of private fundraising late. Most public universities have been doing this for decades and as a result, have endowments measured in the hundreds of millions and even a few billion dollars.

"No state is funding its public education the way states did 20 years ago. In every state there are unmet needs from public funding," said John Armstrong, UMass trustee. "They get a

See CAMPAIGN on page 3

UMass team gets grant to improve computers

By Sheyene Desiluer
Collegian Correspondent

A University of Massachusetts research team is working to improve the use of computers in secondary school learning environments through a $1.2 million grant from the National Science Foundation.

The educators are working on computer programming that will mimic learning through experience to provide an enriching educational experience for high school students. The team consists of computer science professors Beverly Woolf, Andrew Barto, Sridhar Mahadevan and Ivon Arroyo, along with the mechanical and industrial engineering department's Don Fisher. The research team has prior experience in developing intelligent tutors and also in artificial intelligence theory.

The basis for the programming mounts on the idea that the principal advantage of a human teacher is the ability to learn from past interactions with a student. A human teacher also is able to adapt to a learning style with the complementary methods and be responsive to a challenged student, the team points out. In order to make new virtual tutors more effective, the software benefits from concepts of artificial intelligence and machine learning.

The main goal is to develop computer sophistication that identifies student learning habits and responds with personalized individual lesson plans for each student. Woolf feels this feature will improve students attitudes towards studying. "Students will be more active and engaged if tutors can customize their responses to the student's learning needs."

In similar research, the National Science Foundation also funded Wayang Outpost, which prepares high school students for the SAT using a video gaming style of animation.

The project is lead by the psychology department's Carole Beal, who has worked on similar computer programs

See COMPUTERS on page 2

Mideast leaders talk face-to-face

By Lara Sukhtian
Associated Press

SHARM EL-SHEIK, Egypt — With a verbal cease-fire deal in hand, Israeli and Palestinian leaders met at a Mideast summit Tuesday for face-to-face talks and goodwill gestures aimed at ending four years of violence and entering a new era of peace talks.

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas went into a brief meeting about two hours after the summit began — their first since Abbas succeeded Yasser Arafat after his November death.

An invitation to both sides to meet separately with President Bush at the White House this spring added momentum on the summit's eve.

"Israel is willing to go very far and we're going to introduce today a package of confidence-building measures, incentives, to the Palestinians so that they could start this long journey on the road to peace, " said Ranaan

See MIDEAST on page 3

COURTESY CNN.COM

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas shake hands yesterday after a brief meeting after the Mideast summit began.

Karl Rove promoted to deputy chief of staff

By Deb Deichmann
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Karl Rove, the senior political strategist who orchestrated President Bush's re-election campaign, has been promoted to deputy chief of staff, a job that will involve him in most White House policy and not just politics.

Rove will retain his title as senior adviser and will continue to oversee strategy to advance the president's agenda. In addition, he will continue to oversee the offices of intergovernmental affairs, political affairs and strategic initiatives.

But he will add to his portfolio the oversight of all White House policy development and coordination of the Domestic Policy Council, the National Economic Council, the National Security Council and the Homeland Security Council, White House press secretary Scott McClellan said.

The promotion has rankled a few Democrats.

"Empowering Rove in this way shows that Bush cares more about political positioning than honest policy discussions," said Terry McAuliffe, chairman of the Democratic National Committee. "Bush knows that Rove is neither an economic nor a national security expert. He is simply an ideological strategist. ... Clearly, Bush thinks political manipulation matters more than keeping the president honestly informed about the state of the country."

The White House also announced that deputy chief of staff Joe Hagin, the other right hand man of White House chief of staff Andy Card, is taking on more responsibilities.

In addition to his duties overseeing administrative and logistical matters, McClellan said Hagin would represent Card at meetings on intelligence, counterterrorism, proliferation, counter-proliferation, the Defense Department and Homeland Security Council.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
113 Campus Center
University of Massachusetts
Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief Peter Foundas
Managing Editor Mike Martelli
Business Manager Rich Pacheco
Production Manager Cory Rosenberg
Night Supervisor Meghan Healy
Advertising Manager Tiffany Sugalski
Editorial Production Samantha M. Nielsen
Arts & Living Editor Michael Busack
Cable Editor Alyson Zillmann
Editorial Editor Yousef Munayyer
Editorial Editor Allison Elles
News Editor Erika Lovley
Photo Editor Alex Demosthene
Sports Editor Bob McGovern
Circulation Manager Kristen Weiss
Classified Advertising Marty Pappas
Distribution Manager Josh Kiggans
Finance Manager Hirak Shah
Accounting Clerk Virginie Frecaut
Human Resource Sandra Marquez
Assistant Operations Linda Wallack
Assistant Advertising Josh Greenberg
Assistant Business Nathan Chomsky
Assistant Finance Thomas Hecht
Advertising Production Rachael Bruno
Graphics Advisor Charlie Higgins
Asst. Arts & Living Matthew O'Rourke
Asst. Arts & Living Chris Gozzaro
Assistant News Julie O'Donnell
Assistant News Dan O'Brien
Assistant Photo Megan Brinster
Assistant Sports Jeff Howe

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts calendar semester. The Collegian is independently funded, operating on advertising revenue. Founded in 1890, the paper began as Alpha Lit. became the College Signal in 1903, the Weekly Collegian in 1904 and the Tri-Weekly Collegian in 1936. Published daily since 1967. The Collegian has been broadsheet since January 1994. For advertising rates and information, call 545-3500 Mondays through Fridays 8:30 a.m. and 3:30 p.m.

Production Crew
On staff today

Night Editor
Meghan Healy
Photo Technician
Andy Tamulynas
Copy Editor
Matthew Reid
Production Supervisor
Cory Rosenberg
Production Staff
Jodi Weisser, Nate Freedman

policelog

Four arrested in Southwest after Super Bowl

WednesdayFebruary2

10:27 a.m. Vandalism was reported to a vehicle parked behind Sylvan.

ThursdayFebruary3

4:46 a.m. A person stated that a subject entered their room in Pierpont Hall and destroyed property. The subject was identified and a summons was issued for breaking and entering, assault and battery and destruction of property.

8:53 p.m. Alexander Baker, 18, of Westford, was arrested for being a minor in possession of alcohol in the parking lot behind Sylvan.

9:59 p.m. Brendan Smith, 18, of Springfield, Vt., was arrested for being a minor in possession of alcohol in the parking lot behind Sylvan.

FridayFebruary4

12:02 a.m. A party stated that two subjects were fighting in the parking lot in front of the Worcester Dining Commons. One subject, Misty McCartney, 20, of Amherst, was arrested for Assault and Battery.

1:17 a.m. Vandalism to a vehicle was reported in the parking lot next to Alumni Stadium. The damage was a bent antennae cause by an intoxicated subject falling on it.

8:09 p.m. Travis Dixon, 20, of Dedham, was arrested in John Quincy Adams Hall for being a minor in possession of alcohol.

9:02 p.m. Joseph Kolodziej, 19, of Peabody, was arrested for being a minor in possession of alcohol in the parking lot across the street from Southwest.

9:45 p.m. Evan T. O'Connell, 19, of Reading, was arrested for being a minor in possession of alcohol.

9:54 p.m. William Ortiz, 18, of Framingham, was arrested for being a minor in possession of alcohol in the Southwest Circle.

SaturdayFebruary5

12:41 a.m. Jeremy Richard, 22, of Westport, was arrested for possession of a class D substance in the parking lot across the street from Southwest.

3:10 a.m. A party reported a subject was spraying shaving cream on their door and writing obscenities in marking in John Quincy Adams Hall. A summons will be issued for destruction of property.

6:43 p.m. Following a traffic stop, Sean Page, 19, of Woburn, was arrested for being a minor in possession of alcohol.

8:20 p.m. Jamie Steinberg, 19, of Randolph, was arrested for being a minor in possession of alcohol on John Adams Road.

8:55 p.m. John Boisoneau, 19, of Clinton, was arrested for being a minor in possession of alcohol, and Tyler Hamilton, 18, of Clinton, was arrested for being a minor in possession of alcohol, in the parking lot across the street from Southwest.

9:41 p.m. Kristian Guzman, 20, of Revere, was arrested for being a minor in possession of alcohol in the parking lot across the street from Southwest.

9:47 p.m. Following a traffic stop, Peter Gatto, 19, of North Andover, was arrested for being a minor in possession of alcohol in the parking lot across the street from Southwest.

10:26 p.m. Ryan Resendes, 19, of Taunton, was arrested for being a minor in possession of alcohol on John Adams Road.

SundayFebruary6

2:44 a.m. An officer reported that a subject jumped onto the hood of his vehicle on Eastman Lane. Justin Iaworski, 20, of South Hadley, was arrested for disorderly conduct.

3:35 p.m. A party stated that a door in John Adams Hall had been vandalized. An officer stated that the lower and middle hinges were pulled away from the frame and that the damage was over $500.00.

5:14 p.m. Stephen Spang, 18, of Amherst, was arrested for being a minor in possession of alcohol, and Justin Zuckerman, of Chester, N.Y., was arrested for being a minor in possession of alcohol and unlawfully transporting alcohol on Moore Road.

6:58 p.m. Following the Super Bowl a crowd of approximately 200 people gathered in the Southwest Mall. Subjects inciting the crowd were arrested. After the arrests the crowd dispersed. Joseph Murphy, 19, of Holliston, Jose Oller, 18, of San Juan, PR, Brian Robinson, 21, of Vineyard Haven, and Jesse Blumenthal, 19, of Beaconsfield, PQ, were all arrested for disorderly conduct.

— Brendan Heck

Changes for Center

NEWMAN from page 1

They needed everything signed off on before the permit could be granted. It was a lot of busy work." Perhaps the most exciting change to the Center for the student body will be the alterations made to the cafeteria. The old cafeteria, which was formerly located in the basement of the Center and had to be renovated due to an asbestos abatement, will receive a whole new layout, including a new counter, cooking equipment, floors, ceiling and lighting.

The improvements being made to the cafeteria are much welcomed by the Center's frequent patrons. "I think it is wonderful that the Newman Center is improving the facility. I am anxious to see the enhancements later this year," said sophomore Breton Abbondanzio.

While the Newman Center will be under construction, the cafeteria has been temporarily relocated to the Father Quigley Room, located on the first floor. During the renovations, the room has been transformed into a snack bar, offering many of the same services the old cafeteria did.

According to Mary Glenn, the Newman Center's kitchen manager, "We offer light breakfast and lunch foods to everyone here in the snack bar."

The Newman Center's Snack Bar is currently open from 8 a.m. to 2 p.m., Monday through Friday, and 8 a.m. to 12 p.m. on Sundays. Once construction is finished, the Center's cafeteria will be open from 7 a.m. to 10 p.m. seven days a week. The building itself will be open until 10:30 p.m.

Grant will provide computer education for young students targeting young pupils. The software focuses on specific math skills and helps students learn by clues, problem explanations, and prompting a player through a problem. Stored student profiles help the tutor chose corresponding suggestions based on different characteristics such as spatial ability or gender. Evidently, gender can play a part in how a student reacts to a problem.

COMPUTERS from page 1

In an online profile, Arroyo said that he is, "very interested in the social impact of Intelligent Tutors. I have studied how the two genders can interact differently with Intelligent Tutors." Wayang Outpost is an example of an intelligent tutor that guides students through the learning process by using retained data about the child. The capacity to be continually improving is what will set the new technology apart from intelligent tutors like Wayang Outpost.

Presently, computer tutors do not understand the difference between a new student and one with experience. The research aims to help a computer differentiate the behavior of a student with prior knowledge and one that is new to the material.

Developing a computer program that has the ability to understand different skill levels and able to make decisions based on variables of speed and response is the objective of the research. The initiative is also working on how to evaluate the level of mastery of the student. All of this will make a computer more skillful over time.

This computer software will result in an improvement to the learning system and focuses on educating the children in a more effective way than previous programs. In the long term, high school students will measure the effectiveness of smarter computers on a student's competence. Research will also determine whether the use of this computer programming affects how children feel about the various subjects explored by the tutors, such as math, science, and engineering. Other worthy studies can pursue how differences in gender and lifestyle manifest in educational success.

Lombardi sets seven year goal for UMass

CAMPAIGN from page 1

very large substantial portion of their operating funds from that endowment."

The University of Virginia and the University of California at Berkeley have endowments of $1.8 billion, and Texas A&M University has the nation's largest university endowment at $3.5 billion. UMass has an endowment of $70 million according to the Boston Globe.

Several steps have been taken to ensure the campaign is a success and increased its fundraising staff by 40 percent from 67 to 94 people.

"Ours is considerably smaller than other universities, but about the right size for the amount of money we raise," said Lombardi.

Another part of the campaign's efforts will be to get support from Alumni. Lombardi will host several leadership briefings where the chancellor will discuss UMass' campus' programs and opportunities over dinner with small groups of powerful alumni and friends of the university.

As part of an initiative by the UMass President's Office, the office will open an alumni club next year on State Street in Boston, in the same location as the new offices of the President.

"The University has done a very good job in the last three years of locating and in knowing where all the alumni are and strengthening the programs of the alumni association so that there's a lot of contact between alumni and the University," says Armstrong.

Faculties are going to play a role in the canipaign as well. According to Bartolomeo the university will put up on the Web site about the campaign's priorities and in the spring, individual meetings by college will take place to discuss faculty involvement.

When former UMass President William Bulger took office, he was more successful at getting additional state funds, a task which became increasingly harder due to the worsening economy. However, the campaign won't negatively affect state funding. In fact, the state will match $0.50 for every dollar received for endowment or capital.

"The truth is that we can't rely on state money, because we see now how that can change. From a faculty point of view I have seen too many early retirements," says Bartolomeo.

"It's a necessary condition in order to have the University that we want. There really is no alternative," said Armstrong.

Mideast top leaders share peace talks

MIDEAST from page 1

Gissin, a top Sharon adviser. "But there's one thing that must be made very clear ... there will be no flexibility whatsoever, no compromise whatsoever on fighting terrorism."

The cease-fire agreement to be announced later Tuesday will not be a formal written document, but instead a verbal declaration by each side to halt violence, said Gideon Meir, a senior official in the Israeli Foreign Ministry. An Egyptian official familiar with the deal confirmed that.

Abbas will declare an end to violence against Israelis, and Sharon will declare an end to Israeli military operations, Meir said.

In addition, Meir said that Israel will accept that in the short term the Palestinian Authority will not actively crack down on militant groups.

UMass signs Coca-Cola for five more years despite rumors of worker abuse

By Matt Pilon
Collegian Correspondent

According to campus opponents of Coca-Cola, the company has retained pouring rights to the University of Massachusetts campus for five more years, through a process that keeps student involvement to a minimum. Recently, opponents claim, the company has battled allegations of worker abuse and murder abroad.

Coca-Cola denies the charges of abuse and murder. Under its renewed UMass contract the company will have exclusive beverage sales rights everywhere on campus with few exceptions.

Emma Lang, a member of the Radical Student Union who opposed Coke's UMass contract and helped to organize the "Stop Killer Coke" campaign to end what it claimed were worker rights violations in Coca-Cola plants in Africa and South America, said "We are all completely appalled by this. By signing this contract, UMass is saying that it is still ok to support such a company."

In a letter sent in June to Chancellor John V. Lombardi, Coca-Cola denied involvement in several violent acts, including the murder of union leader Isidro Segundo Gil in 1996 at a Coca-Cola bottling plant in Carepa, Colombia. Paramilitary forces fired 10 shots at Gil outside of the plant, according to eyewitness accounts in a July 2001 civil lawsuit in Miami. The lawsuit was brought by the bottling union Sinaltrainal, the International Labor Rights Fund (ILRF) and the United Steelworkers of America. The plaintiffs filed suit under the Alien Tort Claims Act of 1789 that allows foreigners to sue in U.S. courts for violations of fundamental human rights.

According to the lawsuit, Coke bottlers "contracted with or otherwise directed paramilitary security forces that utilized extreme violence and murdered, tortured, unlawfully detained or otherwise silenced trade union leaders."

According to Coca-Cola's website, www.cokefacts.org, the corporation was dismissed from the lawsuit "because the plaintiff failed to offer factual or legal basis for the allegations against the company."

Coca-Cola blamed the violence on political unrest in Colombia, where eight Coca-Cola unionists have been murdered since 1989.

According to the "Killer Coke" campaign, however, Coke's denials of guilt are misleading.

"Though [Coca-Cola] claims that they are not involved in these militant unionist murders, all of the union leaders who were killed were in Coca-Cola plants, as opposed to other plants," Lang said.

Coca-Cola's letter to Lombardi claims that Coke has "independently investigated the claims regarding human rights abuses in Colombia and have found no evidence to support them."

The allegations alone were not enough to tip the UMass contract to Polar Beverages of Worcester, the only other company to submit a bid. Polar offered $40,000 per year to UMass in return for the UMass contracts, according to John Martin, director of procurement, the office that handles all university contracts.

"Polar wasn't able to offer the full range of benefits that the Coca-Cola package was able to offer," Martin said.

In 1997, under the previous contract, Coca-Cola offered less: $250,000 yearly, with $220,000 in one-time contributions, and $85,100 in royalties. 18 percent of the total donations, double the royalty percentage of the new contract, were designated for student programming in the previous contract. The price per gallon of Coca-Cola has also gone up by a dollar since 1997, to $2.99, which helps account for the price hike this year in 20oz. sodas.

Campus vending machine prices under the new contract rose from last year's $1.10 for a 20 oz. Coca-Cola product to $1.25. Coca-Cola gives 46 percent of their vending profits to the school. The revenue the campus collects from the vending percentage (minus expenses related to the vending operation) goes to the Student Affairs Cultural Enrichment, according to director of Administration and Finance Budget and Operations, Ruth Yanka. The company is not required to state their own profit margins, Yanka said. She noted that what is important is the benefit to the school.

Martin said a request for bid went out this summer and representatives from interested companies then toured the campus. Interested parties sent in offers shortly after, and a committee consisting of representatives from the units of the school that will benefit (FAC, Mullins Center, etc.) reviewed. According to Martin, students had a representative at the meeting, but the Radical Student Union doesn't believe that it was enough of a voice to represent the students who are being made into "marketing targets."

"There isn't enough student involvement in the process," Lang commented. "It's just the way the bidding system is set up."

Student businesses such as People's Market choose not to carry Coca-Cola products. "It's a conscious choice," said employee Dolph Paulsen. Another employee at People's Market, Dalyah Assil said, "We try to keep it on as fair grounds as possible, and we don't believe that Coca-Cola keeps the playing field level." People's Market carries a variety of organic juices and sodas, many produced by companies smaller than Coca-Cola.

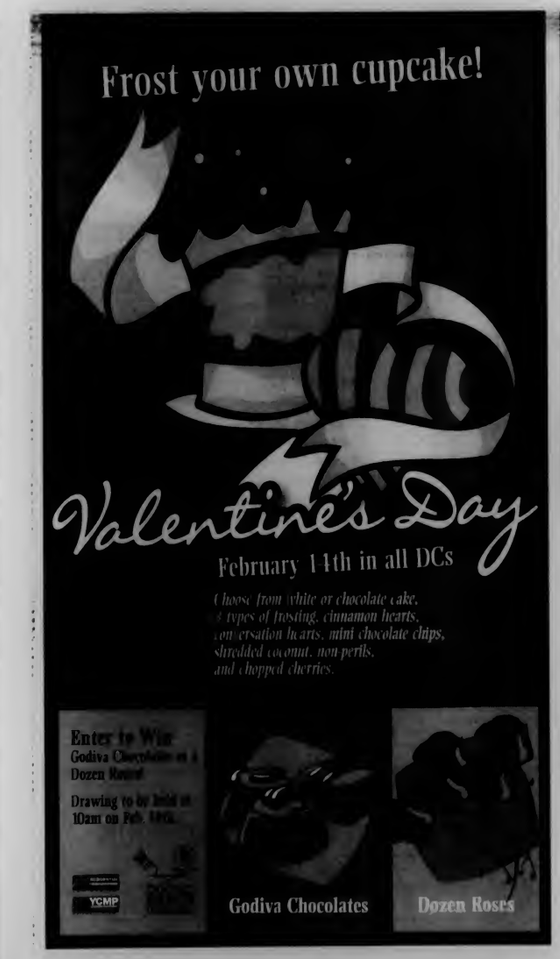
UMass has just signed another five year contract with Coca-Cola despite allegations of worker abuse within the corporation.

No Cals Last Call No Carbs
with hangover & nutritional drink
No Hangover
All-Natural Anti-Hangover & Nutritional Drink
Last Call is available now at:
Liquors 44, Four Season's Liquors, Stoney's Pub,
Holyoke Liquor Mart, Pop's Liquors, R&P Liquors and Niedbala's.
Ask for it at your favorite bar and restaurant
Campus Rep Opportunities Available, Call for more information
Distributed By Baystate Beverage Distributors, Westfield MA 413-642-0150
Please Drink Responsibly

Visit our Career Fair Booth on Wednesday, February 16.

Opportunities are available in the following areas:

Computer Science
Computer Engineering
Electrical Engineering



Mechanical Engineering
Math
Physics

Systems Engineering
Aeronautical Engineering
Optics

Check out our website at rayjobs.com/campus for further information, including our Campus Recruiting Events.
Start your job search by clicking Find a Job.

The power of applied intelligence.
One of the most admired defense and aerospace systems suppliers through world-class people and technology. Our focus is developing great talent.
© 2005 Raytheon Company. All rights reserved. Raytheon is an equal opportunity and affirmative action employer and welcomes a wide diversity of applicants. U.S. Citizenship and security clearance may be required.

Raytheon
Customer Success Is Our Mission

The Campus-Wide Career Fair,
The Life Sciences & Environmental Careers Fair, and The ALANA Job Fair... are all happening on Wednesday, February 16
in the Campus Center

ONE WEEK AWAY

CareerServices
Call us 413-545-2224
Click on www.umass.edu/careers
Walk to 511 Goodell Building

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 2005

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it" -Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Changes to picketing code detrimental to students

The new University of Massachusetts picketing code and the controversies surrounding it have been causing a stir among the student population. The large perpetrator of discontent among the student body, it seems, is the ambiguity and flip-flopping tendencies that have been seen from the administration regarding the code. There are many problems with the code as it stands now. The chief among them, perhaps, is the hindrance it places on a student's right to freedom of speech.

Under the protection of the First Amendment, all Americans have a right to express themselves in any way they see fit, short of threatening or inflicting physical pain on others. The newly-adapted picketing code allows for that right, except where it may disrupt faculty members, students or classes.

Throughout history, it has been clearly evident that in order to get voices heard, there needs to be a disruption. If nothing is changed, or at least acknowledged, as a result of a demonstration, then it served no point. The intent is to get people to stop what they're doing; to notice what is being said.

The issue of "no disruptive picketing" is an extremely hazy one for two reasons. First of all, what exactly constitutes disruptive picketing? Elevated voices can be disruptive, but that is an essential part in relaying a group's message to others. Second, the term "disruptive" is extremely subjective and seems to be functioning as a way for the administration to give the students what they want, but without the power or the clout.

Prior to the announcement of the change in the picketing code on Feb. 2, the vast majority of students may not have even been aware that such a code existed. Now that the new code and the administration are under the spotlight, the sudden change made by Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Michael Gargano and Chancellor John Lombardi has sparked more interest in the matter.

Last semester, given the many recent demonstrations by student activist groups, it is certainly no surprise why the administration feels the way it does in regards to picketing. However, it is a right of the people of the United States to voice their opinions. If students feel that picketing would be the best way for their voices to be heard, then it is acceptable. Not only that, it is protected by the Constitution of the United States.

This issue at hand is not one of disruptive behavior, but one of "the administration's inability to prioritize student's rights," as The Daily Collegian reported on Feb. 8. In the wake of Sunday night's Super Bowl celebrations, the majority of the UMass student body successfully proved to the administration and the authorities that they have the capabilities of conducting themselves in a respectable, mature manner. The picketing code, which has been changed and adapted to suit the administration's wants and desires rather than the students they work for, should adhere to that maturity.

Unsigned editorials represent the majority opinion of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian Editorial Board.

The army of SWORDS

Andrew Freeman

The small robot has tank treads, four cameras, the ability to climb stairs and can be operated by joystick from up to a mile away. It can even right itself after a fall. But this technological breakthrough, which Time Magazine named one of 2004's most amazing inventions, is not on its way to a toy store near you. Instead, it's headed to Iraq.

Eighteen of these SWORDS robots have been deployed to fight in Iraq. The name is an acronym for Special Weapons Observation Reconnaissance Detection Systems, which is an extremely long way of saying a robot with multiple cameras and a machine gun. These machines, manufactured by Waltham-based Foster-Miller, cost around $230,000, and are armed versions of TALON robots. TALONs have been used for the past four years in everything from disposing of explosives in Bosnia to searching for survivors at Ground Zero.

There is every indication that the SWORDS will be superior fighters to current soldiers. In combat it won't be affected by emotion, let alone sleep deprivation or lack of food, and at three feet it is a smaller and probably faster target than a human; additionally it can be equipped with sensors that work in infrared or night-vision. It is constrained by the amount of ammunition, the duration of its lithium ion batteries and the range of communication with the operator, but otherwise the robot is capable of ceaseless combat. SWORDS that were wounded would not require the extensive treatment that a wounded soldier would, let alone receive a pension after retirement. Best of all for the Bush administration, there would be no human cost for a lost robot.

But therein lays the problem — if there is no cost other than economic to sending a robot to war, why not send an entire army of them? Hook the robots up to satellites or figure out how to automate them so that each unit would not need its own operator, and the number of soldiers you deploy could be insignificant. Instead of the approximately 140,000 troops we keep in Iraq, a future conflict could have 10,000 operators or engineers to service hundreds of thousands of SWORDS or other advanced robot warriors. We could have

The fight against Islamic terrorism is more about ideas and tactics than munitions and technology -- and if we cannot provide an alternative to the ideologies that are creating terrorists, then we will make no progress against them.

14 casualties instead of over 1400. If the human cost of war is minimal, even nonexistent, then there would be no restraints to invading all the countries that threaten us. Iran, North Korea, Syria: all could be conquered with relative ease — but there would still be many civilian casualties. We would suffer less, while the people of other countries would suffer more.

Moreover, any robotic army is not going to be able to engage in the attempted nation-building that is becoming a norm of American foreign policy. Robots would not be able to establish connections with a community and assist in the formation of democratic institutions, in the way that trained soldiers could, were they properly trained and arrayed in suitable numbers. The fight against Islamic terrorism is more about ideas and tactics than munitions and technology — and if we cannot provide an alternative to the ideologies that are creating terrorists, then we will make no progress against them.

If the prospect of an automated army seems far-fetched at the moment, realize that the SWORDS project is just one manifestation. Predator drone aircraft, unmanned and remotely controlled, fly over the skies in Iraq and Afghanistan, doing surveillance as well as attacking targets. The Future Combat Systems is propelling major research among defense contractors to produce robotic vehicles to replace the bulky tanks now used.

I wonder if the creators of these projects read much science fiction. With the growth of automated weaponry, a logical next step will be making it smarter — developing artificial intelligence to direct these machines and limits the number of operators. The dangers of that path are obvious, having been exposed in countless films and novels — robots rise up against us. A more likely danger would be that we become accustomed to waging war without consideration of the casualties we inflict, since we take few in the process.

Andrew Freeman is a Collegian columnist.

We are a generation of liars

Sanam Hakim

Everybody in the world tells lies. Sometimes the lies are big and sometimes they are small, but they are always there nonetheless. We are generations of liars raised by generations of liars. It's what we're trained to do, so how can we change it, and should we even try to change it?

The answer, in my opinion, lies in the purity of our children.

If you wear a terrible shirt and ask a child if he or she likes it, you will get a short, honest answer in response. Some children will tell you they like the buttons because they are shiny, some children will tell you they like the color, but most children will just say "no" if they honestly don't like the shirt.

If you wear the same shirt and ask an adult if he or she likes it, you will get completely mixed responses. Few people will be honest and say "no," some will tell you that you look great or come up with a charming response like, "it really brings out your beautiful figure," but most will just say "yes."

Unfortunately, we are constantly raising our children to turn away from complete honesty and to become comfortable with telling little lies pretty much all the time. A child will get his wrist slapped for lying about his math test, but will also get his wrist slapped again if he tells his aunt, honestly, that he ate a candy bar before her home-made dinner. Children are raised to decipher when it is socially acceptable to be honest and when it is not.

These lies, while they may bring instant gratification, are actually doing more harm than good to our society as a whole. They are demeaning friendships, destroying relationships, and harvesting the actual ability to lie within children at a young age.

By definition, a friend is, "A person whom one knows, likes, and trusts." Knowing and liking are the easy part: it is trust that keeps friendships strong and differentiates a friend from an acquaintance. Why is it then that almost everyone has lied to a friend at one point or another, usually about something small and insignificant? A true friend will tell you that you look great if you really don't at all. A true friend will always tell you that you are right, even if you are terribly wrong. A true friend will lie to you and tell you whatever you want, as long as it makes you happy.

A true friend will tell you that you look great if you really don't at all. A true friend will always tell you that you are right, even if you are terribly wrong.

The problem with this logic is that instead of focusing on self-improvement, people begin to dive into shallow friendships and get stuck in them. Instead of a friend telling you that you look bad and helping you look better, a "friend" will tell you that you look terrific and watch you walk around all day looking terrible. Instead of a friend telling you that you were wrong and helping you make everything right again, the issue will remain unresolved and you will become arrogant, never accepting the possibility of being wrong. Instead of a friend telling you the truth, you will have your own pre-programmed robot who will always say only what you want them to say.

Similarly, relationships rely on communication. It is lying that shatters this communication on several levels, and it is lying, which has significantly increased divorce rates and cheating rates in relationships. If two people are in a relationship, the idea is to tell each other everything. However, if avoiding a topic will prevent an argument, why not lie? "Are you OK?" can very simply be answered with a simple, "yes." There are even some lie-responses, which become almost automatic. "Do you think she's prettier than me?" No. "Are there going to be guys there?" No. Eventually, however, these little lies add up and turn into big lies. The honesty in relationships deteriorates to the point where it doesn't even matter anymore. Relationships become superficial, based on lies. After a while, you break up or get divorced and never really think twice about it.

It is sad to me that this is how we raise our children: lie to make others happy, lie to avoid conflict, and lie to keep yourself out of trouble. To me, it just seems like an easy way out, a way to never advance as an individual and a way to keep others down. Maybe that's a part of our childhood we should keep. Maybe if honesty was back in our society, we can redefine the human relationships that are slowly fading away, as the divorce rate gets higher and higher and trust becomes a rare commodity. Maybe someday, there will exist a generation of honest people. Until then, I guess my answer is "yes," your shirt looks great on you today.

Sanam Hakim is a Collegian columnist.

Birth control access necessary

Joseph St. John

More and more pharmacists are refusing to fill their patients prescriptions based on moral reasons. Pharmacists at Kmart, Eckerd's and CVS have refused to give women birth control or morning-after pills to prevent pregnancies. According to USA Today, a thirty-three year old woman who went to CVS every month to fill her prescription was turned down one day because that particular pharmacist didn't believe in birth control. She missed taking her pill that day, and had to go somewhere else to get her birth control pills.

Another pharmacist in Wisconsin did the same thing, but also refused to refer the customer to a different pharmacist afterwards. These occurrences threaten women who were raped or had unprotected sex and need morning-after pills immediately.

Emergency contraception (morning-after pills) is 89 percent effective and usually works only within the first 72 hours after sex. After the first twenty-four hours, its success rate decreases dramatically.

Pharmacists who object to birth control or emergency contraception should not deprive women of that option because of their own personal beliefs. That would be like a vegetarian working at a supermarket refusing to ring up meat products. If someone believes so strongly about something, there are other ways of protesting the product, but by using your job as a way to obstruct someone's access to a certain product is simply unethical.

In that sense it is wrong to put up obstacles meant to prevent women from getting proper health care. In most states, if a woman or girl is raped, or has unprotected sex, she must see her doctor to get a prescription for emergency contraception, and then go to a pharmacy to get it filled. Getting a prescription from a doctor is an unnecessary step that makes preventing an unwanted pregnancy that much harder.

That is why many communities have decided to make Emergency Contraception an over the counter drug. In Alaska, Washington, California, Hawaii, New Mexico and many European countries, emergency contraception can be bought without a prescription. Canada is also considering making it more accessible, because they see that by doing so, a bad experience can be made easier.

Opponents to the morning-after pill say that the easy access to this drug increases the risk of STDs because people would rely on this pill to prevent pregnancy, but the pill does not protect against any STDs.

However, the morning-after pill is not meant to be used as a replacement for other contraception. In fact, repeated use is bad for you and sometimes causes undesirable side effects, including but not limited to, nausea, vomiting, and abdominal pains. It should be used only in emergencies when all other options are gone. When people understand this, it makes sense to sell it over the counter, because, if that condom breaks, you don't want to waste time scheduling and appointment with your doctor, or going through the trials of talking to your parents.

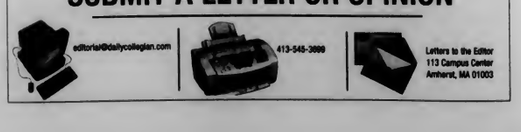
Most opponents are not concerned about the STDs or the unfavorable side effects that women must deal with who take it, they object to it on moral or religious reasons. They consider it another type of abortion, because they believe life begins at the moment the egg is fertilized.

Pharmacists who object to birth control or emergency contraception should not deprive women of that option because of their own personal beliefs. That would be like a vegetarian working at a supermarket refusing to ring up meat products.

Others worry that increased availability of contraceptives would encourage more teen sex, and more promiscuity overall. These are the people trying to control other people's lives by making decisions for them, by taking decisions away from them.

This year, the FDA rejected a proposal to sell morning-after pills without prescriptions, even though the FDA advisors confirmed that it would benefit women's health. Since then, women's groups have accused the FDA and the bush administration for putting politics before science.

Planned Parenthood estimates that non-prescription morning-after birth control could prevent half of the three million unwanted pregnancies that occur every year.



Every woman should have the right to decide whether the day-after pill is necessary for her, and should not need the approval of her doctor to use it. Clear instructions could easily explain how and when to use the day-after pill, and warn when not to use it too.

When pharmacists refuse to sell these pills, women's rights are immediately infringed upon. Right now, there are ten states proposing laws that would allow pharmacists to refuse to sell emergency contraception if they were morally opposed to it, and in Mississippi, South Dakota and Arkansas they can do this already.

Where is this country going? It seems like in many states the government is covertly restricting access to needed contraception. Three million unwanted pregnancies a year is three million too many, and there is no reason why these women should not have full access to the medical support they need.

Joseph St. John is a Collegian columnist.

SUBMIT A LETTER OR OPINION

Girls and the big game

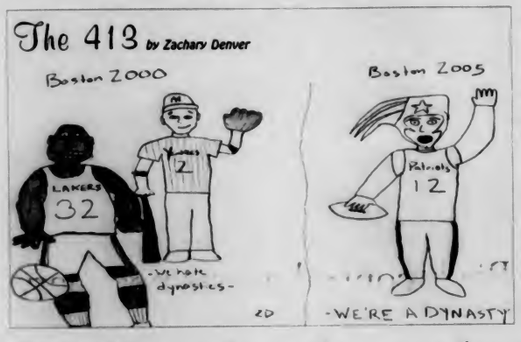
Katelyn Harding

"Ok, so I bought boxes for both teams, each box is for two numbers, I have 9 and 9, if the last digit of the score...."

This is my friend trying to explain to me how she bought boxes and is betting on the Super Bowl. My head is spinning, because she might as well be speaking Spanish. I might even have understood her better. We are sitting next to each other at a friend's house, getting ready to watch the big game. As she is trying to explain this enigma of a concept to me, I begin to think. I may seem to exemplify the type of girl that most guys think of when they think of girls and sports, the idea that girls know nothing about the subject. I may not know everything, but I know enough to be able to enjoy the game. And that's all that really matters.

Spend ten minutes talking to my friend, and she will impress you with her knowledge of the game. She can sit and talk statistics and plays with guys and keep up with them. Although I don't possess these sport lingo skills, does that mean I don't understand sports? I don't think so. I may not be very suave with my sport jargon like my friends, but I do know my way around the sports fields. Besides, if I ever have any doubts, Bill Simmons helps me straighten myself out. And yes, I know it's a male journalist I am referring to, but Simmons has a way of writing that can relate to everyone, including sports fans such as myself.

Throughout my middle school and high school years, I had been a very active athlete. I have been on numerous sports teams, including basketball, softball, swimming and track teams. Sometimes I've been on two of these at the same time. Yes, I might not know how many sacks Tedy Bruschi has had, but does that mean I can't celebrate just the same when he makes a tremendous one in the Super Bowl? I know that Rodney Harrison is a strong safety, but I can't differentiate the two types. Does that mean I can't recognize when he makes a good play? Just because I don't seem to know the statistics of the players present and past, doesn't mean I can't enjoy watching the game along side my numbers-friendly buddies.



I will admit, there is nothing worse than watching a sporting event with someone, whether it be a guy or girl, that has absolutely no idea what is going on. Sometimes you just want to sit, relax, and watch a game in peace. You don't want 50,000 questions being thrown at you, when you know the answer but you don't want to take your eyes off the screen to answer. On the other end of the spectrum, when I am watching a game with friends, I don't really like getting a pop-quiz. "Oh so what position does this guy play?" "Do you know how many assists he has?" "You don't know what 'cover the spread' means?"

Just because I don't seem to know the statistics of the players present and past, doesn't mean I can't enjoy watching the game along side my numbers-friendly buddies.

My answers: no, no, and no. But, if you explain the situation to me, I will understand it. I'm not a moron. Just because I am a girl does not mean I am incapable of understanding sports terminology. I would like to think of myself as in the middle of this spectrum, although I don't know everything, I know enough to understand what's happening on my own.

It's getting to be a little too cliché to say that girls know nothing about sports. My friend, along with many other girls, can tell you differently. Besides, the Red Sox beat the "Evil Empire" in the ALCS, along with the Cardinals in the World Series, and the Patriots have the same number of rings that Jennifer Lopez has from three different men. This is a time to come together and celebrate. Yes, the Patriots played an incredible game, anyone can see that. Could I tell you, numbers-wise how good they did? No. But I can still revel in the win, and be proud to say that it is a great time to be a Boston sports fan, girls and guys alike.

Katelyn Harding is a UMass Student.

This is Oxford, UMass style

S.J. Port

1. Heat oven to summer.
2. Gather 40 American students from a 30,000-person campus in a five-college area.
3. Add dash of students from various other educational institutions.
4. Place ingredients together in an internationally renowned hub of learning.
5. Stir with several Oxford dons, a garrulous barkeep and several cases of Pimms.

Serves: infinite guests.

Unfortunately, the result of this recipe is nothing like the University of Massachusetts' Oxford Summer Seminar, which cannot be recreated or copied. We, the seminar's 2004 class, have been trying ever since we landed back in the States. It can't be done. You'll just have to go and experience it for yourself.

The program at Trinity College of Oxford University presents the ultimate abroad experience for UMass students. As students at Massachusetts' foremost and largest public institution of higher education, who for the most part have always attended public schools, we often wonder what our degrees will be worth; how we'll stack up against the private school students; and where the great opportunities can be found at this burdened and fiscally beleaguered yet great university. One answer lies in the Oxford Summer Seminar program; it is a chance to enter a private world of ideas, history, and privilege.

Inside the Trinity gate is a place to become less burdened by the world and more in tune with the footsteps that have laid the path of academia.

Consisting of 39 individual colleges, Oxford University is located in its namesake city an hour northwest of London. The oldest English speaking university in the world, its educational reputation dates back to the eleventh century.

When Oxford was almost 1,000 years old, Ernest H. Hofer, then a professor of English at UMass, came to the university. Hofer would begin the very first exchange program relationship between any American university and Oxford University.

Beneath its famous spires, down cobbled streets, young Oxford scholars hurry beside erudite graying tenured relics as colleagues pedal past on well-greased handlebar bicycles with bells and baskets carrying manifolds and concordances. The town, overwhelmed by the University, is aesthetically mesmerizing: you'll shudder to see drab Whitmore upon return. On Broad Street, just a hundred yards down from the Bodleian library and Blackwell's famous book store, parallel to High Street and within walking distance of the Eagle and Child pub in which Lewis Carroll, C.S. Lewis and J.R.R. Tolkien discussed the plots of their respective tales, is the centrally located Trinity College, founded in 1555: it dwells in the history absent from our own campus, country and culture. Wander down Broad Street to the Covered Market for a grotesquely rich, warm and gooey cookie from Ben's before you head to your early afternoon class: a seminar of six students led by Oxford Don.

Courses on literature, political science, history, and other subjects are taught in the Oxford seminar style — not the UMass lecture style — meeting twice a week for several hours of discussion. Professors also become accessible at dinners for each class, after which Dons and their students usually retire to the Trinity College beer cellar below the dining hall for intense discussion and drinking. Lectures occur weekly by prominent scholars. Fieldtrips take students to theatre productions, historical sites, London, and around the countryside.

If you complain regularly about the lack of elite intellectual opportunity among the masses here at UMass, or if you're someone interested in adding a few credits and seeing Europe in the process, grab your passport and apply to the Oxford Summer Seminar: www.umass.edu/oxford. How many people can say they had the opportunity to study at Oxford?

Because the University runs the exchange program, credits from the program translate directly to your UMass degree and GPA. It is possible to receive between four and eight credits during the six weeks, offering the opportunity to lesson a course load during the regular school year, or possibly graduate earlier than expected.

As you approach Trinity you'll notice two entrances: the first is a large elaborate wrought iron gate. Tourists and passer-bys regularly stop and peer through its bars to see the elaborately manicured gardens and ornate buildings. The second gate is a small, two-sided wooden door in the stonewall, which runs the entire border of the college's grounds. The right side of this door is open for college staff and students — affiliates of the college recognizable to the porters at the gate's lodge. As part of the UMass Summer Seminar you'll become an affiliate of Trinity, and Mark, the porter, will nod and wave you inside ahead of the visitors left standing at the gate awaiting their tours. People pay to see the lawns of Oxford University's colleges, like Trinity: students of the seminar lounge freely and live in residential suite's designed by Sir Christopher Wren for Trinity in 17th century.

Inside the Trinity gate is a place to become less burdened by the world and more in tune with the footsteps that have laid the path of academia. It is an experience not to be missed for pecuniary worry, and one that we as a University should strive to support and save. Professors in all departments should encourage enrollment, and students must spread the word to friends at UMass and other institutions.

In its 39th year, the Oxford Summer Seminar is a respected and well-known program. However, it has been doubly hit by the weakening of the dollar and increased tuition costs at home universities. The Seminar is struggling to attract and enroll students, which in turn is creating financial woes for the program.

American students are not eager to travel abroad right now. Many question the popularity and safety of Americans off homeland and out of protected waters. However, the fact remains that Great Britain remains a safe and accepting place for anybody to travel through. And while the Seminar may seem like an expensive program, it is actually one of the cheapest, if not the cheapest program, a way to stay and study at any of the Oxford colleges for six weeks. It is worth every penny — American or British. As one alumna of the program said, "There are experiences that are once in a lifetime. They may come at a higher price than you are willing to pay in the beginning; however, when you look back it really is worth it. The Oxford Seminar offers you more than eight credits or travel abroad, it is an encompassing experience of friendship and growth."

S.J. Port is a Collegian Columnist.

Social Security reform and my plan to take over the world

Thomas Naughton

When I heard that George W. Bush was planning to reform and privatize social security, I rejoiced — and I mean rejoiced in every sense of the word. I went to church and sang full-voice along with the hymns, smiling and joining hands with everyone in my pew. When the collection plate came my way, I smiled, took some change out of it and shouted "Social Security — Halleluiah!" and then convulsed on the floor and screamed "Praise Jesus, I am saved!" until my legs got tired and I had a sufficient bump on my head.

My fellow churchgoers were not pleased. They all wanted to know why I had stolen from the collection plate. I explained to them that God's chosen leader, our president, had great plans for the future of social security and that if we wanted to be apart of that future and not be homeless elderly vagrants who eat pickled pigs feet straight from the jar, we better save our pennies and save our dimes. They still didn't get why I would steal from the plate instead of just not giving, but they seemed to understand more when I said "But this is God's money, and God's president would want me to have God's money." I'm not allowed back at that church, but I'm $1.55 closer to real security, the security that God intended.

As I walked away from the church, I turned to wave to the priest who gave me the finger and spat in my general direction. I looked at his middle finger and realized that it was a sign: not only is it true that only I can prevent forest fires, but also I was overwhelmed with the image of "one." One finger, one person, one future, one God, one leg if my other gets shot off or eaten by coyotes, one bank account, one drink because I'm a light weight, one chance at greatness and world domination. I realized that I am the one, the one who will help George W. Bush (and therefore God) to reform social security.

I will be the only 22 year old receiving Social Security benefits on top of having a job and all my previous assets. With this money, I will buy a large corporation like Halliburton or Enron.

My reform would be the ultimate experiment for the validity of social programs. Instead of giving me money when I retire and I'm ugly and more useless than I am now, I propose that my country gives me what was promised to me when I'm old and wrinkled, a nice big check. What better way to enjoy my country's altruism than by striking while the iron (and myself) is hot?

My plan is this: I will be the only 22 year old receiving Social Security benefits on top of having a job and all my previous assets. With this money, I will buy a large corporation like Halliburton or Enron. Then I will receive an enormous tax break, which will give me monetary freedom to do what I really want: Buy a celebrity. I'll buy Paris Hilton and feed her Krispy Kremes until she's so rotund that I have to push her around in a wheelbarrow. The advent of reality television will make her new life as a fat hermit a primetime success and advertisers will pay millions of dollars to me to have their spots run during the hit show "Paris Hilton: Fat's Hot." With my wealth and power, I will have the political sway to buy elections, like the Presidency, a position I will immediately hand over to Dolly Parton, whether she's dead or not.

Then at the age of sixty-five, or whenever we're supposed to retire, I will promptly shoot myself in the backyard, terminating the flow of money from Social Security to me. I will give the remaining money I have acquired to the Christian Coalition so that they can fully brainwash the country like they always wanted to, electing Pat Robertson's frozen head as our president for all time. If I'm going to be dead, I may as well leave the world in the worst state possible.

However, before I die, I will make a pact with the Devil for a large sum of money and disclosure of the true identity of the person Carly Simon was talking about in the song "You're So Vain." In return for this payment, the Devil will allow me to haunt houses and bus stops so that people will fear God and the President and never question the path that our country has taken. I will also haunt the people who couldn't afford to put their money in private social security funds by making their pickled pigs feet dance in the light of the trashcan fire that they are huddled around. They will know that God hates the poor and that he was just joking in the Bible when he said to "give to the poor without hesitation."

The world will be as it should be. God will be fearful, the rich will be well taken care of, the poor will gag on cold pigs feet, I'll be haunting the city bus stop or spying on church officials or politicians who have assignations in cheap motels. This is real capitalism at work, something God would be proud of, just ask George Bush.

Thomas Naughton is a Collegian columnist.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

THANKS FOR THE HELP

At the end of last semester there were students standing in the Campus Center energetically requesting donations to buy holiday toys for local needy families. Those fellow students were cadets of the University of Massachusetts Army and Air Force ROTC programs who were trying to raise money for the annual Amherst Family Outreach toy drive. For almost three weeks these cadets volunteered their time to stand along the Campus Center Concourse, actively requesting donations of any amount to help local children have a happier holiday. This letter is to offer the UMASS community a sincere thank-you from the cadets for your generous donations and patient endurance of our consistent pleas "to help the children." With your help we were able to raise over $2,300 to contribute to the drive. Thank-you again for this remarkable outcome and please remember us when you see us again next holiday season.

David Pease
UMass ROTC

DON'T GO METRO

To the column "Operation: Metrosexual" — Zach, for god's sake do not go metro. If you went metro, it'd be fake. You would know it, other girls would know it.

They'd know it because they would see that it's not the real you. Keep in mind I'm trying to help. I'd have to say that your failure at the gym is your own fault. I've gone from lifting under 100 pounds to over 180 and that's even before I had a girlfriend. For all of high school I didn't have one, and I'm very lucky to have the one I do now, but it wasn't because of my muscle increase.

It was because of me. Zach, there will always be people much stronger and much weaker than you. If you want muscle, it's a commitment. It takes at least an hour for four to five days a week, depending. There are plenty of good workout schedules online. I'd be happy to give you mine, although you should change yours every four to six weeks. Trust me; this is a much more rewarding route. It will save you money, you'll feel better about yourself, and even if you don't get girls right away you can still flaunt. Your comments about guys who can make a muscle but don't have any intelligence bothered me. I'm not 'huge' by any means.

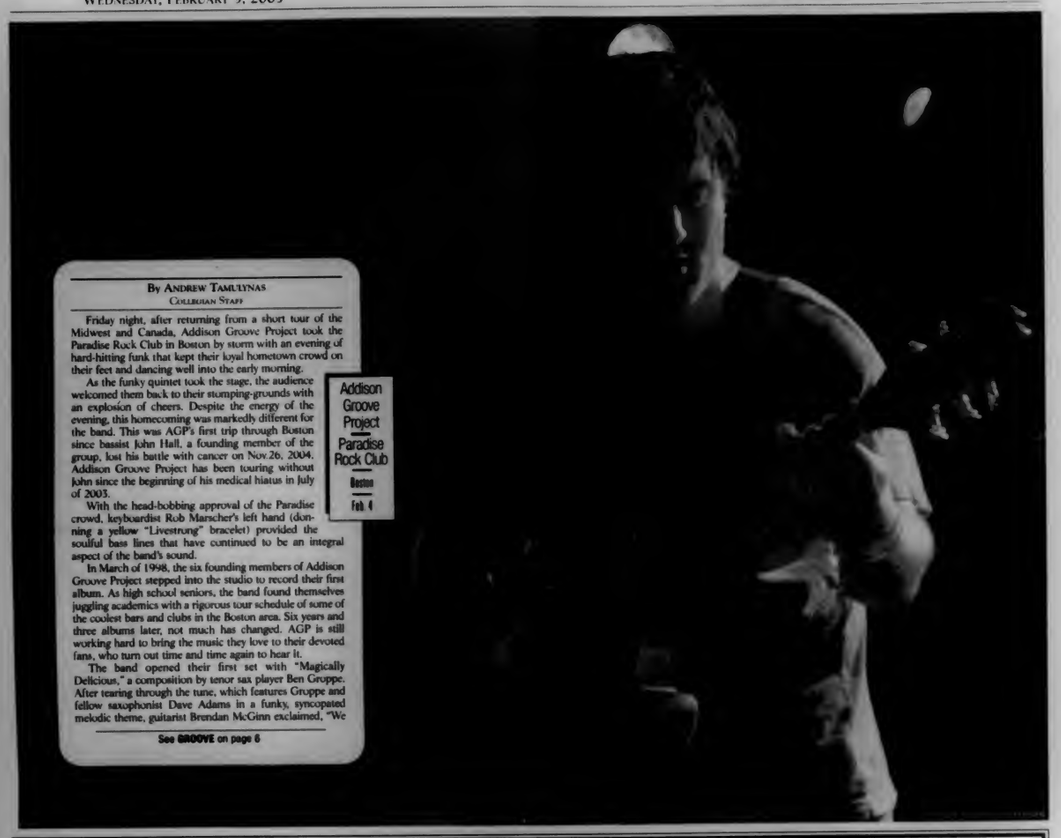
I would say I'm moderate to above average in size in comparison to other guys without being conceited, and I'm a computer science major. I think it takes a fair amount of intelligence to make it in this major (not to say other majors don't). What I'm trying to say is you can have the best of both worlds with a little bit (actually a lot) of effort. The same applies for a person with the opposite problem. In fact, you're probably in a good position. I've worked out for a few years, and now progress is hard. In your position, people who start working out make a lot of progress in their first few months. If you did actually work out for 4-5 days a week for two months you would definitely start to see a difference. The semester is early; get to a gym. If you live near a wellness center all you have to pay is $45 a semester like in Southwest; it's definitely worth it. They're much less crowded. Don't be afraid to ask for a spot either; we're all there for the same reason.

Matt Thompson
UMass Student

ANY RIOT IS UNACCEPTABLE

"Doing the dynasty dance," I read inquisitively as I stared at the color photo of young people lighting toilet paper on fire as others look on. Please correct me if I'm mistaken, but to the Daily Collegian, is it an acceptable form of celebration for students to throw "flaming rolls of toilet paper" and "set off fire works" if the local NFL team wins the Super Bowl ... as long as there are "no known injured at press time"? Perhaps I am being presumptuous, however, the fact remains that the Collegian is certainly not condemning these acts that it portrayed in color and on the front page of Monday's edition. Is this the kind of message that the Collegian wants to invest its resources in? Is this the kind of message that the Collegian wants to impress upon its readers, undergraduate or not?

Perhaps the most pathetic aspect of this display is that people seem to have forgot that the travesties that have occurred less than a year ago. I apologize in advance for rubbing salt into any wounds, however, does everyone remember Victoria Snelgrove? I wish I could say I could remember her better; I went to East Bridgewater High School with Tori; she graduated just before I did but I sadly did not know her very well. And please allow me to disclaim, I am not trying to open this can of worms. Rather, it just makes my bowels churn that after the events related to this tragedy and others that happened on this campus related to "victory celebrations," that the Collegian would blithely encourage, or at least not denigrate the activities that have led to such tragedies.



Perhaps you think that I'm making a connection that does not exist, or that I am exaggerating, and it may be possible that I am. After all, why shouldn't loyal fans (which is a diminutive form of the word, "fanatic,") be allowed to celebrate for the team that they've been investing so much hope and energy into? In fact, I readily encourage all people to express their emotions, positive and negative, verbally and physically. However, neither the Constitution of the United States nor the Declaration of the Rights of Man afford you perform illegal acts in the name of celebration, hedonism, or personal growth: especially not when it puts into jeopardy what so many before you and still do this day do with their nose to the grindstone so that you're education will be that much better. If you have a problem with anything that I have just said or implied, I encourage you to state you're logically, sociologically or psychologically sound justification to my face.

Alexander DeSerpa
UMass student

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 2005 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Addison Groove Project — Paradise Rock Club — Boston — Feb 4

By Andrew Tamulynas
Collegian Staff

Friday night, after returning from a short tour of the Midwest and Canada, Addison Groove Project took the Paradise Rock Club in Boston by storm with an evening of hard-hitting funk that kept their loyal hometown crowd on their feet and dancing well into the early morning.

As the funky quintet took the stage, the audience welcomed them back to their stomping-grounds with an explosion of cheers. Despite the energy of the evening, this homecoming was markedly different for the band. This was AGP's first trip through Boston since bassist John Hall, a founding member of the group, lost his battle with cancer on Nov.26, 2004. Addison Groove Project has been touring without John since the beginning of his medical hiatus in July of 2003.

With the head-bobbing approval of the Paradise crowd, keyboardist Rob Marscher's left hand (donning a yellow "Livestrung" bracelet) provided the soulful bass lines that have continued to be an integral aspect of the band's sound.

In March of 1998, the six founding members of Addison Groove Project stepped into the studio to record their first album. As high school seniors, the band found themselves juggling academics with a rigorous tour schedule of some of the coolest bars and clubs in the Boston area. Six years and three albums later, not much has changed. AGP is still working hard to bring the music they love to their devoted fans, who turn out time and time again to hear it.

The band opened their first set with "Magically Delicious," a composition by tenor sax player Ben Gruppe. After tearing through the tune, which features Gruppe and fellow saxophonist Dave Adams in a funky, syncopated melodic theme, guitarist Brendan McGinn exclaimed, "We

See GROOVE on page 6

Discover the Bachelorettes of UMass

Tina Chung

BACHELORETTE #3: Tina Chung aka "The girl who got hypnotized by the X-rated Hypnotist"
MAJOR: Communications
AGE: 21
YEAR: Junior

PERSONALITY TYPE:
Tina is a caring, outgoing, loud and spontaneous person.

RELATIONSHIP EXPERIENCE:
Two long-term relationships.

LOOKS FOR IN A GUY:
She says that she looks for guys who are open-minded and down to earth.

TURN ON:
Tina wants a guy that can make her laugh.

TURN OFF:
There is nothing worse than a guy who is "conceded and talks a lot about himself," says Tina.

FAVORITE DRINK:
Jack and Diet Coke, "the first drink I every had."

BIGGEST FLAW:
"I'm too honest," says Tina, she just blurts out whatever she is thinking.

SPECIAL HOBBY/TALENT:
Being from California she has been surfing for most of her life.

IF SHE COULD BE ANY ANIMAL:
"A kitty cat because they are soft, sweet and cuddly"

A TIP FOR THE GUYS:
Tina thinks confidence is sexy, and you better have some because the only thing sexier is "her butt."

THE BOTTOM LINE:
Tina has no problem making conversation, yet one topic that she likes to avoid is her very embarrassing antics at the X-rated hypnotist. She is on domestic exchange from California and a member of the National Student Exchange Club. "I will definitely have a good time no matter what," she says, "I will make the best of any situation."

Her dream job is to make six-figures but still have plenty of time to spend with her family. Try to keep this in mind before a date with Tina: she thinks confidence is sexy, and you better have some because the only thing sexier is "her butt."

Jenny Lynch

BACHELORETTE #2: Jenny Lynch aka "The girl that always seems to get toilet paper stuck to her shoe."
MAJOR: Psychology
AGE: 21
YEAR: Junior

PERSONALITY TYPE:
Jenny says, "Once I warm up to people I am very outgoing ... sociable and I go into situations with an open mind."

RELATIONSHIP EXPERIENCE:
One long-term relationship that she now looks back on poorly

LOOKS FOR IN A GUY:
"I look for a guy with a funny sense of humor, confidence, laid back personality, intelligence," says Jenny, as well as "someone who is easy to talk to, and athletic."

TURN ON:
Jenny likes a guy who plays a little hard to get, has a good smile and sports his Tims' and sweatpants.

TURN OFF:
This girl wants nothing to do with any guys that are cocky, have a better fashion sense than her or are bad kissers.

FAVORITE DRINK:
"Any type of white wine. I always have a box of wine in my fridge."

BIGGEST FLAW:
Jenny is a self-proclaimed worrywart: "I worry a lot even when there is no need too"

SPECIAL HOBBY/TALENT:
Jenny used to play soccer at Assumption College. In her prime she was able to jungle a soccer ball over 100 times. She can also recite every line from "Dumb and Dumber."

IF SHE COULD BE ANY ANIMAL:
"A hyena because I laugh a lot."

A TIP FOR THE GUYS:
When you show up for a date with Jenny you better show up with your game face on because she thinks confidence is sexy, but don't be late because keeping your word is sexier.

THE BOTTOM LINE:
Jennifer knows that she is silly and goofy, but that does not stop her from having a great time. "No matter who I go on a date with," she says, "I know I will have a good time."

Jennifer is not ashamed to admit that she still sleeps with the remains of a blanket she has had since she was a baby. She also says she is prone to getting toilet paper stuck to her. Her favorite quote: "Dream as if you will live forever and live as if you will die today." - James Dean.

Alexis Davison

BACHELORETTE #1: Alexis Davison, aka "The girl with all the jewelry she makes herself."
MAJOR: Pre-Med
AGE: 21
YEAR: Senior

PERSONALITY TYPE:
Alexis knows that she is a "dominant" person, she is also "very, very honest."

RELATIONSHIP EXPERIENCE:
2 long-term relationships.

LOOKS FOR IN A GUY:
Alexis does not want any old guy, he has to be intelligent, health conscious, have career goals and have faith too.

TURN ON:
Honesty is extremely important to Alexis, as well as being a good conversationalist and knowledgeable about other cultures.

TURN OFF:
There is nothing that she hates more than cockiness.

FAVORITE DRINK:
Alexis says that she does not drink that often, but when she does she enjoys a martini or a gin and tonic.

BIGGEST FLAW:
"I'm a big nerd," says Alexis.

SPECIAL HOBBY/TALENT:
Alexis danced with the NYC ballet as well as performed neurosurgery on rats for her honors thesis.

IF SHE COULD BE ANY ANIMAL:
"A puma because they are sleek and they make great shoes."

A TIP FOR THE GUYS:
Alexis thinks that a 1971 Barracuda is sexy. Don't have one? That's ok; she thinks nice cologne is even sexier.

THE BOTTOM LINE:
Alexis says that she has been here for four years and she is ready to meet someone new, but not just anyone. For her to like a guy he better have some goals; he better know where he is going in life. Even though she admits that she is often the dominant person in a relationship, Alexis is also very honest and is great at communication. "I'm not shy," she says, "I like to talk." She will chat with a guy all night long.

Alexis is planning on going to med-school and marrying at some point after that. When you first see her one of the things you will notice is her totally original jewelry; that's because she makes all of it herself.

Vote TODAY on the web: WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Addison jams in Beantown

GROOVE from page 5

haven't played that one in a long time."

To the excitement of the Paradise crowd, the band spent much of the evening dabbling in their older material. The first set wrapped up with crowd a favorite, "The Eleven Headed." Though the tune is off their first album, it remains to be one of AGP's best, and a trademark of the band's live performances.

Also essential to Addison Groove's live performances is their masterful and downright fun use of cover songs. In past performances, the band has been known to bring out covers such as Pink Floyd's "Have a Cigar" and "Cross the Tracks" by Maceo by becoming an advocate for comprehensive sex ed in her hometown.

"I was 15, and in my high school I could see it was an issue that was affecting my contemporaries," says Knox, now a first-year sophomore political science major at the University of Texas in Austin. She has her eyes set on Georgetown law school, is interested in getting into politics and says she'd love to live in New York.

"The people around me were getting sexually transmitted diseases," she says. "Young girls were getting pregnant. I heard all the myths about the different ways you can get pregnant, and I realized that was no education."

She was also called a baby killer when she volunteered for Planned Parenthood. "These protesters thought I was going to abort my child or something," she recalls. "I've never had sex, but they thought I was going to abort my child."

Many people told her she was going to hell. She went through the difficult, soul-searching process of questioning her beliefs. But she's not merely still standing. She's thriving.

"The Education of Shelby Knox" chronicles a teenager's path to adulthood, consciousness and political awakening. It's the story of a family that remains very close and mutually supportive despite vast political and ideological differences. Most of all, it's a story about becoming your own person, even when that means going against everything you've been taught. Or, in this case, everything you weren't taught.

"Education," which will kick off the new season of the PBS doc series "POV" on June 21, begins with a series of bracing facts. Lubbock has one of the highest teen-pregnancy and sexually transmitted disease rates in the nation. Teenage gonorrhea rates are twice the national average.

"Lubbock is known for three things," says Knox. "Buddy Holly, the Dixie Chicks and STDs." (There's also Texas Tech, but you get her drift.)

This reputation is what got Knox interested in the sex education issue, first as a member of the Lubbock Youth Council, which works with city government, and then on her own. It's also what drew the attention of New York-based filmmakers Marion Lipschutz and Rose Rosenblatt, who were looking for a sex education story for their next film. They didn't go to Lubbock looking for Shelby, but once they found her, they knew they had an ideal protagonist.

"She's outspoken, and she's a terrific public speaker," says Lipschutz. "She's really dedicated to the issue that we were working on. She was a conservative Southern Baptist who had pledged abstinence until marriage, and she was involved in a fight for comprehensive sex ed, which is generally perceived as a liberal cause."

So how did a nice Southern Baptist girl turn into a sex-ed crusader?

"As I came to see the world outside of Lubbock, I realized that my beliefs were more liberal than my parents'," she says. "I didn't make these decisions because I wanted to be the opposite of my parents. I made them because I read about the issues and figured out which side I wanted to be on."

Knox is still onboard with abstinence. "Kids must be taught that to be completely safe from STDs and teen pregnancy, the only way to do that is to abstain," she says. "However, kids know they can make that decision, and they need to make informed decisions. If they are going to have sex, they need to know the consequences. And they need to know how to protect themselves."

That's not how the Lubbock Independent School District sees it. The district receives federal funding for it's abstinence-only program, which has been in effect since 1995, and school officials would like to see the money continue to flow.

But the abstinence-only policy is not about cash. As depicted in the film, Lubbock is a proudly conservative and Christian city, with many residents and public officials who equate sex education with sexual provocation. The party line is that sex should be saved for marriage. Judging by the STD and pregnancy figures, that doesn't seem to be happening. The abstinence-only policy remains in place.

Among the abstinence-only advocates is Lubbock youth pastor Ed Ainsworth, who conducts "true love waits" abstinence pledge ceremonies with local teens. Knox took the pledge as a sophomore, but she now says Ainsworth uses "scare tactics." In the film, we see Ainsworth warning a room full of teens that STDs can be contracted through shaking hands.

"I talk to teenagers about sexual purity, specifically about abstinence," says Ainsworth in the film. "The reason I do it is that I'm sick and tired of seeing kids mess up their lives physically, mentally, spiritually, emotionally and financially."

Ainsworth, who estimates that he spreads the abstinence message at 200 schools and speaks to 250,000 students every year, has no ax to grind with Knox.

"She's a good kid," he says by phone. "I disagree with her philosophically and with where she's coming from. But it's America, and that's why we all live here."

However, Ainsworth, who has yet to see the film, adds that he's disappointed with the filmmakers' decision to make Knox the protagonist. He recalls that they came to Lubbock to make a film about the issue of comprehensive sex education vs. abstinence, before deciding to focus on Knox.

"I'm not angry, and I'm not upset with Shelby," he says. "I'm just disappointed."

On a personal level, the sex-ed issue is just one sign of Knox's political transformation. She's straight, and she strongly supports gay rights, a stance that hastened her resignation from the Youth Council when she felt the organization wasn't reaching out to gay students. Her favorite course at UT is called "Women, Gender and Politics." She writes for a collegiate feminist magazine called The F Word. Her parents say she has always rooted for the underdog, and she can't deny it.

And she remains a proud Christian.

"Christians in general are not like what the religious right portrays," she says. "That is just a very vocal side of it. I believe most Christians are loving, caring and tolerant. They believe in civil liberties and civil rights. It's very sad and detrimental to the Christian faith that some people have decided to use it for political advantage.

"I accept everyone. I don't think there's one right answer."

'Education' tracks student's fight for sex ed

By Chris Vognar
The Dallas Morning News

PARK CITY, Utah — Shelby Knox is tired. The 18-year-old Lubbock native just got into Park City for the world premiere of the documentary "The Education of Shelby Knox" at the Sundance Film Festival. Her hotel room was a bit chilly on her first night, the interviews are starting to pile up, and the sleep deprivation has her seeking a catnap in her publicist's suite.

But she should be able to handle the grind ahead. Her personal journey of the last few years, chronicled in "Education," has steeled her for almost anything.

Just three years ago she was a sophomore and conservative Southern Baptist at Lubbock's Coronado High School, in a district with a strict abstinence-only sex education policy. Now she's a self-described liberal Christian who underwent a baptism of fire

COURTESY ERICH SCHLEGL

"The Education of Shelby Knox," screened at the Sundance Film Festival, chronicles changes in the beliefs of many of the natives of Lubbock, TX. Knox is a member of the Lubbock Youth Council.

STUDENT TRAVEL

MAKE YOUR BREAK

Spring Break '05

Beach
»Cancun $709 — Air + 1 week at Club Verano Beat, located on the beach
»Jamaica $719 — Air + 1 week at the Fun Holiday Beach Resort, located on the beach

Europe
»Amsterdam $432 — Air + 6 nights at the Bulldog Hostel near central station
»Paris $515 — Air + 6 nights at the Aloha Hostel

Alternative
»Costa Rica $688 — Air + 6 nights at San Jose / Manuel Antonio
»Montreal $511 — Air + 1 week at HI Montreal

Packages include roundtrip airfare from Boston and/or New York and accommodations. Subject to change and availability. Taxes and other applicable fees not included

STA TRAVEL
www.statravel.com
(413) 256.1261

STSTRAVEL.COM
Join America's #1 Student Tour Operator
CANCUN
ACAPULCO
JAMAICA
BAHAMAS
FLORIDA
SPRING BREAK 2005
Sell Trips, Earn Cash & Travel Free
1-800-648-4849 www.ststravel.com

Discover Your LOVER
The Collegian Dating Game

HERE'S YOUR CHANCE TO PLAY

MATCHMAKER!

We've rounded up 3 Men and 3 Women.
You will decide who will date whom!

You've seen the Men, now here are the Women
Look in the Arts & Living Section

You pair them up...
We'll send them on their dates and let you know how it goes!
(Get to know them and pair them up online at www.dailycollegian.com)

UMass Amherst Student Activities Center
UP TO THE MINUTE

February 9
Music Injection Wednesdays:
Bring your lunch and get a healthy dose of live music between classes!
Student Union, Cape Cod Lounge
11am -1pm Free

International Movie Series:
Monsieur Abraham with Omar Sharif
Two unlikely characters begin a friendship in a 1960's working class Parisian neighborhood.
Campus Center Room 163C
8pm Free

February 10
Mix It Up Dance Series: A Night of Swing
Put on your zoot suits for a night of high flying swing dancing. Lessons from the Ballroom Dance Team. No partners needed!
Student Union Ballroom
7pm - 11pm Free

February 11-16
Fraternity & Sorority Recruitment
Look for posters for specific times and locations or stop by 308 Student Union.

February 12
Children's AIDS Awareness:
Date Auction sponsored by UVC-TV 19
Campus Center Auditorium
7:00pm Free

February 15
Jazz History: The Jon Bean Ensemble
Standards and original music played by undergraduate students.
Student Union, Cape Cod Lounge
11:15am - 12:30pm Free

Naked I: Monologues from Beyond the Binary
Monologues exploring the bodies and experiences of transgendered and intersexed people.
Student Union Ballroom
7pm Free

UMass Amherst Calendar of Events: www.umass.edu/studentsfirst

UMass will need to stop Hazelton

MEN'S HOOPS from page 10

Maxwell, who is the tallest of the guards at 6-foot-5, is still significantly shorter than Hazelton.

"We really don't have much of an alternative, (Viggiano) is not healthy. We do not have anybody else to play at the perimeter," Lappas said. "It's going to be Chadwick, Anderson, Maxwell and Bowers. We don't have anybody else. That's the way it is."

UMass is coming off its most dominating win of the season, a 74-58 shellacking of St. Bonaventure at the Mullins Center on Saturday, and is looking to gain momentum going into the final seven games of the season. The Minutemen have had trouble going on winning streaks this season and have only mustered one legitimate three-game winning streak.

Lappas, however, does not see the lopsided victory over the Bonnies as any fuel to the fire.

"It could, but I don't really foresee that. In other words I think that we would come out and play with the same kind of emotion against Rhode Island no matter what," Lappas said. "Obviously, though, it's better coming off a win. Once you throw that ball up, whatever happened in the last game doesn't really matter."

NOTE: Artie Bowers, who sprained his right thumb last Tuesday during practice, played against St. Bonaventure with the hand wrapped. Lappas mentioned that during Monday's practice, Bowers came out with the hand wrapped, but removed the tape during practice.

UM travels to hostile court

ROAD from page 10

splitting fashion.

So therein lies the problem for Steve Lappas' Minutemen, once again. Despite having finally proven that it can win on the road, UMass is in for a formidable challenge when it takes the court against Jim Baron's injury depleted URI squad tonight.

The Minutemen have overcome hostile environments at almost every turn this season — with a 59-52 setback at Saint Joseph's being the lone exception, and can even claim success in the Ryan Center itself after pulling a surprising upset of the NIT-bound Rams last season.

But as every A-10 coach will attest to, there is no such thing as an easy conference win on the road, and to fully establish themselves as road warriors and viable postseason contenders, Lappas and the Minutemen must continue to assert their road success and further what has been a growing trend of solid performances away from Amherst.

"I would put us in the category that we can win on the road. Forget about last year and the year before," Lappas said. "This team is completely different than last year, you have to talk about this year. We played Gonzaga on the road and played well, we beat GW on the road, we beat St. Bonnies on the road ... which are all tough places to play."

Several Patriots looking at the Hall

DUGGAN from page 10

appropriate now that Belichick has won his third championship.

The biggest argument for Parcells is that he has turned around four struggling franchises, but he has become something of a hired gun. He comes into town and shakes things up, but within a few years he burns out and moves on.

Belichick, on the other hand, seems intent on making New England the final stop of his coaching career. Rather than a quick remodeling job, he has crafted a team capable of winning over the long haul.

There are two other members of the Patriots who are almost guaranteed to feature busts in Canton when their careers are done. Both Tom Brady and Adam Vinatieri have been involved in the most dramatic moments of the Patriots' championship run.

Vinatieri is the most clutch kicker ever, as he has kicked two last-second, game-winning Super Bowl field goals. Obviously the Super Bowl kicks were significant, but Vinatieri's greatest kicks were the two he kicked in the 2001 Division round against Oakland in blizzard-like conditions.

Brady is the Patriot who gets the most credit for his part in the team's success, but he still has to deal with people saying he only manages the game and that his only role is to not lose games.

Brady might not have Peyton Manning's record 49 touchdown passes, but he has the biggest numbers in the most important categories. Brady is 57-14 as a starter, 9-0 in the playoffs and has two Super Bowl MVPs.

Whether or not he is on par with Joe Montana right now may prove to be a moot discussion. Brady is only 27 years old and has amazing durability. There seems to be no end in sight to this Patriots' dynasty, and Brady very well could end up atop the mountain of great quarterbacks.

There are four other Patriots on the fringe, who all could make a case for being Hall of Famers if they continue their level of production. Rodney Harrison, Corey Dillon, Ty Law and Richard Seymour have all been to numerous Pro Bowls and are among the best at their positions.

Harrison and Dillon seem likely to draw the most consideration when their time is up. Both have aided their causes by coming to an established winner and blending in seamlessly while taking the team to another level. Harrison has only been to two Pro Bowls, but that has more to do with his reputation as a dirty player than with his performance. For the past 11 seasons he has been the most feared, if not the best, safety in the league.

Dillon managed to make three Pro Bowl squads while wasting away in Cincinnati, and now his career has been revitalized. If the 30-year-old Dillon can put together a few more seasons like this year's, his numbers will stand up when compared to the best backs ever to play the game.

Law is a borderline selection, and Seymour is headed down the road towards the Hall. It's surprising to see that Law has only been a Pro Bowler three times during his 10-year career because he has been one of the top cornerbacks in the league for much of his career.

The best decision Law can make if he plans on becoming a Hall of Famer is to take a pay cut to stay in New England and return to his dominating form during another championship season or two.

It may be early to think about Seymour's Hall-of-Fame prospects, but he has begun to assert himself as one of the premier defensive linemen in the game. He has made the last three Pro Bowls, and if he continues to rake in those honors, it will be impossible for him to be overlooked when his career is over.

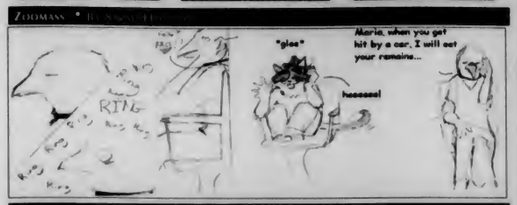
The debates about where this Patriots team stands in relation to all of the other great teams in NFL history will rage on for years to come. But while the Patriots place in history among the all-time best is unsettled, there is no disputing that this team reached such greatness as a result of incredible players more consumed with winning than personal glory.

The personal glory will come later when these players' achievements are looked back on and appreciated for how amazing they were.

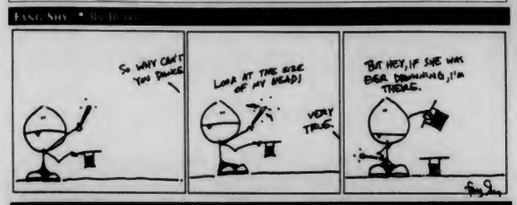
Thirsty for knowledge?
Say when.

FORTUNE 100 BEST COMPANIES TO WORK FOR 2004

At Ernst & Young, the opportunity for growth is enormous. We offer over 7,000 professional development programs — some of the best formal learning programs in the country — because our philosophy is People First. We recognize that our employees are essential to the firm's growth and success. And in order to attract the best talent, we've built an environment that Fortune® magazine has consistently recognized as one of the "100 Best Companies To Work For." So whether you're looking for a place to grow or a great place to work, look for our recruiters on campus. ey.com/us/careers



Audit • Tax • Transaction Advisory Services

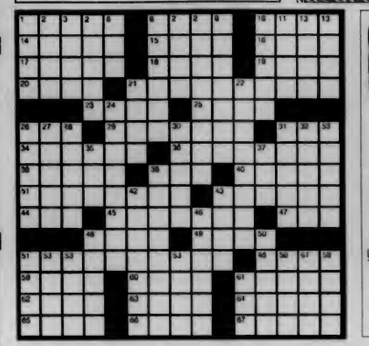


ERNST & YOUNG
Quality In Everything We Do

Quote of the Day

"We all have big changes in our lives that are more or less a second chance."

—Harrison Ford



ACROSS
1 Work alert
6 Pouchlike structures
10 Guitar adjuncts, briefly
14 Cons group
15 North Carolina university
16 Bearing
17 Poe's middle name
18 "Auntie __"
19 Notion
20 __ there, done that
21 Scattering
23 Drink voucher
25 "Exodus" author
26 June celebrant
28 Weirded out
31 Ovine statement
34 Political refugee
36 Uncanny state
38 Episcopal cleric
39 Steno book
40 Municipal
41 Unbalanced
43 Formal attire
44 Silent assent
45 Carnal
47 Permit to
48 Sound quality
49 Type of school
51 Unstoppable
55 Plaster support
58 Resting stop
60 Actress Skye
61 Far from specific
62 Roofer's supply item
63 Type of curl
64 Endangered layer
65 Vamoose!
66 Kennedy and Williams
67 Engaged in

DOWN
1 Wound covering
2 Healthy
3 Inactive
4 Former French currency unit
5 O's Scrabble value
6 Descendant of Shem
7 Unfortunately
8 Calculated
9 Lip-curler
10 Out of order
11 Calf-length skirt
12 Ball-shaped hammerhead
13 Hosiery mishap
21 Nose follower?
22 Mockery
24 Fard of films
26 Baffin Island's neighbor
27 Essential acid
28 Chopped into small cubes
30 Peruses
31 Stained surface
32 Stage whisper
33 Fancy caraval
35 Regular or high-test
37 Veto
39 Actress Cruz
42 Molar mender
43 Old salts
46 Bothers
48 Principle of faith
50 Public square
51 Monotonous routines
52 Historical novel
53 "Damn Yankees" vamp
54 Blyton or Bagnold
56 Excited
57 Dilly
58 Pay attention to 61 Oath

Find today's answers online

www.dailycollegian.com

THE HARP
Irish Pub
NEW!! Wireless Internet
OCMP & All Credit Cards accepted
February Special!
$1.50 PBR Bottles; Honey Brown, Moison
$2.00 A pint / $6.50 a pitcher
WED. ·Busted Vacuum
THU. ·Apollo Sunshine
FRI. ·Irish Sesiun
SAT. ·Savoy Shuffle
"Come Party Like You're Irish!"
413-548-6900 www.theharp.net
163 Sunderland Rd. - N. Amherst
Just north of the apartments

H·O·R·O·S·C·O·P·E·S

aquarius • Jan. 20-Feb. 18
If you're not careful, you're going to get hit by a bicycle.

pisces • Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Get a second opinion after you go to heath services.

aries • Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Today you can expect to hear some funky noises coming from your stomach.

taurus • Apr. 20-May 20
Don't blow that conversation out of proportion. You're thinking too much.

gemini • May 21-Jun. 21
Your shallow heart is the only thing that's beating. You walk alone.

cancer • Jun. 22-Jul. 22
There is new evidence that all the people in your major are weird.

leo • Jul. 23-Aug. 22
You never know who you might see while lounging in the Campus Center today.

virgo • Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Today you're going to see a hottie at the gym, which will make your workout even nicer.

libra • Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Today your slick moves will raise some eyebrows.

scorpio • Oct. 23-Nov. 21
Today is not the day you think it is. Get your mind straightened out.

sagittarius • Nov. 22-Dec. 21
You might just have to incorporate some V8 into your life.

capricorn • Dec. 22-Jan. 19
What are you doing reading the Collegian? You never read the Collegian!

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

ACTIVITIES

Foam party Montreal weekends $89 Montreal Express.Net (781)979-9001

ANNOUNCEMENTS

$600 Group Fundraiser Scheduling Bonus 4 hours of your group's time PLUS our free (yes, free) fundraising solutions EQUALS $1,000-$2,000 in earnings for your group. Call TODAY for a $450 bonus when you schedule your no-sales fundraiser with CampusFundraiser. Contact CampusFundraiser, (888)923-3238, or visit www.campusfundraiser.com

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Brandywine Apts. Now Leasing, 1&2 bedroom apts. Leases begin Jun, July, Aug or Sep. First come, first serve. Get them while they last. www.brandywine-apts.com stop by or call 549-0600

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Sunderland 2 bedroom townhouse on busline $830+, Call Erica 413-665-7794

1 bedroom available North Amherst $425 includes heat & electric, bright, clean, washer/dryer in Condo on bus route 1 mile to UMass female preferred Call Liz 508-367-8893

Center of town, 1, 2, 3 bedrooms, hardwood floors. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstlincolnreal-ty.com 253-7879

Hobart Condos 3 bedroom, hardwood floors, study area in basement. Cable, telephone (internet access) in all bedrooms and study. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstlincolnreal-ty.com 253-7879

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Amherst two bedroom condo on busline 875+, Call Paul 413-687-1416

AUTO FOR SALE

1999 Toyota Camry fully loaded. 75K, Mint condition. Call 413-348-4191

CHILDCARE

Babysitter 3 year old boy afternoon/evenings Amherst 413-256-3084

Early Riser Needed 7:00am to 8:15pm 2 to 4 days a week. Occasional afternoon and Evenings. For 8yr old girl. $10.00 an hr. Please call 584-8312 maria.galk@umassmed.edu

EMPLOYMENT

Make money taking online surveys earn $10 to $125 for surveys. Earn $25 to $250 for focus groups www.cashforstudents.com/umass

EMPLOYMENT

Prestigious Trail's End Camp- Pennsylvania Summer Camp – Guaranteed Experience of a Lifetime, Limited openings for Sports Specialists, Crafts Specialists, Waterfront Counselors (Lake and Pool) and General Counselors; June 19th – August 14th – Gain practical experience working with kids. www.trailsendcamp.jobs.com

Earn some money! Rent us your ears! Listening experiments $8/Hr 413-545-6837 phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu

Nanny position for 2 boys ages 6 & 9. Perfect schedule for student. Part time Spring. Full time Summer. Prior experience necessary. 413-625-2288

"Bartending" $300/Day Potential. No Experience Nesc. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

EMPLOYMENT

Earn lots of $$ and have fun on the water this Spring & Summer. Raft guides needed at Crab Apple Whitewater in Charlemont, MA. Fun Summer job, no experience necessary. We will train. 413-625-2288.

Movie extras, actors, models! Make $100-$300/day No experience required, FTPT, All looks needed! 1800-140-5939 Ext. 1054

HAPPY BIRTHDAY

HAPPY BIRTHDAY, MAGGIE SMERLAS! Best Wishes on your day of birth! Love, your buddies.

MISCELLANEOUS

$$$$ EARN EXTRA CASH!!! $$$$ Get friends, family, and fellow students to play fantasy baseball and earn cash. No risk. Go to www.ootleague.com/affiliate for details.

ROOM FOR RENT

350 per month 413-335-5226

SERVICES

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance 549-1906

Need Just Evacuation and Repatriation Coverage? Check out BETA! $250,000 Evacuation, $25,000 Repatriation COST is $18 for 6 MONTHS! Online enrollment, emailed verification of coverage www.betins.com

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth-control, and Emergency Contraception. Affordable and confidential. STI Screening and Treatment. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992.

SERVICES

Computer Consultants $20/hr we come to your dorm/house Certified technicians. Call Kris (413) 253-0215

TRAVEL

XXX Night Montreal Weekends $89 Montreal Express.net 1(781)979-9001

Spring Break 2005 Only 6 weeks left... Lowest Prices Biggest Parties Earn 2 Free Trips Exclusive with Sun Splash Tours www.sunsplashtours.com 1800-426-7710

Bahamas Spring Cruise 5 Days $299! Includes Meals, Celebrity Parties! Panama City, Daytona $159! Cancun, Jamaica, Acapulco, Nassau $499! Award Winning Company! SpringBreakTravel.com 1-800-678-6386

TRAVEL

#1 Spring Break Vacations! Cancun, Jamaica, Acapulco, Bahamas, & Florida! Best Parties, Best Hotels, Best Prices! Limited Space! 1-800-234-7007 www.endlesssummertours.com

WANTED

Egg Donors Needed. Help make a couple's dream of becoming parents come true by becoming an egg donor. Very generous compensation and expenses paid. Ages 21-32. Non-smokers only. For more information please visit our website at www.robertmcnabsess.com or contact Christine or Liz at 781-769-6900.

Snowboard events intern $50/day stipend. For job description email jfriends@deerfield.edu

Collegian Advertising 545-3500

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS WEDNESDAY

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 2005 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

UMass set to clash with Rams

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

It's amazing how much can change in a year.

On Jan. 31, 2004, the Massachusetts men's basketball team was just about down and out. It's record stood at 7-11 overall and conference play wasn't much better, as UMass struggled to 3-5 in the Atlantic 10. It was about time to pack in the season as any hopes of a post season bid began to drift away hand-in-hand with another gray Massachusetts winter.

The Minutemen were poised to play the University of Rhode Island that night, a team that had high hopes to make the NCAA tournament, and was almost a sure shot at the NIT tournament. It was almost certain that UMass was about to receive another dose of the same old.

The Maroon and White won its biggest game of the year that night, by a score of 67-63, stunning the Rams and the 6,705 in attendance at the Ryan Center. UMass would only win two more games out of its last 10, leaving the victory over URI as its final shining moment.

Now, a little more than a year later, the Maroon and White (11-8, 5-4 A-10) are traveling back to Kingston tonight for a 7:30 tip-off, to face a very different team under a completely opposite scenario.

The Rams (4-15, 2-6 A-10) have had a rough season thus far and are currently in second-to-last place in the Atlantic 10 Eastern Division, only two games ahead of St. Bonaventure (1-19, 0-9 A-10).

The Rams have lost several players this season, including preseason first-team Atlantic 10 pick Dawan Robinson with a stress fracture in his left foot, and Jamaal Wise who is nursing a stress fracture in his left leg. Robinson was the fourth leading scorer for the Rams last year, averaging 11.2 points per game, while Wise was a backup forward, averaging just over four points per contest.

Even though Rhode Island has been hit hard by injuries, and is currently in the midst of a four-game losing streak (all to Atlantic 10 opponents), UMass coach Steve Lappas is not taking this team lightly.

"They've had a lot of hard luck this year, no doubt. But when you go on the road, like we're going, you know, you're not looking to have any mercy for anybody," Lappas said. "We've just got to go out there and concentrate on what we're doing and try to do it to the best of our ability."

UMass freshman Lawrence Carrier will play in his first game against the Rhode Island Rams tonight. It will mark the 123rd meeting between the two teams, making this the longest rivalry in UMass history.

One of the main focuses for the Minutemen will have to be the Rams leading scorer, Scott Hazelton.

Hazelton is a transfer from the University of Connecticut, who was plagued with injuries and limited playing time while in Storrs. Since coming to URI, he has shined, averaging 16.4 ppg. and 7.1 rebounds, leading the Rams in both categories.

Hazelton stands at 6-foot-8, but plays much different than most players of his size. Hazelton frequents the three-guard position, which tends to create a mismatch around the perimeter. Standing sometimes six inches taller than his defender, Hazelton has hit 17 3-pointers this year, good for third on the team.

This presents an interesting match-up issue for the Minutemen, as their most versatile perimeter defender, Jeff Viggiano, is questionable for tonight's game. Viggiano had been seeing a good deal of playing time over the last two games, but may have tweaked an already tender ankle in practice on Monday.

Because of the uncertainty of Viggiano's status, Lappas will have to use the undersized guard quartet of Anthony Anderson, Maurice Maxwell, Chris Chadwick and Artie Bowers to defend Hazelton when he plays out on the perimeter.

See MEN'S HOOPS on page 8

Minutemen visiting a hostile court

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

In a conference full of antiquated, high school-style gyms that lack 21st century appeal but never hesitate to rock-and-roll when given the slightest provocation, the Thomas M. Ryan Center on the campus of the University of Rhode Island was built to be different — but not too different.

When the 54-million dollar arena first opened its doors in June of 2002, it marked a significant improvement over Keaney Gymnasium; Rhody's own 3,000-plus seat bandbox that had been home to men's and women's basketball on the South Kingstown campus for 49 years.

It gave the Rams a newfound appeal and credibility in the recruiting battles they had been losing to east coast schools with better facilities and the chance to capitalize on the newfound lust for big time basketball in South County brought on by a stirring run to the Elite Eight in 1998.

However, despite a state-of-the-art video scoreboard and acoustic system, eight luxury suites, brand new locker rooms and athletic facilities and 7,657 cushioned, chair-back seats, the Ryan Center is anything but a plush arena filled with corporate alums and local families of four.

Instead, as the members of the Massachusetts men's basketball team and any other squad in the Atlantic 10 surely know, those who step onto the court with the wood-grained Ram amidst a sea of sky blue are in for 40 minutes of hell that rival any A-10 venue, from Hawk Hill to the Reilly Center.

From the 700 seats reserved for blue-clad URI students — 50 of which are strategically placed behind the visitor's bench — to the three tiers of stands that hang over the court and put each and every fan no further than 74 feet from the action, the Ryan Center was created with the intention of making fans a significant part of the game, and those same fans have responded in kind by turning out in hordes to support the Rams in earlier years.

See ROAD on page 8

McCutcheon appointed to NCAA Football Committee

Massachusetts Athletic Director John McCutcheon has been chosen to serve on the NCAA Division I-AA Football Committee.

His four-year tenure on the committee will officially begin on Sept. 1, and will come to a close on the same date in 2009.

The eight-person committee will oversee Division I-AA's East Region.

"I am glad to be able to represent the conference on the Division I-AA Football Committee," McCutcheon told UMass Media Relations. "Anytime you have the opportunity to represent your institution and conference on a national level, it is a privilege."

Along with a list of assigned duties, perhaps his most important as a member of the committee will be to assist with the selection of playoff teams and develop the I-AA playoff bracket.

McCutcheon has represented the UMass athletic department for a year now, as he became the sixth permanent athletic director at UMass since 1911 when he was hired on Feb. 4, 2004.

He replaced Ian McCaw, who departed to Baylor after only holding the job for a year.

The other four athletic directors before McCutcheon's arrival in Amherst were Curry Starr Hicks from 1911-1948, Warren P. McGuirk from 1948-1971, Frank McInerney from 1972-1992 and Bob Marcum from 1993-2002.

McCutcheon served as the athletic director at California Polytechnic State University in San Luis Obispo from 1992-2004.

Before his trip out west, he was involved with the Boston College athletic department from 1980-1992, and served as the assistant athletic manager at the University of Maine from 1977-1980.

He has been a member of the National Associated of College Directors of Athletics since 1992 and has served on the NCAA Management Council, the Division I-AA Athletic Directors Association Executive Com-mittee and the Big West Conference Executive Committee.

— Jeff Howe

Crennel changes his colors

By Tom Withers
Associated Press

BEREA, Ohio — Romeo Crennel's long wait is over. An assistant coach for 35 years, he's finally in charge.

Fresh from winning a third Super Bowl title as New England's defensive coordinator, Crennel was introduced yesterday as coach of the Cleveland Browns, a team with far more imperfections than the one he left.

"I've been somewhat successful as a position coach. Now being able to take the reins of a team and try to run a whole team, that's special," Crennel said at a news conference.

"I'm excited about it. I want to be successful, and I want to win and that's what I want to try to bring to Cleveland, a winning football team."

The 57-year-old Crennel is the 11th full-time coach in Browns history and the team's first black coach. He's the NFL's sixth minority coach, but the only one with a Super Bowl ring for each finger of one hand.

Crennel received a five-year, $11 million contract from the Browns, who are coming off a disastrous 4-12 season that was scuttled by major injuries and highlighted by the resignation of Butch Davis on Nov. 30.

In hiring Crennel, the Browns, who are just 30-66 with one playoff appearance since returning to the league in 1999, selected an older, more experienced coach instead of going for an up-and-coming college candidate, as they did in 2001 when they plucked Davis from the University of Miami.

Crennel joins Tony Dungy of Indianapolis, Marvin Lewis of Cincinnati, Dennis Green of Arizona, Herman Edwards of the New York Jets and Lovie Smith of Chicago among the league's black head coaches.

As Crennel was being introduced by the Browns, the Patriots were being paraded through the streets of Boston. But Crennel knew he was in the right place.

"Considering the alternative, this is a good one to be at," said Crennel, who was joined at the news conference by his wife, Rosemary, and two of his three daughters.

Crennel, who began his pro coaching career with the New York Giants in 1981, was passed over for head coaching jobs in the past. Last year, he interviewed with several teams, including Buffalo, Oakland and Chicago. The year before, he spoke with San Francisco about the job that eventually went to Dennis Erickson.

But after the Browns interviewed him on Jan. 7, they knew Crennel was their guy. Except for a small window during the Patriots' postseason bye week, league rules prohibited the Browns from having any discussions with Crennel while New England was still playing.

The secret was out, though, and if the Browns were having any doubts about Crennel as their choice, he reassured them by devising defensive schemes that stopped Indianapolis and Pittsburgh in the AFC playoffs.

Hall-of-Fame talent joins to form a championship team

Dan Duggan

They've been labeled as a collection of unsung heroes. They've been branded as "team players" so often that this phrase has begun to seem demeaning to the players' individual abilities. Now that the New England Patriots have recorded their third Super Bowl win in four years, this band of no-names must be recognized for what they are: a group of supremely talented, unselfish individuals willing to sacrifice personal statistics and big money in order to contribute to a championship team.

The time has come to recognize that the role players on this roster are integral to the success of the Patriots and would be standouts on lesser teams. And for all the talk of the lack of Hall of Famers on this squad, a few players are quietly building resumes worthy of earning a spot in Canton when their playing days are done.

Contrary to what most television analysts have harped on for the past two years, there are at least six potential Hall of Fame players on the roster as well as the coach who is a lock.

Bill Belichick has the best winning percentage in postseason history with a 10-1 mark. The past two years have vaulted him into the all-time great discussion as he has led the Pats to a 34-4 record and the longest winning streak in NFL history with 21 straight victories spanning from last year to Week 7 of this season.

In the process, Belichick has constructed the model franchise for all of professional sports. The comparisons to Bill Parcells don't seem

See DUGGAN on page 8

Adam Vinatieri kicked the game-winning field goal in last year's Super Bowl to beat the Panthers.

LaSalle ends 23-year drought

By Brendian Hall
Collegian Staff

It took a few decades, but the LaSalle Lady Explorers finally pulled it off.

For the first time since December of 1981, the Explorers (10-11, 4-6 Atlantic 10) were on the winning end of a basketball game against the George Washington Colonials (14-7, 7-3 A-10), as they notched a 65-53 upset of GW last Saturday to snap a 23-game losing streak against the Colonials.

The Explorers caught GW on an unusually poor day of offensive production, as the Colonials committed 16 turnovers and shot a measly 29.4 percent from the floor. All-America candidate Anna Montana still threw down a double-double with a 20-point, 11-rebound effort, but she shot just 33 percent on the day.

Meghan Wilkinson received A-10 Co-Player of the Week honors following her 14-point, 12-rebound performance against George Washington. Nine of the senior's 14 points came from 3-point land. Sophomore Crista Ricketts was the point leader on the day, nearly pulling off her own double-double with 25 points and nine rebounds.

The Explorers followed up their upset with 77-48 thrashing of the Fordham Rams on Sunday, to go on their second two-game winning streak of the season.

Musketeers 'X'ed again

Following their heartbreaking loss to No. 22 Temple last week, the Xavier Musketeers regrouped and came out strong for a Friday evening matchup in Pittsburgh, Pa., with Tara Boothe nailing a then-season-high 28 points in an 88-68 thumping of the Duquesne Dukes.

Like their match against Temple, Sunday's game against Richmond had crucial A-10 implications standing behind it. And once again, the Muskies faltered in the spotlight.

Despite a career-high 34-point, 10-rebound effort by Boothe — her 22nd career double-double — XU (14-7, 8-2 A-10) came up shortchanged yet again, this time dropping a 72-65 decision to the Spiders (17-4, 8-2 A-10).

After letting the Musketeers take a 36-32 lead early in the second half, the Spiders went on a tear, embarking on a 22-6 run over the next six minutes. All-America candidate Kate Flavin scored 11 of her 27 points on the run.

Following the win, the A-10 West now looks very tightly knit at the top. Richmond has worked its way into a tie for first place with Xavier following their win, with both teams standing at 8-2 in the conference. Both teams, however, still have to go through George Washington later this month.

Xavier served up a huge 57-42 defeat of the Colonials on Jan. 16, while GW cruised by Richmond three days later, winning that affair 69-57.

Ringing their bell

As if winning three gold medals, being a WNBA All-Star and turning around a basketball program that was, until recently, so-so isn't enough, Temple women's basketball coach Dawn Staley was given the honor of ringing the opening bell at America's first stock exchange Friday.

The event marked the fourth bell ringing ceremony in a yearlong series of special openings at PHLX. Staley was also promoting "Go Red for Women," a nationwide initiative that urges women to prioritize their heart health.

The Daily Collegian

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 2005 NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY • EST. 1890 VOLUME CXV ISSUE 77

Muslim female comic comes to NoHo
ARTS & LIVING, PAGE 6

TODAY: High: 34° Low: 18° | FRIDAY: High: 34° Low: 16° | SATURDAY: High: 37° Low: 18°

DAILY WEATHER FORECAST

Minutemen pick up win in Rhode Island
SPORTS, PAGE 12

Brennan out; Morrison in as new SGA Speaker

By Julie O'Donnell
Collegian Staff

Members of the Student Government announced big plans last night to institutionalize the "Back to the People" meetings that would enforce mandatory Senator attendance. Additionally, acting Speaker Mark Morrison was officially sworn in as Speaker of the SGA upon the resignation of Seamus Brennan.

After the brief announcement of Brennan's letter of resignation, the Associate Chief Justice swore in Morrison as the new Speaker of the SGA. Morrison was elected as the Assistant Speaker late last semester after the SGA held its meetings without an associate for a better part of the semester.

"I am glad to see a new speaker," said Eduardo Bustamante, President of the SGA.

Over the past week, Morrison has also been interviewing potential candidates for the Associate Speaker position.

"Maxine Dubeaux, will be our next associate speaker candidate," Morrison said. "I think that we would be in great hands – it's time to get business done."

Members of the Executive Cabinet have been conducting and attending monthly meetings at rotating dining commons to receive student input about qualms with the university. Last night, the Senate voted to institutionalize these meetings, making it mandatory for all Senators to attend.

Senator Sean Bliss, who has been attending these meeting since Fall semester, encouraged other Senators that this motion is essential in constituent communication.

"We are building communication here, that is what is important," Bliss said. "If we institutionalize [these meetings], then it will be positive."

These meetings, dubbed "Back to the People," are an effort by the SGA to grasp what students are looking for to better their educational experience. If the requests are overwhelming and feasible, the SGA begins the implementation process to complete the requests.

According to Bliss and Bustamante, these meetings have been extremely successful already.

"Thirty four out of thirty five people we asked in Franklin Dining Common asked for paper towels in the bathrooms," Bliss said. "Now, we are currently working on getting that for them, and it will happen."

Additionally, Bustamante said that several students were complaining about noisy construction near their dorms in the early morning. After Bustamante met with the construction workers, an agreement was reached for the workers to begin construction later in the morning.

"[Back to the People meetings] are to solicit student feedback," Bustamante said. "Also it is a chance for them to ask how to get involved."

Bustamante was also pleased to announce the progress of the textbook rental system and that an answer may be reached by the end of the month.

"Textbook consultants sent a report and they seemed to think that students are happy with the current system, which

See SGA on page 2

Mark Morrison is sworn in as the SGA Speaker at last night's meeting.

UMass increases tuition

By Matt Elder
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts' finance committee proposed increasing tuition and fees at the University's four campuses, including a total $598 increase for in-state residents who live on the Amherst campus.

If the proposition is passed at the Board of Trustees meeting on Feb. 16, it would be the fourth year in a row that the cost of attending the University has increased.

"Fees on occasion are increased," said Ed Blaguszewski, the Director of News and Information at UMass. "My understanding is that it's pretty much at or below the cost of living."

Across all four campuses, the increase in fees averages out to about $266 per student, and the increase in room and board will average out to about $330.

The increase, which will not affect tuition, will average at about 3.2 percent, making UMass $15,795 for an in-state resident. Out-of-state students will pay $24,586. With the increase, UMass will be the 9th most expensive state school in the United States. In public schools like UMass, tuition goes to the state and fees go to the university.

"It is our desire to keep costs as low as possible, while at the same time generating the funds that are needed to provide the academic opportunities that our students deserve and that our knowledge-based economy demands," said University President Jack M. Wilson in a press release.

Wilson recommended the increase.

"I'm disappointed. It's expected though," said Eduardo Bustamante, Student Government Association President.

Bustamante said that he was upset at the continued increases. He said that he thinks the school is moving away from a local commitment, adding that he thought the school was focusing its attention on upper-class students, rather than middle and lower-class.

"They're going to privatize a public school," Bustamante said.

Despite all the increases, Bustamante said that he doesn't think the student's quality of life is getting any better. He said the money is "absolutely not" affecting students in a positive way.

"The administration keeps growing, class availability is worse. There's a number of problems," Bustamante said.

Blaguszewski said that the University is spending its money wisely, and that each student's quality of life is a case-by-case basis.

"We think the University is putting money into the quality of education," he said.

The increase, which is expected to pass at the meeting, is meant to keep up with inflation, which was estimated at 3.5 percent, as measured by the consumer price index for the Northeast Urban Region.

Blaguszewski said that the University will use the money for many things, including maintain-

See TUITION on page 3

Arlene Avakian, director of Women's Studies at UMass questions the social use of a male birth control pill.

Shown above, the UMass Medical Center in Worcester, in conjunction with a Norwegian company, is the center of a study on first ever male birth control pills.

A male alternative

New male birth control pill could be the wave of the future

By Matt Belliveau
Collegian Correspondent

"Don't worry, I'm on the pill."

One day, that could be a man speaking.

And with the new agreement between the Norwegian-based company Spermatech AS, and the University of Massachusetts Medical School, that day may come sooner than you think.

Spermatech researchers are in the planning stages of creating a drug that could possibly block sperm's ability to swim as well as its ability to fertilize an egg.

This would not be the first attempt in creating birth control for men, but it would be the first to avoid tinkering with male hormones.

Previously, researchers have found that it is extremely difficult to suppress sperm production while maintaining normal male hormone levels.

A drop in a man's hormone levels would likely cause a lowered muscle mass, a loss of sexual drive, and other testosterone-related effects.

This new drug would instead affect a specific protein in the production of sperm that would inhibit their movement while forgoing the hormonal side effects that women currently experience in taking the pill.

Male students at UMass seemed to be split in their first reactions to the idea of a male birth control pill.

"I think it's great that we'll be given a chance to contribute in the act of birth control," said Dirk Barron, a junior at UMass. "A birth control pill could act as a back-up to condoms, which might break during sex."

However, Barron admitted he thinks the new pill might not be 100 percent safe.

"I love the idea of having another option, but I just have a hard time believing that there won't be any harmful side effects, physically as well as sexually," said Barron.

Today, American men are left with only two realistic methods of birth control: condoms and vasectomies. Both however, have drawbacks.

"For one thing, condoms aren't cheap, and a lot of guys dislike them because they decrease sensation and can spoil the mood," said Barron. "Vasectomies, on the other hand, would guarantee infertility, but I'm way to young for a vasectomy."

While the majority of the public may see this future development as a gift to American men, the creation of a male birth control pill may act as an even larger reward to women and the women's movement.

See CONTRACEPTIVES on page 3

Rice threatens Iran with U.N. sanctions

By Anne Geran
Associated Press

BRUSSELS, Belgium — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice warned Iran on Wednesday that it risks U.N. action if negotiations with Europe over its nuclear program don't progress.

Nearing the end of a fence-mending tour of European allies, Rice also said she encountered "a kind of coming together of common purpose" on another troubled front: Iraq. Several countries committed to help train Iraqi forces and participate in an upcoming NATO training mission.

"I heard devotion to helping more on the reconstruction side

See RICE on page 2

Longtime journalist dies at the age of 83

By Hannah Drake
Collegian Staff

Carroll Robbins, a former executive editor of the Union News, now known as The Republican of Springfield, passed away Sunday, Jan. 23 of prostate cancer and other illnesses. He was 83.

The late Carroll Robbins' love for the world grew from his love for literature, said his son Paul Robbins of Wilbraham. Robbins, who graduated in 1948 from the University of Massachusetts Amherst was a Daily Collegian editor while he pursued his English degree. He became a journalism connoisseur in the Springfield area, racking up more than half a century's worth of experience during his career.

"He was very proud to be involved with the Collegian," said Paul Robbins. "It really helped start his career."

As an editor for The Union-News, Carroll Robbins was especially helpful to young journalists. Both son Paul Robbins and daughter Carolyn Robbins-Chipkin, of Springfield, commented on their father's aptitude for teaching.

"He felt he could make an impression, give [young journalists] direction," Paul Robbins said.

"My dad had great respect and admiration for budding journalists," wrote Carolyn Robbins in a fax correspondence.

"He enjoyed sharing his love of the craft with young people. Despite his many promotions to various editing jobs at the old Daily News and his appointment as the first executive editor of the Union News, he firmly believed that the best job at the newspaper was being a reporter. He loved politics and was a student of municipal government," she said.

"He never accepted anything at face value. He was insistent that reporters give readers the background needed to understand the significance of a story," Carolyn Robbins wrote.

See ROBBINS on page 3

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center
University of Massachusetts
Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief Peter Foundas
Managing Editor Mike Martelli
Business Manager Rich Pacheco
Production Manager Cory Rosenberg
Night Supervisor Meghan Healy
Advertising Manager Tiffany Sugalski
Editorial Production Samantha M. Nielsen
Arts & Living Editor Michael Busack
Copy Editor Alyson Zillmann
Editorial Editor Yousef Munayyer
Editorial Editor Allison Edles
News Editor Erika Lorley
Photo Editor Alex Demosthene
Sports Editor Bob McGovern
Circulation Manager Kristen Weiss
Classified Advertising Marty Pappas
Distribution Manager Josh Riggins
Finance Manager Hiruk Shah
Accounting Clerk Virginie Frecaut
Human Resource Sandra Marquez
Assistant Operations Linda Wallack
Assistant Advertising Josh Greenberg
Assistant Business Nathan Chomsky
Assistant Finance Thomas Hecht
Advertising Production Rachael Bruno
Graphics Advisor Charlie Higgins
Asst. Arts & Living Matthew O'Rourke
Asst. Arts & Living Chris Gazzara
Assistant News Julie O'Donnell
Assistant News Dan O'Brien
Assistant Photo Megan Brinster
Assistant Sports Jeff Howe

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts calendar semester. The Collegian is independently funded, operating on advertising revenue. Founded in 1890, the paper began as Aloha Life. It became the College Signal in 1901, the Weekly Collegian in 1914 and the Tri-Weekly Collegian in 1950. Published daily since 1967. The Collegian has been broadsheet since January 1994. For advertising rates and information, call 545-3500 between 8:30 a.m. and 5:30 p.m.

Production Crew
On staff today

Night Editor
Michael Busack
Photo Technician
Megan Brinster
Copy Editor
Alyson Zillmann
Production Supervisor
Molly Eggleston
Production Staff
Lauren Egavian, Melody Natal

Volunteer fair held at UMass

By Jessica Zolotorofe
Collegian Correspondent

From working with animals at a shelter, to raising money for cancer research, there are a wide array of ways to volunteer in the University of Massachusetts Amherst community.

A bi-annual community service fair was held yesterday by the University of Massachusetts Community Service Organization in the Student Union Ballroom. Over 55 non-profit organizations displayed methods of getting involved and helping their particular causes.

Organization members spoke about ways to get academic credits for community service projects, such as independent studies, community service learning courses and practicums, as well as ways to get other clubs and organizations involved in volunteer work.

Angela Tipton of the Dakin Animal Shelter in Leverett explained the flexibility of participating in community service.

"Depending on what kind of time you have, volunteering can be very flexible. Dakin is willing to accommodate you," Tipton said.

Tipton shared her experience as an intern last semester, explaining her service working with animals didn't take much effort.

"You can take anywhere from one to three credits. One credit is only thirty hours of work over the entire semester," Tipton said. "It makes me happy to place homeless animals and we have a spaying program for stray cats, which is very rewarding."

For the many students who feel their lives are too busy for community service, programs such as "Dinner On Us" offer ways to get involved with a minimal time commitment. Anaar Desai, a UMass student, was browsing booths at the fair and signed up for the program, which allows students interact with young children.

"I saw that it only takes eight hours of community service," Desai said. "I'm in a community health class and I need community service for a requirement. I also like working with young children, so that caught my attention."

Megan Brinster/Collegian

Students approach tables at the UMass Community Service Fair held yesterday in the Student Union Ballroom.

Some students feel that community service may cut into their social lives, but with fun activities such as participating in a bowl or ski-a-thon, running in the "Relay for Life" to raise money for cancer research, or helping make props or costumes for the Rainbow Players group, which is an open arms production group for developmentally disabled people, you can have fun while you give back to the community.

"The theater's really a way for people to come above their labels and disabilities and see that they have gifts," said Ezzell Floranina, of the Rainbow Players group.

The Rainbow group performed in Ireland last year and they have been invited back. The group is looking for people to help fundraise so they can return to Ireland this year.

Nicole Lohr, a volunteer for the American Cancer Society spoke about the "Relay for Life" and why she chose to get involved in this cause.

"In my personal life I've been affected by cancer as many people have, whether it be personally or a family member or friend," Lohr said. "I decided to get involved so I can make a change and bring this issue into the light for college students."

"This is my last semester and UMass offers so many great opportunities that I wanted to take advantage of while I was still here," said John Bruyere, a senior a UMass, "So I came to the fair to learn how to get involved in the community. Some of these programs are just unbelievable."

Bruyere said he was especially interested in "Project Sunshine" because as a premed student, he was drawn to the cause. Project Sunshine is a student-formed organization that brings students to children's hospitals to interact with the ill children; playing games with them, listening to music, or just talking.

Tracy Squires of the Gay Lesbian Bisexual Transgender Community Center for Youth was recruiting volunteers 23 to 25-years-old to tutor, advise, and work with gay, bi-sexual, lesbian, and transgender children ages 13 to 21.

"It is a great place," said Squires. "It's empowering that youths have power to make decisions as to the direction of the center."

If you would like more information about any of these organizations or other community projects, please contact the Office of Community Service Learning at (413)-545-2015, or by email at servelearn@acad.umass.edu.

Student group is looking for members

By Matt Hoffman
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts chapter of the Massachusetts Students Public Interest Resource Group , a public interest research group dealing with public concerns across the state, will be having an informational meeting in an attempt to recruit students interested in the group's agenda, tonight at 7 p.m. in campus center room 168. However, if classes are canceled due to snow, the meeting will be rescheduled for Monday at the same time and place.

The meeting will allow those interested in becoming involved with MassPIRG to learn about opportunities available to them through the organization. Students will also be able to learn about the various issues that MassPIRG is researching and dealing with.

The issue that MassPIRG has been most focusing on lately is the "Energy Efficiency Campaign."

"We are wasting a ton of energy through the use of inefficient appliances," said Tim Austin, the campus organizer for MassPIRG.

In the past legislative year, a commonwealth-wide bill on the matter almost passed, as there was a majority for the proposed law in both the State House and Senate.

The Energy Efficiency Standards Bill would require that producers of a list of 17 appliances, such as emergency exit signs and street lights, adhere to a requirement for energy efficiency.

However, the Energy Committee, under pressure from special interest groups, and the leaders in the State House did not allow the bill to be voted on, according to Austin. Meanwhile, groups such as the coin-operated laundry industry complained about the higher cost of appliances that they would have to buy when their old appliances needed to be replaced.

Yet, MassPIRG says that calculating the cost-benefit of buying the more efficient appliances would take about one and a half years.

Austin said the purpose of MassPIRG's launch of their campaign this year is to increase the profile of the energy issue and put pressure on those in congress.

UMass physics professor Mark Tuminen points out the energy crisis of the 1970's to explain why he thinks this issue is of such importance.

"Petroleum production peaked in the U.S. back in the 1970's. Current data indicates that world petroleum production is most probably at a peak right now," Tuminen said. "Energy consumption in the U.S. far exceeds that of any other country in the world. Energy efficiency and conservation must become a priority as we move beyond the age of petroleum. It's both a matter of economics and survival."

According to Austin, the state of Massachusetts has poor air quality compared to many states. Due to this condition, asthma rates have soared in the commonwealth in the past 20 years.

See MASSPIRG on page 2

Iran faces sanctions

RICE from page 1

and, most importantly, to helping with the training of the security forces inside of Iraq, outside of Iraq, in the NATO training mission," the secretary said.

Rice said the United States had set no deadline on the Iran talks, but that they cannot go on forever. She added the Bush administration had not changed its view that the United Nations should step in to get tougher on Iran.

In Washington, President Bush said the Iranians needed to know that the free world was working together to send a clear message: don't develop a nuclear weapon.

"And the reason we're sending that message is because Iran with a nuclear weapon would be a very destabilizing force in the world," Bush said.

New type of male birth control

CONTRACEPTIVES from page 1

"The women's movement is all about the freedom to choose, and I see the male birth control pill as one more option for everyone," said Breitta Jones, a UMass student.

For nearly 40 years, women who wanted to take birth control have been forced to deal with the side effects that come with taking the pill.

"Many people, men specifically, do not realize the medical risks and side effects that may occur in taking birth control. They are low in occurrence, but it is still a drug, and as such should be treated with the same respect," said Jones. "Women who take it are not just taking reproductive responsibility, they are also taking on all the medical risks associated with the drug such as nausea, blood clots, and high blood pressure."

There is also some concern of how a male birth control pill would be received in today's political climate. As of today, the Federal Drug Association has legislation pending that would give pharmacists the ability to refuse filling a woman birth control prescriptions if it violates his or her moral standards.

Amanda Collings, Community Health and Patient Educator in University Health Services at UMass, feels that a form of male birth control is long overdue.

"We can put a man on the moon, and yet we have such a limited amount of options when it comes to controlling our fertility. It's amazing to me that we don't have better methods of contraception available when you consider how much money is poured into the pharmaceutical industry."

Arlene Avakian, director of the Women's Studies program at UMass, is uncertain just how much success a male birth control pill will have in the American public and whether or not men can be trusted to take the pill habitually.

"I think it's terrific, that men would have to take responsibility for birth control. And also, taking some burden of the risk, because all of this is risky," said Avakian. "But on the other hand, I wonder whether women can trust that men will really take the pill. Men aren't the ones who will become pregnant. They are not the ones, necessarily, who will have to suffer the consequences, or the joys of pregnancy."

"Until you have more of a egalitarian relationship between women and men structurally, that will always be the question," said Avakian. "But I think in a long term relationship, where there was a lot of trust and egalitarianism you could trust this, but if it were me, I'm not sure that I would trust it."

Alicia Desjardians, a UMass student, agrees that while some men may forget to take the pill, it isn't going to effect her opinion on male birth control.

"If the guy is really serious about the pill, then he should take the responsibility to remember to take it," said Desjardians. "Even girls forget once in a while, and it is expected that guys will too, but I still support this."

In between the entire debate, Breitta Jones is still able to give her ultimate summary of what she feels is the reward of this new development, the reward of another choice.

"Birth control is all about choice, and the more choices the better. With the addition of a male counterpart to female birth control there will be a level playing field, and whether men or their partners choose to take advantage of it, at least they will have the option.

Locally known journalist dies

ROBBINS from page 1

Within Carroll Robbins's first six months as the executive editor of the Union-News, according to Carolyn Robbins he had the large task of merging the afternoon and the daily newspaper into a single publication.

"In his work life he demonstrated curiosity, persistence, determination — some might say stubbornness — in trying to get to the truth. He approached his job with a sense of idealism — a belief that the newspaper can make a difference in improving the life of citizens in a community. He was a model of courage and was a source of inspiration to us all," she wrote.

"People knew him as a journalist, we knew him as an adventurer," Paul Robbins said.

"He loved traveling and drinking in new experiences of the world. He really had the mind of a 20-year-old. He started painting when he retired, went to Australia with me, Italy with my sister, and visited the Panama Canal by himself," he added.

A veteran of World War II, serving in the Philippines, Carroll Robbins graduated from UMass under the G.I. Bill. In addition to working for the Collegian, Robbins was active in UMass's literary magazine. Daughter Carolyn Robbins wrote that he spoke fondly of his days at the Collegian, and followed the football and basketball teams until he died.

Robbins spent more than 50 years as a political writer, columnist, and editor in the Springfield area. He served as president of the New England Society of Newspaper Editors and was president of the Valley Press Club.

At his funeral, which was held on Wednesday, January 26, Paul Robbins gave the eulogy. According to The Republican, prior to his death Robbins asked his father what he believed was the meaning of life.

Reportedly, without blinking, his father answered, "to have fun." He is survived by wife Jean Vivian, four children, Christine Robbins-Hamilton, Jo Anne O'Neil, Paul J. Robbins, and Carolyn Robbins-Chipkin—who currently writes editorial columns for The Republican—and ten grandchildren.

His first wife, Rose B. Robbins, died in 2001.

Students face tuition increase

TUITION from page 1

ing and renovating the buildings on campus, and "rebuilding the faculty." Blaguszewski said that last year's disturbances in the Southwest Residential Area did not affect any of the increases.

Wilson told the Associated Press that the University will try to give more financial aid to students who have trouble keeping up with the growing costs.

"We're investing the funds in improving the quality of education," he said, adding that the state does not give the University as much money as it needs.

In 1996, the average fees for an in-state undergraduate student was $4,919, but decreased in 2001 to $4,681. After the 2001 year, fees started rising, including a $2,491 hike from 2003 to 2004.

UMass Amherst out-of-state undergraduate students will receive the highest increase, a rise in $864. Out-of-state graduate student fees will be increased by $853.

More church sex abuse cases pending

By Denise Lavoie
Associated Press

BOSTON — Despite the conviction of defrocked priest Paul Shanley on child molestation charges, the sex abuse scandal in the Roman Catholic Church is far from over, with dozens of civil lawsuits pending in the Boston Archdiocese alone.

There is only one known upcoming criminal case against a priest in the Boston Archdiocese, but there are more than 100 civil lawsuits accusing church officials of sexually abusing children. In California, there are more than 800 civil cases.

"I firmly believe there are victims from the '90s who we have not yet heard from," said Phil Saviano, who founded the New England chapter of Survivors [illegible] those Abused by [illegible] were [illegible] then when [illegible] they had free rein and could act without consequences."

Shanley, 74, was one of the most notorious priests in the scandal. He was convicted Monday of repeatedly raping and fondling a boy at a parish outside Boston in the 1980s.

He was one of fewer than a dozen priests who have been prosecuted in the Boston area. Most priests accused of wrongdoing escaped prosecution because the statute of limitations ran out long ago. But Shanley had moved out of state, stopping the clock.

Another central figure in the scandal, defrocked priest John Geoghan, was convicted of groping a 10-year-old boy. Geoghan was beaten and strangled in prison in 2003.

The Rev. Paul Hurley is awaiting trial after being charged in 2003 with repeatedly [illegible] by raping a teenage boy for sex inside the rectory of a Cambridge church in 1987 and 1988. He has pleaded innocent.

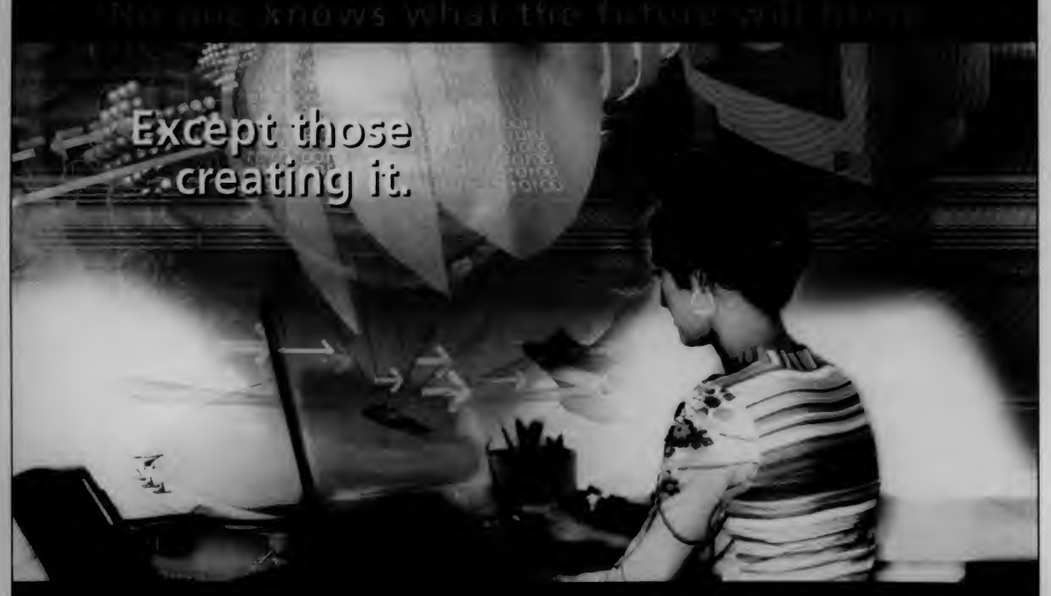
Matthew Cavanaugh/AP

Defrocked priest Paul Shanley sits in a Cambridge courtroom Monday before being found guilty on sex abuse charges.

Speaker sworn in

SGA from page 1

I totally disagree with," he said. "Hopefully sometime this month we will know the fate [of the textbook rental system.]"



Senator members voted on several important items including electing a Chancellor of Elections and Election Commissioners. The duty of the Chancellor is to oversee the presidential elections that will be held this upcoming April, and the Elections Commissioners will man the voting places.

Ambreen Rafiq was appointed to the Chancellor position, and Dhruv K. Bhasin, Hemshankar Sanlal, Caitlin Burbidge and Albert Dennis were appointed to be elections commissioners.

Governor Talardeau of Southwest also announced last night the plans for Southwest Week, which will be running the first week of May. The finalized plans include an outdoor carnival, an open-mic night, the annual Battle of the Bands contest and a band that will play on the horseshoe that has yet to be determined.

Plans also include proactive contests and games including a safe sex campaign and "Hoops against Hate," where students will participate in a three-on-three basketball tournament with their pledge to be committed to spreading social justices. Each player will receive a ribbon that will decorate the basketball court fence.

No one knows what the future will bring.

Visit our Career Fair Booth on Wednesday, February 16.

Opportunities are available in the following areas:

Computer Science
Computer Engineering
Electrical Engineering
Mechanical Engineering
Math
Physics
Systems Engineering
Aeronautical Engineering
Optics

Check out our website at rayjobs.com/campus for further information, including our Campus Recruiting Events.

Start your job search by clicking Find a Job.

The power of applied intelligence.

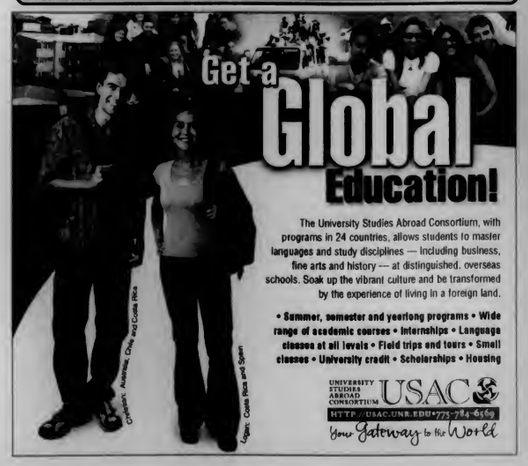
One of the most admired defense and aerospace systems suppliers through world-class people and technology. Our focus is developing great talent.

© 2005 Raytheon Company. All rights reserved. Raytheon is an equal opportunity and affirmative action employer and welcomes a wide diversity of applicants. U.S. Citizenship and security clearance may be required.

Raytheon
Customer Success Is Our Mission

ATKINS FARMS
Country Market
Rte. 116 & Bay Road, South Amherst, MA
(413) 253-9528 * (800) 594-9537
www.atkinsfarms.com

Follow Your Heart To Atkins Farms
You'll Find Gifts in Every Department.



Sweets for your Sweet
Chocolates, Fudge, Truffles & Specialty Valentine Baskets

Cookies for your Cookie
Heart Shaped Cakes & Cookies
Cookie Trays & Valentine Cupcakes.

Blossoms for your Blossom
Roses, Bud vases, Arrangements & Mixed Bouquets

We deliver to the surrounding area or can wire flowers anywhere in the USA. (413) 253-9528

Or Visit Atkins Flower Shop
for your Valentine Flower & Gift Needs
Located in the UMass Campus Center,
For Your Convenience (413) 549-9405
UMass U-Card accepted.

The University Studies Abroad Consortium, with programs in 24 countries, allows students to master languages and study disciplines — including business, fine arts and history — at distinguished, overseas schools. Soak up the vibrant culture and be transformed by the experience of living in a foreign land.

• Summer, semester and yearlong programs • Wide range of academic courses • Internships • Language classes at all levels • Field trips and tours • Small classes • University credit • Scholarships • Housing

University Studies Abroad Consortium USAC
http://usac.unr.edu • 775-784-6569
Your Gateway to the World

Frost your own cupcake!

Valentine's Day
February 14th in all DCs

Choose from white or chocolate cake, 3 types of frosting, cinnamon hearts, conversation hearts, mini chocolate chips, shredded coconut, non-perils, and chopped cherries.

Enter to Win
Godiva Chocolates or a Dozen Roses!

Drawing to be held at 10am on Feb. 14th.

YCMP
Dining Services

Godiva Chocolates

Dozen Roses

Wal-Mart closing Canadian store after union dispute

By Adam Geller
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Wal-Mart Stores Inc. said Wednesday it will close a Canadian store whose workers are on the verge of becoming the first ever to win a union contract from the world's biggest retailer.

Wal-Mart said it was shuttering the store in Jonquiere, Quebec, in response to unreasonable demands from union negotiators, that would make it impossible for the store to sustain its business. The United Food & Commercial Workers Canada last week asked Quebec labor officials to appoint a mediator, saying that negotiations had reached an impasse.

"We were hoping it wouldn't come to this," said Andrew Pelletier, a spokesman for Wal-Mart Canada. "Despite nine days of meetings over three months, we've been unable to reach an agreement with the union that in our view will allow the store to operate efficiently and profitably."

Pelletier said the store will close in May. The retailer had first discussed closing the Jonquiere store last October, saying that the store was losing money.

A spokesman for the UFCW said Wednesday the union had not yet seen the retailer's statement, and that leaders were traveling and not immediately available for comment.

Some employees at the store said they believed the store was closing because of their agreement to join the union and several cried as they left the store. They told Radio-Canada TV that an announcement had been made and they were not allowed to ask questions.

The store in Jonquiere, about 240 miles northeast of Montreal, became the first unionized Wal-Mart store in North America last September, after the bargaining unit was certified by provincial labor officials. Since then, workers at a second Quebec store have also been granted union status. Neither had reached a contract.

The union efforts at both stores are part of a larger chess game labor organizers are waging with Wal-Mart at stores across Canada. The campaign, financed by UFCW money from both Canada and the United States, is also geared to captured the attention of workers in Wal-Mart's home country.

The closest a U.S. union has ever come to winning a battle with Wal-Mart was in 2000, at a store in Jacksonville, Texas. In that store, 11 workers, all members of the store's meatpacking department, voted to join and be represented by the UFCW.

Drive for members

MASSPIRG from page 2

Besides the environmental benefit, MassPIRG believes that this energy conservation would save the state $1 billion over the next 15 years.

Constituents around the country are attempting to pass legislation through state legislatures, rather than in the national congress, because the current legislative body has had a bad record on the environment, according to the coordinator of the energy campaign, Alyza Weiner.

"The current congress and administration has the worst record on environmental policies ever," Weiner said. "It is highly unlikely that the current congress will pass any positive environmental legislation."

Weiner stated that it is unfair that the special interest group's concerns are met, while "the health of citizens all over Massachusetts are overlooked."

Bush plans to expand school testing

By Ben Feller
Associated Press

COURTESY LONGVIEW

President Bush gives a speech to international leaders in November. His new education plan is facing a fight in Congress.

WASHINGTON — President Bush's plan to expand high school testing is facing a fight from some of the same leaders in Congress who pushed through his first-term school agenda.

Bush wants Congress to require yearly reading and math tests in grades nine through 11, extending a greater federal role in education. The No Child Left Behind law Bush championed requires tests yearly in grades three to eight, and once during high school.

Congressional education leaders are wary, if not opposed, to the way Bush wants to change high school, as outlined in his new budget proposal. He wants to spend $1.2 billion on high school "interventions," for example, but erase about as much from vocational education.

That trade-off drew resistance from Rep. Mike Castle, chairman of the House Education and the Workforce's subcommittee on education reform. "It does not look likely" that Bush's testing plan will go forward in Congress, said Castle, R-Del.

"Personally, I believe in it. I think everybody would like to see us do more at the high school level, but there may be certain members of Congress who don't think Congress should be involved," Castle said at an education forum. "I can't give its chances as being very high at this time, but I've seen stranger things happen. So hopefully something can be worked out."

Rep. John Boehner, chairman of the full committee and a stalwart defender of the No Child Left Behind law, has been noticeably noncommittal about Bush's idea. Boehner, R-Ohio, praised Bush for a proposal that he said would "spark a healthy debate" in Congress.

Much of the lobbying effort will fall to new Education Secretary Margaret Spellings, a White House veteran who has good relations with lawmakers of both parties. She wants to build national momentum, drawing particularly on support from governors, for the president's effort.

"As with all major policy initiatives, there will be negotiations with the legislative branch," Spellings said. "We look forward to working with Chairman Castle, as well as all the other members of the House and Senate. ... This is the beginning of the process."

Castle, a moderate, said many conservative members of his party oppose the proposed testing expansions as an intrusion on local school control.

The No Child Left Behind law requires schools to show yearly progress among all major groups of students, with the goal of getting all children up to grade level in reading and math.

U.S. dissatisfied with U.N. agency

By George Jahn
Associated Press

VIENNA, Austria — The United States is lobbying allies in a bid to oust the head of the U.N. nuclear watchdog agency, perhaps as early as the end of the month, diplomats and officials told The Associated Press on Wednesday.

Anticipating that present European diplomatic efforts on Iran will fail, the diplomats and officials also told AP that Washington plans to increase pressure on Tehran over its nuclear program when the International Atomic Energy Agency meets Feb. 28.

In Tehran, Iranian President Mohammad Khatami told foreign diplomats that no Iranian government would ever abandon the progress the country has made in developing peaceful nuclear technology.

Washington, which accuses Iran of making nuclear weapons and wants it brought before the U.N. Security Council for possible sanctions, considers IAEA head Mohammed ElBaradei too soft on the Tehran leadership.

No U.S. comment was available on Washington's strategy for the upcoming IAEA board of governors meeting.

But several diplomats and government officials from IAEA member countries dismissed recent reports that the United States had given up attempts to unseat ElBaradei because of lack of support from other countries.

They've been lobbying, and close friends have given them a good reception," said one of the officials familiar with the issue, who, like the others, spoke on condition of anonymity.

Iraqi officials must recount 300 ballots

By Robert H. Reid
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Iraqi officials said Wednesday they must recount votes from about 300 ballot boxes because of various discrepancies, delaying final results from the landmark national elections. Hundreds, perhaps thousands, of other ballots were declared invalid because of alleged tampering.

Post-election violence mounted, raising fears that the Jan. 30 balloting had done little to ease the country's grave security crisis.

An American soldier was killed Wednesday and another wounded in an ambush north of the capital, the U.S. military said. Two other American soldiers died earlier in the week, the command said Wednesday.

Gunmen ambushed a convoy of Kurdish party officials in Baghdad, killing one and wounding four. And in the southern city of Basra, gunmen killed an Iraqi journalist working for a U.S.-funded TV station and his 3-year-old son as they left their home.

Officials had promised final results from the elections by Thursday, the end of the Iraqi work week. On Wednesday, however, election commission spokesman Farid Ayar said the deadline would not be met because of the recount.

"We don't know when this will finish," he said. "This will lead to a little postponement in announcing the results."

No partial tallies have been released since Monday in the contests for the 275-member National Assembly, 18 provincial councils and a regional parliament for the Kurdish self-governing region in the north.

The most recent figures showed a coalition of Kurdish parties in second place behind a Shiite-dominated ticket endorsed by Iraq's most revered Shiite cleric, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani. The ticket of interim Prime Minister Ayad Allawi, a secular Shiite, was a distant third.

Allegations of voting irregularities, especially around the tense northern city of Mosul, have complicated the count. Some leading Sunni Arab and Christian politicians alleged that thousands of their supporters were denied the right to vote.

Election officials blamed the problems in the Mosul area on security, which prevented fewer than a third of the planned 330 polling centers from opening. Gunmen seized some ballot boxes, officials said.

The commission would not say how many ballots had been declared invalid and whether they had come from the Mosul area, which has a mostly Sunni Arab population.

Tired of the Dorms?

•IT'S NEVER TOO EARLY TO LOOK FOR AN APARTMENT WITH LINCOLN REAL ESTATE•

Lincoln Real Estate

25 N. Pleasant St.
253-7879
www.amherstlincolnrealty.com
Now accepting applications for June 2005

Rent One of Ours
No additional fee for 21–25 year old drivers
• Cars
• Passenger Vans
• Trucks
• Direct Billing to Insurance Companies
• Free Local Pick Up
• Locally Owned and Operated
549-RENT (7368)
POTTERS Auto & Truck Rentals
at North Amherst Motors
Collision Repair Center
On Bus Route • One Mile North of UMass

OPEN MONDAY, VALENTINE'S DAY 4-10
Goten
OF JAPAN
STEAK HOUSE
FAMOUS FOR CAPTIVATING CUISINE PREPARED AT YOUR TABLE
RT. 116, SUNDERLAND 413-665-3628

THE ATLANTIC 10 SHOOTOUT
WIN $10,000
QUALIFYING EVENT THURSDAY MAR 3 6:00 PM CURRY HICKS CAGE
CO-ED CHAMPIONSHIP SATURDAY, MAR 5 2:00 PM MULLINS CENTER
FREE to STUDENTS
Free: Food, Drinks, T-shirts and more
Win Airline Tickets!
WWW.ATLANTIC10.ORG/SHOOTOUT
or visit the Intramural office for more details

No Cals Last Call No Carbs
No Hangover
All-Natural Anti-Hangover & Nutritional Drink
Last Call is available now at:
Liquors 44, Four Season's Liquors, Stoney's Pub, Holyoke Liquor Mart, Pop's Liquors, R&P Liquors and Niedbala's.
Ask for it at your favorite bar and restaurant
Campus Rep Opportunities Available, Call for more information
Distributed By Baystate Beverage Distributors, Westfield, MA 413-642-0150
Please Drink Responsibly

GREEK Revival
ZANNA
Women's clothing, shoes and accessories.
downtown Amherst

Unique gifts for unique couples.
Mercantile
11 East Pleasant Street
Amherst, Ma 01002
(413) 549-1396

Seven Jeans
Your favorite jeans
ZANNA
Women's clothing, shoes and accessories.
downtown Amherst

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

Thursday, February 10, 2005

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it" -Voltaire

Editorial@dailycollegian.com

In search of the right group

Kenny Mulligan

What a wonderful age this is! No longer do we need to think, and consider our own personal beliefs for ourselves. Others have taken that liberty, and developed some very well-customized systems of political and economical ideologies, and laid them out in a convenient menu. Do you want to be a republican? A democrat? A reformist? A roofer? The only limit is yourself.

Of course, like picking out an item from any menu, there is the chance of thinking too hastily, and ending up with a club sandwich, when you realize you would have been so much happier with a bacon cheeseburger. You're probably wondering what I'm getting at here.

I am a journalism student at the University of Massachusetts Amherst, and I do not have a specific subscription to any system of views and/or opinions. I'm not a liberal, conservative, libertarian, or a reformist, nor am I any other kind of anemic sissy-boy hippy, which makes me fit in about as much as a conservative would on this campus.

I need some kind of group to give me a series of views and ethics, so that when I am informed of a newly revealed hot topic in the media, I will then know what kind of reaction I am allowed to have. If I can manage to continue writing opinionated editorials for the Collegian, I may someday become a talking head political analyst and attain a level of greatness on par with the greatest human being ever: Bill O'Reilly. Hell, I'd even settle for the Sean Hannity.

But which group should I choose? I think I should find a group that will allow me a large enough number of people to hate, even when I'm not even sure what those particular people believe in.

I think I should find a group that will allow me a large enough number of people to hate, even when I'm not even sure what those particular people believe in.

"No, I suppose I don't know what a liberal is. All's I know is that hate them," says almost every conservative I've ever met. In all fairness, the words "conservative" and "liberal" can be interchanged and that sentence is still true.

I would like to find a group in which I am amongst people who feel oppressed in some way. This would help me stay nice and angry, which would make me look much more informed, and in the end, I'd have something to do. Then again, I was born with the unfortunate handicap of being a white male in middle-class suburbia.

Perhaps I could be some type of hardcore activist. I've heard great things about these digital revolutionaries known as "hacktivists." It's all futuristic and stuff, like that movie "Johnny Mnemonic." I can become part of a revolution against big businesses by utilizing technology that was probably developed by them in the first place.

I want to be part of a group that acknowledges that we, as middle-class Americans, do not live in the real world. I want a group that stresses the idea that we live in a gated community shut off from the rest of the world's problems, thus making our land the not real world. I find something intriguing about the mentality that the reality of a place is defined by how much it sucks to live there. The more dead bodies there are, the more real the place is.

Whenever I find myself entering a heated and heavy-handed political debate with an individual of limited understanding outside of his or her own political affiliation, my main platform will be the act of pulling a large, blunt, metal object from my pocket and bashing it across my own head, thus knocking myself completely unconscious.

And when people ask me about what revolution I'm fighting for, I'll say, "I'm fighting to revolutionize all over your face!" Then I'll laugh oafishly and accept the many high fives that would be offered to me by people standing nearby.

There are so many different groups from which I may choose, even if most of them have the same opinions. If I decide I want to go with a liberal group, I'll have to be a pot-smoking hippy who hates God and loves killing babies. If I decide I want to go conservative, I'll have to be a heartless big business supporter, who wants to eradicate all minorities by further broadening the already staggering social gap. If I decide I want to go reformist, then I'll just be wasting my life. And if I decide to go roofer, I'll have to work outside in situations of extreme hot or cold, and also run the risk of falling off the roof and hurting myself.

This has me greatly vexed. How will I ever come up with personal opinions without the owner's manual that comes with every political label? Perhaps the "Kenny rocks uber hard" coalition will receive sufficient enough funding without me having to allow membership to anyone else. It's unlikely though.

Oh well, I guess I'll just take the easy way out and become an engineering major.

Kenny Mulligan is a UMass Student.

Facing the true moral issue

Aaron Wodin-Schwartz

With all the recent touting of moral values in this country, it seems that we have missed the boat. It is ironic that the Bush Administration should be elected upon precisely this foundation, when it presents what is probably the most narrowly defined conception of moral values this side of Riyadh. Yet for some reason, the majority of the U.S. electorate has been led to believe that any moral value outside of opposition to abortion, gay marriage, and stem cell research is negligible. Ironic indeed, since these issues are little more than bourgeois quarrels compared to the true crimes against humanity that remained unreferenced once again by the most important political event in the world.

I speak here mainly of the scourge that is poverty and the insurmountable need for its immediate elimination. On Saturday, the seven wealthiest nations on the planet formally agreed, for the first time, to pursue a 100percent write-off in the $70 billion debt which poor nations owe to big institutions like the World Bank. With Great Britain leading the way, the G7 believes that relieving states of significant portions of their foreign debt will allow them to pursue social and infrastructural projects that directly benefit the population and help ease the sting of poverty.

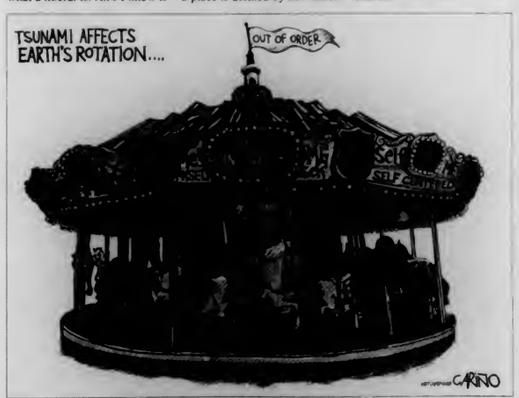
Unfortunately for the world, the fate of this much needed and long overdue program requires the consent of George W. Bush and his backwards cronies at the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue.

In an equally ambitious move, Great Britain also proposed plans over the weekend to raise an extra $50 billion a year in aid to lift African nations in particular out of poverty. They are expected to present a formal plan in July when the heads of state of the G7 countries meet along with Vladimir Putin of Russia in Scotland. The British hosts want the meeting to endorse a plan to relieve African poverty with the same broad sweep and effectiveness as the Marshall Plan after World War II.

The future of both initiatives will undoubtedly depend upon mutual will on both sides of the Atlantic and a certain level of altruistic economic cooperation. Unfortunately for the world, the fate of this much needed and long overdue program requires the consent of George W. Bush and his backwards cronies at the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue.

In a poor omen for the plan's future, the United States Treasury Undersecretary John Taylor paid lip service to the idea, offering that the Bush Administration has long supported a 100percent write-off, but rejecting out-of-hand all three proposals for doing so without providing a single concrete reason.

Implying that our government once again lacks the political will, he further noted that U.S. proposals for total and immediate cancellation of poor countries' multilateral debt had not won unanimous approval here and that unspecified domestic law would not allow Bush to take part in the most popular of the British funding schemes.



The track record of the Democratic Party may be little better in terms of debt-relief initiatives, but it would probably fare better in following the British leadership. In what may prove to be a reflection of the growing world sentiment, former vice-presidential candidate John Edwards told Democrats in New Hampshire on Saturday that poverty is "one of the great moral issues of our time," and pledged to fight it here in the US. While his comparison of the task to that of landing on the moon, conquering polio, or inventing the microchip reveals that his words are of largely rhetorical value, they nevertheless demonstrate the political will that Washington lacks at this crucial moment and reflect the spirit of the G7 proposals.

Such talk is not limited to high-profile democrats; religious organizations around the country are also peeved about the mobilization of morality for Bush's own political ends, and are banding together to work for the elimination of world poverty. The National Council of Churches, an association of liberal denominations that represents more than 100,000 congregations, sponsored an international summit on the annihilation of global poverty last week, in which they were joined by enthusiastic Catholic and Evangelical groups.

More and more Christian seminaries and universities are making organized urban help and reduction of poverty abroad a priority, and they should be commended for this. Dr. David Frenchak, president of the Seminary Consortium for Urban Pastoral Education, notes that if we were to cut out of one Bible all of the verses that address poverty and out of another every verse about abortion and gay marriage, the former Bible would be in tatters while the latter would remain largely intact. Not only that, but the strong statistical correlation between poverty and abortion rates suggest that by addressing one we would no longer have much of a problem with the other.

The point is that we should laugh when the ultra-right in Washington lectures us on the supposed moral values of our country and when false television pundits corroborate such an incomplete view of morality. We must realize that poverty is the ultimate pro-life issue, and instead of defending the illusion we have now, we should work towards a just and moral society.

Aaron Wodin-Schwartz is a Collegian columnist.

To the Student Government

Ben Feder

Dear SGA,

It is my opinion that your organization is useless. Maybe useless is too strong a word. How about naive? The reason I say this is not to offend, but because I'm honest and I think you have a right to know.

Simply put, I have been on this campus for five years as an undergrad, and every year I watch as the SGA slips further into the disingenuous black hole. Instead of serving the campus as you once did, you spend your time bickering and shifting blame as your leadership adds to the barrier they have built between them and the administration.

Guess who is suffering? Us, the campus, the student body that sincerely, desperately, and hopefully requests your assistance and wants to know exactly what your function here is. We simply don't know. And you seem to not want to give us answers. That is what has brought this letter on. Maybe it was the power you now have, with 1.9 million dollars at your disposal? Maybe it was that adrenaline rush you received when you told the Vice Chancellor you're cutting him out of your plans.

Either way, SGA doesn't look that impressive on a resume. You're like a negligent father who hasn't paid any child support. Well guess what? It's time you paid the piper.

But all is not lost. It's a new semester and you can change. You can put aside your differences with the administration, or ALANA, or Higgins or whomever you're angry at this week. So with that being said, allow me the chance to voice my suggestions. Take them or leave them, just please do something different.

I think it would nice if you published your agenda. Maybe at the end of every month you could add an insert in the Collegian detailing everything you did to benefit the campus, the students, and our general way of life. Keep us updated on events that are affecting you. You could list where you are allocating your funds. In all fairness, it's only proper we see where the money is going and to whom. I'm sure the organizations you support would love to know how they are being funded in the grand scheme of things. If you open up to us, we'll open up to you.

Stop fighting with the Administration and work with them. If Bustamante hates Gargano, that's fine. But that doesn't mean that anyone else in the SGA can't go to his office.

Stop fighting with the administration and work with them. If Eddie hates Gargano, that's fine. But that doesn't mean that anyone else in the SGA can't go to his office.

Gargano, that's fine, but that doesn't mean that anyone else in the SGA can't go to his office. Believe it or not, he does keep his door open. I know that your higher-ups keep you down by saying he never responds to their e-mails or didn't return their phone calls. I wonder how many of those e-mails and phone calls are real? Instead, go to his office and talk with him. Voice your concerns. I've walked in there many a time and he has clarified all my questions. Surprise, surprise.

That's what that whole Picketing Code revision is all about. You can still civilly demonstrate and go into the Chancellor's and Vice Chancellor's offices and talk. If you think he revised the code poorly and ambiguously, help him rewrite it so it's clarified and reasonable. You don't even have to agree with them if you don't want to. Demonstrating means getting your voice heard, not storming a building, slamming everything, scaring the secretaries, and getting me shut out of the Financial Aid office because they don't want your rally spilling into their office. They're locking us out because of your squabbling.

I was talking with my SGA buddy about this and I recommended that he go to Gargano's office, and he didn't even know where it was. That shocks me and shows the miscommunication that you seem to thrive upon. If you're going to vote "no confidence" on someone, at least know where he or she works. So I will even offer my help. Come to the info desk on the concourse and I'll point out Whitmore and anywhere else you care to go.

Let me ask you another question. Can you or anyone else even name Gargano's predecessor? Does anyone know what he or she did for the students? I sure can't. If you can, write the response in the margin of this column, bring it to the Collegian and I'll pick it up and offer you a formal apology and demonstrate my disbelief because you must have supernatural powers.

The truth is, is this campus is changing. For the better or worse, I really couldn't tell you, but from the way the SGA, administration, and student bodies are working together now, it's not good enough. It's not going to work and it'll send this campus to its ruin.

So I implore you, as a humble student in this collective mass of voices, to branch out, and reconnect with us. We miss you. Stop the finger pointing. Stop the criticism. Stop the endless controversies. Put the past behind you and look forward, because that's where we are waiting for you.

Ben Feder is a Collegian columnist.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

MUNAYYER'S ANALYSIS QUESTIONABLE

In response to Yousef Munayyer's "Israel's Culture of Racism," I would like to begin by briefly explaining my background and political orientation. My father was born in Ireland, and my mother is Jewish. I consider myself a centrist. No matter what the issue may be I try to analyze all the facts and come to a balanced decision. I try not to let my emotions bias my thoughts and assumptions.

Now, it seems to me that when I read an article about the Israeli/Palestinian problem, the discussion is completely driven by emotion. Instead of this, we should try to have a meaningful discussion about the issues and consider possible solutions. When I open up the Collegian and see an editorial entitled, "Israel's culture of racism," I know that I will be reading a highly emotional piece that has some truths, but is harshly biased by strong emotions. Please, let's stop talking as if all Palestinians are terrorists, and all Israelis are land-grabbing settlers. Life is so much more complicated than that. We must recognize that both sides have their religious extremists, and both sides have their faults.

Instead of yelling about the past, we must look to the future. I welcome articles that talk about a return to the 1967 borders. I welcome talk about two states living side by side in peace. However, I do not welcome talk that seeks to label all Israelis (by which I mean Jews) as bloodthirsty racists. This simply is not the truth.

Palestinians have the right to protest, but I think it's about time to make this protest non-violent. By doing this they will prove to Israel and the rest of the world they can accept the existence of a Jewish nation-state. If, after converting the struggle to the non-violent sphere, Israel continues with its policies, the Palestinians will only gain leverage from the United States and the international community.

As we have read many times, there are basically four possible scenarios which can result from this conflict. One: two states living in peace, side by side. Two: a bi-national state. Three: only Israel, all Arabs deported. Four: only Palestine, all Jews deported.

I hope we can all agree that options three and four are unacceptable. If we do, then the discussion is centered on one and two. I think we can also agree that two is unacceptable to Israel, as this would automatically make Jews the minority. So the only possible or acceptable solution is option is number one. Let us have an open discussion about how this goal can be reached. Let us not be overwhelmed by our emotions. If we cannot do this, it means the extremists on both sides have won and the world will not know peace.

Terrance O'Regan
UMass Graduate Student

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 2005 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Comic Genius

NoHo welcomes innovative comedian

Shazia Mirza
Sun, Feb. 13
The Academy of Music Theatre
Northampton
$18, $12

Eve questions her friends commitment

My favorite hair stylist and I always end up discussing the men in our lives. This is nothing new, however, yesterday, her story seemed slightly more devastating than usual.

"My husband and I separated recently," she said matter-of-factly. "It's for the best. I wouldn't have been happy growing old with him."

I watched her as she cut the years of damage and devastation off my non-virgin locks. I tried to show compassion, but I was secretly happy for her.

She is my age, extremely talented, and absolutely gorgeous. In other words, she is too young and has too much potential to have settled into marriage. As I listened to her speak of unhappy circumstances and the pains of commitment, I couldn't help but think "Is anyone really happy with their partner?"

My closest childhood girlfriend has finally succumbed to a committed relationship. Under any other circumstance, I would find this information upsetting, but she has spent enough time being single for her decision to be justified. This might seem harsh, but I disapprove of my friends falling into relationships that are less than they expect, or even worse, because they are lonely.

Apparently she really loves this guy, and she is happy most of the time. That is all I would ever want for her, but there is always a "but." One day she loves him, the next day she questions love. Sometimes she is content, and other times she forgets about her satisfaction. So I can't help but wonder "If this guy was good for her, shouldn't she be slightly more stable with her feelings?"

I noticed this indecisiveness among my girlfriends is more common than not. I have yet to understand why they must settle for a guy who leaves them with one part satisfaction and one part disappointment.

My other close girlfriend shares similar annoyances and uncertainties. For approximately three years she has come to me with questions.

"Why do all of my relationships always turn out this way? Do you think I choose the wrong guys?" She looks at me, expecting I have the answer. All I can say is, "I can't believe you lasted this long."

Even though she has always listened intently to the advice I dispense, her actions are always slightly delayed upon hearing it. She meets a man. She falls in love. She falls out of love, and something is always wrong with him. She, hopeful and optimistic, hangs on for dear life until the great realization is softly spoken in my direction. She sighs, shakes her head, shrugs, and admits. "I have settled. He is not the one. You were right."

Is this supposed to make me feel better? Probably not, but at least she realized the relationship would not work if there were too many question marks.

As for me, I am just as guilty. I can't remember the last time a guy left me feeling satisfied. Is it because I demand a lot? Or is it because I don't demand enough? Maybe I too choose the wrong guys for fulfilling my needs. Is that why I refuse to commit?

I still don't know, but I am haunted by a need for an answer. I have too much experience, too many choices, and not one guy to show for it. When the numbers were small and I was young, a relationship was simple. It was a positive idea, and a wonderful occurrence. My expectations were low, I didn't know enough to want more, and I was happy with who I loved.

Maybe it is better to marry young. Maybe experience makes everything messier. If this is true, then why is my hairdresser divorced at age twenty-two? It is possible that there aren't any answers. It is also possible that there aren't any reasons. Maybe everyone settles in the end. Should we all just accept this possibility or should we keep searching? When did love get so complicated?

Eve is a Collegian columnist.

Pull out the needles and yarn balls, boys

Knitting has become a newly masculine pastime

By Lisa Black
Chicago Tribune

CHICAGO — As he walked into his first "For Boys Only" knitting class, Will Conrad joked about showing his feminine side, but within minutes the Northbrook, Ill., teenager was intently watching how to "cast on," or loop the yarn onto the needle.

They are guys, they knit and they defy ridicule.

"It's just knitting. It's not like I've killed someone," said Conrad, 15, a swim team member who doesn't care what classmates think. "It's the new fad."

The craft has enjoyed a soaring resurgence over the last few years, and not just among a younger generation of women. Boys increasingly are knitting, from an Evanston, Ill., fourth grader working on a scarf for himself, to a college student in Oak Park, Ill., who skillfully knits toy-like stuffed monsters, to raw beginners like Conrad.

Long typecast as the afternoon pastime of elderly women, knitting has become hip as celebrities such as Russell Crowe and Laurence Fishburne go public with their hobby. Knitting clubs for girls and boys have cropped up in schools across the nation. And new books and shows such as DIY Network's hit "Knitty Gritty" have made it cool to knit guy-friendly items such as guitar straps and iPod covers.

Although women still outnumber men in yarn store aisles, and no one can be sure how many boys knit, professionals say more boys are going public with their needles and balls of yarn.

"I have heard several boys say it's a wonderful chick magnet," said Mary Colucci, executive director of the Craft Yarn Council of America, based in Gastonia, N.C. "I've heard teachers say that the boys are more challenged by some of the intricate patterns."

But unless they have the size and stature of, say, ex-football pro Rosie Grier, a confirmed knitter, it could be awkward for some guys to announce their new passion to friends.

"In the beginning you don't want to tell people," said Louis Levin, 9, a fourth grader from Northbrook. "I've had it happen once where someone said, 'Oh, only girls do that.'"

Still, he said, "it makes me feel good I'm standing out in the crowd."

On a recent Saturday at the Three Bags Full store in Northbrook, Corey Gilbert, 15, is the instructor for the "Boys Only" class. Already a knitting veteran, the high school sophomore helped Conrad and two other boys get started, showing them how to wrap the yarn around the needle and make those first crucial stitches.

One of them, Louis, arrived with some patterns to choose from and a scarf he had already started. He is knitting a teddy bear for his teacher's baby, due in March.

Like the other young knitters, Louis is proud that he can give his finished product to people as gifts.

Nearby, tubs of supplies with labels such as "Yorkshire Tweed Chunky" and "Biggy Print" hinted at the many possibilities that loom.

Jim Flanagin, 11, of Northbrook stopped working his needles long enough to make a phone call.

"I'm knitting your hat right now," he told a friend on the line. "Do you have your measurements?"

Gilbert's mother, storeowner Lynette Swanson, whispered to him that he could use his own head size for comparison.

Then she reminded Conrad to breathe, much like an aerobics instructor might tell her class, as the teenager sat, frozen, afraid that he had made a mistake.

"Oooooh," Conrad groaned. "How do those old women work so fast?"

In Evanston, a similar scene unraveled recently at an elementary school library, where 15 pupils showed up for the knitting club's first meeting of the school year. Among them were five boys, including

See KNITTING on page 8

Young men all over the country have caught on to the new fad of knitting. Though typically thought of as a female craft, the boys assure that the hobby is definitely gender neutral.

Forget costly gym memberships, salsa is the new Nordic Track

By Cleora Hughes
St. Louis Post-Dispatch

ST. LOUIS — With apologies to the Postman's Creed, neither rain, nor snow, nor recent single-digit temperatures will keep hard-core salsa dancers from making a weekly trek to their favorite clubs.

There, in the midst of writhing bodies, clouds of smoke and pounding rhythms, partners schooled in various Latin dances show off their expertise and one-upsmanship before an appreciative crowd.

And we're speaking of the real thing here, where couples actually touch each other and get up close and personal. And therein lies its appeal. Small wonder that salsa, merengue, bachata and cha-cha are being touted as great forms of exercise, especially for women who have forsaken gyms, sweat suits and sneakers for tight jeans, bustiers and stiletto heels.

Just about anybody can learn most of these dances, but salsa, with its intricacies and variations in steps, takes weeks, months, even years to perfect. The current rage, it contains eight beats. You dance to six and the other two are pauses, all on the ball of the foot.

"This is a male-initiated dance, because he is the one directing the turn patterns," explained St. Louis-area instructor Carmen Guynn, who has shed 40 pounds over the past few years. "I like to think of the man as the matador and the female as his cape. The dancers are a mirror of each other. The lady steps back on her right as the man steps forward on his left. It's necessary to keep the same distance between the leader and the follower to maintain a fluidity of moment.

"The second thing you learn is how to turn right for the lady and left for the man," she continued. "From there, it's a left turn for the lady and a right turn for the man."

These are the basic steps, and they sound simple enough while you are learning, but when the steps are set to live band music, everything goes haywire. That is why the dance floor is not conducive to getting the hang of it all.

In their studios, instructors can slow down or speed up recorded music, allowing students to pick up the steps at the rate best for them.

"It is such an intense dance, full of such passion and emotion that it makes you want to move whether you are a dance person or not," said Guynn. "The strongest dancers can carry on for five minutes or more, but it takes time to work up to that speed. Basic steps and turn patterns are mastered in about six weeks, but it takes six months to do the fancy stuff and to understand the music. I've been dancing salsa for eight years, and I'm still learning."

The men especially love to turn their partners at a dizzying rate. That is where "spotting" comes in.

When you are being turned, it's important to focus somewhere on your partner's face or neck. The female half of the couple must make sure that when she turns around, she is looking in exactly the same spot when she faces her male partner again. This will eliminate the dizziness that is inherent in the many turns and twists of the dance.

Another instructor, Kelly Barrett Brown, sees salsa as a magical triangle between you, your partner and the music.

"If these connections are given their due," he said, "something incredible, which is probably best called synergy, arises. It's nothing less than a life force, and demands expression of the self. Too often, the triangle is thrown out of whack by self-consciousness, a timidness or an over-reserve to the dance. This kind of self-regard damages the connection with either the partner, the music, or both.

"My belief is that dance is about joy and that an energetic, creative peace comes from listening, touch and physical expression. It changes lives."

Those who teach this dance say they have found their students eager to learn, showing up faithfully week after week to count from 1 to 8 out loud until the experience becomes part of their being. They also show up at the clubs to observe and applaud dancers whose deceptively simple footwork is something to behold.

And no one receives more applause than Cesar Cardona, a Colombia native who has been dancing for seven years. His many partners are turned, twirled and suddenly flipped within a few inches of the floor. But he never misses a beat.

"I mostly go every week," he said fervently. "It is not just a hobby, it is part of my life and my entertainment."

Cardona, like many salsa aficionados, has attended congresses in Los Angeles, Chicago, New York, Philadelphia and Houston. At these events, they join more than 6,000 people and 120 dance companies from all over the world who come to hone their skills with the best bands on the scene: Oscar De Leon, Ray Barretto, Jimmy Bosch and Sonora Carruseles.

While most instructors have day jobs, Roxanne McKenney of University City, Mo., devotes herself body and soul to the dance. After more than two decades in the field, she has seen it all.

"Although I feel that dance is fun and great exercise for the body, it is also exercise for the mind," she said. "It is stimulating and rewarding, and in my 20 years, I have yet to have a student who was unable to dance. Also, partner dancing is about being in harmony, and that is the goal. Watching people work at harmony is refreshing and vital in this world in which we live. That this dance is so exciting and entertaining is a bonus.

"I have learned to let my students see my mistakes and my recoveries. I laugh at myself and it makes everything I learn relatively easy. We all come up with something clever and just a little bit different once in a while. If I keep my eyes open, I inevitably learn a new move here and there."

The best thing about the Latin dance clubs is that you meet people of all cultural diversities, ages and economic levels, practitioners say, but the main ingredient is still the music. It defies you to keep still.

Salsa dancing is no longer just a sexy way to spend a Saturday night. Not only is it great for dates, but it's a workout as well. Performers Lee Edward Smith and Florcita of "Salsa Magic" strike a pose.

Discover Your LOVER
The Collegian Dating Game

HERE'S YOUR CHANCE TO PLAY

MATCHMAKER!

We've rounded up 3 Men and 3 Women.
You decide who will date whom!

Get to know these single people and pair them up at www.dailycollegian.com

Cast your votes now through Monday, February 14th

Look for the couples you chose on Wednesday, February 16th in the Arts and Living Section

Barton goes bi on hit TV show 'the O.C.'

By Kate O'Hare
Zapzit.com

On last Thursday's episode of Fox's soaper "The O.C.," fans got a hint of things to come, when Newport Beach high-schooler (and former exclusive heterosexual) Marissa Cooper (Mischa Barton) got all hand-holdy with her new best pal, bisexual bartender Alex Kelly (Olivia Wilde).

Alex's most recent Orange County squeeze was Marissa's old neighbor and classmate, Seth Cohen (Adam Brody). Also on last week's episode, Alex made peace with Seth, who is still pining for his ex-girlfriend, Summer (Rachel Bilson) acknowledging that they were each other's "in-between" person.

Those awaiting the big kiss anticipated since series creator Josh Schwartz revealed the lesbian storyline may not have to wait very much longer with February sweeps having begun. But they have been waiting, for many episodes, which is unusual for a series known for burning through story with the speed of a Malibu brush fire.

"What's interesting," Wilde says, "is watching people's reactions as all this unfolds. People might have expected 'Girls Gone Wild,' kiss-in-the-hot-tub type of thing, but what's going to be interesting is when people realize that's not what we did.

"I hope they don't want that and expect that. 'Oh, I want some crazy, hot lesbian scene.' It's not like that. It's much more about Marissa discovering these feelings, and Alex tentatively welcoming her into this, and then what happens after is even more interesting."

One has to assume the affair doesn't last, because neither does Alex's storyline on "The O.C.," which ends with the March 17 episode.

"Right," Wilde says. "Who knows who she goes to next, but I'm gone after episode 16."

Over the season-and-a-half of "The O.C.," Marissa has gone through a few boyfriends, including a painfully up-and-down relationship with Chino expatriate Ryan Atwood (Ben McKenzie). She has also had huge issues with the adults in her life, through her parents' divorce, the subsequent marriage of her mother, Julie (Melinda Clarke), to Seth's grandfather, developer Caleb Nichol (Alan Dale), and the recent departure of her father, Jimmy (Tate Donovan).

Marissa has been a heavy drinker and attempted suicide in Mexico. Overall, she has spent very little time being happy, but some of that time has been during her thus-far platonic adventures with the free-spirited Alex.

"It's true," says Wilde. "So many people have said that to me, that what they really like about Alex is what she brings out in Marissa, and what this situation brings out in her, a hint of happiness and another side to her character. I think that's great.

"We work really well with each other, too, and a lot of people have commented on the chemistry. I was worried, because neither of us is actually bisexual or gay, how do we make the chemistry seem real, not just real enough to make out, but really powerful enough to make people go beyond what they would normally expect or want to watch. That was the challenge.

"I feel like we did that, just because she's a professional, and she knows what she's doing. We agreed on what we were doing there, and we took it really seriously."

Wilde sees the relationship as part of Schwartz's larger plan for the entire cast. "He really was eager to show other sides of his characters. To do that, he had to put them in other situations. You'll see that with every single one of them, from Caleb and Julie, to Summer and Seth. This season is about showing a softer side for some, and a harder side for others.

"Already we've seen a harder side of Seth, with continuing to defy his parents. And Ryan's become the sensible one, but what's interesting is you'll see later on this season that it's still very delicate. Ryan's created this world for himself, and something could destroy it if he isn't careful."

Asked if the love scenes with Barton pushed her beyond her comfort zone, Wilde says, "No, no. It was definitely something I had never done, it was definitely a challenge, but it wasn't something that ever made me feel uncomfortable. I got pushed, but in a good way, in a direction that made me try something new."

As to the ultimate resolution of the storyline, Wilde says, "I'm really satisfied with the way they handled the whole Marissa/Alex thing. The way it ended, it's very heart wrenching. People will feel emotionally attached to them by the end."

MISCHA.COM

Mischa Barton, star of the O.C., tries her hand with the same sex in a new plotline that involves Olivia Wilde, Barton's bi-sexual best friend on the show. Wilde portrays an outgoing bartender.

Boys learn to knit

KNITTING from page 7

Terron Wint, 10, a fourth grader who had never knit before.

He carefully touched the bright balls of yarn stacked in baskets, choosing black, gray and dark blue for his scarf.

"Last year my younger brother was in knitting club, and he was so good at knitting that I thought I would try it," Terron said. "I might bring it to recess because there's nothing to do, or if there's free time, I can just take out my needles and yarn."

Dylan Blanchard, 10, started needlework three years ago, taught by his mother Jane Grover, one of several parents who lead knitting clubs at Evanston-area schools.

"It makes me feel like I'm exercising ... because my fingers are working," said Dylan, who says he often knits before going to bed. "It makes me feel happy. I know I'm doing something and not just sitting around."

Grover was pleased to see many of last year's pupils return, projects and knitting needles in hand.

When she first started the club, she said, she worried about "arming them with needles."

"It hasn't been a problem," she said. "There were about 35 kids, and all of them used the needles for knitting."

While boys are slowly discovering the joys of knitting, enough stigma remains that Vickie Howell, the Austin, Texas-based hostess of "Knitty Gritty," could not persuade a young man in his 20s to talk to a reporter.

"He didn't want it to be out there, that he was knitting," Howell said. "I'm trying to work toward getting knitting and crafting seen as an art form."

That's not a problem for Michael Greischar, 22, who works at the Tangled Web Fibers store in Oak Park while studying filmmaking at Loyola University Chicago.

During his free time, he knits monsters that he said resemble "little stuffed animals but are scary-looking."

As a high school student at St. Ignatius College Prep in Chicago, Greischar learned that knitting was a good way to attract girls, although he said he sometimes felt self-conscious when other guys were around.

"If you're sitting in the library at high school and you're knitting with a bunch of girls, it's not such a normal thing," Greischar said. "But I did it."

The younger boys like Louis also are coming around, as evidenced by a recent conversation he had with a friend as they sat in the back of a car.

They were jabbering about their most embarrassing moments when Louis blurted out: "Oh, and another thing," he said, looking to his friend for reaction. "I knit."

The boy smiled and, without missing a beat, said, "That's OK, I cook."

Women In Jazz

Due to inclement weather predictions the Women in Jazz Festival concert will be postponed from Thurs-day February 10 to Wednesday, May 4 at 8 pm in Bezanson Recital Hall.

What are you doing this summer?

Find out at the

Summer, Co-op & Internship Opportunities Fair

Thursday, Feb 17
10 am - 3 pm
Campus Center Auditorium

Summer and Semester Employment For All Majors

Undergraduate and Graduate Students Welcome

CareerServices

Call us 413-545-2224
Click on www.umass.edu/careers
Walk to 511 Goodell Building

STOCKBRIDGE SCHOOL JOB FAIR 2005

Feb. 15th
10:00 a.m. - 1:00 p.m.
Campus Center Auditorium
UMass Amherst

Eighty companies seeking qualified students and graduates for full-time and internship opportunities. Positions offered in urban tree care, park management, fruit and crop production, horticulture, landscaping, turfgrass mangement and business management.
The shortage of qualified employees in these related areas has created a surplus job market for those possessing the academic and highly specialized, technical training related to these fields.

ALL FIRED UP! creative FOOD & BEVERAGE

GRAND OPENING MONGOLIAN BARBEQUE ALL YOU CAN EAT BUFFETS

WITH COUNTLESS COMBINATIONS OF VEGETABLES, POULTRY, FISH, MEATS AND SAUCES.

Great Live Entertainment on Weekends!
Friday 2/11: Steve Sanderson
Saturday 2/12: Clay Jazz Duo
Happy Valentine's Day! Free dessert for every UMass student!

A FANTASTIC FULL BAR!

OPEN 7 DAYS A WEEK FOR LUNCH AND DINNER
SUNDAY BREAKFAST
DESIGN YOUR OWN OMELETS AND PANCAKES

413-584-5155 • WWW.ALLFIREDUPHADLEY.COM • 48 RUSSELL STREET, ROUTE 9, HADLEY

Eagles understand the weight of a loss in the Super Bowl said an AFC pro personnel director. "But he's not someone you give big money to. He's not a difference-maker."

EAGLES from page 12

Maybe not, but he does happen to be the best of an otherwise mediocre group of free-agent defensive tackles that also includes Houston's Seth Payne, the New York Jets' Jason Ferguson, Cincinnati's Tony Williams, Buffalo's Pat Williams and Minnesota's underachieving Chris Hovan.

There had been organizational talk last year of franchising Simon if it couldn't sign him. His play this season, including his one-tackle performance Sunday against the Patriots, probably has made that unlikely, though the Eagles certainly have the cap space to pay him the $5.134 million cost of franchising him if they really think they can't live without him.

Burgess' situation is interesting. After missing almost all of the last two years because of foot injuries, he started 15 games this season and played very well, especially in the last two playoff games when he was switched back to his natural left-end spot.

The Eagles want him back, but it remains to be seen how much they will be willing to offer him. You've got to assume that they still believe Jerome McDougle can live up to his first-round expectations. And they also have 2003 starter N.D. Kalu coming back after missing all of '04 with an injury.

"All the guys that are up are going to want to come back," Heckert said. "Whether they will, who knows right now? Last year, even with Bobby (Taylor) and Troy (Vincent), there was a little bit of, 'Well, if they don't want me, fine. I'll go someplace else and play.' It wasn't that we didn't want them. We just didn't want to pay them the amount of money they wanted. Especially with Lito (Sheppard) and Sheldon (Brown) being ready to play.

"That attitude has changed, and I think it helped our football team this year. We had very little animosity at all during the year. There was no lingering talk about Bobby and Troy leaving, about Duce (Staley) leaving. Once they left, that was it. Everybody looked ahead. That helps in the locker room."

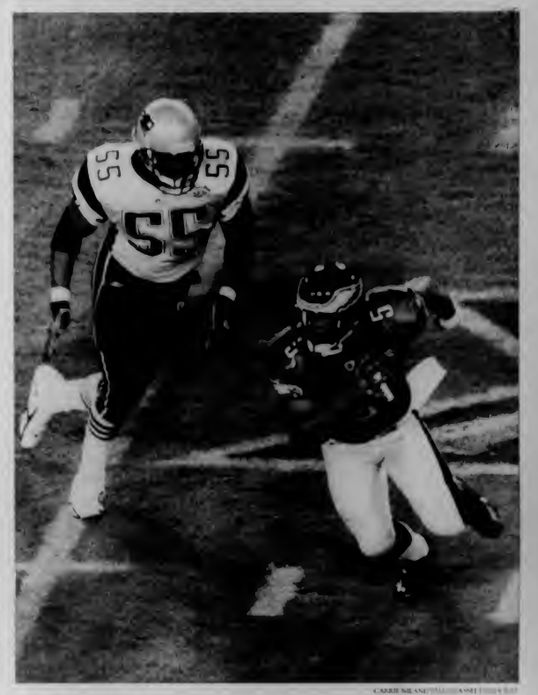
As Heckert pointed out, there are areas the Eagles will try to upgrade, though they'll try to do most of that in the draft. The poor play of their offensive line against the Patriots, and earlier this season against the Steelers, has to be a little bit alarming to Reid and Heckert. With the exception of a meaningless, 22-yard, end-of-the half run when the Patriots had eight players back in coverage, running back Brian Westbrook had nowhere to run most of the night. Gained just 22 yards on his 14 other carries.

Center Hank Fraley took a pounding from the Patriots' rotating nose tackles, Keith Traylor and Vince Wilfork, and the only time right tackle Jon Runyan had any success moving people backward usually was after the play was dead.

Right guard Jermane Mayberry probably won't be re-signed because of his susceptibility to injuries the last couple of years. But he'll be replaced by '04 first-round pick Shawn Andrews, who was the season-opening starter at right guard before breaking his leg in Week 1.

They could move Andrews over to Runyan's spot, which they might have done if he had stayed healthy and played a full season. But they're not likely to do that now, although Runyan's $6.5 million cap number in 2005 makes it tempting.

What the Eagles definitely need to add in the offseason is another running back to team with Westbrook, preferably a bigger, change-of-pace guy. Heckert said they will "try" to re-sign Correll Buckhalter, who has missed two of the last three seasons with knee injuries. But they probably won't try very hard.



The Jets' 230-pound free agent-to-be, LaMont Jordan, who averaged 5.2 yards per carry on 93 attempts this season, would be a nice fit. But the Eagles seem to be leaning toward addressing that need early in the draft with one of the three picks they have in the first two rounds.

"There are a lot of good running backs coming out," Heckert said.

The Eagles are expected to have 10 picks in the '05 draft, including compensatory selections they'll receive next month for the '04 free-agent losses of Vincent, Taylor and Staley.

"We can really help ourselves in this draft," Heckert said. "Assuming we do a good job, we can solidify ourselves for the foreseeable future."

And maybe even get back to the Super Bowl.

CARRIE MUSANTE/DAILY COLLEGIAN STAFF PHOTOGRAPHER

Donovan McNabb tried to elude New England defenders like Willie McGinnest throughout the entire Super Bowl on Sunday night. The Eagles will try to avoid a disastrous post-Super Bowl season next year.

New changes at Pebble Beach have made course different

By Doug Ferguson
Associated Press

PEBBLE BEACH, Calif. — Tim Herron walked back to the sixth tee Wednesday morning at Pebble Beach and took in a spectacular view of the 513-yard hole, which stretches out toward the Pacific Ocean, rising along the rugged cliffs on the right side of the fairway.

Something didn't look right.

"Wow," Herron said. "Look at those cliffs."

Then it dawned on him. He never could see the cliffs so clearly because of a large cypress tree. But that tree is no longer there, wiped out by holiday storms. It should make the par 5 play easier, because any tee shot that strayed too far to the right was blocked by the tree. Players either had to go over or around it.

"You can see the whole cliff now, and it's pretty cool," Herron said. "But it changes everything, especially on the second shot. That tree played with your head."

The Pebble Beach National Pro-Am will have a slightly different look when it gets under way Thursday.

Rain that deluged California six weeks ago also washed out a small section of the 18th fairway about 280 yards from the tee, making the landing area a little tighter. Plus, the two cypress trees replaced in the middle of the fairway were planted about 20 yards farther out than they were.

"I hit a drive where I used to, and it was 15 yards from the water not 25," Jim Furyk said.

But there are some things about Pebble Beach that rarely change.

One of them is the weather, and that's the good news. A tournament that developed a reputation for "Crosby weather" — cold, rain, wind, rain, fog, rain — looks as if it will be basking in sunshine for the fifth straight year.

And the field is eclectic as ever.

Because the three courses have room for 180 pro-am teams, the pros range from defending champion Vijay Singh and Phil Mickelson to players like Steve Stricker, Garrett Willis and Tom Scherrer, whose only status on the PGA Tour is having won a tournament once upon a time.

Amateurs range from Hollywood stars (Bill Murray, Kevin Costner) to comedians (George Lopez) to athletes (Patriots coach Bill Belicheck, Emmitt Smith, Jerry Rice) to CEOs from Fortune 500 companies.

Another Pebble tradition over the last two decades is the type of name on the crystal trophy. Only three of the last 21 winners of the AT&T Pebble Beach National Pro-Am have not won a major.

No other regular PGA Tour event has such a major list of winners over the last two decades. The next best is The Players Championship — the fifth major — with 16 of the last 21 champions having also won majors.

So many major winners at Pebble is no fluke.

"It's going to be a slow process of putting yourself in position and never really shooting yourself out of the tournament," said Mark O'Meara, a Masters and British Open champion who has won five times at Pebble. "Then when the final round is played at Pebble, it's not like somebody is going out and shooting super, super low. A lot has to do with the fact the golf course can be a little intimidating at times."

Furyk cited the quality of the courses — especially Pebble and Spyglass — and the size of the greens that require precision iron shots.

He was reminded of that during his practice round Wednesday with former Pittsburgh Steelers receiver Lynn Swann. After negotiating a blind tee shot on No. 8, then an approach over a corner of the ocean, the green is about half the size as most he sees on the PGA Tour.

"It amazes me still how small these greens are," said Furyk, the 2003 U.S. Open champion. "But it's a good golf course. And it definitely requires a lot of patience. I'd like to add my name to that list."

It's an impressive list.

Davis Love III has won twice in the last four years. Mickelson won the longest Pebble Beach National Pro-Am in tournament history, in 1998, when it started in February and ended in August because of rain. Payne Stewart won in 1999, the last time rain cut the tournament to 54 holes. Tiger Woods staged his seven-shot comeback a year later.

Singh made it look easy last year.

Tied with Arron Oberholser going into the final round, Singh missed the first three fairways and made birdie each time, the cruised to a three-shot victory. It proved to be the start of an incredible year — nine wins, nearly $11 million in earnings, and ending Woods' five-year reign atop the world ranking.

"It was just a good platform," Singh said. "I just played really relaxed from there on and just played great. I think that was a key victory to my great season because it kind of relaxed everything."

And that might be the biggest key of all.

PATRICK SCHNEIDER/DAILY COLLEGIAN STAFF PHOTOGRAPHER

The changes at Pebble Beach will definitely cause problems for Tiger Woods and the rest of the field for this weekend's tournament.

STUDENT LEGAL SERVICES OFFICE UMASS, AMHERST

CALL 545-1995
or stop in at 922 Campus Center

Canseco's book may be good for the game

CANSECO from page 12

That, however, was Canseco's explanation — he alleged a few years ago that 80 percent of major leaguers had taken steroids — and he's sticking to it. Without confirming any of the details, he told The New York Times, "I will give a huge press conference, internationally and worldwide, when the book comes out. I'll answer any questions then."

If anybody else posted the numbers Canseco did — 462 home runs in a big league career from 1985-2001 — promised to tell all, the hysteria would be more real than imagined. But because Canseco's past words and deeds outside the white lines have inspired so little credibility, this latest salvo is easy to shrug off. The incidents he will describe likely will be specific enough to ring true, but Canseco is the worst kind of messenger. On top of that, nobody likes a stoolie.

Spring training camps open in a few days, guaranteeing some uncomfortable moments for the players and club executives who will have to answer some tough questions. But it's high time for them to confront the same questions the game's fans have been wrestling with for a while.

STSTRAVEL.COM
Join America's #1 Student Tour Operator
CANCUN ACAPULCO JAMAICA BAHAMAS FLORIDA
SPRING BREAK 2005
Sell Trips, Earn Cash & Travel Free
1-800-648-4849 / www.ststravel.com

AT THE GATES OF SMITH COLLEGE
ACADEMY AWARD NOMINATIONS
3 BEST ACTOR · DON CHEADLE
BEST SUPPORTING ACTRESS · SOPHIE OKONEDO
BEST ORIGINAL SCREENPLAY
ONE OF THE BEST PICTURES OF THE YEAR
★★★★
ONE OF THE YEAR'S MOST MOVING AND POWERFUL FILMS
DON CHEADLE SOPHIE OKONEDO NICK NOLTE
HOTEL RWANDA
PG-13 A TRUE STORY
ONLY LOCAL SHOWING–DAILY 7:00 & 9:15
SAT. 3pm SUN.-MON 5pm
Valentine Special all Seats $5.00
Bogart Bergman Casablanca
Downtown Northampton's Academy of Music
MOVIELINE 413-584-8430
academyofmusictheatre.com
support by the Valley Advocate • www.valleyadvocate.com

FOUR Seasons
WINE • LIQUOR • CIGARS
333 Russell St., Rt. 9
Hadley, MA 01035
584-8174
Sale date 02/10 - 02/16
not responsible for typographical errors

Beer

Wine		Liquor
Moet & Chandon White Star 750ml	$29.99	Bombay Sapphire Gin 1 lt	$24.99
Terra Valentine 750 ml 2000 Napa Valley Cabernet Sauvignon	$23.99	Bushmills 1 lt	$24.99
Sonoma Hills 750 ml Chard, Cab, P. Noir, Merlot	$10.99	Boru Vodka 1.75 lt	$19.99
Canyon Road 1.5 lt Cab, Merlot, Chard	$10.99	Jameson Irish Whiskey 750 ml	$18.99
Vendange 1.5 lt Chard, Cab, Merlot	$10.99	Romana Sambuca 750 ml	$18.99
Wyndham Estates 750 ml Merlot, Cab, Shiraz	$7.99	Southern Comfort 1 lt	$17.99
Arbor Mist 1.5 lt all flavors	$5.99	Tequila Rose 750 ml	$17.99
Foxhorn 1.5 lt Chard, Merlot, Cab	$5.99	"99" Schnapps all flavors 750 ml	$16.99
		Rubinoff Vodka all flavors 1.75 lt	$9.99
		Cask & Cream all flavors 750 ml	$8.99

Hours: Monday - Saturday 9am - 11pm, Sunday 12pm - 11pm

NHL season may be done this weekend

By Ira Podell
Associated Press

NEW YORK — The NHL told the players' association Wednesday that a deal must be made by this weekend to save the hockey season, a source close to the negotiations said.

The players' association rejected what was described as a compromise proposal during a secret meeting Wednesday in Toronto, the source told The Associated Press on the condition of anonymity.

The sides agreed to continue talking through Thursday, but if an agreement is not reached in principle by this weekend then the league doesn't believe games can be played this season.

A union spokesman did not immediately return phone calls Thursday.

The lockout reached its 147th day Wednesday and has forced the cancellation of 807 of the 1,230 regular-season games as well as this weekend's scheduled All-Star game.

It was believed that there was no contact between the sides since last Friday when talks broke off after three straight days of meetings.

The bulk of the negotiations since mid-December were conducted mostly by NHL chief legal officer Bill Daly and players' association senior director Ted Saskin.

Commissioner Gary Bettman and players' association executive director Bob Goodenow were invited by the union back to the table last week for two days of talks following the players' association rejection of the league's previous salary-cap proposal.

It is that issue that has put the NHL on the brink of losing the entire season.

Bettman scheduled a news briefing for later Wednesday night.

The NHL has been intent on making a deal that provides a link between league revenues and player costs. The players' association has steadfastly refused to accept a salary cap as a solution to the stalemate.

JACKIE LOWENTZ/GRAND FORKS HERALD

Canada's Mike Richards (left) and Russia's Alexei Emelin collided at the World Junior Ice Hockey Championships on Jan. 4. The NHL and its players have collided in their negotiations for months.

Branch only blames himself

By John Smallwood
Knight Ridder Newspapers

JACKSONVILLE, Fla. — Deion Branch had blown it.

As a high school senior in Albany, Ga., Branch had played well enough to catch the attention of then-Florida coach Steve Spurrier and receive a scholarship offer to join the Gators.

Then suddenly, it was all taken away. His SAT scores were OK, but his grades in his high school core course weren't good enough.

The scholarship offer to Florida was rescinded, and Branch knew just who to blame and why it had happened.

"It was on me," said Branch, who accepted a Cadillac XLR as the Most Valuable Player of Super Bowl XXXIX. "I think I got a big head, that's what it was. I was committed to Florida. I got so excited that I just stopped going to school. Everything went downhill from there.

"I had to go to junior college, and I think it was a great example for me. I think I learned that had to happen to me for me to learn some things. And I'm glad that happened to me early because if not, something else would have happened to me later on."

Branch doesn't get a big head anymore, not even after tying a Super Bowl record by catching 11 passes in the New England Patriots' 24-21 victory over the Eagles on Sunday night.

"I've already learned," said Branch, who attended Jones County College in Ellisville, Miss., before transferring to Louisville in 2000. "The Super Bowl MVP, hey, I'm thankful. It's a great honor to be alongside all those great guys who have won this award.

"But don't worry about me getting a big head. My mother already got on me about that, so that's not going to happen."

Branch's head might not get larger, but his wallet soon might. The third-year receiver, selected in the second round of the 2002 draft, is about to become a restricted free agent.

Adding the 133 receiving yards he had against the Birds to the totals he had against Carolina in Super Bowl XXXVIII, Branch caught 21 passes for 276 yards in the last two NFL title games.

Deion Branch has caught 21 passes in the last two Super Bowls, but his big-game reputation will garner some attention as a free agent.

"My home is in Foxboro," Branch said. "I am proud to be a part of this organization. I'm proud to be a part of this family. I know for sure that when that time comes we will work out something for sure that both of us will be proud of."

Maybe, but we'll see what happens on March 2, when the free-agency period begins. Among the Patriots who can become unrestricted free agents, the most important are clutch placekicker Adam Vinatieri and offensive lineman Joe Andruzzi.

Free agency, more than anything, could be the reason New England's newly minted dynasty could crumble after three Super Bowl titles in four years. With that many rings on their fingers, free agents who in the past have stayed with the Patriots for less money might not be as willing to short-change themselves.

Change is the only inevitable fact of life in the NFL; when a team has been as successful as the Patriots, change definitely will happen if for no other reason than teams will come after your guys in an effort to build their own winning program.

The Patriots have lost offensive coordinator Charlie Weis to Notre Dame, and moments after Sunday's victory, offensive coordinator Romeo Crennel accepted an offer to become the head coach of the Cleveland Browns.

Losing two coordinators and a few key players to free agency could be a lot to ask New England to overcome as it tries to become the first team to win three consecutive Super Bowls.

"The coaching-staff issue will be a change for us," head coach Bill Belichick said. "But there are changes every year on every team. There's no team that stays the same one year to the next in the NFL.

"Romeo and Charlie have done a great job. Their record speaks for itself, and certainly a great share of the credit for the success we have had goes to them.

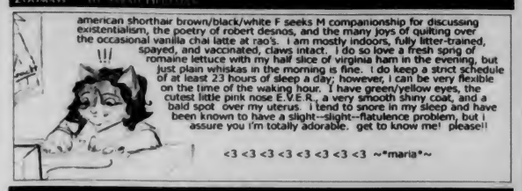
Middle of Nowhere?

Yeah, right.

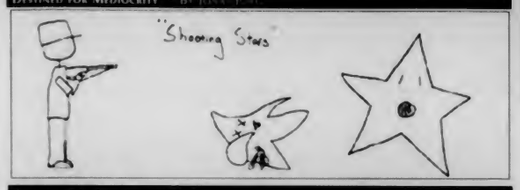
Want directions to a great nursing career at Dartmouth-Hitchcock Medical Center?

Find your way to www.newgradnursing.com

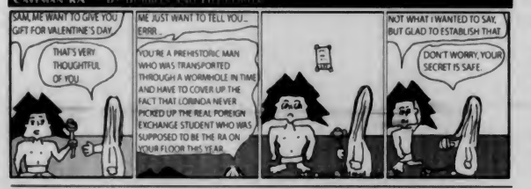
Dartmouth-Hitchcock Medical Center
Lebanon, NH 03756 • www.dhmc.org



Mr. Stick Robot's Laugh O'Rama • By [illegible]



Jeff, Goff & Goat • By [illegible]



Zoomass • By Sarah Hedges

Destined for Mediocrity • By Jesse Lenz

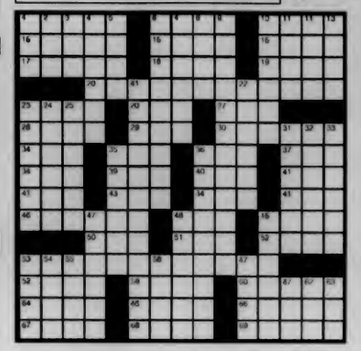
Caveman RA • By [illegible]

Quote of the Day

"A lot of fellows nowadays have a B.A., M.D., or Ph.D. Unfortunately, they don't have a J.O.B."

—Fats Domino

Find today's answers online



www.dailycollegian.com

the Moan and Dove

If you think you're to good to come to our bar.....

You're probably right.

themoananddove.com
460 West St. • Rte. 116
Amherst, MA • 256-1710
3pm 'til 1am every day

Want to increase the size of your Piggy bank?

Advertise with The Daily Collegian

and watch your profits grow

Contact our advertising dept. 545-3500

H·O·R·O·S·C·O·P·E·S

aquarius • Jan. 20-Feb. 18
Don't regret anything you have done today.

pisces • Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Today you're going to have one of those moments where you completely blank out.

aries • Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Stop being such a sappy lovefool and start thinking rationally.

taurus • Apr. 20-May 20
One of these days, Eddy the goose is going to come and get you.

gemini • May 21-Jun. 21
Today someone in the Blue Wall will astound you with their stunning service.

cancer • Jun. 22-Jul. 22
What goes around comes around, you shall see. All is fair in love and war.

leo • Jul. 23-Aug. 22
Wear some nice underwear today, it will make you feel special.

virgo • Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Today you're going to hear an interesting conversation while casually eavesdropping.

libra • Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Put some hot sauce on whatever you're eating. It will add zing.

scorpio • Oct. 23-Nov. 21
You might just want to spend a lot of time in bed today.

sagittarius • Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Today is the day you get to see your friend perform, hopefully.

capricorn • Dec. 22-Jan. 19
Watch out for sketchy burritos today. You might crack a tooth.

Build your business with our business.
Place your ad here, in The Collegian.

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

Activities

Foam party Montreal weekends $89 Montreal Express.Net 1(781)979-9001

Announcements

$600 Group Fundraiser Scheduling Bonus 4 hours of your group's time PLUS our free (yes, free) fundraising solutions EQUALS $1,000-$2,000 in earnings for your group. Call TODAY for a $450 bonus when you schedule your non-sales fundraiser with CampusFundraiser. Contact Campus Fundraiser, (888)923-3238 or visit www.campusfundraiser.com

Put a Valentine's Day classified in for your special someone!

Apartment for Rent

Brandywine Apts. Now Leasing, 1&2 bedroom apts. Leases begin Jun, July, Aug or Sep. First come, first serve. Get them while they last. www.brandywine-apts.com stop by or call 549-0600

Amherst two bedroom condo on busline 875+, Call Paul 413-687-1416

Sunderland 2 bedroom townhouse on busline 830+, Call Erica 413-665-7794

1 bedroom available North Amherst $425 includes heat & electric, bright, clean, washer/dryer in Condo on bus route 1 mile to UMass female preferred Call Liz 508-367-8893

Apartment for Rent

Center of town, 1, 2, 3 bedrooms; hardwood floors. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

Hobart Condos 3 bedroom, hardwood floors, study area in basement. Cable, telephone (internet access) in all bedrooms and study. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

Auto for Sale

1999 Toyota Camry fully loaded. 75K, Mint condition. Call 413-348-4191

Childcare

Babysitter 3 year old boy afternoon/evenings Amherst 413-256-3084

Employment

Top Boys Sports Camp in Maine! Play & Coach Sports * Have Fun * Make $$$ Camp Counselors Positions Available Summer 2005 Apply Online www.campcobosseo.com or call 1-800-473-6104

Earn lots of $$ and have fun on the water this Spring & Summer. Raft guides needed at Crab Apple Whitewater in Charlemont, MA. Fun Summer job, no experience necessary. We will train. 413-625-2288.

Employment

Earn some money! Rent us your ears! Listening experiments $8/Hr 413-545-6837 phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu

Make money taking online surveys earn $10 to $125 for surveys. Earn $25 to $250 for focus groups www.cashforstudents.com/umass

Nanny position for 2 boys ages 6 & 9. Perfect schedule for student. Part time Spring. Full time Summer. Prior experience necessary. 413-625-2288

Movie extras, actors, models! Make $100-$300/day No experience required, FT/PT, All looks needed! 800-340-5939 Ext 1054

For Sale

THE EDUCATION MIRAGE: Cut Student Boredom. Sharpen Your Teaching. Prof. Winn dissects American education. Practical, readable. 180pp. Bookstores $17, tawinn@charter.net

Happy Birthday

HAPPY BIRTHDAY, MAGGIE SMERLAS! Best Wishes on your day of birth! Love, your buddies.

Miscellaneous

$$$$ EARN EXTRA CASH!!! $$$$ Get friends, family, and fellow students to play fantasy baseball and earn cash. No risk. Go to www.totoleague.com/affiliate for details.

Room for Rent

350 per month 413-335-5226

Services

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance 549-1906

Travel

XXX Night Montreal Weekends $89 Montreal Express.net 1(781)979-9001

Spring Break 2005 Only 6 weeks left... Lowest Prices Biggest Parties Earn 2 Free Trips Exclusive with Sun Splash Tours www.sunsplashtours.com 1800-426-7710

Travel

Bahamas Spring Cruise 5 Days $299! Includes Meals, Celebrity Parties! Panama City, Daytona $159! Cancun, Jamaica, Acapulco, Nassau $499! Award Winning Company! SpringBreakTravel.com 1-800-678-6386

#1 Spring Break Vacations! Cancun, Jamaica, Acapulco, Bahamas, & Florida! Best Parties, Best Hotels, Best Prices! Limited Space! 1-800-234-7007 www.endlesssummertours.com

Want to give a shout out to your friends or significant other on Valentine's Day? Why not put a classified in the Collegian? Cheap student rates. 545-3500.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS THURSDAY

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 2005 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

UMass stays Ram tough

The Minutemen knocked off Rhode Island 49-42 last night with the help of 14 points from Maurice Maxwell and 10 from Rashaun Freeman. UMass improved its record to 12-8 and 6-4 in the Atlantic 10.

Eagles understand the weight of a defeat in the Super Bowl

By Paul Domowitch
Knight Ridder

PHILADELPHIA — History hasn't been very kind to Super Bowl losers since the advent of free agency and the salary cap in 1994. Six of 11 runners-up failed to qualify for the playoffs the following year, seven didn't win their division, and none, I repeat, none, managed to make it back to the conference championship game, let alone Roman numeral day.

As the coach and chief cook of the latest Super Bowl loser, the Eagles' Andy Reid is very aware of those troubling statistics.

"I do understand the history of that," he said. "I know (getting back) is a tough thing. Obviously, you have to have some breaks go your way. I know some of those teams had a lot of tough injuries (the next season). Like with any season, whether you went to the Super Bowl or not, you've got to try to stay as healthy as you can to get into the playoffs."

With the 2005 season opener still seven months away, there's plenty of time for a rash of torn ACLs, ruptured Achilles' tendons, fractured fifth metatarsals and other types of apocalyptic misfortune.

But right here, right now, Reid and the rest of the Eagles organization have every reason to believe they are sufficiently armed to make it back to the Super Bowl, and win it, next year.

"We're right there," Reid said. "(If) we eliminate those (four) turnovers, then we become the best team in football. And we've got the players right here to do that."

A year ago, after the Eagles' disappointing, 14-3 loss to the Carolina Panthers in the NFC Championship Game, Reid wasn't nearly as sure of that as he is now. He knew he needed to upgrade his receiving corps, knew he needed to find a difference-making pass rusher. Enter Terrell Owens. Enter Jevon Kearse.

If you're looking for another blockbuster free-agent signing to wash away the bad taste from Sunday's defeat in Jacksonville, forget about it. Not gonna happen. And it doesn't need to happen.

"I think we're a better football team right now than we were last year at this time," said Tom Heckert, the club's vice president of player personnel. "I do think there are a few positions that we can upgrade, and we're going to try to do that. But as far as (needing to sign) a big-time guy, that's probably not going to happen."

"You don't know, as free agency hits, what's going to happen," Reid said. "You want to think there will be subtle changes. But you don't know how this thing works."

The extent of that subtlety primarily will depend on what happens with the Eagles' own free agents-to-be. Reid, Heckert and cap master Joe Banner already have a pretty good idea of how many of their 12 unrestricted free agents they want to try to re-sign and how much they will be willing to spend on each to accomplish that.

In order of importance, their top unrestricted free agent re-signing priorities are expected to be middle linebacker Jeremiah Trotter, defensive tackle Corey Simon, defensive end Derrick Burgess, linebackers Ike Reese and Keith Adams and fullback Jon Ritchie.

The Eagles want Trotter back and he wants to come back. Right now, he is the third-rated inside linebacker on most teams' free-agent board, behind Pittsburgh's Kendrell Bell and Baltimore's Ed Hartwell and ahead of Washington's Antonio Pierce, Atlanta's Jamie Duncan and Indianapolis' Rob Morris. What that means is that Trotter will have suitors.

Unless the Eagles want to consider putting Mark Simoneau back in the middle, which they don't, they don't have a viable on-site replacement for Trotter. As long as he is reasonable and they are fair, a deal likely will get done.

Simon will be a difficult re-signing. Right now, he's coming from the same place Trotter was three years ago. He feels he's one of the top players at his position in the league and wants to be paid accordingly. After watching his inconsistent play this season, most NFL scouts disagree with Simon's high opinion of himself.

"He's a solid NFL starter,"

See EAGLES on page 9

Wolverine charged with felonies

By Maryanne George
Knight Ridder

DETROIT — Katie Karlson remembers that hot August night on her porch near the University of Michigan campus.

For the second time in six days a large man was approaching her house with his pants down, masturbating.

The first time he had covered his face with a T-shirt. But this time she could see his face, and he was standing much closer at the end of her driveway, about 10 feet from the porch.

"I said to my friends, 'Oh my God, he's here again,'" said Karlson, a 21-year-old Michigan senior from Ortonville, recalling the night of Aug. 28. "This went from gross to threatening. We didn't know if he was coming after us."

Larry Harrison Jr., a Michigan sophomore and a 6-foot-3, 300-pound football player, has been charged with four felonies in connection with the incident at Karlson's house and three similar cases of indecent exposure near the campus.

Harrison, 20, who is scheduled for a preliminary examination Wednesday in 15th District Court in Ann Arbor, said he is innocent and continues to attend classes at Michigan, according to court and university records.

But police and the victims want Harrison suspended from school or placed on an electronic tether until the cases are decided.

Harrison, who has been suspended from the football team, is free on a $500 bond.

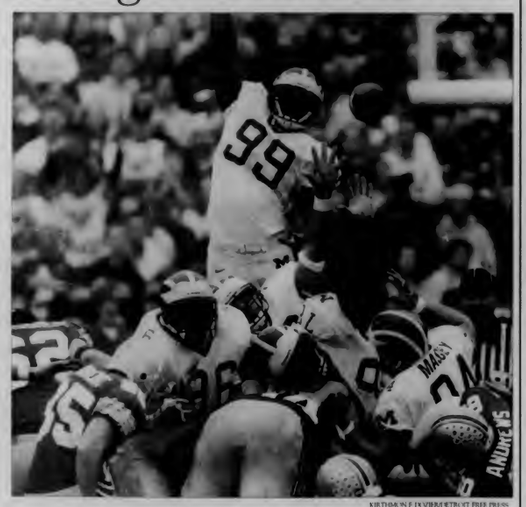
He has been ordered to be off campus by 8 p.m. and at home by 10 p.m., according to court records. His father must also stay at Harrison's Ann Arbor apartment or the student must spend the night at his parents' Detroit home.

The case has pitted the rights of the victims, who say they fear retaliation from Harrison, with Harrison's rights to a fair trial and an education. Victims say Harrison's status as a U-M football player makes it harder to accuse him.

Anthony Chambers, Harrison's attorney, said his client is innocent and is complying with the bond conditions.

"We believe the statements of the victims are based on fear, not facts," Chambers said. "He has not approached any of the victims or tried to intimidate them."

But Karlson said there is no way to monitor Harrison's compliance with the bond order.



"It's so ridiculous," Karlson said. "He doesn't follow the rules. This guy goes up on front porches when he knew he had a lot to lose. I don't want to pass him in Mason Hall," a classroom building on campus. "U-M should get him out of here or at least put him on a tether."

U-M officials say they cannot comment on the case because of federal educational privacy laws, said U-M spokeswoman Julie Peterson. But she said officials balance the rights of accused students with the safety of the campus and have removed students in the past.

She said students victimized by crimes are offered services through the Office of Student Affairs.

But Karlson said she feels the university isn't doing enough to help her and the other victims, who must testify against Harrison in open court.

"I got a voice mail from the Office of Student Conflict Resolution, and they said he was enrolled," Karlson said. "They said if I feel uncomfortable to call them."

KIRTHMON F. DOZIER/DETROIT FREE PRESS

Larry Harrison Jr. (96), a Michigan sophomore has been charged with four felonies for indecent exposure charges around the University of Michigan campus in Ann Arbor. He has been suspended by the team.

Keith Elkin, executive director of OSCR, said the victims or a member of the faculty or U-M staff must file a complaint to initiate a code hearing. To date, no one has filed a complaint against Harrison, he said.

A father of one of the victims said his daughter is afraid to file a complaint.

When Harrison allegedly appeared at his daughter's house, he moved from the sidewalk to a spot close to the front door, according to police.

"My daughter was offered counseling, but to pursue any request to remove him from campus she needed to bring a formal charge in her own name and she said forget it," said the father, who spoke on the condition that he not be identified because he feared for his daughter's safety. "I don't want her to be singled out and face him and then get a midnight visit."

Ann Arbor Police Chief Dan Oates said he understands it is difficult for U-M to balance Harrison's rights with the rights of the victims, but added, "It is our posture that this guy is a predator and he has terrorized a lot of people in Ann Arbor. I would feel better if he was on a tether."

Ann Arbor Detective Chris Fitzpatrick said Harrison is a suspect in 12 other cases of indecent exposure in campus neighborhoods between August and December of last year. As the weather grew colder, the suspect, whose description matches Harrison's, moved from sidewalks and driveways to standing on porches.

He always targeted houses where groups of women lived alone and in five cases went to the houses twice.

Police organized teams of undercover surveillance officers after six incidents and observed Harrison's car in the neighborhoods where the incidents occurred, according to police.

Police say four officers caught him masturbating outside a home in the 700 block of Division Street on Dec. 7 and charged him with a misdemeanor after his arrest.

Last month, the charges were increased to four felonies of being a sexually delinquent person after the victims, including Karlson, identified him in a line up. If convicted, he faces from one day to life in prison.

Corinn Cunningham has identified Harrison as the man she saw masturbating near her front porch on McKinley Avenue in August.

She said the fact that he is a football player intimidates her.

"I wouldn't like to run into him, especially with the whole football team behind him," said Cunningham, 22, from Grosse Pointe Farms, who graduated from U-M in December. "If it were any other student he would be off campus."

Canseco's book may be good for game

By Jim Litke
Associated Press

Every word in Jose Canseco's book could be true. Or only a few.

Either way, it's exactly what baseball deserves. Just about everybody else involved in the game tripped over themselves trying to blur the lines between fair and foul for the last 15 years or so. By default, that makes even a convicted criminal and shameless publicity hound like Canseco as reliable a source as any other. It's what happens when honest men keep quiet.

"If this is all made up, he'll suffer some serious damages," ex-A's pitcher and one-time teammate Dave Stewart told the San Francisco Chronicle. "But if you're an admitted steroid user, believe me, you'd know who uses them."

Canseco is one of four stars from the game's supersized era who have either publicly acknowledged using juice or, according to reports, testified to that effect before a grand jury. One of the four, Ken Caminiti, is dead. A second, Gary Sheffield, said he took them unwittingly. The third, Jason Giambi, has yet to confirm any of the sordid details that made the newspapers when his testimony in the BALCO investigation was leaked.

Canseco, on the other hand, is more than eager to talk and apparently he's naming names. The buzz surrounding his version of events is so considerable that his publisher, HarperCollins, has moved the book's release date up a week, from Feb. 21 to next Monday, and the CBS program "60 Minutes," which planned to air a segment on Canseco on Feb. 20, will now broadcast it on Sunday. But they're not the only ones launching preemptive strikes.

No excerpts have surfaced yet, but accounts in The Daily News of New York claim Canseco writes that he injected Mark McGwire with steroids when they were teammates in Oakland and that he taught Ivan Rodriguez, Juan Gonzalez and Rafael Palmeiro how to use muscle-building drugs after he moved his operation to Texas in 1992.

All three of his former Rangers teammates quickly refuted the allegations, and McGwire has repeatedly denied using steroids. Then again, even after Associated Press columnist Steve Wilstein discovered androstenedione sitting in the open on the top shelf of McGwire's locker in 1998 — before baseball banned the steroid precursor — the St. Louis slugger kept insisting that somebody "stuck their nose in my locker." That's not what happened.

What did happen, though, was this: McGwire publicly acknowledged taking androstenedione the day after a club official was asked for comment. But a day earlier, this was what that club official said: "Use the stuff? He didn't even know how to spell it."

That kind of disinformation has clouded the issue ever since baseballs began flying out of ballparks across the land in alarming numbers. The suits in charge and too many ballplayers, managers and trainers who knew better said the baseballs were wound too tight, the bats were too hard, the new ballparks were too small — just about every explanation was trotted out except the most obvious one. That the ballplayers had become too big.

See CANSECO on page 9

The Daily Collegian

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 2005 NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY • EST. 1890 VOLUME CXV ISSUE 78

New England Winds takes flight at Bezanson
ARTS & LIVING, PAGE 5

TODAY • High: 35° • Low: 18° | SATURDAY • High: 38° • Low: 17° | SUNDAY • High: 35° • Low: 23°

DAILY WEATHER FORECAST

UMass looks to sweep Fordham
SPORTS, PAGE 10

Story addresses owed pay and fee increases

By Casey Novak
Collegian Staff

Representative Ellen Story (D-Amherst), addressed the Faculty Senate on Thursday with what she called "interesting news" on the retroactive pay owed to union workers and a tuition increase to in-state students at the University of Massachusetts, among other topics at the 637th Regular Meeting of the Faculty Senate.

After admitting that she was very hesitant to call it "good news," Story said she has received a lot of e-mails from union members about their retroactive pay.

In fall 2001, contracts promising pay raises to higher education union workers were negotiated for 13,000 higher education employees. The contracts were passed as part of the 2002 budget in both the Massachusetts House of Representative and the State Senate.

When it came time for acting Governor Jane Swift to decide on funding the contract, she vetoed them in July of 2002.

After a major lobbying effort, the Legislature finally passed a funding bill, which brought salaries to where they were supposed to be in January 2004.

However, the retroactive portion (from July 2001 through December 2003) was not paid. The legislative leadership promised that at least one-third of it would be voted by July 2004, the remainder coming later on. This vote, however, did not occur until late fall, and Governor Mitt Romney vetoed the legislation.

"This was an unprecedented situation," said Story. "It was signed, sealed and delivered. We didn't even try to override the veto because it was at the end of the session. We agreed that in this next session we would resume and Governor Romney has filed a supplemental budget a couple of weeks ago. Do you think $37 million for retroactive pay was in it? No it was not."

Story said that the two chairs of the House of Ways and Means, one of who has never even served on the committee before, are taking a look at this.

"What I think may happen is that the Senate President, House Speaker and Chair of Ways and Means agree to add this $37 million into the supplemental budget," Story said. "That is what I hope is going to happen."

Although Story said she was asking for 100 percent of the retroactive pay, she did not think that would happen. Even if it did, she said that the governor would veto it and it would be hard to get the two-thirds majority needed to override the veto.

"But I do think you will see this money," Story said. "There was a commitment made in front of many witnesses, so we hope this will happen sooner rather than later."

Also addressed by Story was the Wednesday meeting of the Administration and Finance Committee of the Board of Trustees, who decided to increase fees 3.2 percent and room and board 5 percent for instate students attending UMass.

"For instate students the cost is now $15,800," she said. "That is much higher than I wish it were, "but it is still much less than the cost for private schools."

The issue of legalized gambling in the state was brought up by one Faculty Senate member as he asked Story if it would ever be possible to bring a certain amount of the money made from gambling to public higher education.

"Casino gambling will keep coming up until we do something definitive about it and probably until we decide to okay it because there is so much money involved," Story answered.

She said that she has noticed a shift in the way legislation is starting to talk about it now, and that she was sure it will come up during this two-year session.

"The only way, I think that a lot of people would vote for it is if revenues were dedicated to something like higher education - something that everybody agrees with, something not controver-

See FACULTY SENATE on page 3

COURTESY VALLEYADVOCATE.COM

Rep. Ellen Story (D-Amherst) spoke about worker retro pay and student fee increases at the UMass Faculty Senate meeting yesterday.

Grateful Dead biographer speaks

By Kathryn Sullivan
Collegian Correspondent

Thirty years after receding from the stark world of academia to pursue a seemingly more exciting avenue of history, Dennis McNally, the authorized biographer of the band The Grateful Dead, returned to the University of Massachusetts to defend his work in a lecture at Memorial Hall on Wednesday.

In front of a room full of deadheads, faculty and students, McNally reflected on his academic roots and his uniquely personal journey to discover history for himself. He graduated from the University of Massachusetts in 1979 with a Ph.D. in American History. He reflects on his education fondly. Worthy and fascinating teachers and long nights buried in books marked his years here.

Yet, he feels that the jargon-filled formal style of history writing he was taught, made it inaccessible to the public. When choosing a subject for his dissertation, McNally took a "sharp left turn" from his predecessors in the field when he became an author.

"Writing cannot be exclusively intellectual," he said to the audience. He urged historians to write history like a story in order to "produce more elegantly expressed history".

He reminds history writers which he researched while touring with the popular psychedelic band of the 1960s, 70s, and 80s, as their publicist for over twenty years. His very uncommon pursuit of history continues to challenge the established system.

Respect was a concept that lingered heavily in the air of Memorial Hall last night. Delicately constructed statements protected the thick cloud of respect that no one wanted to disrupt. McNally looked hopefully at the history department faculty, from which he originated as he explained the rock-and-roll research-filled years that have defined him as a historian.

Similar to the qualities he admired in Jack Kerouac, McNally seemed to be searching for some sort of redemption and respect from his peers as he simultaneously challenged everything they know about writing history.

McNally punctuated his subject matter with jokes as he discussed the importance of writing history for the public.

"Writing cannot be exclusively intellectual," he said to the audience. He urged historians to write history like a story in order to "produce more elegantly expressed history".

He reminds history writers

See McNALLY on page 3

Senate approves new lawsuit measure

By Jesse J. Holland
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Senate approved a measure Thursday to help shield businesses from major class action lawsuits like the ones that have been brought against tobacco companies, giving President Bush the first legislative victory of his second term.

Under the legislation, long sought by big business, large multistate class action lawsuits could no longer be heard in small state courts. Such courts have handed out multimillion-dollar verdicts.

Instead, the cases would be heard by federal judges, who have not proven as open to those type of lawsuits.

The Senate passed the bill 72-26, and it now goes to the House.

Bush called the bill a strong step forward.

"Our country depends on a fair legal system that protects people who have been harmed without encouraging junk lawsuits that undermine confidence in our courts while hurting our economy," Bush said in a statement released in Pennsylvania where he was promoting his Social Security proposals.

Thomas Donohue, president of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, said, "Now it's time for the House to finish the job and take back our civil justice system from plaintiffs' lawyers seeking jackpot justice."

But Todd A. Smith, president of the Association of Trial Lawyers of America, said, "Every American's legal rights are diminished by this anti-consumer legislation." The association said insurance, tobacco, drug, chemical and other companies had financed the push to get the legislation through the Senate.

Bush and other bill supporters - who have pushed for the legislation for almost six years - say it is needed because greedy lawyers have taken advantage of the state system by filing frivolous lawsuits in state courts where they know they can get big verdicts.

Senators who back the bill say that lawyers make more money from such cases than do the actual victims, and that lawyers sometimes threaten companies with class action lawsuits just to get quick financial settlements. Regular people, they assure, will not lose their day in court.

Opponents say Bush and other bill supporters are trying to help businesses escape proper judgments for their wrongdoing - and also to hurt the trial lawyers who litigate the cases, some of whom are big Democratic contributors.

"Are there bad lawyers that bring meritless cases? Sure there are, and we should crack down on them," said Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada, a former trial lawyer. "But this bill is not about punishing bad lawyers. It is about hurting consumers and helping corporations avoid liability for misconduct."

COURTESY CNN.COM

President Bush addresses the issue of major lawsuits at his State of the Union Address in Washington, D.C. last week.

Eight Democrats were sponsors of the bill, leaving the rest with no way to block it.

The bill's aim "is to make sure when companies are called on the carpet, when they are involved in a class action litigation, they're in a court, in a courthouse with a judge where the companies have a fair shake, where the odds, the decks aren't stacked against them," said Sen. Tom Carper, D-Del.

Changing the legal system - including class action lawsuits, medical malpractice lawsuits and asbestos injury lawsuits - has been a priority of Bush and the business community.

"The reason why this bill is the highest priority of the Bush administration and the Republican leadership in Congress is because of one simple fact: Class action suits moved from state courts to federal court are less likely to go forward, to be tried, and they are less likely to reach a verdict where someone wins or loses," said Senate Democratic Whip Richard Durbin, D-Ill. And if the plaintiffs win, businesses are "less likely to pay a reasonable amount of money in federal court than in state court."

The GOP-controlled Senate struck a deal with the House saying if senators passed the bill unchanged, representatives would approve the bill as-is and send it to the White House to be signed into law.

Scientists thinking twice about projects

By Randolph E. Schmid
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Some scientists are thinking twice about doing or reporting on certain research, reacting to political and social controversy in addition to legal restrictions.

"It appears that controversy shapes what scientists choose to study and how they choose to study it, and we need to look a little bit more closely at the effects it might be having," said Joanne Kempner, a researcher at the University of Michigan.

Kempner and co-authors from Brown University and the University of Pennsylvania conducted in-depth interviews with 41 scientists engaged in a variety of studies. They found that half felt constrained by formal limits, but even more said they were affected by informal or unspoken rules on what and how studies can be done. Their findings are reported in Thursday's issue of the journal Science, in a paper entitled "Forbidden Knowledge."

Formal limits include such things as the ban on federal funding for most research on embryonic stem cells and restrictions on research involving humans.

In many cases scientific journals have their own rules, such as refusing to publish material they think might be detrimental to national security.

There also are fears about the ire of interest groups, such as opponents of animal testing, or about how a project would be perceived by the public.

While formal and informal restrictions on research are not unusual, Deborah G. Johnson of the University of Virginia said they are not necessarily all bad.

"On the one hand, you want a profession to have norms and to have some standards and some self-regulation. On the other hand, you don't want there to be an environment of fear of repercussions if they do something which they think is legitimate," said Johnson, who has studied similar issues but was not part of Kempner's group.

One researcher, commenting on avoiding controversial work, told Kempner's team: "I would like to lunatic-proof my life as much as possible."

Another reported deciding not to do a study involving offering food vouchers to drug addicts who tested clean.

"That was something that thought they couldn't do," Kempner said in a telephone interview. "One researcher said, 'Can you imagine that as a headline on the front page of the newspaper, that we're paying cocaine addicts to stay clean?'"

Kempner said, "A lot of

See SCIENTISTS on page 3

MATTHEW REIM/COLLEGIAN

Winter Wonderland

A student braves the elements outside McNamara Hall yesterday as the region was dumped with rain and snow. The University made no announcement to close campus due to weather as of press time.

Doctor convicted of fraud

SYRACUSE, N.Y. (AP) — An Iraqi-born doctor was convicted Thursday of operating a charity that violated a former U.S. embargo and defrauding donors who gave $5 million to help his native country.

The federal jury convicted Dr. Rafil Dhafir of conspiring to violate the embargo, money laundering, tax evasion and Medicare fraud after a trial that lasted more than three months. Dhafir, an oncologist, was acquitted on one of the 11 counts of money laundering.

Defense attorney Deveraux Cannick said Dhafir was the victim of post-Sept. 11 anti-Muslim sentiment. "If he were not a Muslim, he never would have been charged or brought to trial," the attorney said.

Dhafir founded Help The Needy in 1995 and solicited donations to help starving and oppressed Iraqis. The charity was never properly licensed, and the government says only about $160,000 made it to Iraq.

The government says the charity transferred nearly $4 million from its U.S. bank accounts to a bank in Jordan under the name of Maher Zagha, one of the Help the Needy members charged with Dhafir. Zagha remains a fugitive.

The government said Dhafir defrauded donors by using $544,000 for his own purposes, including buying two coin-operated laundries, and he evaded taxes by writing off the charity's donations.

His defense attorneys argued that Dhafir believed humanitarian aid to Iraq was legal, and that while he mixed charity money with his own, he never used donations for personal expenses.

The attorneys also said Dhafir got caught up in difficult rules governing Medicare and his mistakes were not crimes.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center
University of Massachusetts
Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Peter Foundas
MANAGING EDITOR Mike Marzelli
BUSINESS MANAGER Rich Pacheco
PRODUCTION MANAGER Cory Rosenberg
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Meghan Healy
ADVERTISING MANAGER Tiffany Suglaki
EDITORIAL PRODUCTION Samantha M. Nielsen
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Michael Busack
COMICS EDITOR Alyson Zillmann
EDITORIAL EDITOR Yousef Munayyer
EDITORIAL EDITOR Allison Edles
NEWS EDITOR Erika Lovley
PHOTO EDITOR Alex Demosthene
SPORTS EDITOR Bob McGovern
CIRCULATION MANAGER Kristen Weiss
CLASSIFIED ADVERTISING Marty Pappas
DISTRIBUTION MANAGER Josh Kiggens
FINANCE MANAGER Hirak Shah
ACCOUNTING CLERK Virginie Frecaut
HUMAN RESOURCE Sandra Marquez
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Josh Greenberg
ASSISTANT BUSINESS Nathan Chomsky
ASSISTANT FINANCE Thomas Hecht
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Rachael Bruno
GRAPHICS ADVISOR Charlie Higgins
ASST ARTS & LIVING Matthew O'Rourke
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Chris Gaznes
ASSISTANT NEWS Julie O'Donnell
ASSISTANT NEWS Dan O'Brien
ASSISTANT PHOTO Megan Brinster
ASSISTANT SPORTS Jeff Howe

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS CALENDAR SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY FUNDED, OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS AGGIE LIFE. BECAME THE COLLEGE SIGNAL IN 1907, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1914 AND THE TRI-WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1956. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967, THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN BROADSHEET SINCE JANUARY 1994. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL WEEKDAYS BETWEEN 8:30 A.M. AND 3:30 P.M.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Matt Elder
PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Jamie Lau
COPY EDITOR
Michael Busack
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Matthew Reid
PRODUCTION STAFF
Amanda Allen, Tiffany VanLangen

Campus Perspectives

by Jamie Lau

How do you feel about the rising tuition fees at UMass?

freshman
Education major

"It's hard to pay for the tuition when you have to pay for books too."

Thuy Tran

freshman
Exercise Science major

"I think that it is an unfortunate situation, and it will definitely make things difficult for students. Nonetheless, it is unavoidable as UMass tries to offer more for the campus and the students."

Kelly Gazzano

senior
English major

"I feel that the tuition has risen somewhat unfairly over the past four years. To increase tuition every successive year is difficult for students to cope with."

Michael Moran

sophmore
Food Science major

"It's really too bad, because I have a hard enough time paying to be here, and if it gets too high, I'll have to start looking at other schools."

Edward Ryan

grad school
Animal Science major

"The fees are very high in comparison to other schools. Tuition is fine, but the mandatory fees are totally unacceptable."

Anuj Malik

freshman
Dance major

"I can't even afford the tuition right now..."

Lior Benador

'Perfect Storm' brother rescued

GLOUCESTER (AP) — The U.S. Coast Guard rescued three fishermen whose boat sank at sea, including the brother of one of the fishermen lost in the 1991 sinking of the Andrea Gail portrayed in the book and film, "The Perfect Storm."

The 45-foot gillnetter that sank Wednesday about 45 miles east of Gloucester sent a mayday call that was detected by a Coast Guard jet. The plane's crew spotted the men, who had climbed aboard a life raft as their boat, the Hollywood, went down, the Coast Guard said.

A Coast Guard helicopter arrived to lift the three men one-by-one from the 39-degree water.

Two of the three men had been wearing survival suits, and all three declined medical attention.

The crew members were identified as skipper Richard Shatford, Lewis Mitchell and Mitchell's son Brian Clancy, all from Gloucester.

Shatford's brother, Bobby, was one of six fishermen who died in the sinking of the Andrea Gail.

"I already lost one son," said Richard Shatford, father of Bobby Shatford. "It just scares me."

"They were real lucky," he said.

The crew had left port Tuesday and was returning from a fishing trip when the boat began taking on water.

Crew members reported they did not know why the boat was taking on water, Coast Guard spokesman Scott Carr said. The Coast Guard was investigating.

Associated Press

Man with major memory loss found

BOSTON (AP) — An amnesia victim who says his nickname is "Tee" but knows nothing else about his identity has uncovered few clues in the mystery a month after he suffered head trauma that apparently triggered his memory loss.

The man, who appears to be in his late teens, was found dazed in a dirty snowbank on a street corner in the city's Mattapan section on Jan. 12 and brought to a hospital for treatment of his head injury.

"The last thing I remember is being thrown out of a car by three people. I woke up on the street and there was a lady over me," the man told the Boston Herald in a voice tinged with an accent suggesting a childhood in the Caribbean.

"I just want to have my memory back. I hope someone is looking for me," he said.

The man said he had a vague recollection of a woman calling him "Tee."

Police detectives who were alerted to the case by a social worker fingerprinted and photographed the man to see if he was wanted for a crime and checked for a missing persons report. He has never been arrested anywhere in the country, and no one was looking for him locally, police spokesman Lt. Kevin Foley said.

"At this point it becomes difficult to investigate if he does not know who he is, where the assault took place, or whether it was even in Boston," Foley said.

Caritas Carney Hospital discharged the man Monday to a Dorchester homeless center run by the Pilgrim Church. He left the hospital in the jeans, tan T-shirt and black jacket he wore when he arrived there. His wallet was empty, but there was $80 tucked into one of his sneakers.

The man said he robbed of the cash within hours of arriving at the shelter. So he returned to the hospital, but was told they had no place for him.

"We did everything we could for him medically," hospital spokeswoman Diane Lupo said.

During the weeks he spent in the psychiatric unit there, the man befriended another patient, Kelly Rust, 24, and called her for help.

Rust called her sister, Stacy Maceachern, who invited the man to stay at her Weymouth home until his memory returns or his loved ones come forward.

—Associated Press

GREAT Reasons to use UHS Eye Care Services

1 Savings on eyeglasses from the on-site Optical Services at UHS
2 A great place to get contact lenses
3 Convenient hours and location
4 FREE eyeglass adjustments and one year warranty on frames
5 Savings on routine eye exams for students at UMass

SPECIAL OFFER: 10 PERCENT STUDENT DISCOUNT ON ALL FRAMES AND EYEGLASS LENSES!*

"I invite you to use the Eye Care Services"

* Cannot be combined with other insurance discounts.

For appointments or questions, call 577-5383

Frederick H. Bloom, O.D.
Director, UHS Eye Care Services

UHS EYE CARE SERVICES

CINEMARK
CINEMARK AT HAMPSHIRE MALL
Schedule for 2/11/05 - 2/17/05
Purchase Tickets Online @ cinemark.com

BOOGEYMAN (PG13) 1:15 4:15 7:40 10:00*	RACING STRIPES (PG) 1:45 7:00
THE WEDDING DATE (PG13) 1:25 4:30 7:30 9:50*	FINDING NEVERLAND (PG) 2:00 4:25 7:15 9:45
MILLION DOLLAR BABY (PG13) 1:05 4:05 7:15 10:10	THE AVIATOR (PG13) 1:00 4:45 8:15
HIDE & SEEK (R) 1:20 4:20 7:05 9:40	MEET THE FOCKERS (PG13) 1:10 4:35 7:25 10:05
HITCH (PG13) 1:10 1:50 4:00 4:45 7:10 7:35 9:55 10:20*	POOH'S HEFFALUMP MOVIE (G) 1:30 3:25 5:20 7:20 9:15*
ARE WE THERE YET? (PG) 4:40 9:30	SENIOR MOVIE FEB 17TH HITCH DOORS OPEN AT 9:15
IN GOOD COMPANY (PG13) 1:40 4:50 7:45 10:30	FRIDAY NIGHT REWIND MARCH 4TH ROCKY - MIDNIGHT

cinemark.com

Author speaks to students

McNALLY from page 1

to view their subjects as people who "lived, breathed and cried" and not as "puppets for theories."

On the subject of objectivity he said, "fairness is all we can expect."

Although he shared close relationships with the Grateful Dead, he did not let it effect what he wrote about their lives, he said.

"You pursue fairness because you pursue quality," he said.

McNally said that revisiting his roots at UMass has reinvigorated him to work on his next book, a historical look at the culture, music and literature surrounding the Mississippi River.

McNally was pleased to rejoin the academic community, even if only for one night. Upon leaving the podium he remarked, "Thomas Wolffe was wrong, you can go home again."

Dennis McNally, the authorized biographer for the band "Grateful Dead" and a UMass alumnus gives a talk at Memorial Hall.

House votes on driver license issue

WASHINGTON (AP) — Hoping to keep drivers licenses out of the hands of terrorists, the House voted Thursday make states verify that applicants are U.S. citizens or legal immigrants.

Republicans pushed the measure through on a 261-161 vote despite protests from governors and state motor vehicle departments that it would be too costly and would require them to take on the role of immigration officers.

The bill also would make it easier for judges to deport immigrants seeking political asylum if they think they might be terrorists.

"Common sense says we should not allow suspected terrorists to be able to stay inside our borders if they could harm us," said House Speaker Dennis Hastert.

The measure was rejected by Congress and the White House in December as part of a bill reorganizing intelligence agencies in response to flaws found after the Sept. 11, 2001 terrorism attacks. It was revived with newly won support from the Bush administration.

"Today there are over 350 valid drivers license designs issued by the 50 states. We all know it's very difficult for security officials at airports to tell the real ID cards from the counterfeit ones," said the bill's sponsor, House Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner.

Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., said the new features that states would have to include on drivers licenses would prevent terrorists from using them as IDs to board planes like the Sept. 11 hijackers did.

Governors, state legislators and motor vehicle departments have all argued that requiring verification of background information such as Social Security numbers and whether a person is in the United States legally would be burdensome.

Story speaks with Senate

FACULTY SENATE from page 1

sial," Story said.

On the topic of revenues, the State Representative said one of the things she would like to happen is to stop Governor Romney's idea that personal income taxes should be reduced to 5 percent.

"Four years ago it was at 5.95 percent," Story said. "Right now it is frozen at 5. 2 percent. What I talk about is restoring the tax rate - restore it to 5. 65 percent or maybe 5.95 percent."

According to her, that increase would bring in a billion dollars.

"We need to meet the basic needs of our constituents and the only way to do this is by increasing the personal income tax," Story said.

Even though Story found it hard to deliver very much good news, she did say that she thinks we are headed for much better times.

"I am much more optimistic I have been in the last eight years and I think things are going to be infinitely better."

Rice says North Korea should disarm

BY ANNE GERAN
ASSOCIATED PRESS

LUXEMBOURG— Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Thursday that North Korea should return to disarmament talks and avoid a path toward further international isolation. "The world has given them a way out and we hope they will take that way out," she said.

Rice's comments came after North Korea stated explicitly that it has nuclear weapons and said that it needs them as protection against an increasingly hostile United States.

"The North Koreans have been told by the president of the United States that the United States has no intention of attacking or invading North Korea," Rice said during a news conference here with European Union leaders.

"There is a path for the North Koreans that would put them in a more reasonable relationship with the rest of the world," she said, referring to an international disarmament effort that includes the United States.

Giving up nuclear weapons would offer hope for a better life to that country's people, Rice said. North Korea is desperately poor, and people are fleeing the country to avoid starvation.

The North Korean statement may be a bluff meant to put the United States back on its heels before the regime finally does return to the disarmament table. North Korea told a visiting U.S. congressional delegation last month that it would return to those six-nation talks.

Asked to analyze the thinking in Pyongyang, Rice was almost dismissive.

"I'm not sure anyone ever gets very far by trying to second-guess the motivation of the North Korean regime," she said.

"The fact is that we have for some time taken account of the capacity of the North Koreans to perhaps have a few nuclear weapons," Rice said. "There's no definitive - I can't go into the intelligence here - but there's no definitive answers of how many, but this has been since the mid-90s that the United States has assumed that the North Koreans could make such steps.

Traveling with President Bush to North Carolina Thursday, White House press secretary Scott McClellan told reporters, "It's rhetoric we've heard before. We remain committed to the six-party talks. We remain committed to a peaceful diplomatic resolution to the nuclear issue with regards to North Korea."

Talking to reporters en route to Ireland for a refueling stop, Rice noted that she previously had scheduled a meeting in Washington next Monday with South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki-Moon and also said that she and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld will see their Japanese counterparts soon and will discuss the North Korean situation.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice speaks out against North Korea's intention to make nuclear weapons at a conference Thursday.

"Let's see what the North Koreans do down the road. Everybody is urging them to get back to the talks," she told reporters. "I cannot judge the motivation of the North Korean government, nobody can judge." Rice had characterized North Korea as an "outpost of tyranny" during her confirmation hearings.

"I can't judge the North Korean leadership's motivation," she said Thursday. "I told the truth and I think the chief diplomat (Rice) ought to tell the truth."

"We are ready to return to the six-party talks," she said. "The North Koreans should be too."

Rice said earlier that the United States isn't treating North Korea differently from Iran, another nation in President Bush's famous rhetorical axis of evil.

"The message is clear: give up these aspirations for nuclear weapons and you know life can be different," Rice said. She also said that is the same message that Libya understood in renouncing its own nuclear ambitions.

Unlike Iran, North Korea had not been a frequent topic during Rice's breakneck tour of eight European countries and Israel over the past week. She also visited the West Bank and the Vatican.

Rice used the trip to reach out to Europe, and Europe reached back.

It is too soon to measure success, but Rice seemed pleased as she neared the end of the breakneck tour.

Highway renamed after Emmett Till

JACKSON, Miss. (AP) — Stretches of Mississippi highways in three counties would be renamed for victims of the nation's most infamous civil rights killings under a bill approved Thursday by the state Senate.

A stretch of Mississippi 19 near Philadelphia, believed to be the site of the murders of James Chaney, Andrew Goodman and Michael Schwerner, would be renamed for the three civil rights workers ambushed and killed by the Ku Klux Klan in 1964. A reputed former Klansman, Edgar Ray Killen, was recently indicted in the case.

The bill would also rename a portion of U.S. 49 East in Leflore and Tallahatchie counties the Emmett Till Memorial Highway, after the black 14-year-old who was beaten to death in 1955, supposedly for whistling at a white woman. That case has also recently been reopened by prosecutors.

If the bill is passed in the House and signed by Republican Gov. Haley Barbour, it will be the first state-sponsored memorial for Goodman, Chaney and Schwerner, said Sen. Gloria Williamson, a Democrat from Philadelphia.

Two killed in Iraq; precautions underway

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) — A car bomb detonated by remote control exploded in a crowded central Baghdad square Thursday moments after an American military convoy passed, killing at least two Iraqis and wounding two others, the U.S. Army said. There were no U.S. casualties.

South of the capital, the bodies of 20 Iraqi truck drivers who had been shot were found dumped on a road, their hands bound behind their backs, police Capt. Ahmed Ismail said. Some of the trucks were owned by the government, Ismail said.

With violence on the rise after the Jan. 30 election, Iraqi authorities announced the country's borders would be sealed for five days this month around the time of a major Shiite religious holiday. Last year during the holiday, about 180 people were killed in suicide attacks at Shiite shrines.

Most of the latest attacks have been against Iraq's security forces in a bid to undermine public confidence after police and soldiers managed to prevent catastrophic attacks during the elections. Gunmen fired on an Iraqi police patrol Thursday in Baqouba, north of Baghdad, setting off a gunbattle that killed a civilian bystander and wounded two police officers, a security official said. Assailants also gunned down a police lieutenant in Baqouba, the official said.

Five bodies in Iraqi National Guard uniforms were found Thursday in the insurgent stronghold of Ramadi, west of Baghdad. Hospital director Ala al Ani said residents reported that the slain men were among 13 guardsmen who went missing recently.

—Associated Press

Scientists rethink controversial projects

SCIENTISTS from page 1

researchers that we spoke to were risk-averse in terms of avoiding controversy," She added, "There were plenty of people who said controversy is a good thing, because it opens up topics to public debate."

Militant animal rights groups were a concern for many, who worried about organizations that have invaded laboratories to set animals loose and destroy research.

Kempner recalled one of her interviews.

"All of a sudden he said, 'How do I know you're not from an animal rights organization collecting information to storm the place?'"

Sometimes commercial interests can get in the way of research, Kempner added, saying there are cases when the pharmaceutical industry will ask a researcher not to publish a particular finding.

"HOT" YOGA
BIKRAM YOGA AMHERST
www.bikramyoga.com
665-yoga

The room is heated to open you...
The series is powerful to challenge you...
The yoga is BIKRAM to change you...

Designed for all levels, BIKRAM yoga will challenge you physically...focus you mentally...and allow you to relax on a very deep level.

TRY IT FOR 10 CONSECUTIVE DAYS FOR ONLY $20!!!

On Rt. 116 across from Cliffside Apts.
Open 7 Days with generous student rates.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 2005

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." -Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Social security reform needs more discussion

Several decades ago, a president took to the floor of Congress many social reforms that were intended to provide economic security for the individual American who had been suffering through the Great Depression. The current President is now pushing for yet more social security reforms for what he claims is the same purpose, the economic security of the individual American.

George W. Bush is certainly no Franklin Delano Roosevelt, but the strategy is similar, the approach is similar, yet there is one glaring difference; FDR was responding to a severe crisis and the Bush administration has failed to prove the same. In fact, many law makers on the other side of the isle claim that the Bush administration is grossly exaggerating the crisis. They are also accusing the administration of politicizing the issue.

President Bush, however, is quite convinced of the need for reforms. For the first time in several years, he devoted a significant part of his state of the union speech to a domestic issue. This taking primacy, when placed in the context of the ongoing war in Iraq, shows that the President has decided to make it a central issue for his impending term.

There are several objections to the proposed reforms. Perhaps the most glaring among these objections is the objection to the creation of private funds to which part of the social security tax would go. Many liberals have argued that public money does not belong in private hands, but perhaps even more alarming is the possibility that this money, tied to the stock market, can never be truly secure. Security is the underlying theme and to place a portion of the money in what could be a volatile market presents the grounds for skepticism.

The willingness of the Bush administration to do this highlights their confidence in the American economy. Social security, which was established because of an economic crisis, was meant to keep funds out of the danger that the market ultimately presents. The division over Social Security runs between those who want to privatize and those who want to keep public money out of private hands. Also, however, that division runs through those who are confident about the future of the American economy and those who are skeptical.

The Bush administration has given that later group plenty of ammunition for their argument. Aside from the recent devaluation of the dollar and growing global investment in European markets, skeptics of the future of the American economy are concerned about the ever-growing deficit. The plan to overhaul social security itself would be a costly one and, when considering the already large deficit, the ongoing war and necessity for supplies and the intentions of the administration to make tax relief permanent, there is no doubt that questions about paying back the debt are certainly grounded in dangerous realities.

Still, with all the concerns that have been raised on both sides, the younger generations of Americans, namely those between the ages of 18 and 25, have been extremely quiet on the issue. As this is a matter that will affect the youth of today in the years of tomorrow, more debate needs to surface or an older generation will undoubtedly affect the retirement of a generation to come.

Unsigned editorials represent the majority opinion of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian Editorial Board.

Support needed for UMass sports

Mike Anmuth

I'm a big fan of the theory that UMass athletics in general are underappreciated, but the big ones like men's basketball, football and hockey get pretty good press when they're in season.

The smaller sports get pushed to the side in terms of fans showing up and the amount of attention being paid to them, despite the fact that these athletes practice and play as hard as any of the other athletes on campus.

I can say for a fact that this semester, I will be at as many athletic events as possible, whether they're big or small, prominent or not, simply because I love UMass and the athletic program here.

That being said, my friend John and I have tried to go to the UMass women's hockey home games since we have been back from winter break. While we haven't made it to all of them, we have attended the majority of the games and it's been a fantastic time. Not only do you get to sit extremely close to the ice in the Mullins Center practice rink, where women's hockey games are held, but also you feel as though you're definitely a part of the experience.

While men's hockey is awesome to watch and I would never give that up, women's hockey is a whole different ball game because it's a club sport rather than a varsity sport, and the team is responsible for renting the ice, getting the referees, scheduling games and all other administrative matters.

To not only go out there and play your heart out, but to also handle the administrative side of things is really impressive, and our women's hockey team is just that — impressive. As we sat on the side of the ice and watched them quite literally crush Mt. Holyoke with a score of 12-0, we were impressed by the skill of the team members in working together, in their offense and defense and how they showed a neighboring school that UMass is a powerful force.

To not only go out there and play your heart out, but to also handle the administrative side of things is really impressive, and our women's hockey team is just that - impressive.

Each game we've attended has been of the same caliber, the same excitement and the same cheering and clapping whenever our team scores a goal. While there may not be as many fans present as men's hockey, there are definitely dedicated fans that are there for the home games and cheer on the team to victory whenever possible.

Each time we've been there, the same group of students consistently attends and cheers a friend of theirs on the team, and the team in general. Slamming against the boards from the stands whenever a goal is scored, and yelling continuously for a win is the same spirit that should be present not just at women's hockey but at every UMass sporting event.

This is where I encourage you. I'm encouraging you this week to get out and go to the games, the events, the programs, to cheer on our teams in every sport that they play. If hockey doesn't tickle your fancy, we have so many more diverse athletics here on campus that appeal to different audiences. While I'm out there cheering on women's hockey, men's hockey, men's and women's basketball, softball and baseball, swimming and diving, tennis and any other events that I can fit into my schedule this semester, you should be on the sidelines with me.

Our athletics are comprised of students who do the same academic work that you do, but practice hard and practice often, compete and then practice more, so they deserve our appreciation. Show them that appreciation by being a part of the athletics fan base, joining the athletics fan club, the Maroon Platoon and/or encouraging your friends to go to events as well.

In order for a university of this size to thrive, we need school spirit and a lot of it, to help ourselves feel connected to the place that we spend the better part of our year attending. I know that after the win over UConn for men's basketball, I was never more proud to be attending the University of Massachusetts. We can create and increase that feeling every day by attending athletic events and showing our support in as many ways possible. I know I will. The only thing left to say here is what I've been saying all along and I will continue to say, particularly when I have my large foam #1 hand at events: Go Minutemen and, of course, Go Minutewomen!

Mike Anmuth is a Collegian columnist.

Time to change the box

Ben Duffy

One of my favorite idioms from this decade has been "think outside the box." It's a perfectly phrased invitation to think in dimensions that our brains haven't been conditioned to understand. I admit that I think inside of a box. It's called socialization, and the only ones who haven't been exposed to it are newborn infants. In time, they will grow and learn. They will experience the world they live in, internalize norms, adopt "isms" and craft dogmatic matrixes of thought. It happens to all of us, no exceptions.

So here I am at the esteemed University of Massachusetts, where I find myself in the political minority. Prevailing political currents on campus challenge the "box" in which I think; that is to say my own "isms", assumptions and beliefs. My liberal friends have suggested that I should be grateful that UMass is providing me with such an opportunity to think outside of the box. Challenging assumptions is an integral part of a good liberal arts education, they argue.

A young liberal might come here for freshman orientation with certain philosophies, and graduate four years later with every assumption fortified.

I couldn't agree more, and that's why I want to return the favor. I wouldn't want my liberal friends to leave UMass with a substandard education. It's been my experience that the student body here leans to the left. It would be patently unfair to deprive these students of the same quality of education that I receive, by allowing them to continue to think inside of the box.

By reinforcing predominantly left-wing assumptions, it allows the "box" in which they think to constrict further and further. A young liberal might come here for freshman orientation with certain philosophies, and graduate four years later with every assumption fortified. I wouldn't want my liberal friends to be ripped off like that.

For example, I find so many students who adhere to the great Marxist idea that all of history is the history of class struggle. Whether they're aware of the ideas Marxist associations or not, they nonetheless approach history with a "follow the money" approach. Every war we've ever fought was actually a covert ploy to make the rich richer and the poor poorer.

I'd be an idiot to think that money doesn't make the world go round, but I can't believe that so many people believe that there is a single theme that can explain of all history. Sorry, but history isn't that simple, and the idea can become a very small box if you allow it. After a year at UMass, I've decided that this idea is an inviolable precept of campus leftism, and so the box gets smaller.

I advocate hiring more conservative faculty members, not wishy-washy conservatives like Rush Limbaugh either. I'm talking about hardline right-wingers who are every bit as dedicated as our very own Professor Sut Jhally.

I have the perfect candidate in mind. His name is Dr. Michael Savage, and you can hear him every evening from 7:00pm until 10:00pm on WHYN AM 560. Dr. Savage's program, "The Savage Nation" is by far the most passionate right wing radio show on the dial.

Staunchly independent, Michael calls it like he sees it. Even I'm offended from time to time, though that's entirely irrelevant. Dr. Savage wouldn't come for my sake. He'd come to help the poor liberals who are getting shortchanged. Through Dr. Savage's lectures, he could help dogmatic leftists to expand their horizons and really get their money's worth from their tuition. His views on homosexuality, immigration, war, terrorism and race could really spice things up here on a campus where nearly everyone agrees with everyone else.

Don't doubt Dr. Savage's intelligence or qualifications either. Author of 18 books, having earned two master's degrees and a PhD, Dr. Savage is indeed a very bright guy. Unfortunately, Savage's education isn't in poli-sci or history, but rather in epidermology and nutrition. That's okay though, we can pull a classic stunt that the lefties have been pulling for years. We can sneak him in to teach a nutrition class, which the good doctor can exploit as his political pulpit.

According to a Wall Street Journal survey of 50 universities, half of all students "...said that their professors 'frequently comment on politics in class even though it has nothing to do with the course' or use the classroom to present their personal political views."

Michael Sugarman of the UMass Anthropology Department spent an entire lecture on Nov. 3 talking about Bush being the worst president there ever was and how his reelection was going to usher in the Apocalypse. German instructor Melissa Gazzo tried to slip a one-sided lesson on multiculturalism into my German class last year. If Professor Sugarman doesn't have to teach anthropology, and Ms. Gazzo doesn't have to teach German, then I guess Michael Savage doesn't have to teach nutrition.

Of course, I fully expect that his lectures will cause cardiac arrests here at liberal UMass. The first time he said that "liberalism is a mental disorder," that homosexuality is unnatural, or that we really need to flatten Iraqi cities that refuse to flush out insurgents, there would probably be mass riots in the classroom. That's okay though. If I can sit through lectures that make my blood boil, they can too. It's all part of a well-rounded education. You can thank me later.

Ben Duffy is a Collegian columnist.

Smiles make all the difference

Elizabeth Carter

As I waited alone for my cheese-steak sub at the Marketplace Cafe, I looked amidst the crowd of faces that seemed to be etched of stone, blank and searching looks, some with a subtle masked sorrow, others a bored malaise, and others still foreign with a certain doleful longing for more familiar surroundings. Yet in each of these faces, there was a bereft sense of loneliness hidden behind the mirror like eyes existed tangibly enough for me to see.

The man behind the counter cooked feverishly, cracking eggs and frying bacon with a type of machine precision I both respected and lamented upon. Yet there were no smiles. No, not one amidst this crowd was crinkling their eyes and baring their teeth in a show of elated emotion that seems so rare in public, especially a public room full of strangers. And I wondered to myself why? Why is it that no one ever smiles at each other? A room full of people all attempting to pretend that the rest of the people who happened to be joining them simply did not exist. How very sad. How very cold. How very lonesome.

I wondered was it the pressing weight of stress the new semester has brought with it? Or maybe it is the bitter cold that has been chilling our cheer and chilling each of us to the bone whilst we scurry outside the warm enclaves we all run to for shelter? Or possibly the air of detachment our ever dangerous society encourages and promotes, selling the idea that strangers are enemies to be hidden from and reviled?

Possibly something deeper and more personal what lies within the heavy heart of each attendee of the Marketplace today?

Then, of course, there is the creeping fear at what should happen if one were to smile and extend unneeded kindness to others whom we do not know. First there is the risk of the smile not being returned. For some, that may be a chance of rejection that is not worthy of wasting on a stranger. Then there is the concern that another may take the quiet compassion exchanged in a subtle upward turn of the lips as an overfriendly invitation in conjunction with a simple lack of desire to make new acquaintances for a myriad of personal reasons.

I truley wish we would all turn in our glass masks, melt the surface and reveal the flesh underneath by simply cracking an unashamed smile at a complete stranger.

While these are not the best outlooks, they do make sense in an odd manner.

So we look blankly at one another, hiding our humanity away behind a mask of unacknowledging indifference. How very gloomy a way that is for all of us to live. In my mind's eye, all those around me turned to cold hard steel, their movements jerkish and exactly alike in their robotic symmetry with their expressionless faces. Dancing to a music no one could hear yet each was exactly in step — never noticing that anyone else was in the room at all. Faces of glass that pretended to be stone yet truly are glass to those who look to see the person hidden behind the emotionless veneer.

I truly wish we would all turn in our glass masks, melt the surface and reveal the flesh underneath by simply cracking an unashamed smile at a complete stranger, a smile that simply gives, does not ask, and does not desire to receive anything back, a smile that grants its happiness, and understands the fearful responses it may incur from the frozen glass faces around it. Glass faces that twist their masks to contorted looks of confusion because they cannot comprehend unassuming happiness that simply bestows itself without expectation. Yet as I said this is a smile that understands and therefore takes no offense at rebuffs and only hopes that some day each and every mask is discarded, and that someday we all stop being afraid to feel.

Elizabeth Carter is a Collegian columnist.

Have an opinion? Submit it to Ed/Op.

Send submissions to editorial@dailycollegian.com

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 2005

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Taking flight...

New England Winds soar at Bezanson

By Joe Piedrafite
Collegian Staff

This past Tuesday, about 50 music fans filled Bezanson Recital Hall in the Fine Arts Center, eager to hear the evening's performance from the New England Winds, a quintet from the larger Air Force Band of Liberty. The quintet, based out of Hanscom Air Force Base in Bedford, MA, consisted of Master Sgt. Katherine Cooper on Flute, Staff Sgt. Amanda Dell on clarinet, Bassoonist Airman 1st Class Christopher Stahl, Senior Airman Craig Matta and Airman 1st Class, Kate Nettles on horn and oboe, respectively.

Music Department Professor Michael Sussman welcomed the audience and introduced the Quintet. Their program was entitled "From Salzburg to Manhattan," which referred to the diversity of their musical program for the evening, playing works of various writers across the globe.

Staff Sgt. Amanda Dell introduced the group and their first piece, "Quintet" from August Klughardt's Opus No. 79. A piece in four movements, it lasted almost 25 minutes.

Bassoonist Airman 1st Class Christopher Stahl introduced their next piece, a deviation from the program, entitled "Suite for Woodwind Quintet" by a French composer. It also was a piece in three movements, and the five incredibly talented musicians produced enough sound to flesh out an entire orchestra.

After a short break, the Quintet came back and fielded questions from the audience during a short question-and-answer session. When asked how many performances they do a year, Master Sgt. Cooper and Airman 1st Class Stahl said that they perform "about 300-400 times a year." They went on to explain that The New England Winds was a group of the much larger Air Force Band of Liberty, which has approximately 70 members. In addition to the New England Winds, there are other groups within the larger ensemble, a Brass quintet, Jazz Band, a Pop Combo, and other various small ensembles. The ensemble practices Monday thru Friday for about four hours a day.

New England Winds
Bezanson
UMass
Feb 8

After the question-and-answer session, the group continued their program, and the second half focused on more upbeat, peppy music than the first half had. Their repertoire for the second part of their program included "A Frolic in Be-Bop Major" from a larger piece called "Gone with the Woodwinds". They continued with a beautiful rendition of Louis Armstrong's "What a Wonderful World," which easily got the loudest response of the evening.

"Freskita Serenade" was next, a light, jazzy and up tempo piece, and they closed the evening with Stephen Foster Collins' "American Folk Suite". Senior Airman Matta joked, "Collins was America's first pop star! He found success at an early age, had a troubled marriage, and died tragically young with only 38 cents in his pocket!" The New England Winds ended their concert on an extremely high note, and showed how talented they were.

The New England Winds was presented as part of an ongoing series the Music Department presents throughout the year, showcasing small ensembles and visiting musicians in the beautifully restored Bezanson Recital Hall.

Wolfe explores life for college students in latest novel

By Alex Lange
The Maneater

COLUMBIA, Mo. — Many people probably think the chances of a 72-year-old man writing a successful, or even accurate, novel centered on modern college life are slim. In his latest novel, author Tom Wolfe proves age has not impaired his ability to research a subject and synthesize those findings into a poignant story.

"I Am Charlotte Simmons" is a graphic reproduction of the American college in the new millennium. It has neither political agendas nor religious themes; the book is a sensational day in the life of the modern university. When Wolfe makes reference to "Sprewell rims" and the movie "Old School," adults might get lost, but details like this appeal to college readers.

At the prestigious and fictional Dupont University, a nationally recognized sports program battles for glory with Ivy League academians while the general student population tries to establish itself in undergraduate societies.

Three well-developed student characters, a somewhat deplorable but charming fraternity member, an NCAA basketball superstar and a Rhodes Scholar hopeful, find their lives growing in complexity as they become involved in different ways with Charlotte Simmons, a naive freshmen girl from Allegheny County in North Carolina's Blue Ridge Mountains.

"I Am Charlotte Simmons" is not what typical Wolfe readers might expect. For the first time, Wolfe uses a female main character, and, unlike previous novels in which he spreads action across a big city, 90 percent takes place at the small, gothic Dupont University.

Wolfe is the father of two college students. In interviews, Wolfe has pointed to his daughters as original sources for interest in this latest novel. He indicated a fascination with the changes in university life he witnessed during his time as a student, particularly regarding coed dorms. He also redefines the student part of student-athlete, as his readers are allowed to intimately follow sports superstars around campus.

The politics of university sports are just part of the color Wolfe uses to paint Dupont University. He vividly takes the reader through fraternity formals, campus protests, underage club-going and even debates among the intellectual elite.

To research his book, Wolfe observed student life at some well-known universities, including Stanford University, the University of Michigan, the University of North Carolina-Chapel Hill and the University of Florida.

Wolfe supplies enough detail to depict campus architecture and also the intricacies of his characters' physical appearances. Words such as "latissimi dorsi" and "trapezius" appear next to "loamy lions" as he describes students at the recreational facilities.

When reading Wolfe, it is important to note each character is a composite. This is why his story sells.

Wolfe is often credited for a journalistic approach to writing, but the story is fiction, and his characters, as realistic as they might be, exist only on the pages of the book. Nevertheless, the novel is a true gem of modern American culture and an accurate portrait of campus life.

"I am Charlotte Simmons"
Tom Wolfe
Farrar

COURTESY FARRAR PUBLISHING

Despite the fact that he is 72 years-old, many critics have claimed that the author Tom Wolfe accurately illustrates the college experience in his newest book titled "I am Charlotte Simmons".

New PlayStation may be racing to success

By Stanley Miller II
Milwaukee Journal Sentinel

LAS VEGAS — I've seen the future of mobile entertainment, and it's the PlayStation Portable.

When Sony said it was going to challenge Nintendo in the portable gaming market last year, analysts were guarded about how well it would do against a company whose Game Boy franchise has dominated hand-held gaming for more than a decade.

While Sony's PSP possessed impressive features and technical specifications including the ability to play digital music and video the prevailing opinion was that runaway success would depend on the games that developers and publishers created for it.

During the 2005 International Consumer Electronics Show last week, Electronic Arts showed off early versions of several games that will be available when the PSP goes on sale in the United States in late March.

After trying out a handful of launch titles, my attitude toward the PSP surged from optimistic to foaming-at-the-mouth excited. If other publishers release games matching the style and quality I saw from Electronic Arts, the PSP will be the hottest high-tech toy of 2005.

The launch lineup for PSP games from Electronic Arts includes "Need for Speed Underground Rivals," "NBA Street," "FIFA Soccer," "NFL Street," "MVP Baseball" and "Tiger Woods PGA Tour."

COURTESY SONY

At the 2005 International Consumer Electronics Show in Las Vegas, Sony showed off their latest gaming device. Some critics argue the Playstation Portable is one of the best innovations since Nintendo's Gameboy.

It's hard to imagine you could have a cinematic experience on a 4.3-inch screen. But in "Need For Speed Underground Rivals," the street racing game takes advantage of the PSP's high-resolution, 16:9 widescreen liquid crystal display to create something that looks like a tiny version of the movie "The Fast and the Furious."

The visuals in "Need For Speed" looked amazingly sharp and colorful, and the engrossing illusion of velocity the game generates as you blaze down city streets is completely convincing.

Game designers from Electronic Arts were quick to stress that "Need For Speed" and their other PSP games with similar titles already available for PlayStation 2 are not just ports of old games to the new platform.

In addition to new content such as the racing venues in "Need for Speed" the PSP games from Electronic Arts have several new game modes that take advantage of the portable nature of the device.

For example, "Need for Speed," "NFL Street" and other games offer a mode called party play, where up to four people can pass around a PSP, play one of the games, and the system will automatically track the scores and crown a winner.

The PSP's controls are similar to its PlayStation predecessors, so PSP games are intuitive for anyone who has played one of the older systems.

All of the games Electronic Arts showed at the Consumer Electronics Show also let two players compete head-to-head wirelessly using the PSP's built-in Wi-Fi technology.

To fuel competition on the PSP, games such as "Need For Speed" and "NBA Street" feature an "owns list." When one player defeats another in a game with an owns list, the result of the contest is digitally branded into the PSP profile of both the winner and loser. The winner "owns" the loser a badge of honor until the loser wins a match.

Other game modes are designed to give players a quick fix for situations when they might only have a few minutes to play.

Instead of running a complete circuit race in "Need for Speed," for example, a game mode called "drift" allows players to try to quickly navigate an obstacle course by taking sharp turns yet avoid skidding into pillars spread throughout the track.

Another notable feature for Electronic Arts' coming PSP games is a system called EA Pocket Trax, which lets players listen to music or watch videos linked to the games they are playing. In "Need For Speed," for instance, you can watch music videos for bands that provided music for that game. You also can just listen to 40 or so songs in soundtrack without playing the game.

Sony has not announced a price for the system in the United States, but it now costs about $190 in JapanSince the PSP became available in Japan on Dec. 2, more than 510,000 of the devices were sold before the end of 2004, Kaz Hirai, president and CEO of Sony Computer Entertainment, said last week at the Consumer Electronics Show.

BOSTON BARTENDERS SCHOOL of AMERICA
WANT A HOT JOB?
Learn to be a Professional Bartender!
Classes Starting Now!
Boston Bartenders School
218 Memorial Avenue • West Springfield
1-800-357-3210
www.bostonbartender.com

Discover Your LOVER
The Collegian Dating Game
HERE'S YOUR CHANCE TO PLAY
MATCHMAKER!
We've rounded up
3 Men and 3 Women.
You decide who will date whom!
Get to know these single people and pair them up at
www.dailycollegian.com
Cast your votes now through Monday, February 14th
Look for the couples you chose on Wednesday, February 16th in the Arts and Living Section

Mixtape Volume 1: 'The Dark Side'

The Mix Tape
Matt O'Rourke

Starting today, and on every Friday for the rest of the semester, a column titled "The Mixtape" will run featuring a 30-minute side of reviewed tracks from albums both new and old. Each mixtape aims to create a list of tracks that either all fall under the same category of music, fit a certain mood, or a combination of the two. For reader feedback, please e-mail Matt at arts@dailycollegian.com

1. "Out of Time" – Blur (3:52)

For the inaugural mixtape session, I felt the need to present some tracks that have a dark tone to them. To begin this session, I decided on Blur's "Out of Time" from their latest album "Think Tank". Turning up the volume on this track reveals darker tones with a near-screaming choir of ghostly proportions in stark contrast to the jazzy foreground. When combined with Damon Albarn's lyrical singing, a bridging effect between the two is created. Appears on: "Think Tank" (Virgin, 2003)

2. "Good Vibrations" – Brian Wilson (4:36)

"Good Vibrations", or what I liked to call "Good Vibrations (as it was meant to be)" from Brian Wilson's long awaited album, "SMiLE", is perhaps the epitome of dark tones vs. light. Perhaps it's the vocals pitted against the strings and percussion, but somehow this song manages to generate a solid (albeit cliche) "good" feeling. If you haven't heard the new version of this song, find the album, and listen to it immediately. Appears on: "SMiLE" (Nonesuch, 2004)

3. "Anthems for a Seventeen Year-Old Girl" – Broken Social Scene (4:35)

Broken Social Scene covers track 3 with their underground-indie hit, "Anthems for a Seventeen Year-Old Girl". Once again, a song that will elicit a solid good feeling inside of the listener, but also a dark feeling (perhaps caused by the vocal effects once more). Its simple repetition brilliantly covers the feelings of a stereotypical seventeen year-old girl. Fair warning, the song is catchy, and some will be tempted to replay it several hundred times. Appears on: "You Forgot it in People" (Arts & Crafts, 2003)

4. "Careful Where You Stand" – Coldplay (4:44)

"Careful Where You Stand," a Coldplay b-side from the time of "Parachutes" and "The Blue Room EP," is next. The song pushes a high-yet-light falsetto from Chris Martin against the slight echoes of electric guitar. Like much of Coldplay's earlier material, a dark ambience fills the background, and hence, this song makes the cut. Appears on: "Parachutes" (UK Bonus CD) (EMI, 2000)

5. "The Last Broadcast" – Doves (3:22)

"The Last Broadcast" draws upon some of same methods used by Coldplay and Blur while adding a driving rhythm in the drums. The guitar in this track can also be stylistically compared to Johnny Greenwood of Radiohead and creates a wonderful atmosphere. Definitely a track meant to be played for late night work sessions. Appears on: "The Last Broadcast" (Heavenly / Capitol, 2002)

6. "How to be Dead" – Snow Patrol (3:23)

With Snow Patrol, this side of the tape begins to "lighten up," albeit slightly. "How to Be Dead" is about inner-conflict, arguing, and ultimately giving up. The brilliant line of "Dr. Jekyl is wrestling Hyde, for my pride" is pop-ish, but also gives the listener something to remember the song by. The last few seconds will resonate in your head for days to come. The mixing of the track is wonderful, providing layers of sound, which adds greatly to its replayablity factor. Appears on: "Final Straw" (A&M / Polydor, 2004)

7. "Watching the Sun Come Up" – Ed Harcourt (5:45)

The "Dark Side" ends with "Watching the Sun Come Up," an amazing song by Ed Harcourt, which should be tried doing what the title suggests. The song, in fact, cannot be listened to, but rather, experienced. I realized this song's full potential last year by accident after pulling an all-nighter with some friends. The piano is both dark and bright in tone, against the rest of the band that is usually pushing the rhythm and driving heavy chords. The lyrics are also masterfully crafted, especially with Harcourt's voice singing "my hands, they are a'shakin" accompanied by his wavering voice. An amazing track, and a perfect end to the "Dark Side." Appears on: "From Every Sphere" (Heavenly / Capitol, 2000)

Running Time: 29:17

Women's clothing, shoes and accessories.
downtown Amherst

WANT TO WRITE FOR ARTS? CALL 545-1361

MAXIMUM Capacity SPORTS BAR
Forget the flowers... And come enjoy... Cancel the candy...
Satisfied Staying Single Night
This Friday Night!
Wild Games & Prizes
No Cover Charge!
Special Guest DJ DAVID BLAZE
Broken hearts...
...who needs 'em?
Then, this Saturday 2/12: Almost Cowboyz Country Rock Only $3!
190 Memorial Drive – Chicopee MA
www.maximumsportsbar.com

UMass tries to reverse road woes

HOCKEY from page 10

36 points), Sean Collins (12-24-36) and Brett Hemingway (16-16-32) leading the charge.

To no surprise, those three were major contributors on the Dec. 9 matchup too. Collins led the way with two goals and an assist while Callander was able to tally a goal and an assist, and Hemingway pitched in with a pair of helpers.

The Wildcat defense has been steady in front of the goaltending tandem of freshman Kevin Regan, who was just named Superskills Rookie of the Week for the third time this season, and Jeff Pietrasiak, who made 17 saves during the shutout in the two team's only meeting this season.

Cahoon said his team's best opportunity to win will be by capitalizing on the Wildcats' mistakes.

"We need to get more offensive opportunities," Cahoon said. "We played a pretty solid game up there [on Dec. 9], but the result wasn't what we wanted it to be. We've got to take advantage of the opportunites they give us because they're going to give us [some], and we've got to work on scoring some goals."

Until last Friday against hated rival Maine, UNH hadn't lost a game at the Whitt all season, and currently sitts at 14-1-0 on their home sheet, which could cause some problems for the road-wary Minutemen.

UMass will at least be carrying some of that North Andover momentum all the way up to Durham tonight.

"We certainly can look at last Saturday night in a positive light, and the kids can have some fun after the game, and it makes it easier going to practice the next week," Cahoon said. "We're going up [to UNH] feeling better about ourselves for sure but knowing that it's going to be a real challenge."

NOTES: Junior defenseman Marvin Degon was named one of 15 semifinalists for the Walter Brown Award on Monday. The award is given to the best American-born college hockey player in New England. UNH's Sean Collins was also named a semifinalist...The Whittemore Center was unkind to the Minutemen more than just on the scoreboard during their last visit. It was their that then-leading scorer Matt Anderson was checked long the left boards by Mike Radja and suffered a broken right ankle.

COURTESY KAREN WINGER

Freshman forward Matt Burto goes after the puck during the Minutemen's 2-1 loss against Northeasten on Feb. 3.

Giambi says sorry to the fans

By Ronald Blum
Associated Press

NEW YORK - Jason Giambi repeatedly apologized to fans, the New York Yankees and his teammates on Thursday but refused to say why - or discuss whether he used steroids.

Giambi came to Yankee Stadium to make his first public comments since it was reported in December that he'd told a federal grand jury in 2003 that he took steroids for at least three seasons.

"There's been a lot of distraction, definitely, over the last year, and I'm sorry for that. I really am," Giambi said. "I feel I let down the fans. I feel I let down the media. I feel I let down the Yankees, not only the Yankees, but my teammates.

"I accept full responsibility for that," he went on. "I'm sorry, but I'm trying to go forward now. Most of all, to the fans, I'm sorry. I know it's going to be hard, and I understand how they feel."

With general manager Brian Cashman, manager Joe Torre and agent Arn Tellem at his side, Giambi refused to say what he specifically was apologizing for.

"I'm sorry I can't be more candid with you guys about everything because of the ongoing legal matters," he said.

Giambi said he had not read the San Francisco Chronicle story, which cited transcripts of his grand jury testimony, and he would not say whether the newspaper's report was accurate.

"When I went into that grand jury, I told the truth," he said.

Giambi twiddled his thumbs, crossed his legs and held a knee as he spoke.

The former AL MVP was bothered by a parasite and a benign tumor last year, and slumped to .208 with 12 homers and 40 RBIs. The Yankees dropped him from their postseason roster.

"I think we're all curious to see how he's going to rebound from everything he went through last year," Torre said. "He certainly looks better than he did."

One of the few topics Giambi addressed specifically was Jose Canseco's upcoming book, which is being released next week. The New York Daily News reported Sunday that Canseco says in the book that he, Giambi and Mark McGwire shot steroids together.

"I think it's sad. I think it's delusional," Giambi said. "It's just so far-fetched. It's not even fantasy."

The 2000 AL MVP with Oakland, Giambi came to the Yankees for the 2002 season. His production decreased in the second half of the 2003 season, when he played with an injured knee.

Chow may be first D-1 Asian coach

By Steve Wilstein
Associated Press

The NFL's gain is college football's loss and further evidence that the two are going in different directions on minority hiring.

Norm Chow, the architect of the offense that propelled Southern California to two straight national titles, hoped to become college football's first Asian-American head coach.

He waited 32 years, mentoring Heisman Trophy and Hall of Fame quarterbacks, going from BYU to North Carolina State to USC, designing high-scoring offenses everywhere he went.

He earned a national reputation. His phone number wasn't a secret. But precious few calls for head coaching jobs ever came.

On Wednesday, he stopped waiting, got out of the college ranks for at least a while, and signed on as offensive coordinator for the Tennessee Titans.

The dream to be a head coach hasn't faded. Chow called the Titans job "an opportunity for me and my family to get to the highest level of football." He downplayed reports of friction with USC coach Pete Carroll and spoke of his excitement of being in the NFL.

You'd think athletic directors would have been knocking each other over to hire a man like Chow. He worked with Heisman winner Ty Detmer, recently elected Hall of Famer Steve Young, Jim McMahon, Marc Wilson and Robbie Bosco during 27 years at Brigham Young. He guided standout quarterback Philip Rivers for a year at North Carolina State, then Heisman winners Carson Palmer and Matt Leinart at USC.

You'd think a man with that kind of record of success would have had his pick of schools to be a head coach.

You'd be wrong.

College football is still largely run the way it's always been run, hirings made through the good old boy network. There aren't many minorities among athletic directors and presidents, and they don't hire many minority coaches.

"College football is going in the exact opposite direction as the NFL," said sports sociologist Richard Lapchick, who monitors race and gender issues at Central Florida's Institute of Diversity and Ethics in Sports.

In the NFL, the number of minority head coaches has tripled to six since the "Rooney Rule" was adopted two years ago. During the same span, the number of minority head football coaches at the 117 NCAA Division I-A schools dropped from five to three.

"It was absolutely shocking to me," Lapchick said, "that at the end of this year, after two consecutive national championships and everybody saying how great a coach he was, that Norm Chow didn't get offered a college head coaching job. It was very disheartening."

The day before Chow took the Titans' job, New England Patriots defensive coordinator Romeo Crennel saw his long wait to be a head coach end when he was named to lead the Cleveland Browns.

On the pro level, Crennel's credentials were every bit as impressive as Chow's in colleges. Crennel, a year younger at 57, earned two Super Bowl rings with Bill Parcells in New York and three with Bill Belichick in New England but never had the chance to run his own program until now.

In becoming Cleveland's first full-time black coach, Crennel is more proof that the league's diversity policy is working.

That policy is all about opportunities, not quotas. It's about opening doors, not shutting people out. It's about giving qualified candidates a chance to succeed or fail on their own merits.

"My skin color is black, but I am a head coach," Crennel said. "I hope that I possess the qualities that are in a head coach with the leadership, organization, and the prioritizing. In many cases, I have been the only African-American on a staff or in the neighborhood. The best thing I can do for other minority candidates is be successful and a role model."

Newly elected Hall of Famer Fritz Pollard was the NFL's first black coach in the early 1920s. There wasn't another until Art Shell took over the Raiders in 1989. Two years ago, the only black coaches were the Indianapolis Colts' Tony Dungy and the New York Jets' Herman Edwards.

Commissioner Paul Tagliabue, responding to pressures inside and outside the game to hire more minorities, appointed a committee headed by Pittsburgh owner Dan Rooney. The panel recommended a policy requiring all teams with coaching vacancies to interview at least one minority candidate.

AT THE GATES OF SMITH COLLEGE
Academy Award Nominations
3 Best Actor • Don Cheadle
Best Supporting Actress • Sophie Okonedo
Best Original Screenplay
ONE OF THE BEST PICTURES OF THE YEAR
★★★★
ONE OF THE YEARS MOST MOVING AND POWERFUL FILMS
Claudia Puig, USA TODAY
Don Cheadle Sophie Okonedo Nick Nolte
HOTEL RWANDA
PG-13 A TRUE STORY
SAT. 3pm SUN.-MON 5pm
Valentine Special All Seats $5.00
Bogart Bergman Casablanca
Downtown Northampton's Academy of Music
MOVIELINE: 413-584-8435
academyofmusictheatre.com
support by the Valley Advocate • www.valleyadvocate.com

Popularity of a champion

RED SOX from page 10

until four days after that.

Curt Schilling appeared at a Boston nightclub where the team received the Sports Illustrated Sportsman of the Year award then spent most of the offseason at his Arizona home, recovering from ankle surgery.

"Red Sox fans make it a point to come up to me," he said.

Even the bloody sock he wore in his victories in Game 6 of the AL championship series and Game 2 of the World Series drew attention. A replica of it was sent to writers with the proof of a book on the Red Sox-Yankees rivalry called "Blood Feud."

Publishers scrambled to hit the market while the Red Sox were hot. Authors as diverse as horror-master Stephen King and flaky retired Red Sox pitcher Bill Lee put out books.

Other former Red Sox worked at the fantasy camp in Fort Myers where the club increased its usual number of participants from 120 to 130. Each paid $3,600 for a week of games at the team's minor-league complex.

"I got so many phone calls, I wanted to throw the phone through the wall. I could have taken 180 people," said Ken Nigro, who ran the camp. "Had I known we were going to win the Series beforehand, I'd have run two camps."

He also supervised a week-long Caribbean cruise on which nearly 200 fans - "We ran out of cabins so we couldn't take more," Nigro said - mingled with pitchers Bronson Arroyo and Lenny DiNardo, bench coach Brad Mills and television announcer Don Orsillo.

Three young women whose flight was delayed paid for hotels before they could join the cruise three days after it began.

"I wound up giving them some money out of my pocket," Nigro said. "They spent a small fortune in addition to the money they spent going on the cruise just to be with the group. You're talking about diehards here."

Plenty of fans already have shelled out big bucks for Red Sox spring training tickets. Although the most expensive seat rose from $21 to $44, highest in the majors, the entire home spring training schedule sold out earlier than ever before.

The first home game for spring training is March 3 against Minnesota. Four days later, the Yankees come to town on the anniversary of their first visit to Fort Myers after Alex Rodriguez joined them last offseason.

The Yankees won that game 11-7 in front of a sign-waving sellout crowd. Commemorative pins for the game sold for $5.67 and lines outside the ballpark were long hours before game-time.

"They're fun," Rodriguez said then of games between the rivals. "We look forward to an unbelievable summer."

That it was.

The Red Sox battled the Yankees for first place in the AL East and held second from June 1 to the end of the season. Boston then swept Anaheim in the AL division series before losing three straight to the Yankees in the ALCS.

The Red Sox didn't lose again, winning four against the Yankees and another four against the St. Louis Cardinals to win the World Series for the first time since 1918.

COURTESY GETTY IMAGES

Terry Francona, the coach of the 2004 World Series champion Boston Red Sox, has been a fan favorite ever since the championship.

Fleet Center gives name away for a day

BOSTON (AP) - The owner of FleetCenter is offering egomaniacs a shot at fleeting fame: a chance to buy personal naming rights to the sports arena for just a single day.

The rotating, day-to-day opportunity is being offered through an eBay auction while the arena's owners continue seeking a long-term naming rights deal to replace the FleetCenter name, now rendered obsolete by Bank of America's $48 billion acquisition last year of the former FleetBoston Financial Corp.

There are actually a little more than a dozen separate auctions taking place on eBay, with bidding starting at $25 for the right to name the center for 24-hour naming rights later this month.

Proceeds from the deals will be going to a charity supported by the arena's owner, Delaware North Cos.

The bidding kicked off at 6:15 a.m. Thursday, and one particular date - Feb. 16 - had already reached $3,150 by noon - with more than four days to go until the auction closes. On that day, the Boston Celtics are hosting the Memphis Grizzlies.

Single-day names for the home of the Celtics and the NHL's Boston Bruins could carry the names of the bidder, a loved one, or a business.

As an example, Richard Krezwick, president and chief executive of Delaware North, offered his own suggestion: The Rollie Krezwick Center, in honor of the executive's dog, a wheaten terrier.

"He's a big sports fan," Krezwick said. "He watches hockey religiously."

Bidders will not be required to include "Center" in the building name, and the arena will approve all names provided they're "rated G," Krezwick said.

Winning bidders won't get to change the arena's large exterior signs, but will be able to see their chosen names on the FleetCenter's Web site, its Jumbotron video screen, and a message for callers to the automated phone system, which will say "Thank you for calling the YourCenter."

They also will get four luxury seat tickets to the day's game or show, a framed photo collage and a certificate, and a "special surprise gift package."

Aspiring bidders can also submit offers by logging onto the FleetCenter's Web site, www.fleetcenter.com.

An assortment of sports enthusiasts, publicity hounds and others are already latching onto the idea.

FleetCenter executives have been negotiating with a handful of sponsors to buy single-day deals before the 24-hour naming rights go to eBay bidders starting Feb. 16. Local Fox television station WXFT station and a Chicago-based sports marketing publication are among the initial potential sponsors.

The publisher of the sports publication, Dan Migala, will pay $500 to rename the building the MigalaReportCenter.

— Associated Press

BUCCI
HAIRCUTS always $10.
25 N. Pleasant St. Amherst 256.0733
145 Main St. Northampton 586.0155

Need a Ride to Church?
Just be at UMASS Haigis Mall at 10 AM
For the Free Sunday Shuttle to Dwight Chapel
Only 12 minutes away!
FREE Bible with your first ride!
See you there!
885 Federal Street
Belchertown, MA 01007
413 256 8059
www.dwightchapel.org

Rematch in the Bronx

MEN'S HOOPS from page 10

10 Eastern Division standings at the time.

Tomorrow's game against Fordham has a little more on the line than an average conference game. If Fordham defeats UMass it will move up and tie the Minutemen for third place in the A-10 East.

Lappas is wary of taking any team lightly this year, and is hoping that the Minutemen can utilize the same weapons they did last time against Fordham. One main weapon is the presence of Rashaun Freeman in the post, and the general inside game that has been UMass' bread and butter this season.

"I think the last time we played Fordham we got him (Freeman) the ball a lot. We try to get him the ball and I think we do a good job getting him the ball," Lappas said. "Against URI Rashaun scored 10 points, but Deli scored and Stephane Lasme scored too. So I think we're happy with the way we've been getting the ball inside. I think we've done a good job all year and we're just going to keep pounding it in there."

Senior point guard Chris Chadwick dishes off a pass against URI on Wednesday night. Chadwick had four points and three rebounds.

The last time these teams met, Freeman had a career caute, putting up 26 points while reeling in seven boards. Also contributing that night was senior captain Anthony Anderson, who was fresh off a position change from point guard to shooting guard. Anderson had a season-high 23 points, going 5-for-10 from behind the arch.

Freeman has been the main focus of opposing teams throughout the season, which has left players like Anderson and Maurice Maxwell open for more looks. Anderson has maintained his consistency as a reliable scoring option, while Maxwell has exploded and is currently second on the the team in scoring, dropping 11.7 ppg.

With the emergence of Maxwell, it would appear that Freeman would get more open looks in the post, but over the last few games teams have been choking the paint with guards and forwards alike.

Lappas isn't convinced that Maxwell will help Freeman's personal statistics, or after how many touches he will get a game. He is convinced that Freeman remains a dominant post player, and that the addition of Maxwell is just icing on the cake.

"He's the fourth highest scorer in the league, he's averaging almost 15 points per game. He's not going to score 25 every game, he's not going to do that no matter how open he gets," Lappas said. "All that does is add to our balance. "

Francona: a household name

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

BOSTON - Strangers handed Terry Francona cell phones so he could talk to their relatives. Restaurant workers on a tiny Caribbean island asked Theo Epstein to sign their Boston caps as he dined during what he thought would be a brief vacation from business.

Middle-aged wannabes were turned away from the oversubscribed Red Sox fantasy baseball camp, publishers churned out books about the team and players got more pats on the back and less privacy.

Just some offseason sacrifices timostly welcome ones for winning the team's first World Series in 86 years.

"I'm recognized pretty much everywhere," said Francona, a champion in his first year as Boston's manager. "It's a very small price to pay."

Francona's bald head is a giveaway, but his general manager, Epstein, gets noticed even though his casual style of dress and occasional beard blend into a crowd of 30-somethings.

"I was out of the (Boston) region and a guy came up to talk to me," he said. "It was really cold and I had a winter jacket and scarf on. You could barely see me. All he could see was my eyes and my nose."

It was a very busy few months for Epstein: Red Sox duties occupied all but "a handful of days," he said, and he added several free agents, including David Wells and Edgar Renteria.

His players had their own memorable moments.

Johnny Damon got married but didn't lop off his long mane. Kevin Millar sighed with relief when Epstein decided to keep him and trade fellow first baseman Doug Mientkiewicz to the New York Mets. Players had opportunities to make money on speaking engagements.

Trot Nixon, though, preferred to relax.

"I wanted to spend time with my family," the right-fielder said.

Now he's already working out at the Red Sox camp even though the reporting date for pitchers and catchers is next Thursday and position players aren't due in

See RED SOX on page 7

UMass looks for success on the road

HOOPSIDE from page 10

Lappas is confident the Minutemen will be prepared to win.

"We've done well on the road, regardless of who we've played. You want to go on the road and win game and we need to go and do it again,' Lappas said. "There's no doubt that we did a lot of good things the first time we played them, things we want to try and do again."

As Lappas knows, the Minutemen have been there and done that with these types of games all season, regardless of crowd, opponent or venue, and the Minutemen once again realize they will be in up to their collective necks tomorrow in what shakes down as one of the more important, under-the-radar games of this season.

So if UMass can linally do as the Red Sox did and break its own version of a Bronx curse, Lappas and Co. could be headed back up I-95 not just with a win, but with the mindset of a team knowing it just may be starting to rall.

"If we can get on a little bit of a rull with a win on Saturday, that would really help us for Tuesday [against Florida State]," Lappas said. "I think the confidence in this team is starting to grow. It remains to be seen where that is going to take us, but I think we're headed in the right direction."

Minutewomen hit Buckeye state

WOMEN'S HOOPS from page 10

rent scoring leader, freshman sensation Pam Rosanio (11 ppg).

A defensive-minded team like the Minutewomen, the similarities between the two teams don't end there. While Marnie Dacko has doubled UMass's winning total from last year with seven games still to go, UD head coach Jim Jabir has been met with the task of turning a team that won just three games in 2003-2004 into an A-10 West contender.

Although the Flyers currently sit at one game below .500 and fourth in their division, statistics certainly don't measure the magnitude of Jabir's will and determination.

Before the season could even start, Jabir was diagnosed with cardiac arrythmia, a condition that affects a person's heart rate. He took a medical leave of absence on Nov. 3, was fitted with an artificial defibrillator to moniter to condition, and remained hospitalized until opening night, when UD thumped Akron 66-56.

He finally returned to the sidelines on Dec. 7, and has been line for the most part since.

"I've known Jim for years, so all coaches have had their adversities to come over," Dacko said. "But this is good for him, good for his family...I think all coaches are role models."

If the Minutewomen don't find their physical match against Dayton tonight, they certainly will on Sunday, when they travel to the Cintas Center in Cincinnati to take Tara Boothe and the Xavier Musketeers head-on.

Last season, the junior forward was held to no points, three rebounds, two assists and committed four turnovers in XU's 53-43 win over an injury-plagued UM squad.

But Boothe has since improved her game enough to garner her a pre-season All-America Honorable Mention from Street and Smith's.

Senior forward Brooke Campbell goes up for a layup against St. Bonaventure on Sunday night.

Through 04-05, the Kentucky native leads the Muskies in field goal percentage (52.5), rebounds (7.6 per game), blocks (12) and points (19.2 per game).

Of the five starters, she's committed the least amount of turnovers (33). Not only that, but Boothe has an improved, if not deadly, outside-shooting game this season.

"Last year she didn't have any points against us, but this year she has broadened her game," Dacko said. "We really have to be able to pressure her on the perimeter."

Now or never for the NHL

By Ira Podell
Associated Press

By this weekend, the NHL will either have a surprising deal that saves the hockey season or a dubious place in history.

The long-awaited deadline is set. If the league and the union can't hammer out a new collective bargaining agreement in this last round of talks that started secretly in Toronto on Wednesday, commissioner Gary Bettman will pull the plug.

The NHL would then have the distinction of being the first North American sports league to lose an entire season to a labor dispute. Bettman would rather not have that mark on his record but cautioned that the right deal is necessary for the NHL to survive.

"This has just been a very difficult, frustrating process and again we're sorry we have to go through it," he said. "But we had no choice."

Bettman and Bill Daly, the NHL's chief legal officer, had dinner late Wednesday night with players' association executive director Bob Goodenow and senior director Ted Saskin but there were no formal discussions, a source close to the negotiations told The Associated Press on condition of anonymity.

The group met again at the league's office in Toronto on Thursday morning.

The lockout reached its 148th day Thursday. If a deal is reached, Bettman said, there would be a 28-game regular season and the 16-team playoff structure would be preserved.

"It is clear to me that if we're not working on a written document by this weekend, I don't see how we can play any semblance of a season," Bettman said. "Obviously we will listen to everything the union has to say, but we've given all we can give and gone as far as we can go."

Bettman and Daly visited the players' association office in Toronto. The union made it clear that it wasn't going to initiate new talks this week, so the league took a new offer to the players.

It wasn't received well.

"It's really not whether there's a better deal or a worse deal - it's the right deal, it's the fair deal," Goodenow said. "We've always been focused on those principles."

The NHL handed over what it called "a compromise proposal."

It presented the idea that a new deal be made using the players' association's proposal from Dec. 9 that included a luxury-tax system and a 24 percent salary rollback on existing contracts.

But if any one of four financial conditions set forth by the league were exceeded, then the NHL's salary-cap offer from last week would go into effect the following season. Teams would then be forced to spend at least $32 million on player costs but no more than $42 million, including benefits.

"The NHL delivered a one-page concept to us which they tried to suggest represented a compromise," Goodenow said. "The league's proposal was a transparent attempt to impose on our Dec. 9 proposal the effects of their twice-rejected Feb. 2 triple-cap proposal."

Goodenow said that one of the four limits would immediately be exceeded if this deal was put in place, and others could be easily reached.

The union asked Bettman and Daly to stay in Toronto through Thursday for negotiating sessions.

Goodenow said they would try to figure out new ways to get over the main stumbling block of a salary cap, but added that the players' association won't hand over a new proposal Thursday.

"We'll have conversations about these difficult areas and see if we can't come up with an idea, a framework or a mechanism for some common ground," Goodenow said. "The prospect that we'd be able to conclude an agreement by the end of the weekend is very daunting.

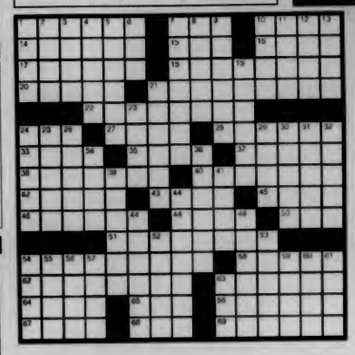
"It is possible, but I don't want to discuss the levels of probability."

The lockout has wiped out 824 of the 1,230 regular-season games through Thursday, as well as this weekend's scheduled All-Star game. If the season is canceled, there is no telling when there will be NHL hockey again.

"The deal can only get worse, from a technical matter and as an economic matter, the longer we go without a new deal," Bettman said. "That's not a threat, that's simply the reality of where we find ourselves."

SUMMER OUTDOOR JOBS
Backpacking On Power Lines
Throughout New England applying herbicides (mostly Round-up) with a back pack sprayer to control small trees.
Drivers license, good physical condition and drug screen required upon job offer.
Also Mass herbicide applicator license required.
Send resume or request information/application to:
Vegetation Control Service, Inc.
2342 Main St., Athol, MA 01331
(800) 323-7706 or (978) 249-5348
Fax (978) 249-4784 email: vcsathol@aol.com
V.C.S. is an equal employment opportunity company

CUSTOM TEE Shirts 586-7133



Panda East
Enjoy our fine Chinese and Japanese cuisine while helping aid the Tsunami fund
Thank you for dining at Panda East
With this coupon, $1 of your bill will be donated to the Tsunami fund
Thank you for your support.
www.pandaeastamherst.com
103 No. Pleasant St., Amherst
256-8923 • 256 8924
Delivery Hotline: 549-0077

No Cals Last Call No Carbs
ask, hangover & nutritional drink
No Hangover
All-Natural Anti-Hangover & Nutritional Drink
Last Call is available now at:
Liquors 44, Four Season's Liquors, Stoney's Pub, Holyoke Liquor Mart, Pop's Liquors, R&P Liquors and Niedbala's.
Ask for it at your favorite bar and restaurant
Campus Rep Opportunities Available, Call for more information
Distributed By Baystate Beverage Distributors, Westfield, MA 413-562-0150
Please Drink Responsibly

ATKINS FARMS Country Market
Rte 116 & Bay Road, South Amherst, MA
(413) 253-9528 • (800) 594-9537
www.atkinsfarms.com
Follow Your Heart To Atkins Farms
You'll Find Gifts in Every Department.
Sweets for your Sweet
Chocolates, Fudge, Truffles & Specialty Valentine Baskets
Cookies for your Cookie
Heart Shaped Cakes & Cookies
Cookie Trays & Valentine Cupcakes.
Blossoms for your Blossom
Roses, Bud vases, Arrangements & Mixed Bouquets
We deliver to the surrounding area or can wire flowers anywhere in the USA. (413) 253-9528
Or Visit Atkins Flower Shop
for your Valentine Flower & Gift Needs
Located in the UMass Campus Center,
For Your Convenience (413) 549-9405
UMass U-Card accepted.

ADVERTISE
Find today's answers online
www.dailycollegian.com

H·O·R·O·S·C·O·P·E·S

aquarius • Jan. 20-Feb. 18
Today you're going to find yourself telling the same story over and over again.

pisces • Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Your favorite movie is on TV later! You'll catch it while flipping through the channels.

aries • Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Don't judge that new person in your life too quickly.

taurus • Apr. 20-May 20
Lately, you've been having some pretty funny thoughts. It must be the water.

gemini • May 21-Jun. 21
You'd marry Jon Bon Jovi in a heartbeat, if you could.

cancer • Jun. 22-Jul. 22
It's ok to wear a sweatshirt today. No point in looking good until later.

leo • Jul. 23-Aug. 22
You have the nicest collection of belts in the whole wide world.

virgo • Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Today is going to be very busy. Pace yourself.

libra • Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Don't forget the list of things you have to do today.

scorpio • Oct. 23-Nov. 21
Today is a good day to give and receive surprise hugs.

sagittarius • Nov. 22-Dec. 21
It seems like your radar may be a little off lately.

capricorn • Dec. 22-Jan. 19
You better knock on wood when you say you're going to.

Quote of the Day

"Music expresses that which cannot be said and on which it is impossible to be silent."

-Victor Hugo

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

Activities

Foam party Montreal weekends $89 Montreal Express.Net 1(781)979-9001

Announcements

$600 Group Fundraiser Scheduling Bonus 4 hours of your group's time PLUS our free (yes, free) fundraising solutions EQUALS $1,000-$2,000 in earnings for your group. Call TODAY for a $450 bonus when you schedule your non-sales fundraiser with CampusFundraiser. Contact CampusFundraiser, (888)923-3238, or visit www.campusfundraiser.com

Apartment for rent

Amherst two bedroom condo on busline 875+, Call Paul 413-687-1416

Apartment for rent

Hobart Condos 3 bedroom, hardwood floors, study area in basement. Cable, telephone (internet access) in all bedrooms and study. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

Brandywine Apts. Now Leasing, 1&2 bedroom apts. Leases begin Jun, July, Aug or Sep. First come, first serve. Get them while they last. www.brandywine-apts.com stop by or call 549-0600

Center of town, 1, 2, 3 bedrooms; hardwood floors. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

Apartment for rent

1 bedroom available North Amherst $425 includes heat & electric, bright, clean, washer/dryer in Condo on bus route 1 mile to UMass female preferred Call Liz 508-367-8893 Sunderland 2 bedroom townhouse on busline 830+, Call Erica 413-665-7794

Auto for sale

1999 Toyota Camry fully loaded. 75K, Mint condition. Call 413-348-4191

Child care

Babysitter 3 year old boy afternoon/evenings Amherst 413-256-3084

Employment

MAKE EXTRA CASH! Make your own hours! Sell T-Shirts to Sororities, Clubs & Groups & Make a commission on every sale. Guaranteed!!! Very Easy. Bonus's too! 413-586-7133 OR print@sunraiseinc.com

Earn some money! Rent us your ears! Listening experiments $8/Hr 413-545-6837 phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu

Earn lots of $$ and have fun on the water this Spring & Summer. Raft guides needed at Crab Apple Whitewater in Charlemont, MA. Fun Summer job, no experience necessary. We will train. 413-625-2288.

Employment

Make money taking online surveys earn $10 to $125 for surveys. Earn $25 to $250 for focus groups www.cash-forstudents.com/umass

Nanny position for 2 boys ages 6 & 9. Perfect schedule for student. Part time Spring. Full time Summer. Prior experience necessary. 413-625-2288

Movie extras, actors, models! Make $100-$300/day No experience required, FTPT, All looks needed! 1800-340-5939 Ext. 1054

Happy Birthday

HAPPY BIRTHDAY, MAGGIE SMERLAS! Best Wishes on your day of birth! Love, your buddies.

Miscellaneous

$$$$ EARN EXTRA CASH!!! $$$$ Get friends, family, and fellow students to play fantasy baseball and earn cash. No risk. Go to www.rotoleague.com/affiliate for details.

Personals

JGFace, Route 9 towards Northampton Take a left onto Strong Ave. (across from Fitzwillys) #41 Second floor Ciao!

Room for rent

350 per month 413-335-5226

Services

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance 549-1906

Services

Need help filling out Immigration forms? Want advice on arranging documents for filing with INS? Contact the Student Legal Services Office at 545-1995 for help filling out Immigration forms.

Travel

One Bed and Studio (Four Queen Beds) at Deerpark one mile from Loon Mountain Available 3/11-3/18 Ken 335-9775

Spring Break 2005 Only 6 weeks left... Lowest Prices Biggest Parties Earn 2 Free Trips Exclusive with Sun Splash Tours www.sunsplashtours.com 1800-426-7710

Travel

Bahamas Spring Cruise 5 Days $299! Includes Meals, Celebrity Parties! Panama City, Daytona $159! Cancun, Jamaica, Acapulco, Nassau $499! Award Winning Company! SpringBreakTravel.com 1-800-678-6386

#1 Spring Break Vacations! Cancun, Jamaica, Acapulco, Bahamas, & Florida! Best Parties, Best Hotels, Best Prices! Limited Space! 1-800-234-7007 www.endless-summertours.com

Place a classified ad in the:
COLLEGIAN MARKETPLACE
Call 545-3500 or visit us in the Campus Center Basement

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS WEEKEND

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 2005 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Minutemen ready to rumble in Rose Hill

UMass looks to sweep Fordham

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

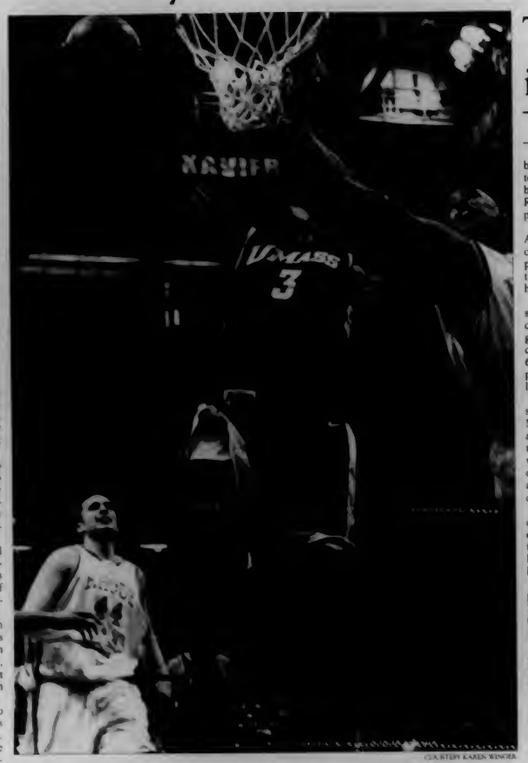
Over the past few games, the Massachusetts men's basketball (12-8, 9-5 A-10) team has shown it can play overpowering offense and stifling defense. The only issue has been whether or not it can do both at the same time.

After dominating St. Bonaventure on Saturday 74-58, the Minutemen traveled to Kingston, R.I. and gave the scorer's table a night off. UMass defeated the Rams 49-44, in a game highlighted by defensive stands and shot-clock violations.

So now, in the midst of its fourth two-game winning streak, the Maroon and White travel to the Bronx, N.Y. tomorrow to play the Fordham Rams (9-12, 5-5 A-10).

UMass coach Steve Lappas was upset with the offensive output by the Minutemen on Wednesday night, but does not feel his team is truly inconsistent as a whole.

"I'm not concerned with our defensive consistency and that's part of consistency. In basketball you look around the country and offensively teams have peaks and valleys throughout the whole year, everybody," Lappas said. "I'm really looking for defensive consistency, and I think we've had that since the beginning of this year."



As it has for most of the season, UMass has done a sufficient job of slowing down the game's tempo. The Minutemen, however, are currently ranked seventh in the A-10 in scoring defense, letting up 66.6 points per game (ppg) despite only allowing five points per game more than conference leader Saint Joseph's (61.1 ppg).

The last time the Maroon and White played Fordham, the Minutemen were firing on all cylinders and beat the Rams 76-63 at the Mullins Center on Jan. 19. However, the ensuing week of basketball saw each team spiral in a different direction.

UMass came out of the lopsided victory with three games that raised questions in regards to its ability to respond to a big win. The Minutemen went on to get crushed by Saint Joseph's on Jan. 22, 73-54, and were then taken into double overtime at St. Bonaventure before squeaking out a 82-78 win before losing to Richmond 67-63 on Jan. 29.

Fordham, however, appeared to use the loss to the the Minutemen as fuel for the fire. The Rams went on to defeat URI 63-49 in Kingston on Jan. 26 then, only four days later they took down the Temple Owls at home, who were on top of the A-

See MEN'S HOOPS on page 8

COURTESY KAREN WINGER

Sophomore swing-guard Maurice Maxwell goes up for a layup against Rhode Island on Wednesday night. The Minutemen won the game 49-44. Maxwell led all scorers with 14 points on the evening.

Tough history in the Bronx

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

Forgive Steve Lappas and the Massachusetts men's basketball team for not necessarily looking forward to tomorrow's clash with Fordham in the Bronx, N.Y., because for the Minutemen, recent trips to historic Rose Hill Gymnasium haven't exactly gone as planned.

Two years ago, the Maroon and White opened Atlantic 10 play at Rose Hill, fresh off a stunning win over No. 24 North Carolina State just three days prior. The result? An 80-67 loss to a 2-10 Ram team that had previously lost nine in a row and was 0-6 at home entering play.

Last season, UMass traveled to Fordham looking to snap a three-game losing streak, and caught the Rams on a day that they would be without starting point guard Jermaine Anderson. Nonetheless, Fordham controlled play throughout the game, cruising to a 75-61 win that snapped a nine-game skid and was the program's first win in the month of February in nearly three years.

However, as those in and around UMass basketball surely know, the past has had little effect on the Minutemen of 2004-05 – a fact those in Storrs, Conn. and Washington D.C. will surely not dispute. So when the Minutemen take the floor of Division 1's oldest venue at 1 p.m. tomorrow, Lappas believes they will do so with the same mindset they have taken into each and every contest – that of playing to win, regardless of all else.

"We approach every game the same way. Same type of energy goes into the game plan, same type of strategy goes into a game plan and that's the same with this one," Lappas said. "This is an important game, but no more important than the last one, the last one isn't important anymore because we won."

One fact that cannot be ignored as well is the disparity in talent between the Rams that will show up at Rose Hill tomorrow, compared to the bottom-feeding teams year's past. Having graduated old nemeses Michael Haynes and Mark Jarrell-Wright, Fordham brings an almost entirely new group into this matchup – a group the Minutemen familiarized themselves with during a 76-63 win on Jan. 19 in Amherst, but undoubtedly boasts a solid core of talent.

Therefore regardless of past failures, tomorrow's contest may still be UMass' most difficult, and certainly most important, in the Bronx in some time now.

But after already experiencing success against this Fordham group and having proved that it can not only win on the road, but in hostile road environments,

See HOOPSIDE on page 8

New-look Minutewomen head to Ohio

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

Slowly but steadily, it appears the pieces of the puzzle are coming together for the Massachusetts women's basketball team as it prepares for a stretch run In Ohio.

Last Sunday, coach Marnie Dacko switched the roles of center Patrycja Gulak and freshman forward Kate Mills, and It worked wonders. In Mills' debut at the center position, she racked up 11 points, six rebounds, three assists and three steals and provided terrific pressure on the post as the Minutewomen cruised to a 69-38 defeat of the St. Bonaventure Bonnies.

The game also marked the first time since March 3, 1996 that all five starters accounted for all of the team's points in the game.

Although Mills has had better games on paper from the bench—she had 14 points in a game last month against Temple—it is clear that Mills provides a consistent inside game for the Minutewomen (12-9 5-5 Atlantic 10) that has gone missing at times this season.

And while Gulak will be coming off the bench for a second consecutive game tonight when UMass visits the Dayton Flyers at the University of Dayton Arena, Dacko is hopeful that the 6-foot-4 Polish transfer can maximize her potential in a lesser role.

"I'm looking at [the switch] as a positive that I'm taking pressure off her," Dacko said. "I think she puts too much pressure on herself, she knows she puts too much pressure on herself If lightening the load means she's going to be more efficient, then that's what I'll stick with."

Having worked heavily on their inside game in practice this week, the Minutewomen head to Ohio for two games this weekend, expecting a physical game against two A-10 foes. They will certainly get it tonight when they take on the Flyers (10-11 4-6 A-10) and their dynamic duo of guards Emily Williams and Cara Wright.

Like the Minutewomen, the Flyers only feature one scorer in double figures in Wright. The 6-foot Ohio native is putting up 10.3 points per game, only slightly less than UMass's cur-

See WOMEN'S HOOPS on page 8

COURTESY KAREN WINGER

UMass head coach Marnie Dacko goes over a play with her team during the Minutewomen's game against St. Bonaventure on Sunday. UMass heads to Ohio this weekend to play Dayton (Friday) and Xavier (Sunday).

UMass squeaks by URI

KINGSTON, R.I. - Maurice Maxwell scored 14 points and Rashaun Freeman added 10 points, but it was stifling defense that propelled the Massachusetts men's basketball team to its third consecutive road victory, 49-44 over Rhode Island before a sparse crowd at the Thomas Ryan Center Wednesday night.

The Minutemen (12-8 6-4 Atlantic 10) played their best defensive game of the season, holding the Rams to 30.5 percent shooting from the floor, including 15.4 from 3-point range. Additionally, the 37 points allowed was the lowest total scored by an opponent since the 1999-'00 season.

UMass returns to action tomorrow, when it travels to the Bronx, N.Y. to face A-10 East rival Fordham at Rose Hill Gymnasium. Tip-off is slated for 1 p.m.

Maxwell's 14 points marked the seventh consecutive game that the he has scored in double figures, and the sophomore swingman has averaged 14.9 points per game over that stretch.

Stephane Lasme and Anthony Anderson also chipped in with eight points apiece, with the latter also posting four steals in 38 minutes.

A 7-0 run early in the second half pushed UMass out to a 38-26 lead with 8:33 to play, before Rhode Island cut the lead to six in the final minutes.

The Maroon and White had opened up a 20-14 lead at halftime after holding URI scoreless over the final 7:41 of the half.

— Mike Marzelli

Hockey faces worthy foe in UNH

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

After Saturday night's 3-1 victory over Merrimack, there was one thing very certain about the Massachusetts hockey team: the weight that was the 11-game road winless streak (0-10-1) had vanished from their shoulders.

But there was still one thing that seemed uncertain about the Minutemen (11-16-2, 5-11-2 Hockey East): the status of their starting goalie, Gabe Winer, who had left the game in the second period due to an apparent right leg injury that was best-described by coach Don Cahoon as simply, "a pull."

Winer appeared to injure himself while sprawling across the crease to stop a hectic flury of shots by the Warriors, and he took the early part of the week off to rest his injury before getting back on the ice during Wednesday's practice.

"There is no sense in putting him out there too early," Cahoon said. "I've got to be cautious. It's not like he hasn't seen enough pucks this year or doesn't get enough practice time, so an extra day or two off the ice wasn't going to really take him off his game."

Whether Winer will see any action during this weekend's series with No. 8 New Hampshire (18-7-3, 11-3-2 Hockey East), remains to be seen and will most likely be a gameday decision in both cases.

The two teams will meet in Durham tonight at 7 p.m. and then back in Amherst tomorrow night at 7 p.m.

Regardless, the Minutemen will have their hands full against the powerful scoring attack that UNH boasts. The Wildcats beat UMass 4-0 at the Whittemore Center on Dec 9, and all their goals were scored In the final 20:23 of play. UNH boasts the fourth-ranked scoring offense in the nation with 3.89 goals per game and also showcase the nation's best power play, scoring 24.8 percent of the time.

Six Wildcats have tallied at least 20 points this season with Preston Callander (17 goals-19 assists-

See HOCKEY on page 7

COURTESY KAREN WINGER

Junior foward James Solon has two goals and five assists this year for the Minutemen.

New England's Largest College Daily • Est. 1890

The Daily Collegian

Monday, February 14, 2005 www.dailycollegian.com Volume CXIV Issue 79

Student group helping tsunami victims

By Jonathan Vega
Collegian Staff

Members of the University of Massachusetts' Art of Living Club are leading a campus initiative to raise funds for thousands of children orphaned by the tsunami that devastated regions of South Asia.

Akshaye Sikland and Georgi Georgiev are both graduate students at UMass Amherst and active members of the Art of Living Club and Pranava, a Hindu student association on campus.

"The UMass Art of Living Club is associated with the Art of Living Foundation which is a global non-profit humanitarian and educational foundation," says Georgiev. "It has two main activities: one is a humanitarian service component and the other focuses on personal development."

Georgiev explains that the AOLF's unique mental health courses have been implemented to assist more than 3,500 people overcome post-traumatic stress disorders in Tsunami-effected areas of Southeast Asia. The Art of Living Course combines the powerful Sudarshan Kriya breathing techniques with ancient wisdom, yoga and pranayama to produce effective stress elimination and elevated mental, physical and emotional states.

According to Sikland and Georgiev, 440 tons of relief supplies with an estimated worth of $33 million has been collected and distributed by volunteers of the AOLF and the International Association for Human Values. Additionally, the AOLF and the IAHV have established camps for 5,000 potentially orphaned children in remote areas of Sri Lanka.

The IAHV has entered disaster zones, according to Sikland, "when everyone else, including the United Nations, was leaving." The organization has also provided humanitarian assistance for Afghanistan, Jakarta, Kosovo, New York and Washington DC (during the September 11th terrorist attacks), the Gujarat earthquake and Orissa Cyclone.

"[In India] the AOLF has adopted about 1,000 orphans in a particular slum town that was near a beach and was completely destroyed," Georgiev said.

The UMass Art of Living Club is raising money to build an orphanage in Srinivaspuram for these 1,000 displaced and orphaned children. Donations are being accepted at the Tsunami relief informational booth in the campus center concourse. The informational booth will be in the Campus Center until this Friday, Feb. 18.

"These orphans will be matched with families who lost their children in the disaster," said Sikland. "Volunteers like us from all over the world have come together and we decided that we needed to take up [funding the orphanage] as a UMass project."

Georgiev and Sikland hope to collect $30,000 for construction of a orphanage for the 1,000 children adopted by the AOLF.

Sikland pointed out that if every person on campus donated one dollar the monetary target would be reached.

"After converting American dollars to Indian rupees it only takes one dollar a day to pay for a child's education, food and shelter," Georgiev said.

"A lot of people have donated funds for general purpose support," said Georgiev. "But none of them really know where the money is going."

Furthermore, Georgiev insists that, "it's an unspoken fact that some of the largest humanitarian organizations have an overhead of over 60 percent." The AOLF has an overhead of six percent, he said. Therefore, 94 cents of every dollar reach the people who need it most.

Money is the most efficient way of helping those in need of Tsunami aid, according to Georgiev, because donated materials are often left in warehouses and often produce logistical challenges that require additional funds.

"There are cultural differences and people just may not need the types of things that are coming from [the United States], most people don't have houses anymore so where do they keep the [donated] food."

You can make a difference in the lives of those affected by the Tsunami disaster. Donations are being accepted in the main offices of a number of academic departments throughout campus, as well as several local businesses. You can also make an online donation at the International Association for Human Values Web site, www.iahv.org. For information regarding Art of Living courses visit the Art of Living Foundation on the Web at www.artoflivingma.org or www.artofliving.org.

COURTESY THAILAND-PATTON SET

Victims of the Southeast Asia tsunami examine the immediate aftermath in December 2004. A UMass student group is raising funds to help orphaned children of the disaster.

New fees set for O.I.T. classrooms

By Brian Castro
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Office of Infor-mation Technologies launched a new Pay-for-Print service Jan. 25 in its classrooms around campus in response to increased student usage of its printers.

"My budget was getting exhausted and I had to figure out what to do," said Copper Giloth, OIT's Director of Academic Computing and art professor.

OIT started the service in response to rising print costs from an increase of students using OIT classrooms for print jobs. As a result, students using a printer in one of the OIT's 11 classrooms will now have to pay five cents per page. However, students will have a limited number of free printouts.

Each student will receive a $5.00 credit, or 100 free pages, on his or her U-Card account towards printing per semester. Once that money is gone, additional print jobs are deducted from the U-Card account.

Once a student prints a document, they are prompted to enter their OIT user account name and password. The student then heads to a print release station, swipes the U-Card, enters his or her user name and selects the documents they want to print out.

The reason OIT has started charging for printouts was due to a shift in how students were getting the material for their courses, said Giloth. Typically, professors assign course packets to students for additional reading. But now more professors assign course notes through online electronic reserves. Instead of buying more course packs, students print off their materials from the Internet.

"The purpose for these classes is to have a place where students could print their original work for classes," said Giloth. "That was fine five of six years ago, but now students are printing online resources."

According to Giloth, OIT had a small crisis when she took over OIT's classrooms in Sept. 2003. A professor with 500 students assigned 500 pages worth of readings online and told students they could print from OIT's classrooms. That's a total of 250,000 pages or 25 percent of the one million pages that OIT estimates it prints every year. OIT's $50,000 yearly print budget only covers one million printouts.

Giloth also found out that recycle bins became full of reprints because students would print out their papers as much as three times because of mistakes.

OIT set restrictions last year that allowed students only to print out their own original work for classes, but many students were not happy with these restrictions.

According to Giloth, students sent complaints regarding the restrictions and in other cases students would act very hostile towards the student consultants who worked in these classrooms.

To lift the restrictions, OIT looked at colleges that charge printing, which includes Amherst College, Hampshire College and Smith College, before decided to implement a pay-for-print system. OIT started testing the system in Spring 2004 and student testing began last December.

Although Giloth hasn't received any formal student complaints, student opinions have had different opinions.

Amin Islam, an Accounting and Economics Major, has mixed feelings towards the policy.

"It's nice they started you off with $5 but I think most people will run out before the end or even midway thought the semester. I don't think they should charge people to print stuff. It should be free...it should be public," he said.

Marine recruiters running into problems

By Don Babwin
Associated Press

ALGONQUIN, Ill. — On a recruiting visit to a school in this Chicago suburb, Marine Staff Sgt. Jody Van Doorenmaalen asked a sophomore what popped into his parents' heads when they thought about him joining the Marines.

"The only thing they think (is) I'm going to go to war and die," 16-year-old Nick Ambroziak replied.

The exchange illustrates the difficulty these days for recruiters like Van Doorenmaalen as they visit high schools, community colleges and shopping malls trying to sell the Marine Corps to young people while the country is at war in Iraq.

Earlier this month, the Marine Corps announced it had fallen short of its monthly recruiting goal in January for the first time in nearly a decade.

While the Marines say they remain on track to meet their recruiting target for the year, they also acknowledge their task is harder because of the war and its mounting death toll from roadside bombings, helicopter crashes and suicide attacks.

"I'd say it has made it more challenging on a number of fronts," said Capt. Timothy O'Rourke, executive officer of the Marine Recruiting Station Chicago.

One of the first students to stop at his information table in the cafeteria at Algonquin's Harry D. Jacobs High School was Jeff Gold, an 18-year-old senior.

With his military-style haircut and dream of becoming a police officer, Gold would seem the ideal candidate. But Gold is pretty sure what would happen if he did join.

"I probably will get deployed," he said after talking to Van Doorenmaalen. "And I'll probably die."

Among the biggest obstacles today between recruiters like Van Doorenmaalen and recruits are parents. When the country wasn't at war, parents often stayed in the background while their sons or daughters decided whether to enlist, but today they pepper recruiters with questions and concerns.

"Recruiters are spending a lot of time going to parents' houses making sure they clearly understand the responsibilities their son or daughter will face as a Marine," O'Rourke said.

Recruiters also are butting up against research that shows young people today are more tied to their parents than young people in years past.

COURTESY KAREN WINGER

Marine recruiters at a mall outside Flint, Mich. approach teenagers to enlist them in the military. Recruiters around the country report their job is harder now as more people are reluctant to enlist.

No hugging allowed for some prisoners

WEST BOYLSTON (AP) — There's a long list of things that you can't do when you're behind bars, but for inmates at the Worcester County Jail and House of Correction, the list is getting a little longer.

Sheriff Guy W. Glodis has ordered an end to the face-to-face sessions in most sections of the Worcester County Jail and House of Correction, saying that contact between prisoners and visitors are to blame for most of the drugs and weapons entering the county lockups.

That means an end to the brief hug that prisoners are allowed to receive at the end of a visit, as well as any other direct contact with visitors. Kissing has been banned for several years.

"There has to be some kind of disincentive to go to jail," Glodis told the Telegram & Gazette of Worcester. "This shouldn't be a place to be coddled, hugged or given contact. This is a penal facility in which you lose many rights. That's why it's a jail."

Contact visits between inmates and family members and friends will end April 1, and the last remaining open meeting area will be converted to a no-contact room, with prisoners and visitors separated by Plexiglas windows and talking by phone or through a mesh steel screen.

Glodis said the policy is part of a new approach linking prisoners' privileges, such as television and canteen services, to their willingness to participate in rehabilitation and education programs.

Contact visits will still be allowed in the minimum-security wing of the jail.

Civil liberties activists and prisoners' advocates said the change is unneeded and will hinder prisoner rehabilitation.

Russell S. Chernin, a Worcester lawyer and board member of the Worcester chapter of the American Civil Liberties Union of Massachusetts, questioned the tie between contact visits and contraband and said jail officials should improve security and monitoring efforts.

—Associated Press

Local marines welcomed home

CHICOPEE (AP) — The arrival home Saturday after seven months in Iraq couldn't have come any sooner for Marine Lance Cpl. Anthony D'Amato, Jr., whose pregnant wife, Heidi, greeted him at Westover Air Reserve Base.

"Now my job can be to be with my family, instead of being over there," said D'Amato, 23, a computer specialist whose wife is eight months pregnant. "It's amazing. There are no words that can describe how I feel right now."

D'Amato was among 50 Marines from Wing Support Squadron, 472 Detachment Bravo, which arrived home after a seven-month deployment supporting aircraft at an air base in the Al-Anbar province. About 100 family members and friends greeted them in Chicopee.

Family members carries signs that read "welcome home" and "we love you." Another 100 members of the detachment remain in Iraq and are due to return in a few weeks.

There were no deaths from this detachment, said Sgt. Sherry Haetinger.

The Marines returned to the U.S. on Wednesday in Pennsylvania, and had a police escort for their bus trip Saturday. Members of the detachment are from Massachusetts, Connecti-cut and New York.

—Associated Press

New H.I.V. strain discovered

BOSTON (AP) — Massachusetts doctors have treated several HIV patients with a resistance to some of the most commonly prescribed treatments, raising further concerns about a possible new, drug-resistant strain of the virus.

The patients' resistance to drug treatment is similar to a New York City case that has sparked widespread concern among public health experts, the Boston Herald reported.

Dr. Gregory Robbins, an infectious-disease expert at Massachusetts General Hospital, said doctors there have treated several HIV patients in recent years with early resistance to two of the four drugs most commonly prescribed to treat infection

"There is global concern that there may be an increasing amount of patients who have a resistant virus," Robbins said.

In the New York case, an unidentified man in his mid-40s was diagnosed with a rare strain of HIV in December. He showed an immediate resistance to three classes of HIV drugs, and his infection progressed to AIDS within three months.

Drug resistance is increasingly common among HIV-positive people, but not with such a fast progression to AIDS, said Ron Valdiserri of the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. He said public health officials have not confirmed any other similar cases.

—Associated Press

EDITORIAL/OPINION
A HALLMARK CONSPIRACY?
Is Valentine's day a day to enjoy love or hate being alone ... or is it both?
PAGE 4

ARTS & LIVING
47th annual Grammy Awards
John Mayer was among the many music artists to perform at the Grammys last night.
PAGE 5

SPORTS
BATTLE IN THE BRONX
Freeman scores 27 but UMass falls to Fordham at Rose Hill
PAGE 10

WEATHER
TODAY Snow, 37°/31°
TUESDAY Showers, 53°/32°
WEDNESDAY Showers, 46°/19°

we value vacations. we value you taking vacations. have a vacation on us.
enter for a chance to win a free trip for you and a friend in our vacation sweepstakes. you have priorities. an amazing vacation is one of them. whether it's at the beach, volunteering in the community, or on an adventure, the choice is yours. for official rules, visit www.pwc.com/mypriorityvacation

1 No purchase necessary
2 Must be at least 18 years of age, a student attending this school and legal U.S. resident
3 Must enter by 2/22/05 at 11:59PM EST
4 See Official Rules at www.pwc.com/mypriorityvacation

*connectedthinking

PRICEWATERHOUSECOOPERS

© 2005 PricewaterhouseCoopers LLP. All rights reserved. "PricewaterhouseCoopers" refers to PricewaterhouseCoopers LLP (a Delaware limited liability partnership) or, as the context requires, other member firms of PricewaterhouseCoopers International Limited, each of which is a separate and independent legal entity. *connectedthinking is a trademark of PricewaterhouseCoopers LLP (US). We are proud to be an Affirmative Action and Equal Opportunity Employer.

Attorney General changes position on gay marriage

BOSTON (AP) — Attorney General Thomas Reilly, who played a key role in state efforts to fight the legalization of gay marriage a year ago, now says he favors same-sex marriage and will oppose any efforts to ban it.

Reilly, an unannounced Democratic candidate for governor, told The Boston Globe he was "moved" by the same-sex marriages that took place after gay marriage was legalized on May 17.

Reilly said he would vote against a constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage if reached the 2006 state ballot.

"Once rights are given, they should not be taken away," Reilly said.

Reilly said he still personally believes marriage is between a man and woman. He also declined to take a position on whether a proposed constitutional amendment banning gay marriage should go before voters, saying that's up to legislators.

Reilly is the state's top lawyer and in that role fought gay marriage supporters in the Goodrich case, which that led the Supreme Judicial Court to legalize gay marriage.

He also joined with Republican Gov. Mitt Romney in enforcing a 1913 law that barred out-of-state same-sex couples from marrying in Massachusetts.

His legal brief in the SJC case questioned whether gay and lesbian parents are as good parents as heterosexual parents, language he removed after gay marriage supporters protested. He also criticized the SJC ruling, saying a momentous change in social policy should be left to the Legislature.

Reilly told the Globe he has been consistent since March in saying he would not favor taking away marriage rights once they were granted.

"This is not a change in my beliefs. I have been consistent," he said. "What has changed is that May 17 came and went, and people entered into marriage. ... No one has been hurt."

He added, "You couldn't help but be moved by the commitments and marriages that people have entered into."

Tim O'Brien, the executive director of the state Republican Party, said Reilly has "completely flip-flopped" on the issue because he needs to answer to a special-interest group within the Democratic Party.

Arline Isaacson, cochairwoman of the Massachusetts Gay and Lesbian Political Caucus, said it was disturbing that Reilly would not oppose efforts to place what she says is a civil rights issue on the ballot.

"If he is now saying that he doesn't believe our rights should be taken away, we welcome that, but we need someone who would play a leadership role in this debate and stand up and say ... that a civil rights question should not be placed on the ballot," she said.

Susan Ryan-Vollmar, editor of Bay Windows, New England's largest gay and lesbian newspaper, said members of the state's gay and lesbian communities remain "furious" with Reilly.

Mass. Attorney General Tom Reilly now supports gay marriage.

"When the subject comes up of Reilly running for governor, it runs from, 'Over my dead body' to 'He is going to have to really grovel,'" she said.

Reilly is seeking to meet with gay and lesbian leaders as he prepares his campaign for next year's governor's race.

Former Democratic National Committee chairman, Steve Grossman, is trying to set up meetings between Reilly and gay and lesbian leaders at his Newton home.

"I have an enormous respect for Tom Reilly that he is willing to move to a new position on this issue and others," Grossman said.

"I don't want a governor who will dig in and say, 'I will never change.'"

—Associated Press

Bags of cash allegedly paid to war contractors

By Larry Margasak
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — U.S. officials in postwar Iraq paid a contractor by stuffing $2 million worth of crisp bills into his gunnysack and routinely made cash payments around Baghdad from a pickup truck, a former official with the U.S. occupation government says.

Because the country lacked a functioning banking system, contractors and Iraqi ministry officials were paid with bills taken from a basement vault in one of Saddam Hussein's palaces that served as headquarters for the Coalition Provisional Authority, former CPA official Frank Willis said.

Officials from the CPA, which ruled Iraq from June 2003 to June 2004, would count the money when it left the vault, but nobody kept track of the cash after that, Willis said.

"In sum: inexperienced officials, fear of decision-making, lack of communications, minimal security, no banks, and lots of money to spread around. This chaos I have referred to as a 'Wild West,'" Willis said in testimony he prepared to give Monday before a panel of Democratic senators who want to spotlight the waste of U.S. funds in Iraq.

A senior official in the 1980s at the State and Transportation departments under then-President Ronald Reagan, Willis provided The Associated Press with a copy of his testimony and answered questions in an interview.

James Mitchell, spokesman for the special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction, told the AP that cash payments in Iraq were a problem when the occupation authority ran the country and they continue during the massive U.S.-funded reconstruction.

"There are no capabilities to electronically transfer funds," Mitchell said. "This complicates the financial management of reconstruction projects and complicates our ability to follow the money."

The Pentagon, which had oversight of the CPA, did not immediately comment in response to requests Friday and over the weekend. But the administrator of the former U.S. occupation agency, L. Paul Bremer III, in response to a recent federal audit criticizing the CPA, strongly defended the agency's financial practices.

Bremer said auditors mistakenly assumed that "Western-style budgeting and accounting procedures could be immediately and fully implemented in the midst of a war."

When the authority took over the country in 2003, Bremer said, there was no functioning Iraqi government and services were primitive or nonexistent. He said the U.S. strategy was "to transfer to the Iraqis as much responsibility as possible as quickly as possible, including responsibility for the Iraqi budget."

Iraq's economy was "dead in the water" and the priority "was to get the economy going," Bremer said.

Also in response to that audit, Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman had said, "We simply disagree with the audit's conclusion that the CPA provided less than adequate controls."

Willis served as a senior adviser on aviation and communications matters for the CPA during the last half of 2003 and said he was responsible for the operation of Baghdad's airport.

Describing the transfer of $2 million to one contractor's gunnysack, Willis said: "It was time for payment. We told them to come in and bring a bag." He said the money went to Custer Battles of Middletown, R.I., for providing airport security in Baghdad for civilian passengers.

Willis said a coalition driver would go around the Iraqi capital and disburse money from the a pickup truck formerly belonging to the grounded Iraqi Airways airline. The reason is because officials "wanted to meld into the environment," he said.

Willis' allegations follow by two weeks an inspector general's report that concluded the occupying authority transferred nearly $9 billion to Iraqi government ministries without any financial controls.

Scientists say it's 'unlikely' lobsters feel pain when boiled

By Clarke Canfield
Associated Press

PORTLAND, Maine — A new study out of Norway concludes that it's "unlikely" lobsters feel pain, stirring up a long-simmering debate over whether Maine's most valuable seafood suffers when it's being cooked.

Animal activists have claimed for years that lobsters feel excruciating agony when they are cooked, and that dropping one in a pot of boiling water is tantamount to torture.

But the study, which was funded by the Norwegian government and written by a scientist at the University of Oslo, suggests that lobsters and other invertebrates probably don't suffer — even if lobsters do tend to thrash in boiling water.

The report was aimed at determining if invertebrates such as insects, crustaceans, worms and mollusks should be subject to animal welfare legislation as Norway revises its animal welfare law.

It summarized the scientific literature dealing with feelings and pain among those creatures without backbones.

The study concluded that most invertebrates — including lobsters, crabs, worms, snails, slugs and clams — probably don't have the capacity to feel pain.

Lobster biologists in Maine have maintained for years that the lobster's primitive nervous system and underdeveloped brain are similar to that of an insect.

While lobsters react to different stimuli, such as boiling water, the reactions are escape mechanisms, not a conscious response or an indication of pain, they say.

The Norwegian report backs up what the state's lobster industry and researchers have always said, according to Bob Bayer, executive director of the Lobster Institute, a research and education organization based in Orono.

According to a Norwegian study, it is unlikely that lobsters feel pain when they are boiled alive in order to be cooked.

"We've maintained all along that the lobster doesn't have the ability to process pain," Bayer said.

But the Norwegian study also cautioned that more research is needed.

There is a scarcity of scientific knowledge on the subject, which is why further testing will be done.

People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals, an animal rights organization based in Norfolk, Va., has made lobster pain part of its Fish Empathy Project, putting out stickers and pamphlets with slogans like "Being Boiled Hurts. Let Lobsters Live."

The organization regularly demonstrates at the Maine Lobster Festival in Rockland, and 10 years ago placed a full-page ad in a Rockland newspaper featuring an open letter from actress Mary Tyler Moore urging festival-goers to forego lobster.

PETA's Karin Robertson called the Norwegian study biased, saying the government doesn't want to hurt the country's fishing industry.

"This is exactly like the tobacco industry claiming that smoking doesn't cause cancer," she said.

Robertson said many scientists believe lobsters do indeed feel pain.

For instance, a zoologist with The Humane Society of the United States made a written declaration that lobsters can feel pain after a chef dismembered and sauteed a live lobster while preparing lobster fra diavolo on NBC's "Today" show in 1994.

But Mike Loughlin, who studied the boiling of lobsters as a University of Maine graduate student, said lobsters simply lack the brain capacity to feel pain.

"It's a semantic thing: No brain, no pain," said Loughlin, now a biologist at the Maine Atlantic Salmon Commission.

Whether lobsters feel pain or not, many consumers will always hesitate at placing lobsters in boiling pots of water.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
113 Campus Center
University of Massachusetts
Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief Peter Foundas
Managing Editor Mike Marzelli
Business Manager Rich Pacheco
Production Manager Cory Rosenberg
News Supervisor Meghan Heals
Advertising Manager Tiffany Sugalski
Editorial Production Samantha M. Nielsen
Arts & Living Editor Michael Busack
Campus Editor Alyson Zillmann
Editorial Editor Yousef Munayyer
Editorial Editor Allison Edles
News Editor Erika Lovley
Photo Editor Alex Demosthene
Sports Editor Bob McGovern
Circulation Manager Kristen Weiss
Classified Advertising Marty Pappas
Distribution Manager Josh Kiggans
Finance Manager Hirak Shah
Accounting Clerk Virginie Froissart
Human Resources Sandra Marquet
Assistant Operations Linda Wallack
Assistant Advertising Josh Greenberg
Assistant Business Nathan Chomsky
Assistant Finance Thomas Hecht
Assistant Production Rachael Bruno
Graphic Artist Charlie Higgins
Asst. Arts & Living Matthew O'Rourke
Asst. Arts & Living Chris Gazzara
Assistant News Julie O'Donnell
Assistant News Dan O'Brien
Assistant Photo Megan Brunner
Assistant Sports Jeff Howe

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday by the students of the University of Massachusetts and Amherst College. The Collegian is independently owned, operating on advertising revenue. Established in 1890, the paper began as the Index. Last year it became the Collegian. Since 1914, The Massachusetts Collegian, then published three times a week, has been published daily, Monday through Friday, except during vacations and exam periods, since 1967. The Collegian has been awarded the Pacemaker Award for excellence by the Associated Collegiate Press on 10 occasions, most recently in 1996. The Collegian is a member of the Associated Press and Liberty Newspapers.

Production Crew
On staff today

Night Editor
Mike Marzelli
Photo Technician
Alex Demosthene
Copy Editor
Matt Hider
Production Supervisor
Matthew Reed
Production Staff
Kathryn Rowe, Samantha Nielsen

To write for news, call Erika, Dan or Julie at 545-1762

STUDENT LEGAL SERVICES OFFICE
UMASS, AMHERST
HELPING STUDENTS PROTECT THEIR RIGHTS FOR 30 YEARS
Free Legal Advice, Referrals, Representation, and Counseling for UMASS Students
Student & Workers Rights, Family & Criminal Law, Landlord/Tenant & Consumer Disputes
CALL 545-1995
or stop in at 922 Campus Center

CELEBRATING THE NEW YEAR!
JOIN IN THE FUN AND FESTIVITIES
Dragon Dance and Lucky Money
for the first 50 customers at each DC

Wonton Soup
Suckling Pig
Peking Duck
Longevity Noodles
Spring Rolls
Fried & Steamed Rice
Sweet and Sour Shrimp
Sweet & Sour Tofu
General Tso's Chicken
Fortune Cookies
Almond Cookies
Almond Jelly
Green Tea

DINING SERVICES
RESIDENTIAL
YCMP

February 16th
From 5-8pm in all DCs
YEAR OF THE ROOSTER
Chinese New Year

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 2005

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it" -Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

A lovely holiday or a Hallmark conspiracy?

The search continues

Bob McGovern

I was sitting in my car last Wednesday, when the first wave of this Valentines Day business smacked me right across the face.

When most people are driving and decide to change lanes, they tend to forget about the radio for a few seconds. I am the same. I was in dire need to get around a powder-blue mini van, clad with stickers on how to save every endangered animal, tree, and tofu factory known to man. It was just a typical maneuver on a cloudy Western Massachusetts day.

I went around this person, gave a little look to put a face to the vehicle, and then sped off for no other reason than to prove that I was the victor. The moment was over, but it was just long enough to let my radio guard down and permit the song My Girl to get all the way to its first chorus.

At that point, I was just laughing at myself for making semi-erratic driving maneuvers to a song that Macaulay Culkin got his first on-screen kiss to. Then, I started to listen and realized that the day of manufactured introspection, yes Sir Valentines Day, was right around the corner.

I began to hear the rumblings from my single friends about how Valentines Day sucks and the fact that it's just another Hallmark holiday that ends up making people upset. It's almost a unanimous feeling among those without a significant other as February 14th sheds an overbearing light on who's single and lonely and who's in a relationship and "happy."

I have never really felt this way about today and for the first time in the last few years, I am no longer part of the latter group, but I am part of the former. However, much like everybody else that hasn't settled down into comfortable relations with someone, I'm still searching.

Ah, the search.

We are all constantly going through transitions, but none is more powerful than the changes that occur in your heart. Faces, places, and feelings that have come through this endless search for someone have left marks on us, some a bit larger than others. There are images of that person you thought had everything and fleeting remembrances of the one that got away all mixed up in the abyss of your personal memory.

Some would say that this is the very reason to hate this holiday.

There is this red hue everywhere, as hearts, candy, and flowers have seemingly taken over everything. You can't even go to Cumberland Farms without seeing the cardboard rack of generic Valentine's Day gifts that didn't quite make it to the Hallmark outlet store. It is a hodge-podge of trinkets and off-redness that attacks the very sanity of those who are not in the right state to succumb to their allure.

We are forced to think about our current situation and a lot of the time it's difficult. When you are stuck in that middle ground between today and tomorrow, it's hard to examine the moment. A lot of the time, this ambiguous undertaking leads to apathy and the easy way out... simply saying that Valentine's Day sucks. I, for one, am not going to do that.

Today is a day that I am going to enjoy what I do have and maybe evaluate what I see on the horizon. I feel like there are a lot of us that are in the same boat, just with much different situations. My roommate and I are a classic example.

Today is a day that I am going to enjoy what I do have and maybe evaluate what I see on the horizon. I feel like there are a lot of us in the same boat, just with much different situations.

He and I have gone through this entire college process together, and with that have discussed the things that good friends talk about. Right now his girlfriend, who is also one of my best friends, is away in England for his final semester. For myself, well lets just say I've been looking at a pair of blue eyes to the west.

Both of us have talked about today and how it will pretty much be a normal day, just with a reminder that there are people that we would like to see. We are just going to go about the normal distractions of our everyday life that keep us sane and let the day pass.

So here it is again, that blaring red day in the midst of a snowy February. Couples have plans, single people are grumpy, and it's the one day out of the year where the dollar store actually sucks (check it out, I'm serious).

I guess I'm going to just sit back and let my mind wander as I go about my day. Maybe I'll rock out to Sweetest Thing by U2 as I cruise down Rt. 116, belting out every word with complete confidence and conviction.

All the while I'll be thinking of the search and the past, and that damn middle ground that keeps me going.

Bob McGovern is a Collegian editor.

Knowing she's worth it

Chris Eckel

One of the worst days of my life came on February 14th, 2003. I was still brittle and raw over my recent breakup with my then-girlfriend, so I sat alone in my room watching some awful movie. Except I wasn't quite alone; my neighbor was with me, or at least her voice. Judging by her tone, she was having sex in her room so loud that it would make Jenna Jameson blush. So now jealousy was going to join my good friend misery and the three of us could hang out. Oh great, life, just twist the knife a little harder. That night lasted longer than the movie "Waterworld."

I've since learned that having a crush you're afraid to act on is no better than being out of love entirely. I've always been a bit of a coward in love.

Think about that guy from "Love Actually" who doesn't tell Keira Knightley that he has a crush on her. She is engaged to his friend, so he knows he has no chance. He tells her that he hid his crush as a form of self-preservation, because he knew if he opened up, he'd end up with a broken heart. And that, in a nutshell, is the approach I've taken with this one particular girl I know. For years, I've been afraid to tell her how I feel because I'm terrified that she'll feel differently. Having a dream that I poured myself into be shattered so suddenly might just turn me into a broken ghost of a man.

So, my affection for this lass has become more of a silent obsession. I have an awesome alert on AIM when she signs online so that I can stare at her info in silent awe. She could quote Barney in her profile and I'd still find it profound.

Whenever we go to the movies in a group, I always take mental notes about what kind of candy she gets so I can someday get her some chocolate to cheer her up. Rest assured, I also know her favorite Antonio's slice and favorite mixed drink for those big nights out on the town.

I named one of my pet fish after her - she doesn't even know I have fish! Right now, it doesn't matter. Someday, I hope my little beta fish will meet its namesake.

I named one of my pet fish after her- she doesn't even know I have fish! Right now, it doesn't matter. Someday, I hope my beta fish will meet its namesake.

Sometimes, while taking notes in class, I sit wondering about what song I'd whisper in her ear if she gave me the chance. Currently, that song is "Marianne" by Coldplay, but I might find new inspiration. Even worse, I sometimes sit in class and imagine some guy who's not good enough for her beating me to the punch and cooing the exact same damned song while wrapping his arms around her. Sitting through "Ordinary Differential Equations and Developments in Dynamical Systems Theory" is a less painful way to spend 50 minutes.

Speaking of pain, I've gone through quite a bit of it for her. I stumbled and slipped my way over to her apartment once in a blizzard to shovel her walkway so she wouldn't have to worry about doing it. As soon as I had lost the feeling in my nose and decided it was a job well done, I walked away, because I thought she'd freak out at my random kindness. Sweet work-reward ratio, Chris! If Kathie Lee Gifford hears I am willing to work for so little, I might just find myself a post-graduation job - that is, if my frostbitten hands are still nimble enough to sew 4,000 sweatshirts a day.

Last summer in Amsterdam, while all my friends were doing the stoned karaoke thing, I sat miserably with my head on the bar because a song that reminded me of her came on. I think everyone just assumed I got a terrible batch of mushrooms, but unrequited love is the ultimate bad trip.

And yet, there's no way I can possibly convince myself this girl isn't worth the pain. Nothing great comes without struggle, right? Someday, I'll tell her how I feel. Someday, she'll become so happy at what a guy tells her that she'll finally realizes he's the one. I can only hope those days end up being the same day and that guy is me. Like today: it's Valentine's Day. It's time to get my answer from my muse, my daydream, my reason to believe in Boyz II Men and "Sleepless in Seattle."

I'm going to track her down sometime today and spill my heart out to her.

To all of you who have equivalent crushes, I suggest you go find that special girl or guy and do the same. Odds are, if he or she likes you, you don't even need to elaborate as hopelessly as I did. Just mention you'd like to get coffee sometime. If you never try, you'll always regret not having known what he/she thought.

All you've got to lose is a front-row seat to your neighbor's porno set. Good luck bringing a little more love into the world.

Chris Eckel is a Collegian columnist.

Between desire and dignity

Elizabeth Joyce-Brandt

Valentine's Day. These two words strike fear into the heart of many single women all over the country. Many may ask why this holiday can cause a seemingly normal woman to lose her mind in the days before and after.

Of course, these people asking are those who are no longer living the single life. These people have forgotten what it is like to sit home alone on a Friday night wondering when their prince will come, when they will find everlasting love, and more importantly, what time the beautiful Wings delivery guy will finally show up.

These people are also the same people who bother their single friends with annoying questions about what they can buy for their boy/girl friend, where they can go or what they should wear. When faced with these questions, I most likely answer sarcastically, if at all. To be honest, I don't really care where you're going, what you're buying or what you're wearing. My Valentine's Day policy is don't ask, don't tell.

Now don't get me wrong. I can delight in my friend's attached happiness. Whatever makes them happy is good enough for me. It's not their relationships that bother me, but rather the lack of one in my life. You see I am single. And hearing about my best friend's fabulous sex life or super sweet boyfriend only reminds me of what I don't have.

There is something to be said about the single life. The only person I answer to is myself, and I am able to do whatever I please, which pleases me just fine. I don't have to deal with the crap I see some of my friends dealing with. I don't have to explain what I did last night to a guy who lives 300 miles away and barely makes an effort to come and see me. I don't have worry about girls flirting with my boyfriend. I don't have to work my plans around a semi-reliable guy who says he'll be over at 8 and shows up at 9:45.

But maybe just once, I wouldn't hate it. Pathetic? A little bit. Am I the only one who feels this way? Definitely not. I know many other girls who feel the same way that I do. Perfectly normal, terribly single girls.

It's not that we're freaks, because I swear I'm not. There is no apparent reason why I should be single. I am normal and funny, smart and understanding. I'm not co-dependent on anything besides Sex and the City and diet coke.

It's not that we're freaks, because I swear I'm not. There is no apparent reason why I should be single. I am normal and funny, smart and understanding. I'm not co-dependent on anything besides Sex and the City and diet coke. I'm not clingy or needy or any of those horrible things. And yet, I am single as they come.

Perhaps the real problem is that romance is dead. For our generation, dating has seemed to fallen by the way side along with clear Pepsi and snap bracelets. Perhaps convenience is to blame for our romantic laziness. We no longer have ask a person to dinner, we can simply send an instant message to the object of our affection and make small talk for three and a half hours, all while chatting with others, surfing thefacebook.com, eating a bowl of Mac n' Cheese, and watching the latest episode of Law and Order. Why deal with the awkwardness of the first phone call, when it's easier for both parties to send a text message to their cell?

Maybe it's fear that keeps us from making romance a priority. Guys are afraid that flowers would make too much of a statement to his date, and for this same reason girls are creeped out by the very gesture. It seems that our generation is more comfortable with getting wasted and then making a night of it with the closest person with a full set of teeth.

Are we are afraid of putting ourselves out there? Afraid that we will go on horrible dates and be put in awkward positions of having to let people down, afraid that we will be the ones to be let down? Maybe there are no real answers to why some fabulous girls and guys are still single, maybe we are just waiting to be discovered by that special someone or maybe we are destined to live an amazing single life, different than anything we have ever expected.

As Valentine's Day approaches, I will not be given chocolates or stuffed monkeys that say "I go bananas over you!" I will most likely be doing something not even worth mentioning. All I know is that I will not be trying to finagle a bedroom session out of some drunk, just for the sake of saying that I wasn't alone.

Elizabeth Joyce-Brandt is a UMass student.

Every day is Valentine's Day

Eric Marklein

Oh Saint Valentine! A man canonized after being deliciously beheaded by the order of Roman Emperor Claudius II. Legend says it was for marrying people against the Emperor's decree. Claudius believed single men made better soldiers on the battlefield. I bet if he'd seen some of those recent wartime movie classics like Cold Mountain (Union vs. Confederacy), Matrix Revolutions (Man vs. machine/reality/Hugo Weaving), or Windtalkers (Nicholas Cage vs. his acting potential), he'd have noticed something common in all of these films. Aside from being terrible, they all have a married man who will do anything, fight anyone, windtalk anywhere to get back to his woman. The married man had something to die for on the battlefield. Single guys just had a bachelor pad. Hat's off to marriage, baby!

But I'm not here to praise Saint Valentine or Valentine's Day. I'm here to knock it down a peg or more. Preferably six. Let the peg knocking begin.

Here's the first one: Careful! It's piping hot out of the oven! For two consecutive years, the same girl dumped me just as Valentine's Day approached. For the brokenhearted and single on Valentine's Day, it's quite the drag seeing so much love being displayed. In Eternal Sunshine of the Spotless Mind, Jim Carrey's character coldly regards Valentine's Day as "a holiday invented by greeting card companies to make people feel like crap." Do you ever wonder if your love interest could pen the words found in the card given to you? Do you ever feel a little less considering they might not even have the talent to pen them?

As time passed, your hero gathered his wits and moved along. A few months after the second breakup, we met up at one of the local cafes for a chat. I thanked her for saving me 30 bucks on a Valentine's Day gift for two consecutive years.

Here's my favorite Valentine's Day story. My first girlfriend and I conveniently had one of those X-month anniversaries on the 12th of February. So we month anniversaries on the 12th of February. So we month anniversaries on the 12th of February. So we

Lace and fur return in the fashion world for Fashion Week 2005

By Elizabeth Whitescarver
Associate Arts Editor

NEW YORK — Hold on to your crushed velvet. Buy some glen plaid. Stock up on patterned tights. And don't forget pretty skirt at the first of the cold winter nights.

Those are the messages for building a wardrobe in the fall, as the heavy hitters made quite clear in memorable fashion at the mid point of Fall 2005 Fashion Week.

Oscar de la Renta and Marc Jacobs presented collections brimming with fun fur and suede. Betsey Johnson's 80's collection rolled out with plaid and soft fur rounded by velour tights.

Cynthia Steffe finally abandoned her corporate look in favor of more whimsical dresses and tunics made from baby doll dresses and vintage finds pulled from Rosalie Sorrels' attic. B. Michael premiered his collection of classy suits against the backdrop of a live opera performance. And Carolina Herrera offered elegant tweed suits with chunky fur stoles.

Next winter's fashions will be extensions of this fall's looks: lace skirts, brocade jackets, tweed suits, cashmere tops and wrap coats. But instead of using bright pops of color, designers toned it down, showing their hardcourts — rusty, muted yellows, sage greens and navy blues.

The dramatic curve from the fabric, pinafore bottoms and zippers, not from pouffs.

"These collections are better. I like the Victorian feel to them," said Lisa Marrotta, of Philadelphia, after 14th Avenue.

Most fashionable among bags will be laptop-size numbers that can be slung over the shoulder, made from corduroy, crushed velvet and python fringe. Ponytails will be high again. Heels will be too, but open-toed or closed, the shoes must be metallic.

Hold on to that bolero-style sweater you thought you'd use for only one season. And note what these designers envision:

Oscar de la Renta

The de la Renta team started with loosely tailored tweed and brocade suits. Models wore their hair pinned up, and glided down the catwalk to classical music. A soft green-and-brown cashmere skirt and sweater in glen plaid made a smart work outfit. A brown cashmere/angora coat draped the model beautifully.

Crushed-velvet jackets reigned. Brocade coats and dresses dazzled over black satin shoes and, of course, de la Renta had versions of his cinched-waist dresses, this time in black satin and tulle, with poufy skirts.

He trimmed his coats in fur, but not as the focal point of the garment, as was true in years past. Instead, the fur served as a nice detail.

Eveningwear brought an abrupt change in the music and rapt attention from singer Beyonce and her mother, Tina Knowles, who were seated in the front row.

A see-through black organza blouse and tuxedo short was a hot combo, and a wine-colored floral silk taffeta gown was wonderfully wintry. When a sparkling deep-purple gown with mustard-yellow flowers glided by, Beyonce, wearing a soft yellow de la Renta skirt, glued her eyes to the train.

Betsey Johnson

This collection was surprisingly wearable, as Johnson's pieces took a vintage twist. Her skirts were short, the panty hose plaid. She served Guinness and, true to form, did her trademark flip after the show.

The details, such as lace trim and petticoats under the skirts, are what made these garments Johnson wasn't afraid to match a floral and a plaid. A ruby satin tulip-tier dress was beautiful, and a crocheted dress in olive was demure. Johnson added striped scarves and, in some cases, stockings to match her outfits. All and all, the grouping was fun and well thought out, with a nod to creativity and girly oomph.

Reem Acra. This was definitely a going-out collection; 9-to-5ers need not apply. But for all their eccentricities (sequins and a gypsy feel), Acra's pieces were pretty and seasonless. Models wore large colorful beaded necklaces with glittery gold, belted trenchcoats, and snake-print flared charmeuse dresses. A black tulle skirt (yes, tulle) with chiffon camisole and cardigan was fabulous.

BCBG. Max Azria didn't give the shopper any room to experiment in his collection: If you buy one piece, you have to buy the whole ensemble. This was a grouping of strong construction and visually soft pieces, with felts and suedes just begging to be touched.

The look was warm and sexy. An embroidered black wool jacket paired with a soft shift dress combined serious professional with fun. A green silk chiffon dress with navy tights and a cognac studded belt was punkish and lovely at the same time. Burnt oranges and midnight blues were winter shades that popped.

See FASHION on page 7

COURTESY SLAVEN VLASIC

A model wears a design from Narciso Rodriguez during the Olympus Fashion Week at Bryant Park in New York on Feb. 8.

BOX OFFICE REPORT

Feb. 11 - 13

	Gross	Total	Change
HITCH	34.0 Million	34.0 Million	NEW
Disney's Hefflump Movie	10.0 Million	10.0 Million	NEW
	9.0 Million	31.5 Million	-53%
The Wedding Date	7.5 Million	21.8 Million	-28%
Are We There Yet?	7.0 Million	60.5 Million	-29%

Natural, Healthy, and Smart!
Dr. Lee Kane
Chiropractic Physician
Participating provider for student insurance, GIC, automobile insurance & most others
Amherst Family Chiropractic
Center for Natural Health
38 Triangle St • Amherst (next to Bertucci's)
549-1500

Discover Your LOVER
The Collegian Dating Game
HERE'S YOUR CHANCE TO PLAY
MATCHMAKER!
We've rounded up 3 Men and 3 Women.
You decide who will date whom!
Get to know these single people and pair them up at www.dailycollegian.com
Today is the LAST DAY to Vote!
Look for the couples you chose on Wednesday, February 16th in the Arts and Living Section

OPEN FORUMS
Candidates for the position of Director of Undergraduate Admissions
Michael Cole, Director of Recruitment & Admissions, University of Massachusetts Graduate School Biomedical Sciences
February 14, 2005, Campus Center 163
Suzanne Espinoza, Director of Student Recruitment and High School Services, University of Utah
February 16, 2005, Hasbrouck 124 Auditorium
Peter Ferrell, Dean of Admissions, Hofstra University
February 22, 2005, Campus Center 163
Forums will be held at
3:00 - 4:30 P.M.
Resumes will be available in 319 Whitmore and at the Open Forums.

Good film picks for Black History Month

By Chris Jones
Ka Leo O Hawai'i

To celebrate the legacy of Black History Month, Power96 and I present the second list of movies to honor the black actors and actresses who express our history, our achievements, our struggles and our triumphs as Americans. The movies are located in Sinclair Library or can be found at a video store near you.

A new list will be presented every week for the month of February. Take the time to educate yourself in historical Black entertainment.

"Gone With the Wind" (1939)
Drama/War/Romance
Directed by Victor Fleming

The epic story of a woman who can cope with everything in the Civil War, except losing the love of the man she wants to another. It stars Hattie McDaniel as Mammy. McDaniel's unforgettable performance netted her an Academy Award, the first for an African-American actor.

"The Color Purple" (1985)
Drama/Hate/Love
Directed by Steven Spielberg

The life and trials of a young African-American woman, starring Whoopi Goldberg, Oprah Winfrey and Danny Glover. "The Color Purple" is one of the most powerful and meaningful films ever made. To this day it stands out as a classic example of great cinema at its finest. The movie is based on the novel by Alice Walker, who wrote the screenplay with collaborator Menno Meyjes.

"Hollywood Shuffle" (1987)
Comedy
Directed by Robert Townsend and Keenen Ivory Wayans

Bobby Taylor wants to be a respected actor. His strategy is to pick at Hollywood about how they only cast Black actors for stereotypical parts.

"Eyes on the Prize" (1987)
Documentary
Directed by Henry Hampton

A documentary about the American Civil Rights Movement, following its struggles from the 1950s through the early '70s.

"Menace II Society" (1993)
Action/Crime/Drama

Directed by Albert Hughes. A young street hustler attempts to escape the rigors and temptations of the ghetto in a quest for a better life.

COURTESY PBS

One of the suggested films is a classic documentary that was first aired on PBS. The 1987 film chronicles the history of Civil Rights in America.

New brew may help students stay awake

By Jennifer Nedeau
U-WIRE (DC BUREAU)

WASHINGTON — College students bored with the taste and effects of regular beer can put their lips to "B-to-the-E," the newest creation by America's number one selling beer company, Anheuser-Busch. The concept: Beer with caffeine.

"Sounds like it's going to suck. Why do you need an energy drink, for beer? I don't want to be a hyperactive drunk. I want to relax. If I want to get all crazy, I'll take a few shots," said George Washington University junior, Matthew Gillmor.

B-to-the-E, which stands for "beer with something extra," was launched in 55 U.S. test markets in October and is now being sold at bars and stores nationwide. It comes in a 10 oz. can with 6.6 percent alcohol by volume and contains about 54 milligrams of caffeine, comparable to half a cup of coffee.

"Contemporary adults thirst for variety and what's new, and our B-to-the-E delivers a beverage that is true to their lifestyles and range of drinking occasions," said Pat McGauley, senior director of NewProducts and High End Brands, Anheuser-Busch, Inc. "Our new B-to-the-E provides caffeine, guarana, and ginseng in a great tasting beer."

"Well, I'm sure people would be attracted to it because of it's energizing effect, and it actually may be a good idea. It just sounds odd for some reason," said Academy of Art in San Francisco student, Yvannia Perez.

Aimed at "contemporary adults," few college students have heard about the new beer and haven't seen it sold at nearby beverage stores.

"Caffeinated Beer? I've never even heard of it," said Spencer Hagan, a sophomore at University of California, Santa Barbara.

David Clark, a junior at Ohio State, works at a bar when he is at home in Whitehall, Mich. He said that his bar, Racquets, sells a can of B-to-the-E for $3 each.

"Basically, I would drink B-to-the-E if I was getting off work and wanted to have a chill night with a few friends, but I can't spend $25 to get drunk," Clark said.

He said that from a bartender's perspective, right now the most popular alcoholic energy drinks are vodka and Redbull for women or Yaggermeister and Redbull for men.

"Budweiser is really smart to make an energy drink, considering the popularity of these type of drinks right now," Clark said. Clark tried the new B-to-the-E last weekend to see what the buzz was about.

"I drank three and didn't feel drunk, nor did I feel like I had more energy. I need to drink at least eight beers to get a good buzz, but when I drank those it was like drinking three Mountain Dews. I mean can you really sit down and drink a six pack of pop?" Clark said.

At Brickskeller Saloon in Washington, D.C., where about 1200 brews are on sale every day, BE began being sold about six weeks ago. Dave Alexander, the owner, won a place in the Guinness Book of World Records for his collection and said that the new BE is selling fairly well, over a case a week at a price of $3.25 each beer.

"It doesn't taste like coffee or beer to me, nor an energy drink, it's in it's own little niche," Alexander said.

While Alexander said it is "too early to tell" whether or not BE is here to stay, he said he finds the new brew, "unusual and not something created by a brewmaster, but by a marketer."

"I wonder about this type of marketing...to me I think it is kind of disingenuous and false. It almost seems like they are trying to find a way to make underage drinkers, drink alcohol, which bothers me," Alexander said.

Nathaniel Davis, the brewmaster at Anheuser-Busch, Inc, finds things differently in his new beer.

"We created a great new drink that's outside the boundaries of the taste adults would expect from a traditional beer." "I think they should stray away from saying 'caffeinated beer.' It sounds unappealing," Perez from the Academy of Art said.

Other students also think that the marketing scheme is a bit strange. "I guess they are aiming at college students...who want to drink and stay up to do work?" Clark said.

While Anheuser-Busch has developed a beer that includes caffeine, many bars have served alcoholic drinks with the energy drink Red Bull.

Lacy fashion trends

FASHION from page 6

Azria presented a lot of walking shorts that he paired with opaque tights for cute looks great for the long of leg.

Marc Jacobs. His runways show began after dramatic celebrity entrances by Jay-Z and Beyonce. Uma Thurman, and Drew Barrymore. Jacobs' models were really pale and downright cherubic, and he centered his designs on blousy cuts, smock dresses, and poufy skirts. There was a lot of cashmere and taffeta and crushed velvet, and colors were bright. If not pretty, the collection was well thought out. Yet there were few standout looks, the exceptions being cashmere T-shirts and crepe dresses layered over silk.

Monique Lhuillier. A designer well known for her wedding dresses, Lhuillier presented a collection of ruffles, taffeta and metallics for shimmery day-to-evening outfits. She opened her show with a cute plum metallic-and-tweed polo shirtdress. She sent ruffled skirts down the runway, and a Chantilly lace cocktail dress. Pale models were Morticia-like in her black outfits, but she made up for it with a strikingly beautiful pleated ballerina dress in rust.

Bill Blass. Michael Vollbracht wrote in his liner notes that this year's collection was inspired by the late designer Geoffrey Beane and "Tonight Show" host Johnny Carson. Whatever the inspiration, it worked.

This was a working-girl collection of cashmere, pinstripes and embroidered skirts. A white gazar shirt and black beaded skirt were brilliant, and a pair of pinstriped pants was jazzed up by a gray embroidered jacket.

Vollbracht offered embroidered lace gowns and chiffon tea dresses. And most exciting was his wonderful use of the color pumpkin.

COURTESY SLAVEN VLASIC

A model wears a creation by Calvin Klein at the designer's show during Fashion Week in New York on Feb., 10, 2005.

WORLDWIDE PARTNER
Ideas that energize.
At GE, we believe in the power of ideas. Ideas that not only give Billy the wind torque he needs for his go-cart, but provide clean alternative energy to thousands of homes.
We invite you to come power your ideas at GE. We offer careers in Engineering, Finance, Human Resources, IT and Sales & Marketing.
gecareers.com
An Equal Opportunity Employer
Come see us at the Summer, Co-op and Internship Fair
February 17th
Campus Center
10 AM - 3 PM
imagination at work
A diversified technology, financial services, media company

Minutewomen get mixed results

WOMEN'S BASKETBALL from page 10

ter for the Minutewomen. UMass jumped all over Dayton in the first half and expanded its lead in the second half.

The 30 points Dayton scored were the fewest UMass has allowed in 30 years. It was also the lowest total the Minutewomen have ever allowed to an Atlantic-10 opponent. UMass held Dayton's leading scorer Cara Wright to only four points.

"Our defense was great," Dacko said. "We took Wright out of the game. Our post players did great."

In typical fashion, the Minutewomen received balanced scoring. Rosanio led the way with 12 points, followed by Nelson with 11, and Mills with nine.

After the game, Rosanio was named the A-10 co-Rookie of the Week, the third time she has received the honor this year. Rosanio's 10.8 ppg leads the team and is second among A-10 freshmen.

Campbell only registered six points in the win, but played a great floor game. The senior forward pulled down 11 rebounds and dished out a career-high seven assists.

The story of the game was the defensive effort turned in by the Maroon and White.

Dayton (10-12, 4-7 A-10) shot a lowly 20 percent from the floor and was never able to mount enough offense to pose a threat to the Minutewomen.

Brooke Campbell had 18 points, nine rebounds, and three blocks in a losing effort against Xavier.

Minutemen fall to Rams

MEN'S BASKETBALL from page 10

on the day, that being a wide open shot from sophomore Artie Bowers with 11 minutes to go in the game.

Trailing by 10 at the half, UMass came out of the locker rooms on a rampage. The first play of the half saw Stephane Lasme back down Dunston, spin around, and forcefully dunked the ball over him. The Minutemen appeared to feed off this momentum and Freeman, Anderson, and Maxwell went to score in succession.

The eight-point run put UMass down by two points, but a thunderous dunk by Dunston, including a foul, killed whatever was fueling the Minutemen. Dunston had a career game against the Maroon and White, scoring 18 points with 11 rebounds and three blocks. 13 of his points came in the second half.

Dunston received a lot of feeds in the post from the Fordham guards, but aggressive play in the post from UMass caused him to only make three field goals on the game. It was this aggressive play, however, that sent him to the line where he went 12-of-15.

In the first half, it was clear that Freeman was due for a big game. Freeman scored 10 of UMass' 19 first half points most while being double teamed in the post. A large part of his efficiency was the combination of Jeff Viggiano playing as a small power forward and Fordham's defensive-minded power forward Mushon Ya'akosi getting two early fouls.

Viggiano drove to the lane as UMass was down 10-6 and looked to be going for a finger-roll. Right before Dunston rejected the shot, Viggiano dished the ball to Freeman for an easy two points. On the next offensive drive, Viggiano drove again. This time, Dunston wouldn't bite and Viggiano took off two steps inside the paint and tomahawk dunked the ball.

NOTE: With 6:12 remaining in the second half coach Lappas questioned points put on the board after a foul. The points were removed, but during the discourse between Lappas and the referee, Fordham coach Dereck Wittenberg began yelling at Lappas. Lappas mentioned, "It was unusual. I've never had an exchange with another coach in my entire career, that's all I'll say about it."... Senior guard Anthony Anderson had four points and went 0-for-4 behind the arch. Lappas mentioned, "He is really hurting, his back is really killing him."

Senior point guard Chris Chadwick had four steals and four points against Fordham on Saturday.

Whittenburg out of line

MARZELLI from page 10

then Whittenburg sprang into action.

Without provocation, the Fordham coach left his seat on the bench, approached center court and started yelling expletives at Lappas. While it was unclear what he was saying from my seat across the court, those nearby to the confrontation claimed to have heard numerous unmentionables, including allegedly telling Lappas to, "Get back in the f—— box you mother f—— a——," among other things.

Now let me remind you, Fordham's Rose Hill Gym is the oldest Division I arena in the country, and is currently celebrating its 80th anniversary. It's not the Mullins Center, or even any of the other smallish gyms in the A-10. It is a 3,200-seat glorified high school gym in which fans are literally sitting on the floor, and can hear coaches and players hantering all game long.

From what some of the fans on the Fordham side of the gym were saying after the game, this was not the only instance in which Whittenburg chose to use vulgarity in describing his displeasure over the course of the afternoon, but it was certainly the most egregious.

Even Lappas and his staff had no idea what to do, and as Lappas said after the game, they had never seen or heard anything like it. All the UMass coach could do was turn and walk away with a stunned look on his face, having no idea how to react. After the game, there was no handshake between the two, and despite Lappas' genuine efforts to find and speak with Whittenburg after the game, he coach was nowhere to be found.

In the press conference, Lappas called the incident "unusual" and said that he had "never had an exchange with another coach in his entire career." Whittenburg, meanwhile, scowled angrily when asked to comment in the post game press conference and refused to offer any explanation.

Let me follow this up by saying that I've always held Whittenburg in high regards, both as a player, a coach and a person, and as a funny, intelligent and witty interview over the three separate occasions I've had a chance to associate with him. When he was hired at Fordham, I truly thought they got the right man to replace the decrepit Bob Hill, and to a degree I still believe that today.

As a man, he's accomplished amazing things in the game of basketball. Prior to his NCAA Championship, he played for arguably the most famous and successful coach in the history of American high school basketball, DeMatha (MD) Catholic's Morgan Wootten, and was part of an undefeated 1978 National Championship team.

Following his stint playing at State, Whittenburg returned to Raleigh to coach under Valvano, before eventually spending five years on the staff of famed former Georgia Tech coach Bobby Cremins. He then left to become the head coach at Wagner, where he did amazing things with the Seahawks program in turning around a terrible team and leading them to their first-ever NCAA Tournament bid in 2002-03.

Yet now Dereck Whittenburg should be ashamed of himself, and for his program. To carry on like that in a small gym, with the season's first sell-out crowd on hand, while he is trying to build a name for himself and establish trust with those in and around the Fordham program – which I might add is a Catholic institution – is not representative of the man I always thought Dereck Whittenburg was, and for that I'm disappointed as an Atlantic 10 beat writer, and as a college basketball fan.

So as far as I'm concerned, it is time for Whittenburg to get on the phone, call Amherst and do the right thing: apologize to Lappas. And from there, he should apologize to his own team, his fans and his school for his transgressions – the type of immature actions you might expect from one of the Rams' freshman players, not their veteran coach.

Mike Marzelli is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at Marzelli@dailycollegian.com.

UMass gets crushed by UNH

HOCKEY from page 10

Yandle's pass through Warner's legs.

It took the Wildcats just 55 seconds into the second period to gain a four-goal advantage. Sean Collins notched his first goal of the night, beating Warner after taking a pass from Yandle, who crossed the puck from the right point.

The goal of the night happened six minutes later when Collins took the puck and skated past a UMass defender, making several nice moves inside the blue line before faking out Warner to make the score 5-0.

The Wildcats scored a pair of goals in just 29 seconds, first from Michlikier and next from Justin Aikins, to push the lead to 7-0 when the game was just 28:59 old. Michlikier closed out UNH's scoring in the third period, and Fenton was able to break Regan's shutout in the final frame.

"[UNH's] abilities are pretty well-documented," Cahoon said. "People that put up points for them do it continuously, but in no way does that forgive us for our lack of effort, lack of will, lack of courage; probably one of the most disgraceful performances that I've ever been a part of.

"We could talk about X's and O's all night long.... I could have had [former Detroit Red Wings coach] Scotty Bowman doing the board work between periods, and that wouldn't have solved the lack of interest that seemed to exist out there to get on pucks, to neutralize people and to exert themselves defensively in their own end. All the detail in the world wouldn't have solved the disinterested way in which we performed."

The Minutemen played what was probably their best 20 minutes of hockey of the season during the first period on Saturday night.

They got on the board first when Craig MacDonald sent a shot at Regan that was eventually cleaned up by P.J. Fenton, who scored his second goal in as many nights.

The lead only lasted for about four-and-a-half minutes, as Mike Radja was able to tie the game at one when he scored in traffic in front of Waidlich.

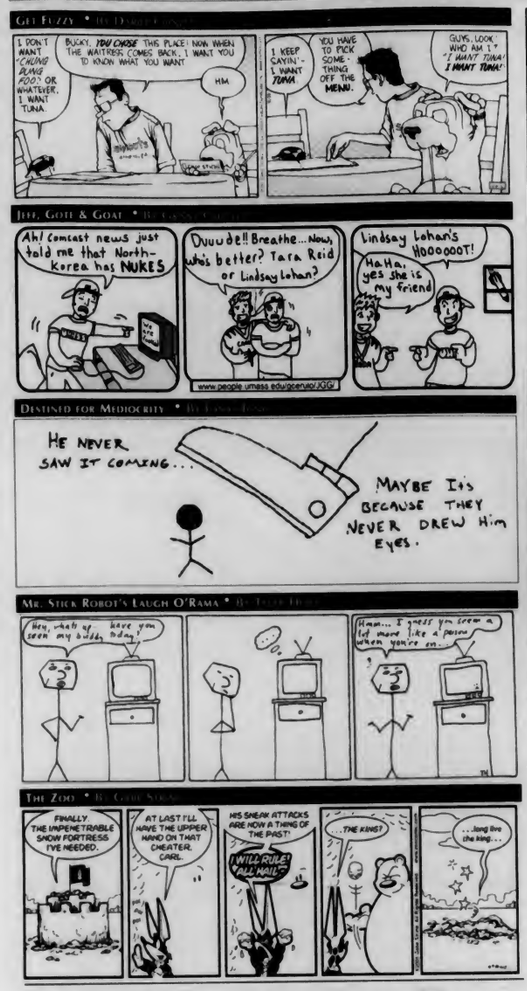
UNH took the lead for good in the second period when Brad Haishins scored his first career goal by sending a wrist shot from the left point that never left the ice but was still out of the reach of Waidlich's right leg.

Just over a minute later, Michlikier stole the puck in the UMass zone and skated past Zech Klann, Marvin Degon and Waidlich, who came flying out of his net in an unsuccessful attempt to steel the puck by diving at Michlikier at the blue line.

The Wildcats closed out their scoring with goals from Hemingway, Michlikier and Josh Ciocco, respectively.

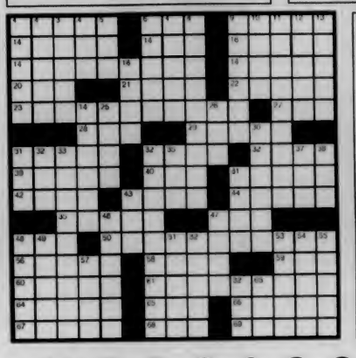
"Obviously, we're just pleased with the outcome of the weekend," UNH coach Dick Umile said. "It's a huge win for us, picking up four points [is important] anytime you can do that in the Hockey East.

Freshman forward Zach Klann had three shots against New Hampshire on Saturday. Klann has two goals and an assist this season.



Attention: Artists!
Arts Extension Service presents
Making Art • Making a Living
Four workshops that address the business of being an artist:
• MONEY for Artists (ART 41) March 1
• MARKETING for Artists (ART 42) March 8
• JOBS for Artists (ART 44) March 22
• LEGAL STUFF for Artists (ART 40) March 29
Information: www.UMassULearn.net
Register: 413-545-3653
Workshops are scheduled for Tuesdays in March (except the week of Spring break, March 15) in the Campus Center, at the University of Massachusetts from 4:30 - 6:30 p.m. Preregistration is required. For more information, please visit www.UMassULearn.net and look under Noncredit Art courses or call 413-545-2360. Arts Extension Service sponsors the series through support from the UMass Arts Council.
UMassAmherst Continuing Education Out Choo-e Your Future Your Way

Rent One of Ours
No additional fee for 21-25 year old drivers
• Direct Billing to Insurance Companies
• Free Local Pick Up
• Locally Owned and Operated
549-RENT (7368)
POTTERS AUTO & TRUCK RENTALS
• Cars
• Passenger Vans
• Trucks
at North Amherst Motors
Collision Repair Center
78 Sunderland Road North Amherst MA 01059
www.northamherstmotors.com
On Bus Route • One Mile North of UMass



STSTRAVEL.COM
Join America's #1 Student Tour Operator
CANCUN ACAPULCO JAMAICA BAHAMAS FLORIDA
SPRING BREAK 2005
Sell Trips, Earn Cash & Travel Free
1-800-648-4849 www.ststravel.com

Need A Fundraiser?
Sell something EVERYONE needs!
A Proven Best-Seller!
We'll Pay... $5.00
for each qualified Massachusetts Daily Collegian subscription sold by your organization.
For more details call our Circulation Department at 413-545-3500 or email circulation@dailycollegian.com and ask about fundraiser opportunities for your organization.
The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
circulation@dailycollegian.com

University of Massachusetts Amherst
New Students Program Summer Counselors
AMBASSADORS. LEADERS.
Not BIG on Sleep.
WE'RE HIRING for 2005 Summer Orientation
KEEP READING, IF YOU ARE.....
• a current undergraduate at UMass Amherst with a minimum GPA of a 2.5
• enthusiastic about UMass Amherst and ready to talk about it
• someone who looks forward to meeting new people
• familiar with the residential, academic, and social opportunities at the university
• involved in RSO's, intramurals, or other campus activities
• a person with high energy and high stamina - (if you need 8 hours of sleep, stop here)
STILL INTERESTED? CHECK OUT THE JOB BENEFITS.
• networking with parents in many areas of employment (think life after graduation).
• improved public speaking, time management, and communication skills.
• connections with faculty and staff members from across campus.
• $2874.00 in salary and health coverage.
• free room and board on campus during orientation
• campus employment options after orientation is over - or head to the beach
STILL READING? WE'D LIKE TO MEET YOU.
Feb 18, 2005
http://www.umass.edu/newstudent/nsp_employment.html

ACROSS
1 Fully conscious
6 Drench
9 Salted meat
14 Banker?
15 As well
16 Maine campus
17 Recreational hangouts
19 Shoestrings
20 Wynn and Begley
21 Interruptions of continuity
22 Butcher's cut
23 A bit daft
27 Internet pop-ups
28 Anonymous John
29 Neighbor of Egypt
31 Green tea
34 Example
36 Japanese wrestling
39 Burans
40 Pub brew
41 Temple table
42 Alternative to a saber
43 Mad scans
44 Costume jewelry
45 Jacob's father
47 Confine
48 Scam
50 Semiconductor devices
56 Satellite's path
58 Red and deep blue
59 Floral ring
60 Family member
61 More ostentatious
64 Al and Tipper
65 Swallow
66 Superior to
67 Uneasy feeling
68 Crafty
69 Hebrew lawgiver
DOWN
1 Quaking tree
2 Ralph Emerson
3 Hold it, sailor!
4 Code base
5 Get it wrong
6 Ermine in a light coat
7 Spirited vigor
8 Owns
9 Shot like a rock
10 United Emirates
11 Mel's Brothers movie, with "The"
12 In an upright position
13 Sensory organs
18 Eye levelly
24 Idolizers
25 Sore
26 Regret bitterly
30 Sloping
31 Tiller's tool
32 Sleepy alternative
33 Comic David
34 Dead animals
35 Clay, today
37 Wrestlers' pad
38 Mine find
41 Big galoots
43 Disfigure
46 Bear witness
47 City on the Arno
48 Line dance
49 Celestial hunter
51 Kuzmanich's kingdom
52 Like sailor's stories
53 Potpourris
54 Superman portrayer
56 Fathers
57 Chile
62 Actor Neill
63 SHO rival
Find today's answers online
www.dailycollegian.com

UMASS YOGA
CLASSES IN BOYDEN 10
MONDAY/WEDNESDAY
12:30 – 1:45 pm Power Yoga (1-3)
2:00 – 3:15 pm Restorative (1-2)
TUESDAY/THURSDAY
1:00 – 2:15 pm Yoga Basics (1-2)
2:30 – 3:45 pm Intermediate (2-3)
4:00 – 5:15 pm Yoga Basics (1-2)
DROP IN ONLY $10
and apply this fee towards a semester class package:
1X/WEEK $75
2X/WEEK $145
TO REGISTER
Campus Recreation, Boyden 215
413-545-0022
www.umass.edu/umim

Want to Jumpstart your business?
Advertise with the Collegian

H·O·R·O·S·C·O·P·E·S

aquarius • Jan. 20-Feb. 18
Don't complain about being bored. Do something about it.

pisces • Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Today you are going to find yourself tongue-tied by a cutie from class.

aries • Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Everything happens for a reason. That is, if you believe in fate.

taurus • Apr. 20-May 20
Today, it will be very hard to pay attention in class.

gemini • May 21-Jun. 21
What really happened this weekend? Actually, it's better if you don't know.

cancer • Jun. 22-Jul. 22
You're going to push yourself over-the-edge with that little bit of ice cream.

leo • Jul. 23-Aug. 22
It's time to find out what those people upstairs keep dropping.

virgo • Aug. 23-Sept. 22
It's about time you wrote down that song you've been thinking of.

libra • Sept. 23-Oct. 22
What goes up must come down. Don't mess with gravity.

scorpio • Oct. 23-Nov. 21
Today, you need to take everything you do very seriously. It's important.

sagittarius • Nov. 22-Dec. 21
One day, all of the hot dogs in the world will be yours.

capricorn • Dec. 22-Jan. 19
You area love machine, whatever that means.

Quote of the Day

"Duct tape is like the force. It has a light side, a dark side, and it holds the universe together."

—Oprah Winfrey

Blow away your competitors, advertise with The Collegian
Call 545-3500

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

ACTIVITIES

Foam party Montreal weekends $89 Montreal Express.Net 1(781)979-9001

ANNOUNCEMENTS

$600 Group Fundraiser Scheduling Bonus 4 hours of your group's time PLUS our free (yes, free) fundraising solutions EQUALS $1,000-$2,000 in earnings for your group. Call TODAY for a $450 bonus when you schedule your non-sales fundraiser with CampusFundraiser. Contact CampusFundraiser, (888)923-3238, or visit www.campus-fundraiser.com

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Brandywine Apts. Now Leasing, 1&2 bedroom apts. Leases begin Jun, July, Aug or Sep. First come, first serve. Get them while they last. www.brandywine-apts.com stop by or call 549-0600

1 bedroom available North Amherst $425 includes heat & electric, bright, clean, washer/dryer in Condo on bus route 1 mile to UMass female preferred Call Liz 508-367-8893

Center of town, 1, 2, 3 bedrooms; hardwood floors. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Hobart Condos 3 bedroom, hardwood floors, study area in basement. Cable, telephone (internet access) in all bedrooms and study. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

AUTO FOR SALE

Pontiac Sunbird 93 automatic 4 cyl excellent turquoise ABS Asking $1350 or BO Call 253-0279

1999 Toyota Camry fully loaded. 75K, Mint condition. Call 413-348-4191

EMPLOYMENT

Top Boys Sports Camp in Maine! Play & Coach Sports * Have Fun * Make $$$ Camp Counselors Positions Available Summer 2005 Apply Online www.camp-cobbossee.com or call 1-800-473-6104

Prestigious Trail's End Camp- Pennsylvania Summer Camp – Guaranteed Experience of a Lifetime; Limited openings for Sports Specialists, Crafts Specialists, Waterfront Counselors (Lake and Pool) and General Counselors; June 19th – August 14th – Gain practical experience working with kids. www.trailsendcamp jobs.com

EMPLOYMENT

Make money taking online surveys earn $10 to $125 for surveys. Earn $25 to $250 for focus groups www.cashforstudents.com/umass

Nanny position for 2 boys ages 6 & 9. Perfect schedule for student. Part time Spring. Full time Summer. Prior experience necessary. 413-625-2288

Earn lots of $$ and have fun on the water this Spring & Summer. Raft guides needed at Crab Apple Whitewater in Charlemont, MA. Fun Summer job, no experience necessary. We will train. 413-625-2288.

EMPLOYMENT

Movie extras, actors, models! Make $100-$300/day No experience required, FT/PT, All looks needed! 1800-340-5939 Ext. 1054

HAPPY BIRTHDAY

HAPPY BIRTHDAY, MAGGIE SMERLAS! Best Wishes on your day of birth! Love, your buddies.

MISCELLANEOUS

$$$$ EARN EXTRA CASH!!! $$$$ Get friends, family, and fellow students to play fantasy baseball and earn cash. No risk. Go to www.rotoleague.com/affiliate for details.

ROOM FOR RENT

350 per month 413-335-5226

SERVICES

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance 549-1906

TRAVEL

One Bed and Studio (Four Queen Beds) at Deerpark one mile from Loon Mountain Available 3/11-3/18 Ken 335-9775

Spring Break 2005 Only 6 weeks left... Lowest Prices Biggest Parties Earn 2 Free Trips Exclusive with Sun Splash Tours www.sunsplashtours.com 1800-426-7710

TRAVEL

XXX Night Montreal Weekends $89 Montreal Express.net 1(781)979-9001

Bahamas Spring Cruise 5 Days $299! Includes Meals, Celebrity Parties! Panama City, Daytona $159! Cancun, Jamaica, Acapulco, Nassau $499! Award Winning Company! SpringBreakTravel.com 1-800-678-6386

#1 Spring Break Vacations! Cancun, Jamaica, Acapulco, Bahamas, & Florida! Best Parties, Best Hotels, Best Prices! Limited Space! 1-800-234-7007 www.endlesssummer-tours.com

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTSMONDAY

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 2005 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Fordham outlasts UMass

Freeman scores 27 points in loss

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

NEW YORK - The Massachusetts men's basketball team has shown it can win without its premiere big man, Rashaun Freeman, playing at the top of his game. On Saturday, however, the Minutemen made it very clear that he also can't do it on his own.

Freeman dropped 27 points and grabbed 11 rebounds for UMass, but it wasn't enough to overcome a slow, methodical attack from the Fordham Rams. Fordham won the game 63-56 in front of the first sold out crowd of the year (3,200) at the historic Rose Hill Gymnasium. The win was Fordham's fifth straight at home.

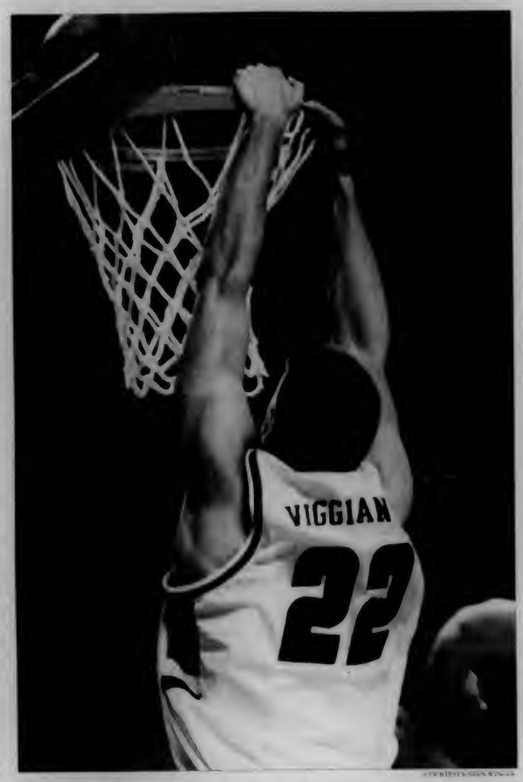
Fordham	63
UMass	56

There was only one lead change in the game and the Maroon and White allowed the Rams (10-12 6-5 Atlantic 10) to jump out to a 29-19 lead. UMass (12-9 6-5 A-10) would never trail by more than 10, but it was never able to go on a long enough run to take the lead.

"We dug ourselves a hole in the first half, which hurt us in terms of our ability to come back and in a tough road game we gave ourselves some opportunities and missed a couple of easy ones," UMass coach Steve Lappas said.

With 1:21 left in the game, the Minutemen were trailing 55-49 and opted to turn on the full-court press. UMass caused confusion on the inbounds and Maurice Maxwell stole the ball before getting fouled. He sunk both free throws and the Minutemen looked to take the last bit of momentum in the game.

Lasme went to the line with 52 seconds left, he hit his first, and bricked the second off the right side of the rim. Fordham's freshman sensation, Bryant Dunston grabbed the rebound and passed the ball of to Jermaine Anderson. Lappas signaled for the intentional foul and Bowers grabbed Anderson, sending him to the line.



Anderson hit both free throws with 41 seconds left, putting Fordham up 59-54.

There was question to whether fouling with so much time on the clock was a wise decision. Lappas defended the strategy citing the fact that they no longer had time outs and he did not want the game to come down to a three.

"If it was two I was going to not foul in that situation," Lappas said. "When it was three I just didn't want it to come down to where we were down three, possibly with 17 seconds to go and having to shoot the three point shot."

Lappas' desire to sway from the three may have been warranted. The Minutemen hit only one three

See MEN'S HOOPS on page 8

COURTESY KAREN WINGER

Junior forward Jeff Viggiano goes up for a dunk against Davidson on Dec. 20, 2004. Viggiano had another big dunk against Fordham on Saturday and scored three points on the night. UMall lost 63-56.

Whittenburg was out of line

Mike Marzelli

NEW YORK - College basketball fans all know the scene; they've seen it a million times before: North Carolina State tied at 52 with overwhelming favorite Houston and its famed "Phi Slamma Jamma" attack in the 1983 NCAA Championship game at The Pit in Albuquerque, NM.

With less than 10 seconds to play, Thurl Bailey's pass barely eludes the outstretched arms of Benny Anders and finds its way to a guard named Dereck Whittenburg, who then heaves up the most famous air ball in hoops history – right into the hands of teammate Lorenzo Charles, who drops it in the basket in one felt swoop, and pandemonium takes over. Charles goes nuts, Whittenburg goes nuts, and the late, great Jimmy Valvano is still looking for someone to hug; truly a moment for the ages.

I may not have been old enough to watch it live, or even remember it happening, but through the miracles of modern TV and countless replays, that is always how I've remembered Dereck Whittenburg – for an airball, an awesome airball.

Yet on Saturday, how I remember Whittenburg changed significantly. It's not that the aforementioned moment lost any of its luster, because that will not happen as long as college basketball is around, but rather because of an unfortunate event during Massachusetts' game at Fordham, where Whittenburg is now the coach.

It was a moment that gave me a new lens to see him through; a new perspective on a guy I've always thought was pretty OK in my book. A perspective that is both disturbing and alarming.

Whittenburg was hired as the head man in the Bronx prior to last season, and has done yeoman's work in turning around the woeful Rams into contenders this season. A team that struggled to win even the easiest of games over the last several seasons can now add wins over Temple, Xavier and UMass to its resume in 2004-05.

On Saturday, however, I feel as though Whittenburg embarrassed himself, his players, members of the UMass team and coaching staff, the fans at Rose Hill Gymnasium and the basketball program he was hired to rebuild. Maybe I'm over reacting, and it's very possible that I could be in the minority who feel this way, but I was personally angry at Whittenburg for how he carried on.

To set the scene, Fordham was leading UMass 48-43 at the 6:12 mark of the second half when Ram forward Bryant Dunston was fouled on the floor while going to the basket. After continuing to the hoop, Dunston laid the ball in, but the hoop was disallowed because the foul was called previously. Nonetheless, the scoreboard operator posted two points on the Fordham side of the scoreboard, making the score 50-43.

Immediately, UMass coach Steve Lappas moved quickly to center court to talk to the nearby referee and confirm with the official scorer that the basket did not count. Lappas carried on for a little over a minute, and

See MARZELLI on page 8

Minutemen dominated by UNH

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

To say the least, it was a bad weekend for the Massachusetts hockey team.

The Maroon and White's (11-18-2, 5-13-2 Hockey East) home-and-home series with New Hampshire (20-7-3, 13-3-2 Hockey East) began with an 8-1 debacle at the Whittemore Center which caused UMass coach Don Cahoon to call out his team for showing a complete lack of effort on the ice.

UNH	8
UMass	1
UNH	4
UMass	1

"What I'm afraid of here is that I've got too many kids in that locker room that have gotten a little bit out of this program in the last couple of years," Cahoun said. "Maybe as much as they could have expected, and that's good enough for them and it's time to move on.

"They're forgetting the whole point of it, the whole point of competition at this level. Our team tonight was an absolute disgrace to Hockey East so that pretty much tells you what my sentiments are, and what I'm talking to these kids about right now.

"New Hampshire is a terrific team, and they make plays. They might have beaten us straight up tonight regardless of how hard we played, and I can live with that. But I can't live with kids who don't want to be out there wearing the UMass shirt and wearing it with pride and playing with intelligence and integrity and passion, the way this game is supposed to be played, and it takes will and courage to do that. If you don't have will and courage to do it, take the shirt off and go home."

Needless to say, the Minutemen came out of the gates flying around the ice on Saturday night at the Mullins Center in front of goalie Michael Waidlich but UMass was unable to quell the powerful UNH offense and lost again, 6-1.

COURTESY KAREN WINGER

UMass captain Stephen Werner had two shots against UNH on Saturday. The Minutemen were swept by the Wildcats this weekend.

New Hampshire coach Dick Umile tied Charlie Holt's school record with 347 career wins after the Saturday night triumph.

The Minutemen debuted a new set of black uniforms on Friday night, but the glamour of them quickly wore off when the Wildcats scored 4:58 into the game. Robbie Barker wristed a shot to the net from just beyond the right point, and Daniel Winnik got his stick on it to tip it over goalie Tim Warner's shoulder.

Seven minutes later, UMass had a chance to even up the score, but P.J. Fenton couldn't convert after James Solon made a great centering pass in front of UNH goalie Sean Regan. The Wildcats quickly took the puck down to the other end of the ice and scored after Preston Callander fed Brett Hemingway with an identical pass from the left point to make it 2-0.

New Hampshire stretched its lead to three before the end of the first period when Jacob Micflikier, who had a hat trick plus an assist Friday, followed by a two-goal performance on Saturday, tipped Brian

See MEN'S HOCKEY on page 8

Women's hoops splits weekend

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's basketball team traveled to Ohio this weekend and came away with a split. UMass dominated Dayton Friday 52-30, but fell to Xavier 65-55 on Sunday.

The Minutewomen have a secure hold on second place in the Atlantic-10 East division, currently holding a two-game lead. UMass returns home for a three-game homestand which begins Thursday at 12 p.m. with a match-up with Rhode Island.

UMass	52
Dayton	30
Xavier	65
UMass	55

"Obviously we wanted to come away with two wins, but I'm happy that we're playing with more confidence," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said. "I can see it before the game that the team believes they can win any game."

In the Xavier game, UMass gave the Musketeers all they could handle, but came up short. The game featured six ties and 10 lead changes in the second half.

Xavier (16-7, 10-2 A-10) took control on a three-pointer by Suntana Granderson with 1:37 remaining. The three-pointer put Xavier ahead by four and UMass wasn't able to respond.

Xavier went 6-6 from the free throw line in the final minute to put the game away.

"It was a tough game," Dacko said. "We missed nine lay-ups and had 11 turnovers in the first half. If we just made our lay-ups we would have won the game. But I'm really proud of the way the team played. We came back and played good basketball in the second half. I would really like to see that game played on a neutral court."

UMass (13-10, 6-6 A-10) was led by Brooke Campbell, who turned in her second outstanding performance of the weekend. Campbell had 18 points, nine rebounds, seven steals, and three blocks.

"Brooke's really done a tremendous job," Dacko said. "She played great defense and did a good job on the boards. She keeps getting better and better."

Another key contributor for the Minutewomen was freshman Kate Mills, who chipped in 12 points. Mills has provided an offensive spark since being inserted into the starting lineup last Sunday against St. Bonaventure.

Xavier was able to limit the production from the UMass backcourt, holding Katie Nelson and Pam Rosanio to a combined 13 points.

UMass played excellent defense against the best offensive team in the A-10, holding Xavier to 3-17 from three-point range.

While UMass slowed Xavier's perimeter game, the Musketeers were able to pound the ball inside. Forward Tara Booth, a favorite to be named A-10 Player of the Year, poured in 21 points and collected seven rebounds.

The Musketeers also got strong performances from guard Miranda Green and forward Adeola Olanrewaju. Green was second on the team with 15 points and Olanrewaju recorded a game-high 13 rebounds.

Friday's result was much bet-

See WOMEN'S HOOPS on page 8

COURTESY KAREN WINGER

Sophomore foward Tamara Tatham takes the ball in against Duquesne on Jan. 21. UMass beat Dayton and lost to Xavier this weekend.

New England's Largest College Daily • Est. 1890

The Daily Collegian

Tuesday, February 15, 2005 www.dailycollegian.com Volume CXIV Issue 80

Boston Herald jury begins deliberations

By Theo Emery
Associated Press

BOSTON — The jury in a libel trial against the Boston Herald began deliberating on Monday after closing arguments in a closely watched case that pits the tabloid against the judge that sued over articles about him.

The jury deliberated for about 35 minutes on Monday afternoon after hearing instructions from the trial judge, Charles Johnson. The jury was scheduled to reconvene on Tuesday morning at 9:30 a.m.

At issue are articles published in the Herald in 2002 that portrayed Superior Court Judge Ernest B. Murphy as lenient toward defendants and insensitive to victims. The articles by reporter David Wedge and others had quoted Murphy as saying about a 14-year-old rape victim: "Tell her to get over it."

Murphy, who was based in New Bedford Superior Court when the articles appeared, sued the Herald and four of its reporters for libel, claiming they were malicious in their reporting. Murphy, 61, insists he never said the quote attributed to him about the 14-year-old rape victim that was allegedly uttered during a private meeting with attorneys. The newspaper has stood by its reporting.

The Herald's attorney, M. Robert Dushman, told the jury in his closing argument that freedom of the press is a carefully protected right, and that any distress that the Herald articles caused Murphy should not sway their decision.

"This has obviously been a very emotional case for Judge Murphy and his family," Dushman said. "In this case, we ask you as jurors to set aside sympathy and decide the case on the law."

Dushman acknowledged that there were "minor errors" in some of Wedge's reporting, but said the jury that the overall gist of the stories were solid, and that Murphy was a "newsworthy story" that the Herald had an obligation to cover, as other media did.

He also questioned Murphy's memory of some of the events he contested, and described Wedge as a thorough, thoughtful reporter who went further than other reporters, such as when he approached Murphy for comment outside a dining club.

"David Wedge actually made a very thorough investigation here," he said.

Murphy's attorney, Howard M. Cooper, said Wedge's work was shoddy and that he fabricated a "sensationalized, supermarket tabloid story" with the goal of getting public exposure and ultimately selling more papers.

Cooper said that Wedge knew that what he was reporting was wrong, opted not to check his stories with people who could debunk them, and relied on sources in Bristol County District Attorney Paul Walsh's office who had a "vendetta" against Murphy.

"Mr. Wedge and his editors at the Herald disregarded the truth that was staring them in the face," he said.

He said that Murphy was a compassionate man who was devastated by the Herald's reporting, and said the judge's recourse was for the jury to find in his favor.

"A man who loses his wealth loses little. A man who loses his health loses much. A man who loses his reputation loses everything," Cooper told the jury. "Where does a man go to get his reputation back. The answer is, he comes to you."

Because Murphy is a public figure, the jury must be convinced that the Herald maliciously reported material its reporters knew was false, a higher standard than the requirement a nonpublic figure must meet to win a libel case.

UMass students design Olympic park

By Jonathan Vega
Collegian Staff

Ziying Tang and Dong Zhang, two graduate students from the department of landscape architecture at the University of Massachusetts Amherst, have won an international competition with a design proposal for the Olympic Forest Park.

The park will debut to the world in the 2008 Summer Olympics, which are to be held in Beijing, China. Zhang and Tang are married and have been studying in the United States for one and a half years.

Tang and Zhang's design is drawing attention because of its unique integration of an ecological water system within a traditional contemplative Chinese garden. Zhang explains that the design illustrates techniques on how the ancient city of Beijing can nurture it's past while addressing environmental challenges that are pressing Beijing's increasingly modern landscape.

Yao Ying, the vice director of the urban planning commission told People's Daily, a Chinese publication that the park, "[will] cover an area of some 700 hectares, the park will be built into a green belt for Beijing residents' entertainment and recreation, as well as for improving the city's environment."

A pair of UMass graduate students designed the Forest Park Olympic gardens for the 2008 Beijing summer Olympics. The two won an international competition and their design features a unique water system.

The International Federation of Landscape Architects and the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization organized the competition, in which Tang and Zhang beat out 160 applicants from all over the world with their "Forest Park" design.

In October the American Society of Landscape Architects held an annual meeting to present Tang and Zhang with a $3,500 award in Salt Lake City, Utah. "Our design reflects the harmony and integration possible in landscape architecture," Zhang said. In the fall of 2004, Tang and Zhang won the National Low Impact Development Design Competition, which was organized by the University of Maryland.

The NLIDD competition challenged students by requiring consideration of groundwater conservation. The graduate students who participated in the competition selected portions of their respective campuses for theoretical redesign that included low-impact development approaches that conserve the environment. However, according to the 2004 ILA Student Design Competition, entries must also consider the theme of "Harmony and Integration in Landscape Architecture."

"[Forest Park] is part of the Olympic Park, and it is located on

See OLYMPICS on page 2

Bomb assassinates former Prime Minister

By Bassem Mroue
Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — A powerful bomb assassinated a former prime minister Monday, carving a 50-foot hole in a street and turning armored cars into burning wrecks — devastation that harked back to Lebanon's violent past and raised fears of new bloodshed in the bitter dispute over Syria, the country's chief power broker.

The blast wounded 100 people and killed 10, including the main target: Rafik Hariri, a billionaire businessman who helped rebuild Lebanon after its civil war, but had recently fallen out with Syria.

The United States called the attack "a terrible reminder" that Lebanon still must shake free of occupation by Syria — the neighbor that keeps 15,000 troops here and influences virtually all key political decisions.

Syria denied any role and condemned the assassination. But opposition leaders in Lebanon said they held both the Lebanese and Syrian governments responsible and demanded Syrian troops withdraw.

A U.S. official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said it was too early in the investigation to know who was responsible, but said any list of suspects "would have to include the Syrians and their surrogates in Lebanon."

Hariri, 60, left office in October but had the wealth and the prominence to maintain some degree of independence from Syria, while never moving toward total defiance.

His shift toward the opposition in recent months had given a boost to calls for the withdrawal of Syrian troops — and his death silenced an influential and moderate voice that could prove hard to replace.

It was unclear if his killing would delay parliamentary elections that had been expected in April and May.

Top government officials met in emergency session, then instructed the army and internal security forces "to take all necessary measures to control the security situation." The Supreme Council for Defense,

See BOMBING on page 2

Lawmakers speculate chocolate's origin

By Jim Abrams
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Before you pop that Valentine chocolate in your mouth, consider whether it could have been produced by child slaves, lawmakers said Monday in admonishing the chocolate industry for its pace in monitoring labor practices on West African cocoa farms.

"If we can have our tuna fish dolphin-free, we can have our chocolate slave-free," Rep. Eliot Engel, D-N.Y., said at a news conference where he pledged to abstain from chocolate and refrain from buying Valentine's Day chocolate for his wife and daughter.

A can of tuna fish as the ultimate guilt-free gift for one's valentine?

Engel and Sen. Tom Harkin, D-Iowa, who in 2001 helped negotiate an industrywide protocol on child labor practices, said industry representatives told the lawmakers they would miss a July 1 deadline for certification that children were not being exploited on cocoa-growing farms.

COURTESY CNN.COM

Lawmakers criticize the origin of popular Valentine's Day chocolates, saying that the treats could have been produced by child slaves.

It was a "show of bad faith," Engel said, adding that he and Harkin were considering legislation that could require labeling on chocolate products guaranteeing they were not made with child labor.

The Chocolate Manufacturers Association is "puzzled and surprised" by the charges, and is fully committed to meeting the July 1 deadline, said industry spokeswoman Susan Smith.

She said the industry to date has complied with every deadline in the 2001 agreement, and it has initiated a large-scale test of a cocoa farm labor monitoring program in Ghana and the Ivory Coast, the source of more than 40 percent of the world's cocoa beans.

More than 650 hamlets are included in that pilot program, she said. Progress has been good in Ghana but somewhat slower in the Ivory Coast, where civil strife and lack of roads make it hard to reach many areas.

Students scammed in scholarship fund

By Juliana Leal
Collegian Correspondent

Last year, thousands of college students across the country were invited to join the Outstanding Student Honor Society and the organization promised academic, career and scholarship assistance to those in excellent academic standing, however, the society proved to have no affiliation with the universities; in fact, it never existed.

Invitations were sent via e-mail to thousands of students at institutions in Massachusetts, New York, Virginia, Indiana, North Carolina, and Louisiana. The only requirements were a GPA of 3.0 or above, and a one-time membership fee of $12.

Joanna Krawiecki, a UMass Nursing junior, fell victim to the scam. She received an invitation through her student e-mail account to join the society on Feb. 12, 2004. The lengthy e-mail was personally addressed to Krawiecki, and contained bogus background information about the organization. It stated that OSHS was credited by the Outstanding Student Consortium, which allegedly offered services such as career development resources and shopping discounts, and even scholarships.

As a student in good standing and member of the Lambda Delta National Honor Society, Krawiecki decided this was a worthwhile opportunity and enrolled. She never questioned the authenticity of the organization and wanted to take advantage of the scholarships offered.

"I didn't think much of it at the time, since it seemed legitimate and UMass didn't send any warning e-mails that this was a hoax," she said. "I even e-mailed questions through the website about the scholarship. I got replies from a real person, not an automated message, telling me all the requirements for the scholarship application."

According to Krawiecki, she was able to access her online account on the Web site honorstudent.org from February until September of last year.

In October, she sent via mail her application for a scholarship the society claimed to offer, but the package was returned as undeliverable and the Web site was no longer in service.

"It was then I realized that I was scammed. I also used this society on my resumé for scholarship applications. As a student in good standing, how mortified I would have been if employers looked into this society and saw that it did not exist," Krawiecki said.

On Jan. 18 Krawiecki e-mailed Provost Charlena Seymour regarding the issue. The provost forwarded the message to Vice Chancellor Michael Gargano. He said he would "check with [his] staff relative to alerting the campus community."

Krawiecki's sister, Jill, also received an invitation from the society but decided not to join. One of Joanna's friend, a junior in the School of Management, also received the invitation and joined.

Stories like Krawiecki's are found nationwide. Suspicion arose at Binghamton University when Vice Provost Stephen Straight saw a copy of the e-mail and realized the organization was not affiliated with the school. He ordered an official warning to all students about the hoax. To some, the news came too late; they had

See HOAX on page 2

Palestinian Leader seeing improvement

By Ibrahim Barzak
Associated Press

GAZA CITY, Gaza Strip — The Israeli military delivered the bodies of 15 militants to the Palestinians for burial Monday, a handover celebrated in Gaza as the first real achievement of Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas, who is trying to prevent fickle militants from straying from a fragile truce.

This latest dividend of improved relations between Israel and the Palestinians came as Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said he would ask the Cabinet next week to formally serve notice of the government's intention to withdraw from Gaza and four West Bank settlements.

The planned pullout has created a politically charged atmosphere in Israel, and prominent Israeli politicians on Monday called for detaining Jewish extremists without trial or charges in response to a wave of threats against government ministers who support the withdrawal.

Tens of thousands of Gazans poured into the streets as 15 ambulances carrying the bodies of the militants rolled into Gaza City's main square, escorted by Palestinian security. Each ambulance had the name of the dead man inside on the windshield.

Dozens of armed men stood in the square, raising the banners of their factions and saluting the bodies. The Palestinian police band played the national anthem in the background.

The militants were killed in attacks on Israeli army outposts in Gaza and other Israeli targets in the past two years. It was not clear why Israel had kept their remains.

COURTESY CNN.COM

Militants are searched along the Gaza Strip before Mideast peace-talks occured last week.

The bodies were released a day after Israel's Cabinet approved the names of 500 Palestinian prisoners to be freed, and security commanders discussed the handover of the West Bank town of Jericho to Palestinian control. All three measures are part of a package of overtures agreed on last week at a summit where Sharon and Abbas declared a cessation of 4 1/2 years of hostilities.

ARTS & LIVING
CARBS ARE OK
Low carb is out, bread is in. No longer is high protein the way to live.
PAGE 5

EDITORIAL/OPINION
SMOKING LEGALITIES?
Should employers have the authority to hire or fire employees based on them being a smoker?
PAGE 4

WEATHER
TODAY Mostly Cloudy, 53°, 34°
TONIGHT Mostly Cloudy, 42°, 34°
TOMORROW PM Showers, 49°, 22°

SPORTS
BACK AT HOME
UMass ready to take on Florida State in basketball.
PAGE 10

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center
University of Massachusetts
Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief Peter Foundas
Managing Editor Mike Marzelli
Business Manager Rich Pacheco
Production Manager Cory Rosenberg
News Supervisor Meghan Heah
Advertising Manager Tiffany Sugalski
Editorial Production Samantha M. Nielsen
Arts & Living Editor Michael Bosack
Calendar Editor Alyson Zillmann
Features Editor Yousef Munayyer
Editorial Editor Allison Edles
Asst. Editor Ericka Lovley
Photo Editor Alex Demosthene
Sports Editor Bob McGovern
Operations Manager Kristen Weiss
Classified Advertising Marty Pappas
Distribution Manager Josh Riggans
Finance Manager Horak Shah
Administrative Coord. Virginie Frecaut
Head Account Sandra Marquez
Assistant Operations Linda Wallack
Assistant Advertising Josh Greenberg
Assistant Business Nathan Chomsky
Assistant Finance Thomas Hechi
Advertising Production Rachael Bruno
Graphics Advisor Charlie Higgens
Asst Arts & Living Matthew O'Rourke
Asst Arts & Living Chris Guzzara
Assistant News Julie O'Donnell
Assistant News Dan O'Brien
Assistant Photo Megan Brunner
Assistant Sports Jeff Howe

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts academic semester. The Collegian is independently funded, operating on advertising revenue. Founded in 1890, the paper began as Aggie Life. It became the College Signal in 1907, the Weekly Collegian in 1914 and the Daily Weekly Collegian in 1956. Publication first appeared 1967. The Collegian was 100% employee owned since January 1994. For advertising rates and information, call 545-3500 between 8:30 a.m. and 5:00 p.m.

Production Crew
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Meghan Heah

PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Megan Brunner

COPY EDITOR
Michael Bosack

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Samantha M. Nielsen

PRODUCTION STAFF
Nick Belanger, Tom Heslin

Grad students win park design contest

OLYMPICS from page 1

the axis of Beijing," says Tang, "the Forbidden City is to the north, and Forest Park is actually the gardens of the Olympic Park."

According to Tang and Zhang the groundwater issues that Beijing faces stem from urban landscapes that bypass water from the natural water system; the natural system would allow rain water to seep into the ground or return to the atmosphere to form clouds and rain. However, in Beijing the groundwater levels are at all time lows because of displaced run-off water taken out of the natural system through drainage systems.

The 2008 Olympic Games symbol.

The Forest Park Design incorporates lakes and streams that are central tenants of traditional Chinese garden designs with functional groundwater collection basins, which benefit the ecology and population of Beijing. "We're trying to keep the water in the ground rather than let it go into pipes," Zhang said.

"[Humans] have built layers of concrete between the Earth and the Sky, and we are trying to bring a balance back to the landscape," says Tang. Likewise, Zhang emphasizes the importance of the traditional Chinese garden in their "Forest Park" design.

"In parks of the United States, open is good but in China they like to block out areas. We want you walk into an area and see the details, not give an overview first," says Tang. To overcome this challenge Tang and Zhang have focused on winding streams with snaking gardens that connect to elevated footpaths that hover over wetlands brimming with long grasses.

Students scammed

HOAX from page 1

already signed up and paid the $32 fee. Others received the warning in time and escaped deception.

Krawiecki said she wonders why UMass did not take the same initiative.

"Who knows how many students received this invitation, regardless of whether or not they joined. The issue here is that UMass did not warn students of this hoax honor society like the other schools caught on," she said.

Vice Chancellor Gargano said he released a general warning on the issue of honor society legitimacy "probably through one of the monthly emails [sent] to students."

"This particular case dates back to over a year ago," said Gargano. "We are in the process of collaborating — myself, [Commonwealth College] Dean Slakey, and the provost — on a letter to students about honor societies. We will advise them to check periodically with the Association of College Honor Societies about the validity of these organizations."

Dubious information on the Web site pointed to the possibility of a scam, though many students failed to realize it. The society Web site claimed OSHS was accredited by the Outstanding Student Consortium agency. Both OSHS and OSC were listed under the same address in Sunnyvale, California. According to an article from Binghamton University, the address is not of an office, but just a mail drop. Aside from OSC, the society was not accredited by any other institution.

By law, the contact information of a website domain's registrar must be publicly available. According to whois.net, the OSHS Web site was created on Feb. 23, 2003, and registered under Simon Chan from California. However, registration information for the Web site has been recently changed and is now under Domains by Proxy, Inc., located in Arizona.

Attorney Charles DiMare from Student Legal Services advises UMass student who are victims of this hoax to contact the office.

"We can represent UMass students in consumer fraud cases. We can help coordinate a potential investigation or prosecution with the attorney general's office," said DiMare. Non-UMass students and UMass students who prefer) can directly contact the Consumer Fraud Division of the Common-wealth of Massachusetts Attorney General's office. DiMare suggests that if multiple students file one joint complaint, they may have a stronger case.

Three officials killed in bombing

By Chris Tomlinson
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — A roadside bomb killed three Iraqi National Guard troops Monday and officials said insurgents blew up an oil pipeline near Kirkuk and killed two senior police officers in Baghdad. Political leaders sized up their positions in a new government.

The three troops were killed by a bomb that detonated in Baqouba, 35 miles northeast of Baghdad, as their convoy passed, said Mudafar Al-Juburi of the Dyala police station. Three other soldiers were wounded, he added.

Insurgents near Kirkuk attacked the Al-Dibbis oilfield belonging to the North Oil Co., said Maj. Gen. Anwar Mohammad Amin. The pipeline supplied oil for domestic use and the damage will hamper production, he said.

It will take workers at least three days to extinguish the blaze and repair the pipeline, Amin said. Insurgents have regularly targeted Iraq's oil infrastructure, repeatedly cutting exports and denying the country much-needed reconstruction money.

In Baghdad, gunmen firing from a car killed two high-ranking policemen Sunday night, an Interior Ministry official said. Insurgents also fired six mortars at a police station in central Baghdad, injuring three, police said.

The al-Qaida affiliate in Iraq claimed responsibility for a number of attacks Sunday in statements posted on a militant Web site. But the claims could be independently verified.

The violence came after officials announced the results of Iraq's Jan. 30 elections.

A slate backed by Shiite Muslim clergy won 48 percent of the votes and 140 of the 275 National Assembly seats. A Kurdish ticket got 26 percent and 75 seats, while a secular Shiite party won 40 seats. Nine parties divided the remaining 20 seats.

"This is a new birth for Iraq," election commission spokesman Farid Ayar said, announcing results of the country's first free election in more than 50 years. Iraqi voters "became a legend in their confrontation with terrorists."

An Iraqi translator for Italian troops and his son were shot to death Sunday in the southern city of Nasiriyah, a spokesman for Italy's military said. The spokesman said officials were investigating and so far had no leads. The exact circumstances of the shooting were unclear.

The Iraqi militant group Ansar al-Sunnah Army claimed in an Internet statement Sunday it had kidnapped an Iraqi Christian translator who worked at a U.S. military base.

Former Prime Minister assassinated which groups the president, Cabinet ministers and military officials, also declared three days of national mourning.

BOMBING from page 1

Later in the day, the army command announced forces were put on maximum alert and that soldiers and officers were being recalled from vacation or leave. It also said troops were setting up checkpoints and patrolling the streets.

The official National News Agency said Hariri's funeral would be Wednesday in a mosque in Beirut.

President Emile Lahoud, a longtime rival of Hariri, called his killing "a dark point in our national history." He promised the assassins would be brought to justice.

There were no credible claims of responsibility. A previously unknown group, Support and Jihad in Syria and Lebanon, said in a video broadcast on Al-Jazeera television that it carried out the bombing, which it termed a suicide operation.

Security authorities raided the west Beirut home of Ahmed Abu Adas, a Palestinian they said appeared in the video but fled during the day. They confiscated computers, tapes and documents, the Interior Ministry said.

The midday blast tore through Hariri's motorcade a block from the famed Mediterranean-side corniche and was so powerful it left the bulletproof vehicles a burning, smoldering wreck. The explosion gouged a crater in the street 30 feet wide and 9 feet deep and shattered windows and twisted metal window frames at a nearby British bank and the landmark Phoenicia Hotel.

The Lebanon bomb killed many, including former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri. The bomb also killed 10 people and injured 100.

UMASS BASKETBALL
MEN'S BASKETBALL VS. FLORIDA STATE
Tuesday 7:00 pm
Big Y
FREE GAME DAY PROGRAM WITH YOUR BIG Y EXPRESS SAVINGS CLUB CARD

MASSACHUSETTS HOCKEY
FRIDAY @ 7 PM
ICE HOCKEY VS. BU
FREE WHITE OUT T-SHIRTS
1st 5,000 fans!!!
3rd Annual
WHITE OUT NIGHT
WHITE OUT THE TERRIERS!!!
FREE WHITE OUT T-SHIRTS
1st 5,000 fans!!!
sponsored by:
The Harp · howYOUdoin? · Your Campus Meal Plan · Rao's Coffee · Alumni Association · Mullins Center · The Zone sports radio 640 · Bueno Y Sano · Global Spectrum · Daily Hampshire Gazette · Kraft
STUDENT TICKETS FREE!!!

Regency Hair Stylists
~ Hair Cuts ~
Regular $20
Special $15
*Call for an appointment with
Marna or Megan
Mention this ad Monday through Thursday
253-9526
189 North Pleasant Street Amherst
Marna Megan

STSTRAVEL.COM
Join America's #1 Student Tour Operator
Cancun · Acapulco · Jamaica · Bahamas · Florida
Spring Break 2005
Sell Trips, Earn Cash & Travel Free
1-800-648-4849 www.ststravel.com

University of Massachusetts Amherst
New Students Program Summer Counselors
AMBASSADORS. LEADERS.
Not BIG on Sleep.
WE'RE HIRING for 2005 Summer Orientation
KEEP READING, IF YOU ARE.....
• a current undergraduate at UMass Amherst with a minimum GPA of a 2.5
• enthusiastic about UMass Amherst and ready to talk about it
• someone who looks forward to meeting new people
• familiar with the residential, academic, and social opportunities at the university
• involved in RSO's, intramurals, or other campus activities
• a person with high energy and high stamina - (if you need 8 hours of sleep, stop here)
STILL INTERESTED? CHECK OUT THE JOB BENEFITS.
• networking with parents in many areas of employment (think life after graduation).
• improved public speaking, time management, and communication skills.
• connections with faculty and staff members from across campus.
• $2874.00 in salary and health coverage.
• free room and board on campus during orientation
• campus employment options after orientation is over - or head to the beach
STILL READING? WE'D LIKE TO MEET YOU.
Feb. 18, 2005
http: www.umass.edu newstudent nsp employment.html

Infamous 'Baby 81' from Tsunami traced to family

By Kristian Francis
Associated Press

KALMUNAI, Sri Lanka — The 4-month-old boy dubbed "Baby 81" now has a name — Abilass — and a birth date — Oct. 19 — and two loving parents who can't wait to get him back.

Sri Lankan court, relying on DNA tests, ruled Monday that the baby recovered from tsunami debris belongs to the couple who launched an agonizing court battle to claim him.

"I am so happy, and I could have to thank God for giving us child back," the boy's [illegible] father, Murugupillai Jeyarajah, said after the ruling. "We've got the results for all our hardships."

"We're happy!" exclaimed the baby's mother, Jemila.

Eight other couples also tried to claim the boy in the days after the devastating Dec. 26 tsunami. Only the Jeyarajahs filed a formal claim, but they couldn't describe all the birth because their [illegible] and other possessions were lost when the killer waves battered Kalmunai. They said their baby was swept from his mother's arms.

Authorities ordered DNA tests on the boy after Sri Lanka's cabinet minister for Muslim affairs, Rauff Hakeem, visited the coastal town.

Kalmunai Judge M.P. Mohamed announced the results Monday and told them at a closed hearing with lawyers and then ordered the Jeyarajahs, hospital officials and the baby to come to court Wednesday so the child can be returned to his parents, said S.T.M. Manarudeen, an attorney for the couple.

The lawyer went to the house where the Jeyarajahs are staying temporarily to break the news, and was embraced by the baby's grieving father.

The couple had a private visit with the boy Monday night. The hospital has allowed them to be with the baby every day.

The Jeyarajahs say their son, named Mulass, was born Oct. 19.

The boy was found amid mud, debris and corpses after the waters receded, and was named Baby 81" because he was the 81st admission at the hospital the day the tsunami hit.

It has been a wrenching seven weeks for the Jeyarajahs. At one point, they barged into the Kalmunai hospital to try to reach the baby and were briefly detained after a scuffle with the staff. Then the father threatened to commit suicide unless the baby was given to them.

The court had originally ordered the hospital to give the couple temporary custody until the boy's parentage could be determined, but doctors refused, arguing he still required medical attention.

"If we were rich and of a higher social caste, the treatment would've been different," said Murugupillai Jeyarajah, a barber. But he quickly added: "At the same time, if it hadn't been for the doctors, we wouldn't have seen the baby alive."

The story of "Baby 81" was a rare bright spot in a catastrophe that killed at least 167,000 people in a dozen nations. 31,000 of them in Sri Lanka. Tens of thousands more are listed as missing.

The infamous baby known as "Baby 81" will reunite with his family Wednesday after a couple launched a widespread search for him. He was identified thanks to specific DNA testing in Sri Lanka.

Japanese student kills teacher

By Audrey McAvoy
Associated Press

TOKYO — A 17-year-old boy armed with a sashimi knife stabbed a teacher to death and wounded two other adults Monday at his former elementary school, then stood in the faculty lounge and smoked a cigarette with the bloody blade still in his hand.

No students were injured in the midafternoon attack, the latest in a series of rampages in Japan involving knives and children.

Police said the teen, who refused to talk after his arrest, used the 8-inch knife usually reserved for cutting raw fish. Such blades are extremely sharp and are normally only accessible to trained chefs.

Terrified teachers watched the boy from the edges of the faculty room where he was found, as he held the knife in one hand and a cigarette in the other, said a police spokesman, Isao Noda.

The attack panicked the 600 students and 30 teachers at the public school in Neyagawa City just outside Osaka in western Japan. TV video showed small children, guided by adults, running from school buildings.

"I couldn't believe it," principal Hirokazu Sakane said at a news conference. "It is unforgivable. It is especially mortifying that a staff member lost his life."

Police did not release the boy's name because he is a minor, but Hirokazu Kashiyama, an official with the local board of education, said he was a graduate of the school.

Mitsuaki Kamozaki, a 52-year-old teacher, was fatally stabbed in the back. A 57-year-old female instructor had deep knife wounds in her stomach and a 45-year-old school nutritionist was also treated for serious injuries.

Television station FBS reported that the boy, when younger, had written that his dream was to become a video game creator or game magazine editor when he grew up.

Japanese media reported that he started skipping class in elementary school and had dropped out by junior high. Local board of education officials did not have information on his attendance record.

Though violent crime is relatively rare in Japan, juvenile delinquency is on the rise, according to police statistics. In 2002, the government lowered the age for which juveniles can be prosecuted as criminals to 14 from 16.

Last June, an 11-year-old schoolgirl stunned the country when she murdered her sixth-grade classmate by slashing her with a box-cutter at lunchtime. The girl later said a spat over the Internet provoked her to kill her 12-year-old friend.

The stabbings Monday took place just a few towns away from the scene of Japan's most deadly classroom attack in recent memory, when a man with a history of mental illness burst into an elementary school near Osaka and began slashing children in 2001.

The killer, Mamoru Takuma, was executed in September.

That attack, which killed eight children and injured more than a dozen others, led to calls for better school security.

U.S. Education Secretary urges universities to adopt Bush's law

By Justin Pope
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Colleges should better measure and report their students' progress, Education Secretary Margaret Spellings said Monday, urging university presidents to adopt the spirit of President Bush's No Child Left Behind law regarding elementary and high school students.

Spellings did not suggest that a higher education equivalent of the controversial 2001 law is in the offing — a prospect that would alarm college officials.

But in her first speech on higher education since joining Bush's Cabinet, she told the American Council on Education that the federal government provides one-third of higher education revenues — compared to one-tenth for the K-12 system — and said taxpayers are entitled to the kind of accountability NCLB had provided for primary education funding.

She called on states and universities to use NCLB "as a model as you work to close your own achievement gap" in her address to the American Council on Education's annual meeting.

That gap was illustrated by the release Monday of ACT's annual report on minorities, which showed minority enrollment had grown by 1.3 million students, or 52 percent, between 1991 and 2001. The participation rates of blacks (40 percent) and Hispanics (34 percent) still trail that of whites (45 percent).

NCLB, which requires annual testing in grades three through eight in reading and math, has helped give educators data they need to identify students in danger of falling through the cracks, Spellings said. Better data could do the same for higher ed, she said.

Higher education leaders said they were confident Spellings understood that K-12 and higher education face different challenges that require different solutions.

"I think to the degree she wants accountability, it would be done in a much more nuanced way," said David Ward, president of ACE.

Still, the prospect of more aggressive federal oversight is an difficult subject for college leaders, who have complained at the conference here that scarce federal funds for research and financial aid are increasingly coming with strings attached.

They are also concerned about President Bush's budget proposal, a subject that comprised a major portion of Spellings' remarks. The proposal calls for an increase in the maximum Pell Grant award of $100 each of the next five years, to a total of $4,550, but also cuts other federal student support programs.

Congratulations to the World Champion
New England Patriots
We won the wager...
Let's continue to celebrate and enjoy a feast on UPenn!
• Philly Cheese Steaks
• Pork Roll
• Soft Pretzels
• Tastykakes
Also enjoy a chance to win a Patriots Super Bowl Kit
Thursday, Feb. 17th
5-8 pm in all DC's
Dining Services

CELEBRATING THE NEW YEAR!
JOIN IN THE FUN AND FESTIVITIES
Dragon Dance and Lucky Money
for the first 50 customers at each DC
Wonton Soup · Suckling Pig · Peking Duck · Longevity Noodles · Spring Rolls
Fried & Steamed Rice · Sweet and Sour Shrimp · Sweet & Sour Tofu
General Tso's Chicken · Fortune Cookies · Almond Cookies · Almond Jelly · Green Tea
Residential YCMP
February 16th
From 5-8pm in all DCs
Chinese New Year

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 2005

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." -Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

A person's right to smoke

Matthew Reid

Let me start off by saying how opposed I am to smoking. I hate the smell. I hate how the smell gets on your clothes, and I hate the whole concept of smoking in general. It's baffling to me how much money people will spend on cigarettes.

With that said, I think that people have every right to smoke in the privacy of their own homes.

Howard Weyers, President of Weyco Inc., feels differently. The medical-benefits administration company in Okemos, Mich. went smoke-free last month, requiring all employees to take breathalyzer tests to ensure that they weren't lighting up. Four employees refused the test, and were promptly fired.

The company said that it has the best interest of the employees in mind.

Forgive me, but I fail to see how firing someone is in their best interest.

I'm not arguing that smoking can lead to heart disease, emphysema, lung cancer and other healt'i-related problems, but the fact that Weyco has singled out smokers doesn't make a whole lot of sense to me.

The company also says that it is trying to lower health care costs by not employing smokers. Does this mean the company can fire people for having lousy diets? What about people who participate in extreme sports? Fatty foods and skydiving may not kill as many people as tobacco, but where do you draw the line, and who should be allowed to draw the line in the first place?

I'm not arguing that smoking can lead to heart disease, emphysema, lung cancer and other health-related problems, but the fact that Weyco has singled out smokers doesn't make a whole lot of sense to me.

State Sen. Virg Bernero (D-Mich.) is working on a bill that would prevent Michigan employers from using anti-smoking policies to fire or fail to hire workers who smoke. Sen. Bernero is not an advocate of smoking, but is an advocate or a person's right to privacy. The term "equal opportunity employer" applies to gender, sexual orientation, race, age, religion, disability and nationality, and "doing things in your own home that are your own business" should be on the list as well.

The exception would be if smoking deters from a person's ability to do their job. A few years ago a police officer in Fall River was fired when his boss learned he was a smoker (state law prohibits police officers from using tobacco products, whether they are on duty or not, due to the detrimental effects of smoking on physical ability). I agree with a law banning cops from smoking. However, as much as I may be opposed to the act itself, smoking is still legal, even for workers of a Michigan medical-benefits administration.

I am reminded of a conversation that repeatedly comes up between two people I work with back home. My hometown is currently in a debate over the smoking rights of individuals in certain "private establishments." These establishments are not business offices, but rather places where people go to socialize.

One of my coworkers, who happens to be a non-smoker, feels that smoking should be allowed, because the people who frequent the clubs pay membership dues and have a right to do what they want inside of the club's walls. A fellow co-worker disagrees, saying that smoking is harmful not only to the smoker, but to the other people in the room as well (this person happens to be a smoker).

I realize that the situation doesn't exactly parallel the situation at Weyco, but it does bring up an interesting and important point — this is not about smoking. The fact that a smoker thinks smoking at the clubs should be banned, and a non-smoker feels smoking should be allowed, proves that this issue goes beyond how someone feels about smoking. The issue is one of privacy and discrimination. I'm not saying discrimination against smokers is anything like other more blatant types of discrimination, but it is discrimination nonetheless.

Weyers, in a column he wrote for USA Today defending his company's position, said that people against his policy are not "facing the dangerous realities of smoking." He goes on to say that his plan is "not about what people do at home ... it's about the acceptance of personal responsibility by people we choose to employ." It doesn't seem like a "personal" responsibility to me. If a boss is monitoring someone's every move and punishing people for not meeting their own expectations.

The headline of Weyers' USA Today column was, "Smoking is not a civil right." Excuse me, Mr. Weyers, but not smoking isn't exactly a person's civic responsibility, like you seem to think it is. The truth is, many smokers may very well "face the dangerous realities of smoking," as you put it, and still choose to smoke. It's their decision.

I don't like smoking any more than Mr. Weyers does, but it's not illegal and employers can't pretend as though it is. I would love to see the government prohibit smoking completely, but that's never going to happen, not as long as Big Tobacco keeps profiting from its global empire. Maybe some day the right system will be in place for smoking to stop completely, but that day is not now. Weyco Inc. would argue that they are doing their small part in the fight against smoking, and that's all well and good, but people, even smokers, have rights to privacy.

Matthew Reid is a Collegian columnist.

The boundaries of free speech

Zach Oelschlegel

Last spring, I wrote a column entitled "Having a Right to Racism," making the point that the right of free speech applies not only to what the comics on IBO can say, but also to the Klan member down the street. For instance, I've found that often times, people will cry foul over their First Amendment rights and at the same time praise Germany for making hate speech illegal, which doesn't make much sense.

Here at UMass, the topic of free speech has made a comeback yet again, as Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Michael Gargano and Chancellor John Lombardi made significant changes to the university picketing code. The new rule states that "disruptive picketing" is in violation of the code, with the possibility of expulsion as the penalty. The student group Take Back UMass, the SGA and the American Civil Liberties Union aren't happy — with good reason.

However unlikely the possibility of the administration actually punishing a student for something so trivial isn't the point, but the fact that the administration could, technically speaking, choose to do so is particularly bothersome.

The entire matter comes down to where the line on free speech must be drawn. Our two chancellors dropped the ball in how incredibly vague the language of the code is in what a protestor can or cannot do. The new code does not allow for something inside buildings that is disruptive. Bill Newman, an ACLU representative, was dead on when he said disruptive behavior could be viewed as "a button, a pin or a sign — any of these can be demonstrations."

However unlikely the possibility of the administration actually punishing a student for something so trivial isn't the point, but the fact that the administration could, technically speaking, choose to do so is particularly bothersome. The language of the whole code must be changed to ensure students know what they are allowed to do under the code.

However, after that point was made, Newman went on to say that "all students have the right to demonstrate on university premises," which, if he truly believes that, must make him one of Massachusetts' worst lawyers. Others have tried to paint the picture that because UMass is a state organization (making it public property), it allows the right for students to do essentially as they please on those properties. The idea is completely ludicrous, and here's why.

Being an out-of-state student, my tuition costs for the entire year total more than $24,000. The reason I am here is to learn, so in essence I am paying about $50 an hour to attend class. Therefore, when 50 students with an agenda come into my class, all of which are on the same "university premises" Newman spoke of, and make it their business to ensure I know Michael Gargano is the Antichrist, they are stealing from me. By disrupting my class and preventing my professor from teaching me something, they have completely robbed me of my tuition money.

The ACLU doesn't mean to tell me that students are free to pilfer my money and disrupt my class because it is held on university premises, does it? If the ACLU really feels that way, I'd invite them to see how far they'd get trying to demonstrate inside a state owned police station.

A right to free speech does not entitle one to be a jackass. You have the right to free speech to the point where it does not infringe on someone else's right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. The freedom of my fist to swing stops just short of where your nose begins. The argument that you are allowed to be disruptive because then it will get everyone's attention is extremely flawed.

Thankfully, from who I've talked to, it seems the SGA gets this, and will work to make sure when the picketing code is revised again, classrooms will be off limits. Other parameters that must be set are what students should be allowed to do once inside Whitmore. Should students have the right to stop members of the administration from getting their jobs done, or are those employees at the will of the student body, since it is the students they are working for? Do students really have the right to be as loud and demonstrative as they want to once inside Whitmore? There is a lot of gray area here that is up to discretion.

Realistically speaking, both sides need to find some sort of compromise. Originally, the new code said that you were not allowed to even enter a UMass building if picketing was your agenda, and that was changed due to it blatantly infringing on a student's rights. The ACLU was actually correct that time. Students should be allowed to peaceably assemble, which is what this code has allowed, but they must accept the fact that First Amendment rights are not rights to idiocy. I'm glad that I have people standing up for my rights, but sometimes all I want to do is just go to class.

Zach Oelschlegel is a Collegian columnist.

Torture and the American way

Mike Sances

The story of Maher Arar is one that rightfully inspires terror in us all. A Canadian citizen, Arar was detained and questioned by American authorities while changing planes at New York's John F. Kennedy Airport back in September of 2002. Two weeks later, Arar was hooded, shackled and shipped to Syria in a private jet, where he was subsequently tortured and starved for several months, treatment that continued long after he confessed to training at al Qaeda camps in Afghanistan.

But as it turned out, the authorities had made a mistake: he wasn't a terrorist after all. A year later, Arar was released and cleared of all wrongdoing; he is now suing the U.S. government. Yet Arar's story is only one of many. In fact, according to Jane Mayer, writing in the Feb. 14 edition of the New Yorker, the practice of "extraordinary rendition" — or "outsourcing torture" as Mayer's title bluntly de-euphemizes the phrase — has long been tacit U.S. policy, even before Sept. 11. Since 2001, according to several intelligence officials quoted in Mayer's piece, the Bush administration has allowed rendition to get "out of control."

Besides the obvious, one major problem with the runaway policy is that it leaves the government with the question of what to do with the "rendered" suspects once they have outlived their intelligence value. They can't release them, or try them in court, because the revelations of systematic abuse would be too much of an embarrassment. They can't simply kill them, either. You torture it, you bought it.

Perhaps that's why, as the Washington Post reported back in January, the Pentagon is set to construct a global network of Guantanamo-style camps, to be situated in the homes of "friendly" human rights violators strewn across the Middle East, and where the exhausted prisoners will be housed until the Global War on Terrorism has been terminated.

Well, as you might expect, I happen to have a better solution. build the detention centers here in the United States. While it might not solve the torture halve of the equation, it will ensure economic growth and thousands, perhaps even millions of new jobs by setting up such camps here at home the government. There is no reason we should be closing torture chambers here at home and opening them in the Middle East.

If some of you are still under the impression that torture is not the American way, then you've obviously failed to adjust to the new era we're living in.

Every student at this school is scared to death of the increasingly tight job market in this country. At the same time, the wave of volunteerism and generosity left over from Sept. 11 remains largely unsatisfied. Our generation wants employment, and we want to make a difference. What better way to solve both of these problems then by enlisting to light on the intelligence front of the War on Terrorism, especially since the Sept. 11 Commission so recently informed us that information will be the key factor in winning this fight. And peaceniks rejoice! Such a bold and extensive interrogation system may very well reduce the need for conventional warfare.

If you're the squeamish type, fear not; not everyone employed at these hypothetical camps would actually be engaging in torture. The facilities would need an entire infrastructure — guards, desk clerks, janitors, technicians and even psychologists — that would in fact provide the bulk of the employment opportunities.

If some of you are still under the impression that torture is not the American way, then you've obviously failed to adjust to the new era we're living in. Having torture camps in your own backyards, perhaps even working in them yourselves, should ease this transition for you. After all, as the vice president put it shortly after the Sept. 11 attacks, the Global War on Terror is "a mean, nasty, dangerous, dirty business. We have to operate in that arena."

Furthermore, by openly embracing a policy of torture, we will have eliminated the contradiction and indeed hypocrisy inherent in the image we project toward the rest of the world. As an Arab League spokesman said in the wake of the Abu Ghraib scandal, torture under Hussein was expected; the fact that Americans would engage in torture while giving lip service to freedom and democracy was "an irony that to my taste is very sickening." (After all, even if you hate murderous tyrants like Hussein, at least you know where they stand.) Here's our chance to rid ourselves of this sickening irony once and for all.

It is inconceivable that the U.S. government will be halting its policy of rendition any time soon. As one of the author's of the famous "torture memos" has been putting it in recent weeks, "the public has had its referendum." Torture isn't going anywhere; the best we can hope for as students is to accommodate ourselves to this new reality as honestly as we can.

Mike Sances is a Collegian columnist.

Disarmament through diplomacy

Yousef Munayyer

A superpower, which is exercising its influence all over the world, supports a client state in another hemisphere where it is not welcome. Small, but bothersome, that client state, armed with nuclear weapons, poses a threat to all other states in the region. When it becomes apparent that other powers in the region are armed with nuclear weapons as well, tensions increase and the situation is elevated to a crisis.

If this sounds familiar, it is probably because I just described the beginnings of the Cuban missile crisis of the early '60s. Yet, that is not what I am referring to. This is a description of a modern day developing crisis; a nuclear Iran.

Perhaps some are confused by the comparison. In 1959 a revolution in Cuba brought Fidel Castro to power presenting the first serious Marxist presence in the Western hemisphere since the onset of the Cold War. After an unsuccessful American-backed Bay of Pigs operation Castro moved into the Soviet sphere of influence for good.

So how does Cuba, an island in the Caribbean, have anything at all to do with Iran? The answer lies in the Negev desert at a location secured by several military perimeters where Israel makes its weapons of mass destruction.

By 1962 American U-2 spy plans had photographed evidence of Soviet military build-up on Cuban soil and the speculation of a nuclear Cuba sent shockwaves into security policy circles. Only 90 miles from the American coast, soviet medium range ballistic missiles where now capable of reaching many major American cities in very short periods of time.

The possibility of placing missiles in Cuba made the soviets salivate. American nuclear weapons, located in eastern Turkey facing the soviet "soft underbelly", had been in range to hit the U.S.S.R.'s largest cities. Oct. 1962 would prove to be the most nerve-wrecking month in modern American history.

So how does Cuba, an island in the Caribbean, have anything at all to do with Iran? The answer lies in the Negev desert at a location secured by several military perimeters where Israel makes its weapons of mass destruction.

Israel, like any nation with a guilty conscience, understood the necessity to acquire nuclear weapons for its protection. In fact, the development of Israel's nuclear facility was being monitored by the Eisenhower administration, at a period in American foreign policy when special interest and lobbyists did not supersede national security issues as much as they do today.

The Kennedy administration did not follow up, to say the least. It wouldn't be until years later, in the '80s, when the world would truly hear of Israel's nuclear capabilities. Mordechai Vanunu, a former technician at the Dimona nuclear facility in the Negev desert, blew the whistle and informed the public about the real weapons of mass destruction in the Middle East. For this he served a lengthy prison sentence, much of which in solitary confinement, and the world is indebted to him for having enough of a conscience to expose Israel's nuclear secret.

Technology has now made aerial photographs of Israel's nuclear facilities available for everyone to see on the Internet. While aerial photographs of Iraq, Iran and North Korea are as sharp as they can be, aerial photographs of Israel in such high resolution are not available. The reason for this is actually U.S. law.

The Kyl-Bingaman amendment to the National Defense Authorization Act prohibits the publication of aerial photographs of Israel that are of a higher resolution then what is routinely commercially available in the world market. Israel is the only country which receives such protection under U.S. law.

Israel has also displayed a history of preemptive attacks when it feels threatened both in the war of 1967 and in the bombing of an Iraqi nuclear facility in 1981. It is with these facts in mind that Iran seeks nuclear weapons. The threats to Iran are not coming from neighboring Pakistan nor are they coming from the former Soviet Union. Iran perceives a threat, in the same way the United States did in 1962, when nuclear weapons were in a Soviet client state next door.

There is a diplomatic way to make sure Iran does not turn nuclear. It would entail enforcing the United Nations resolution which established the cease fire in the first gulf war. U.N. Security Council resolution 687 calls for making the Middle East a zone free of weapons of mass destruction. Yet this cannot be done until Israel is forced to give up its nuclear weapons.

The U.S. removed its missiles from Turkey as part of the deal that ended the Cuban Missile Crisis and now it has a chance to use its diplomatic sway on Israel so that Iran would have no reason to be paranoid. The only question now is if the United States is willing to do so. Then again that would entail Israel being a client state of the U.S.A. and not the other way around.

In my column last week I incorrectly identified a victim of the Israel occupation mentioned in the New York Times as Ghadir Mukhaimar. The victims name was Nuran Deeb. Both were 10 year-old schoolgirls shot in Gaza only months apart. May they both rest in peace.

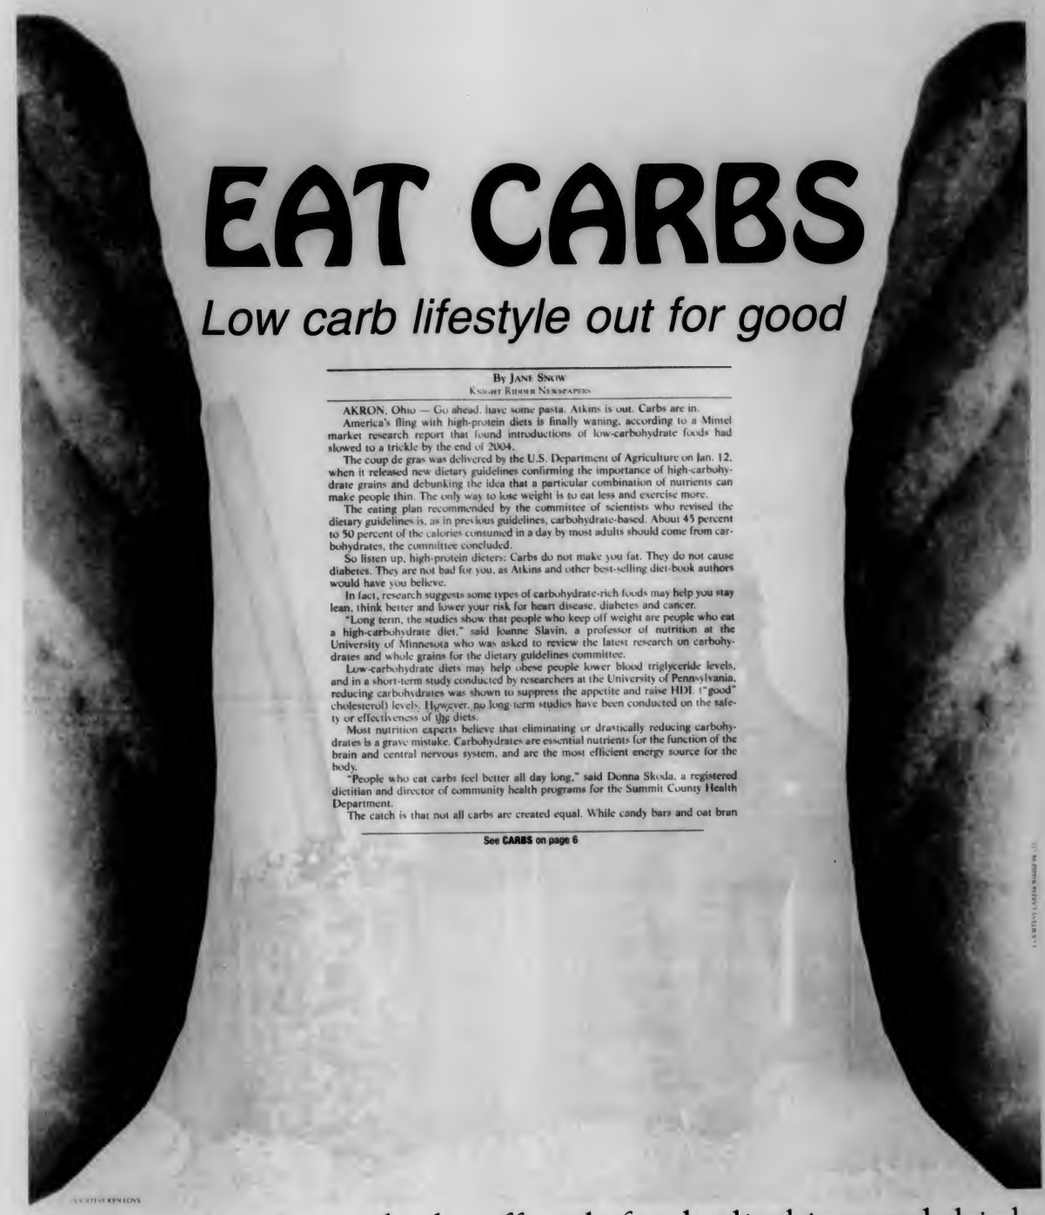
Yousef Munayyer is a Collegian editor.



CHECK OUT THE COLLEGIAN ONLINE AT...
WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 2005

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

COURTESY KEN LOVE

EAT CARBS

Low carb lifestyle out for good

By Jane Snow
Knight Ridder Newspapers

AKRON, Ohio — Go ahead, have some pasta. Atkins is out. Carbs are in.

America's fling with high-protein diets is finally waning, according to a Mintel market research report that found introductions of low-carbohydrate foods had slowed to a trickle by the end of 2004.

The coup de gras was delivered by the U.S. Department of Agriculture on Jan. 12, when it released new dietary guidelines confirming the importance of high-carbohydrate grains and debunking the idea that a particular combination of nutrients can make people thin. The only way to lose weight is to eat less and exercise more.

The eating plan recommended by the committee of scientists who revised the dietary guidelines is, as in previous guidelines, carbohydrate-based. About 45 percent to 50 percent of the calories consumed in a day by most adults should come from carbohydrates, the committee concluded.

So listen up, high-protein dieters: Carbs do not make you fat. They do not cause diabetes. They are not bad for you, as Atkins and other best-selling diet-book authors would have you believe.

In fact, research suggests some types of carbohydrate-rich foods may help you stay lean, think better and lower your risk for heart disease, diabetes and cancer.

"Long term, the studies show that people who keep off weight are people who eat a high-carbohydrate diet," said Joanne Slavin, a professor of nutrition at the University of Minnesota who was asked to review the latest research on carbohydrates and whole grains for the dietary guidelines committee.

Low-carbohydrate diets may help obese people lower blood triglyceride levels, and in a short-term study conducted by researchers at the University of Pennsylvania, reducing carbohydrates was shown to suppress the appetite and raise HDL ("good" cholesterol) levels. However, no long-term studies have been conducted on the safety or effectiveness of the diets.

Most nutrition experts believe that eliminating or drastically reducing carbohydrates is a grave mistake. Carbohydrates are essential nutrients for the function of the brain and central nervous system, and are the most efficient energy source for the body.

"People who eat carbs feel better all day long," said Donna Skoda, a registered dietitian and director of community health programs for the Summit County Health Department.

The catch is that not all carbs are created equal. While candy bars and oat bran

See CARBS on page 6

Discover Your Lover kicks off with food, climbing and drinks

By Hannah Drake
Collegian Staff

Tonight two University of Massachusetts singles will have the wining, dining and climbing blind date experience of a lifetime, as Discover Your Lover, the Massachusetts Daily Collegian's dating game, officially kicks off.

The two strangers, paired online by Collegian readers, will be rock climbing, getting a bite to eat and going out for drinks as part of the first of three Discover Your Lover blind dates. The three males and three females, chosen from a pool of applicants who signed up in the Campus Center to participate, were photographed and profiled in last week's issues of the Collegian and readers were then asked to vote online and decide who should date whom.

The first stop on Date Number 1 will be climbing on Northampton Athletic Club's 40-foot textured climbing wall, with boasts 23 climbing stations and a cave.

Rock wall manager and climbing enthusiast Pete Ward said that it's a "little more daring" than the typical first date.

"It's an unbelievable, shockingly cool thing to do," Ward said.

"The whole point [of rock climbing] is to learn something new about yourself. It's challenging and sometimes scary for people. It puts you out of your comfort zone, and people don't always want to learn new things about themselves on a first date," he explained, which can make it a risky first date idea.

Northampton Athletic Club, located at 306 King Street in Northampton and accessible via the PVTA bus line, was voted the Valley's Best Health and Fitness Center in 2004. With 2200 members, it offers yoga, massage, tanning, basketball, free-weight and cardio equipment, aerobic classes, childcare and fitness assessments. The club also has top-rated personal trainers, sauna and steam rooms, and a juice bar and café.

"We get a lot of college kids. It's super social and great if you want to be active, but you don't want to be trudging around in the cold," Ward said.

After working up a sweat during the hour-long climb, the two will be taken to their homes to shower before part two of their three-part date. Later that night, the date gets more romantic as they head to Amherst's La Cucina di Pinocchio (located at 30 Boltwood Walk) for some New American cuisine.

Bartender and manager Kerry Valentine recommends either the shrimp artichoke scampi or the portabella mushroom for an appetizer. The entrée?

"The best meal, and our most popular meal, is the lobster fettuccini," said Valentine.

For dessert, Valentine recommends either the creme Brule, the tiramisu or the cannolis.

"They're all home made. They're all really good," she said.

"We have great food and great

See LOVER on page 6

MEGAN FRIESTAD/COLLEGIAN

Rock climbing at the Northampton Athletic Club is one of the activities that are slated for the three dates that are featured in the Daily Collegian's Discover Your Lover dating game contest.

A nation of reality television junkies

Reality TV

Michael Busack

Though this may be the first time anyone has ever admitted it, Ashford and Simpson were right. "Ain't nothing like the real thing baby."

Yes, my mind has been made up: reality television producers have crossed the line with their recent plans to create a television show dedicated to find the next Janis Ioplin. Correct me if I am wrong, but the appeal of the legendary Joplin was found in her originality. In soothe, this is a disgrace to the legacy of Ms. Joplin.

However, this marks a new trend in television, movies, and music: an absolute lack of originality. Where are our generation's cultural leaders? Reality television shows with a contest concept are a perfect example of just how packaged Ameri-cans are willing to accept our culture.

People are starting to all together lose their sense of "reality" because of these shows. Ironic isn't it? A bus driver in Buena Vista, Pa., in a sheer moment of utter brilliance, asked the young students on her bus to throw things and jump around the vehicle last week. Why you might ask? The woman was videotaping the raucous, so that she could submit an audition tape to be considered for the hit reality television show "Survivor".

The woman, Maureen Monaghan, has been charged with recklessly endangering children. She is lucky their isn't a law that reprimands people for being incredibly stupid. I'm afraid they would throw away the key for this genius.

Thousands of young businessmen and women also lined up to audition for the new seasons of "The Apprentice". While there will be two "Apprentice" shows this time around, Donald Trump is not going to be the only egotistical business guru. Martha Stewart, queen of pastry, master of the thread count and prisoner #10919445, will also be hosting a version of the show. It promises a stiff business sense and a great apple-rhubarb pie with a honey cinnamon glazed crust.

So, this is America. We have come to expect celebrities to defy our every prediction, and Martha Stewart is not an exception. What I do think is crazy, however, is that fact that a small number of people get selected for this show, out of thousands of applicants. The problem I have with this is that this means that thousands of business men and woman are actually taking the day off from work to try out for a television show that will most likely humiliate them in front of the entire nation. Do other cultures waste their time with this?

Don't worry though, if you think America has got it all wrong, you won't believe what England has been up to. The famed controversial channel 4 broadcasted in England, is planning on broadcasting their first ever exorcism, Anglican priest and all. The planned de-devilling has allegedly caused a stir in the U.K.. The young man who is the focus of the show, says he feels possessed. I smell a spin off. Here is what you do: take the possessed one, put him on the "Surreal Life," bring back Tammy Faye Baker and she can show him what is up. Honestly, would anyone be that shocked?

What ever happened to the days when you could think of "60 Minutes" as a reality show? I know, there is a distinct difference between a news show and "Who Wants to Marry a Millionaire," but that's the thing: it hasn't always been that way. With the introduction of more and more of these reality shows, with such ridiculous plots, we are starting to lose a sense of American television culture.

I love shows like "American Idol", I do, and there are many other great reality shows out there that I think are perfectly reasonable, but what happened to the American sitcom? If you look back 10 years ago, to the days of "Friends", "Seinfeld" and "Frasier", the American sitcom was highly regarded, innovative and funny. It was a breeding ground for the actors of the future.

Today we still have many great sitcoms, but they are fighting a losing battle against the overwhelming amount of reality crap. I sincerely hope that 20 years from now, our kids don't look back at our generation and wonder, as I do, what makes people tune in to "Extreme Makeover" and not "Everybody Loves Raymond."

That's enough rant for this week. Stay tuned.

Michael Busack is a Collegian editor.

Most successful fad diet in history may soon fade to make way for carbohydrates are both high-carbohydrate foods, they are not equally nutritious. Figuring out which carbs to eat and which to pass up can be confusing.

CARBS from page 5

A theory popularized by some diet books is that eliminating carbohydrates that have a high glycemic rating will help curb hunger and help people lose weight.

The glycemic index rates carbohydrate-rich foods on how quickly they raise blood sugar levels. When blood sugar spikes, the pancreas releases insulin to corral the glucose and store it in the cells, where it eventually becomes fat if more calories are consumed than are expended.

The glycemic index may be a valuable tool for diabetics, but research is still in the early stages, Slavin said. There is no evidence that eating high-glycemic foods causes people to gain weight, she said. Any food eaten in excess, whether it's a steak or a bowl of pasta, will be stored in the body as fat.

"People want a way to evaluate carbohydrates, which is why the glycemic index diet is popular," Slavin said. "Do not use the glycemic index to improve your diet, because you're not going to improve it."

Slavin pointed out that Frosted Flakes have a lower glycemic score than regular corn flakes, but that doesn't mean they're more nutritious.

High-glycemic foods do not cause adult-onset diabetes, either, as some diet books claim. Obesity, not carbohydrates, causes adult-onset diabetes, Skoda said.

If the glycemic index is no help in sorting out carbohydrates, what about the standard categories of simple and complex carbohydrates? These categories can help untangle some of the confusion but not all of it.

Simple carbohydrates are found in candy, cakes, soda pop and other sugary foods. These carbohydrates are made up of just two or three molecules, and are easily converted to glucose by the body. Glucose is what the muscles use for energy.

Most complex carbohydrates take longer for the body to convert to glucose, so they make you feel full longer. They are found in such foods as bread, pasta, potatoes and beans.

Not all simple carbs are bad, though, nor are all complex carbs good. Such nutritious foods as fruits, some vegetables and milk technically are simple carbohydrates. And white bread is a complex carbohydrate, although it provides a fraction of the nutrition of whole-grain bread.

A better way to choose carbohydrates is by whether the foods are whole or processed, Slavin suggested. People should go for whole-grain breads, brown rice, whole-grain cereals, fresh or frozen vegetables and whole fruits. These foods are high in fiber, vitamins and minerals.

The new dietary guidelines recommend that at least 3 ounces of grains, or half of a day's recommended intake of six to 11 servings, be whole grains. A slice of bread is about one ounce.

Whole-grain foods have significantly more fiber than refined grains. A one-half cup serving of brown rice has 3.4 grams of fiber compared to 0.1 gram in a serving of white rice, for example. A high-fiber diet may help prevent heart disease, diabetes and certain cancers.

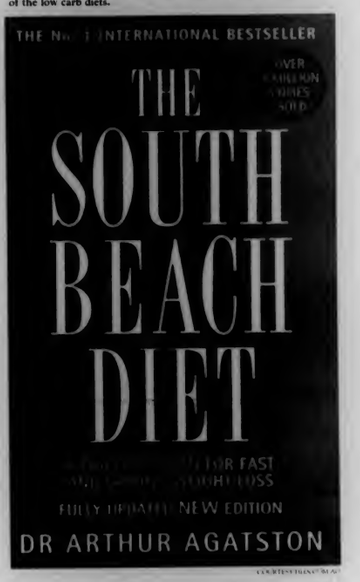
"The risk of coronary artery disease has been shown to be reduced by about 26 percent with regular consumption of whole grains," Skoda said.

Researchers also have evidence that a high-fiber diet can help prevent breast and colon cancers, and possibly cancer of the pancreas, stomach, rectum, uterus, mouth, throat, liver and thyroid, Skoda said.

To reap the health benefits, the National Cancer Institute recommends consuming 20 to 30 grams or more of fiber a day. Meat, the mainstay of high-protein diets, contains no fiber.

Shoppers will soon have an easier time identifying whole-grain foods in stores. Beginning this week, products rich in whole grains will be allowed to carry a whole-grain stamp designed by Oldways Preservation Trust in partnership with grain-food manufacturers. Oldways, a nonprofit Boston food issues think tank, campaigned for a prominent stamp for whole grains in the new dietary guidelines, Oldways president Dun Gifford said.

The stamps will designate whether a product contains 100 percent whole grains, is an excellent source of whole grains (16 grams per serving) or a good source (8 grams).



Gifford predicts that a flood of new whole-grain products will hit the market in the wake of the new dietary guidelines.

"There will be double or triple the number of products on the shelves that are whole grain," Gifford said.

Eating healthfully is about to get a whole lot easier.

Doctor Robert Atkins, shown above, is famous for bringing the low carb diet to the forefront of American health and fitness. The South Beach Diet, shown below, was made famous by cardiologist Arthur Agatson. It uses the glycemic index to create another version of the low carb diets.

Lovers unite under rock wall

LOVER from page 5

drinks. It's absolutely date-friendly," said Valentine.

"It's a pretty relaxing atmosphere. You can come in and just drink. We make great martinis. I'm a little bias though, because I make them," Valentine added.

Following dinner, the couple will go to The Moan and Dove, (at 460 West Street) in South Amherst, for drinks.

A patron review on pubcrawler.com described the Moan and Dove as "small in size, but big in selection and quality," and "the only serious beer bar in western Mass."

According to Ward, a friend of the owner, it's "ridiculously classy."

"It's like the ultimate beer snob joint in the world," Ward explained. "If you have any interest in learning about beer, the people who work there are absolute beer experts. They're stunningly knowledgeable about it," he added.

Northampton Athletic Club is open weekdays from 4:30 a.m. to 10 p.m., Saturdays and Sundays 7 a.m. to 7 p.m. Students get a 10 percent discount. College Climbing Night is from five to 10 p.m. on the first and third Monday of every month, with prices at almost 50 percent off the normal charge. Information is available at nohoac.com.

Pinocchio's recommends reservations, and is open for lunch Mondays through Saturdays from 11:30-2 p.m. Dinner is offered 5 p.m. to 9 p.m. Mondays through Thursdays and 5 p.m. to 10 p.m. Fridays through Sundays. The lunch and dinner menus are available at pinocchiosamherst.com.

The Moan and Dove is open from 3 p.m. to 1 a.m. on weekdays and 1 p.m. to 1 a.m. on Saturday and Sunday. Their menu is available at themoanandove.com

MAKE $12/HR PLAYING POKER
In just a few days we will be adding poker to our stable of skill games and for an extremely limited time we're looking for a VERY SELECT FEW to join us right at the start. Yes, we will PAY YOU to play poker, as well as giving you a chance at other offers "regular" players will never see.
For more information: www.gamesgrid.com/mas
GamesGrid Poker
Make your best play.

Need big ideas for ADVERTISING?
The Massachusetts Daily Collegian reaches over 14,000 people everyday.
WHAT A GREAT IDEA!
Call 545-3500 and advertise with us!

NHL too boring to last

By Jim Litke
Associated Press

It wasn't as if the NHL was having such a great season to begin with.

So there's that consolation if league boss Gary Bettman pulls the plug on this one, expected to happen Wednesday barring any last-minute settlement.

Think about it: If the commissioner hadn't come up with that nifty lockout maneuver when he did, and the season went ahead as usual, chances are the three biggest stories at this juncture would have all been public-relations disasters. They would have played out in courtrooms and offices instead of ice rinks, and dragged the attention of most casual fans along with them.

Those stories, in rough chronological order, would have been: Former St. Louis goon Mike Danton being sentenced last November to 7 1/2 years in prison for trying to have his agent killed; Vancouver thug Todd Bertuzzi petitioning Bettman last month for reinstatement after he viciously blindsided Colorado forward Steve Moore; and Atlanta's Dany Heatley being sentenced last week to three years' probation after pleading guilty to second-degree vehicular homicide in the death of teammate Dan Snyder.

That's the problem with the NHL. Pro hockey can be exhilarating, but hasn't been for a while, and the only time it makes the front of the sports pages anymore is when someone or something goes terribly awry.

Now some people will argue that even bad press is better than being ignored, which is essentially where the pro game finds itself at the moment. But there's no convincing Bettman of that, probably because nearly all the press during his 12-year reign has been bad.

Bettman took the job pledging to put hockey on equal footing with the other major team sports, and he widened the NHL's footprint from 21 franchises to 30, made inroads into nontraditional hockey meccas like Arizona, Florida, Tennessee and Texas, grew revenues from $400 million to almost $2 billion, and brought big-time U.S. broadcasters into the league's TV fold.

But running with the big boys carries a steep price tag and all that expansion accomplished was to put more teams in a deeper financial hole. A league-sponsored report last February put losses from the previous season at $273 million, and there are only two ways to get rid of a deficit like that: one is to bring in more money, the other is to cut costs.

Unfortunately, Bettman failed to get "cost certainty" the first time he locked the players out and lost nearly half the 1994-95 season. This time around, he's willing to call off the whole deal and risk driving away even more fans to get his way.

Any idea that stupid is rarely the work of one man, and that's certainly the case here. Players are taking home three-quarters of what the teams are taking in the average salary has grown to $1.8 million last season from $558,000 in Bettman's first season. And while their union has shown some willingness to compromise in the few bargaining sessions that have taken place, they're drawing the line at a salary cap.

The NFL and NBA have them in place, baseball still does not. Bettman and his owners have gone on record guaranteeing the players an annual income of $1.3 million under their latest proposal — cap included. But as NBA star Latrell Sprewell said so plaintively earlier this season, players have families to feed, too. That's their rationale for letting this season slip away, and like Bettman, they're foolishly sticking to it.

Some of the resulting developments would be funny if they weren't so painful.

A nine-man group called the Atlanta Spirit bought the NHL Thrashers, the NBA Hawks and Philips Arena operating rights last year, and part of its payback was supposed to come Sunday, with a chance to host hockey's All-Star game. Instead, with the arena dark, a member of the ownership group said he might go sit in the stands "and pretend like I'm watching a game."

"It's been a disappointment," Michael Gearon Jr., told his hometown newspaper. "we haven't seen a hockey game, really, since we became owners."

Gordon needs to mature

NASCAR from page 8

"I enjoyed working with Robby, he was not a problem at all," Childress said. "I wish him good luck with his own team, because I personally don't think it can work in today's NASCAR.

"Look, Robby has the talent to be a champion. There's no doubt in my mind, he could win a championship at this level if he just concentrated on driving and left everything else alone."

Gordon realized he needed to make changes while doing one of the extracurricular activities Childress frowned upon.

Competing last month in the Dakar Rally, Gordon became the first American to win a stage when he took the opening leg. But he wrecked on Day 6 and spent the final 10 days as a support vehicle for his teammates.

It meant Gordon had to pull over along roadsides in Africa and wait for his teammates to arrive. Then, he'd take the broken parts off their cars and replace them with the good parts from his car. They would continue on, while Gordon would wait for his own car to again be repaired.

At night, he slept alone in a sleeping bag in his tent in the Mojave Desert with nothing to interrupt his self-analysis.

"It gave me 10 days to mature," he said. "Not that 10 days is going to fix me, but it gave me a lot of time to think.

"You know the old saying your parents taught you? Think before you open your mouth? I couldn't get that down and it has taken me a long time to get there. I am still not 100 percent there. But at 36, I am thinking about it now before I pop off and say something."

His career may depend on it. Some of his sponsorship agreements carry clauses in them to protect the companies from being embarassed by Gordon.

Jim Beam, new to NASCAR this season, doesn't want a repeat of last September when Gordon retaliated against Greg Biffle by intentionally wrecking him, and collecting two championship-contending cars at the same time.

"I didn't feel bad about that at the time," Gordon said. "But I do now and I'm impressed that we've been able to recover and still end up with great partners because some of the sponsors definitely questioned me."

Mickelson rocks the golf world

By Doug Ferguson
Associated Press

PEBBLE BEACH, Calif. — Two weeks, two wins for Phil Mickelson.

And these aren't ordinary victories.

Mickelson is usually a thrill-a-minute, a guy who keeps everyone entertained by trying to hit clutch shots along the back nine with the tournament at stake. He birdied five of his last seven holes to win the Masters last year. He once hit a tee shot into the canyon during a playoff at Torrey Pines and still managed to win with a double bogey.

That's what makes these last two weeks on the PGA Tour so alarming.

One week after winning in Phoenix by a career-high five strokes, Mickelson went wire-to-wire in the Pebble Beach National Pro-Am to win by four strokes over Mike Weir.

"He's obviously doing something right," Weir said.

Mickelson has won his last two tournaments by nine shots. Going into this year, he had won his previous eight PGA Tour titles by a combined nine shots.

"After working on the right things now for a year, after getting back my distance off the tee and being able to utilize my wedge play, I feel like I'm able to make a lot more birdies," Mickelson said. "It just seems like ... I don't want to say the game is easier, but it just feels a little bit easier."

There wasn't much heavy lifting Sunday, for sure.

Mickelson closed with a 1-over 73, the first time he has ever won with a final round over par. About the only thing he didn't get was the 72-hole record. He missed a 15-foot birdie putt on the final hole and finished at 19-under 269, one shot short of the record set seven years ago by Mark O'Meara.

"I really don't think about records like that, individual tournament records," Mickelson said. "I just really wanted to win this tournament."

That was never in doubt from the time Mickelson opened with a course-record 62 at Spyglass Hill, regarded as one of the toughest tests in northern California.

Weir tried to make it interesting.

The former Masters champion from Canada birdied three of his first four holes — the exception was a bogey when he missed the third green — and then made the only birdie of the final round on the 430-yard ninth hole, which plays along the cliffs and into a wet wind. Weir hit 3-wood into 6 feet.

When he birdied the 11th hole to get to 14 under, Mickelson's lead was down to four.

Mickelson, who had bogeys on Nos. 9 and 10 to give the Canadian fleeting hope, was never worried. He knew the outward 10 holes at Pebble Beach were the toughest, and he only needed to get through them with limited damage.

When he got to the 11th, he smoked a drive down the middle of the fairway, hit a wedge into 18 feet and hit the purest putt of his final round for a birdie that pushed his lead back up to five.

Both players spent the rest of the day missing putts by the tiniest margin — Weir burned the edge on his next six holes, and his chip for eagle on the 18th just turned away. Mickelson followed his birdie at No. 11 by missing putts from 6, 4 and 8 feet, then he missed three more inside 18 feet.

But all that affected was the final score.

This is new territory for Mickelson, winning by such a large margin, and it might take some getting used to.

"It was weird," he said. "I didn't feel the normal intensity, the normal stress. It was a very enjoyable round."

Which type of victory does he prefer?

"I enjoy the stress-free day at Pebble Beach, playing with friends," he said, alluding to Ford president Steve Lyons, with whom Mickelson has an endorsement deal. "But I also enjoy that intensity and nervousness and the excitement of having to pull off clutch shots to win."

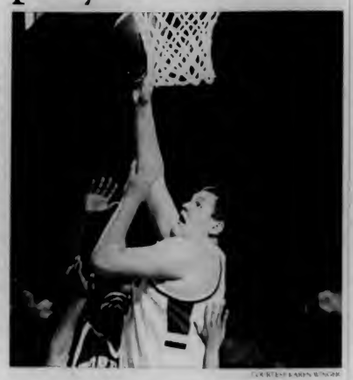
Phil Mickelson watches his tee shot during the 2005 AT&T Pebble Beach National Pro-Am in Pebble Beach, Calif., on Sunday.

STOCKBRIDGE SCHOOL
JOB FAIR 2005
Feb. 15th
10:00 a.m. - 1:00 p.m.
Campus Center Auditorium
UMass Amherst
Eighty companies seeking qualified students and graduates for full-time and internship opportunities. Positions offered in urban tree care, park management, fruit and crop production, horticulture, landscaping, turfgrass mangement and business management.
The shortage of qualified employees in these related areas has created a surplus job market for those possessing the academic and highly specialized, technical training related to these fields.

Discover Your LOVER
The Collegian Dating Game
CHECK OUT YOUR MATCHMAKING SKILLS!
We rounded up
3 Men and 3 Women
You paired them up!
Find out where the couples are going:
Date Package #1 TODAY
Date Package #2 TOMORROW
Date Package #3 THURSDAY

UMass plays ACC foe

See MEN'S HOOPS on page 10



uncertain status of senior captain Anthony Anderson's back. Anderson has had discomfort in his back, but according to Lappas, it flared u a bit during the Fordham game. Anderson currently leads the team in three (46) and three-point percentage (.393).

Lappas knows that in order to be successful against FSU the Minutemen need to play a more consistent inside-out game. However, he is also pleased that UMass is no longer taking as many forced three-pointers as it has in the past.

"Our perimeter shooting has been the biggest Achilles heel of this team the whole year. If we shoot the ball well, we are a much better basketball team. I think we're taking very good shots; we just need to start making them," Lappas said. "The good thing is that we're cutting down on the number of threes we're taking, but we still need to make a couple of them."

If FSU wants to take the Minutemen out of their game they will try to turn up the ball court defense. Over the course of this season, the Seminoles have exhibited an athletic approach to their defense, which including letting the opposing cross the ball court line before attacking.

Lappas is a bit concerned about catching this team in the midst of a losing streak, especially after a demoralizing loss. He sees this team as one of the most talented UMass has seen this year to date.

COURTESY KAREN WINCOR

Jeff 'Big Deli' Salovski goes up for a layup against Fordham on Jan. 19. The Minutemen have gone 3-3 since that game.

"This is a good team. They're very talented and very athletic, and this is as talented a team to come in here this year," Lappas said. "I'm not telling you they're as talented as Boston College, who's having a great year, but this team has talent all over the place. It's a tough game, a tough match up."

NOTE: UMass is 3-0 against ACC teams when they come to play at the Mullins Center. The Minutemen defeated N.C. State 69-62 on Jan. 2, 2003; the historic 1995 Wake Forest team 60-46; and Florida State 62-58 on Feb. 3, 1984... today's game will be the second time in Florida State history that its basketball team has played in Massachusetts, the first was the aforementioned loss to UMass in 1984.

Canseco calls out several stars

CANSECO from page 10

denial.

"The relationship that these allegations portray couldn't be further from the truth," McGwire's statement said. "I also worry how these false allegations will taint the accomplishments of the Oakland Athletics' coaches, players and executives who worked so hard to achieve success during the era in question, along with the other players and organizations affected by this book.

"Most concerning to me is the negative effect that sensationalizing steroids will have on impressionable youngsters who dream of one day becoming professional athletes. Once and for all I did not use steroids or any other illegal substance."

McGwire was not available for interviews.

In the book, Canseco is an unabashed advocate of performance-enhancing drugs.

"By the time my 8-year-old daughter, Josie, has graduated from high school, a majority of all professional athletes — in all sports — will be taking steroids. And believe it or not, that's good news," he writes. "I have no doubt whatsoever that intelligent, informed use of steroids, combined with Human Growth Hormone, will one day be so accepted that everybody will be doing it. Steroid use will be more common than Botox is now. Every baseball player and pro athlete will be using at least low levels of steroids. As a result, baseball and other sports will be more exciting and more entertaining."

Canseco calls himself the "godfather of steroids in baseball," saying "I single-handedly changed the game of baseball by introducing them into the game."

He says both baseball management and the union tried to ignore steroid use.

"Are players the only ones to blame when Donald Fehr and the other bosses of the Major League Baseball Players Association fought for years to make sure players wouldn't be tested for steroids?" he wrote, adding: "Fehr had to know the truth."

Baseball commissioner Bud Selig said last week that the sport's leadership was unaware of possible steroid use until 1998. Fehr declined comment Monday.

Canseco expr-esses resentment at the way he was treated by management and the media.

"There was a huge double standard in baseball, and white athletes like Mark McGwire, Cal Ripken Jr. and Brady And-erson were protected and coddled in a way that an outspoken Latino like me never would be," he wrote. "Canseco the Cuban was left out in the cold, where racism and double standards rule."

Canseco specifically took aim at Jason Giambi, a former Oakland teammate.

"Giambi had the most obvious steroid physique I've ever seen in my life," Canseco wrote. "He was so bloated, it was unbelievable. There was no definition to his body at all. You could see the retention of liquids, especially in his neck and face."

COURTESY ASSOCIATED PRESS

Former baseball player Jose Canseco has called out several stars, including Jason Giambi, in his book.

Robby Gordon looks to start new team

By Jenna Fryer
Associated Press

DAYTONA BEACH, Fla. — Alone in his tent in the African desert, Robby Gordon realized he had a lot of growing up to do.

"Sometimes I make dumb decisions because I still have that pre-schooler mentality: If you push me, I'll push you back," Gordon said. "I've realized that's something I internally have to work on."

The time is now for Gordon to stop acting like a child because he's launching a risky venture this season in trying to field his own race team. The driver-owner combination has not been very successful at NASCAR's highest-level. Ricky Rudd called it quits in 1999, Bill Elliott closed his operation in 2000 and Brett Bodine did the same in 2003.

Since then, no driver has been bold enough to put his own money on the line against the heavily funded super teams - organizations with as many as four Nextel Cup entries and a slew of engineers, accountants and sponsor-seekers.

But Gordon has always been a risk-taker. When someone tells him he can't do it, the first thing he does is try to prove them wrong. Only this decision is already showing signs of backfiring. Gordon is in danger of not making the season-opening Daytona 500, considered NASCAR's biggest race of the year.

His No. 7 Chevrolet showed up at Daytona last weekend with an illegal engine part that NASCAR quickly confiscated and will penalize him for. It put Gordon behind in qualifying preparations, and he was forced to borrow an engine from Dale Earnhardt Inc. to use Sunday.

But the DEI engines were uncharacteristically short on horsepower, and Gordon ended up 38th on the speed chart.

Because new qualifying procedures guarantee a starting spot to any team in the top 35 in points last season - and Gordon is considered a new team with no points — he must now race his way into the Daytona 500 in one of Thursday's two qualifying events.

He'll be one of 18 drivers battling for the final four spots in the field.

"Obviously we have a huge obstacle in front of us right now," Gordon said. "But we know we can be competitive once we battle through the new-team blues."

Why would Gordon even try this?

After all, he did it once before and failed, folding his personally owned team midway through the 2000 season. He was considered lucky when car owner Richard Childress picked him up for the final 10 races of the 2001 season.

It was a tryout of sorts, and Gordon passed by scoring his first career Cup victory in the 2001 finale by brashly bumping Jeff Gordon out of the way for a win. Childress rewarded him with a three-year contract that produced another two wins and 22 top-10 finishes.

But Gordon likes to be his own boss. So he and Childress parted ways last season, and Gordon formed Robby Gordon Motorsports.

Contrary to popular opinion, Childress said the three seasons together were not unpleasant despite Gordon's clashes with RCR golden-boy Kevin Harvick and the intentional wreck Gordon caused last September that ended Tony Stewart and Jeremy Mayfield's championship hopes.

See NASCAR on page 7

Weis ready to hit trenches at Notre Dame

By Tom Coyne
Associated Press

SOUTH BEND, Ind. — Charlie Weis got an early start Monday on his first full day of work as Notre Dame's coach, telling more than 200 students it is essential to raise expectations so the Irish can become a football power again.

"I've never been in a program that's lost," Weis told the students, who gathered at the Joyce Center at 6 a.m. to hear from the new coach. "I'm 48 years old, I've never been in a program that's lost. Every where I've been, we've won. It hasn't been because of me. But I've been part of the reason we've won."

Weis said it's his job to persuade both students and players to change their outlook.

"Right now I don't even have the players convinced that what I'm selling is going to end up working," he said.

Weis had been working as the offensive coordinator of the Patriots through New England's latest Super Bowl victory. He still doesn't know all the Irish players even though he was hired two months ago and is using a picture chart to link names and faces.

He didn't give any guarantees about how long it will take to turn around the Irish program, which hasn't won a national championship since 1988, but said, "It's not going to take as long as some other people think."

"We're not going to be a 6-6 team here very long," he added. "I don't know if it's going to be done in one year. I don't know if it's going to be done in three years. But I can tell you one thing, every week we're going to be competitive."

Weis told the crowd, made up primarily of male students, that he learned his coaching style from Patriots coach Bill Belichick and Dallas Cowboys coach Bill Parcells.

"I've kind of tried to take the best of both their personalities. They have two totally different personalities, and mine is different than those as well," he said. "I've been groomed by those guys over the years to the point where I think I have a clue of knowing how to run a program."

Weis drew laughter and applause from the students when he said that USC coach Pete Carroll was a friend of his, "but he's never really done great against me."

But Weis said the two-time defending national champion Trojans, who have beaten Notre Dame by 31 points for three straight seasons, clearly are a much better team than the Irish right now.

"That's the problem," he said. "Notre Dame has got to get to the point where that's the ability of players we have here."

Weis said he doesn't accept the reasons some people use to explain why Notre Dame hasn't been an elite team in recent years. Those reasons include rigorous academics, a difficult schedule and trouble persuading recruits to come to Notre Dame.

"You don't sit there and make a whole bunch of excuses," he said. "Walking in the door, there's too many excuses."

Weis also told the students that Notre Dame is where he wants to be. He said the Miami Dolphins were interested in hiring him. He added that an unidentified NFL team called him the night he flew in to accept the Notre Dame job and told him they wanted to hire him. But he said he wanted to return to his alma mater.

"I intend to be here a long time. I'm not three-and-out," he said. "My goal is to be able to leave this campus on my own terms about a decade from now with everyone saying, 'God, I'm glad we hired that guy.'"

COURTESY ASSOCIATED PRESS

Charlie Weis, former assistant coach for the Super Bowl champion New England Patriots, is now the head coach for Notre Dame.

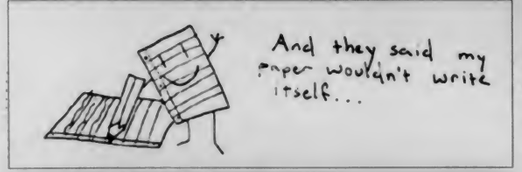
MAXIMUM Capacity SPORTS BAR
TONIGHT:
CHRIS FARLEY NIGHT
DRINK SPECIALS:
$3.50 GIANT FROSTED DRAFTS!
$2.50 PATRIOTS DRINKS!
$1 BLUE RAZZ KAMIKAZE SHOTS!
ALL MONTH!
ONLY 20 minutes from campus!
STUDMUFFIN DANCE CONTEST!
WWW.MAXIMUMSPORTSBAR.COM
1370 Memorial Drive-Chicopee, MA

Need a fundraiser?
Sell something everyone needs!
We'll pay $5.00 for each qualified Massachusetts Daily Collegian subscription sold by you!

COMPARE AND SAVE
ROUND 1
StudentUniverse.com
-VS-
Student Travel in Amherst
StudentUniverse.com
24 HRS (when YOU want)
DING! DING!
Those Other Companies
9-5 (when THEY want)
Round Trip to Athens: $500
COMPARE AND SAVE
Round Trip to Athens: $811
Terms: All fares are based on travelling times and include a StudentUniverse service fee of $9. Comparison fare is based on the same itinerary available at other student travel providers in Amherst. Taxes may vary depending on the itinerary selected. Fare shown is based from BOS to ATH on April 5-13, 2005. Visit StudentUniverse.com for complete rules. All fares are subject to availability and change without notice.
StudentUniverse.com

Check out the Collegian online for the latest on UMass athletics
www.DailyCollegian.com

GET FUZZY • By Darby Conley



JEFF, GOTI & GOAT • By Kenneth Cloke

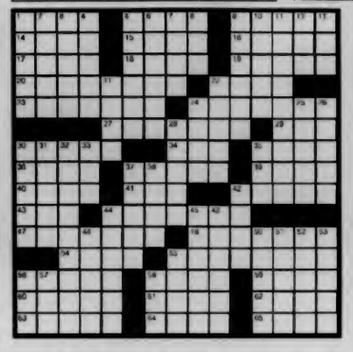
VALLEY OF THE SQUIRRELS • By Cooper Pence

DESTINED FOR MEDIOCRITY • By Jessy Eck

CAVEMAN RA • By Ryan Hamilton

Quote of the Day

"A people that values its privileges above its principles soon loses both."



—Dwight D. Eisenhower

ACROSS
1 Injection
5 Unspecified amount
9 Carnivals
14 Day segment
15 Prayer ender
16 Allow in
17 Green Gables girl
18 Peggy and Brenda
19 Daddy's mate
20 Sodium chloride
22 Traditional knowledge
23 Take for granted
24 Gather
27 Pathetic
29 Simpson judge
30 Jockey's controls
34 Lulu staple
35 Detest
36 Sea eagle
37 Complaints
39 List unit
40 Cad's come-on
41 Ripen
42 Exploiters
43 Rink material
44 Terminating
47 Slaughtered animal's body
49 Harasses
54 Arizona city
55 Dark shade
56 Zagreb resident
58 Book increment
59 Old-time actress Theda
60 Out-of-date
61 Daredevil Knievel
62 Wicked
63 Aquatic mammal
64 Highland loch
65 Liars

DOWN
1 Acute
2 Respect
3 Unit of weight
4 Difficult journeys
5 Deli meat
6 Egg dish
7 Encounter
8 Printer's measures
9 Renowned
10 Decorate
11 Instant
12 Edge
13 Pigs' digs
21 Dines
22 St. __ Cardinals
24 Housetop
25 Express in words
26 Verse compositions
28 Fencers' lists
30 Old treasure
31 Author Jong
32 Most central
33 Born in Burgundy
35 Belonging to that man
37 Lightweight wood
38 Vanities
42 Far from pretty
44 Net flinger
45 Visual representations
46 Works of fiction
48 End
50 Receded
51 One bound in servitude
52 Shroud of __
53 Embossed emblems
55 Central area of a church
56 Naval noncom
57 Informer
58 Livestock enclosure

Find today's answers online
www.dailycollegian.com

THE HARP
NEW!! Wireless Internet
OCMP & All Credit Cards accepted
Irish Pub
February Special!
$1.50 PBR Bottles; Honey Brown, Molson
$2.00 A pint / $6.50 a pitcher
TUES. ·Tonight is Trivia Night! (Starting at 9p.m.)
WED. ·Busted Vacuum
THU. ·The Amity Front
FRI. ·Irish Sesiun
"Come Party Like You're Irish!"
413-548-6900 www.theharp.net
163 Sunderland Rd. - N. Amherst
Just north of the apartments

Want to Jumpstart your business?
Advertise with the Collegian

H·O·R·O·S·C·O·P·E·S

aquarius • Jan. 20-Feb. 18
You seem extraordinarily chipper this morning.

pisces • Feb. 19-Mar. 20
The more you start hanging out with that person, the more you'll start acting like them.

aries • Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Be patient today. There is no need to rush through everything.

taurus • Apr. 20-May 20
It's time to put the spider dreams to rest. There is no spider.

gemini • May 21-Jun. 21
Today one of your coworkers will totally weird you out.

cancer • Jun. 22-Jul. 22
A nice comment from a friend is exactly what you needed to hear today.

leo • Jul. 23-Aug. 22
You've finally had that talk you've been drooling. Hopefully, things will be better now.

virgo • Aug. 23-Sept. 22
No more scarying people in the DC. It's bad for their health.

libra • Sept. 23-Oct. 22
It sounds like you read the book, even though you didn't.

scorpio • Oct. 23-Nov. 21
Today you're gonna spill halt your lunch all over yourself.

sagittarius • Nov. 22-Dec. 21
You are the master of procrastination. Do it today.

capricorn • Dec. 22-Jan. 19
You should ask your roommate what you said last night.

Blow away your competitors, advertise with The Collegian
Call 545-3500

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

ACTIVITIES

Foam party Montreal weekends $89 Montreal Express.Net 1(781)979-9001

ANNOUNCEMENTS

$600 Group Fundraiser Scheduling Bonus
4 hours of your group's time PLUS our free (yes, free) fundraising solutions EQUALS $1,000-$2,000 in earnings for your group. Call TODAY for a $450 bonus when you schedule your non-sales fundraiser with Campus Fundraiser. Contact CampusFundraiser,

ANNOUNCEMENTS

(888)923-3238, or visit www.campus-fundraiser.com

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Brandywine Apts.
Now Leasing, 1&2 bedroom apts. Leases begin Jun, July, Aug or Sep. First come, first serve. Get them while they last. www.brandywine-apts.com stop by or call 549-0600

Center of town, 1, 2, 3 bedrooms; hardwood floors. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER NO FEES www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Hobart Condos 3 bedroom, hardwood floors, study area in basement. Cable, telephone (internet access) in all bedrooms and study. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

AUTO FOR SALE

Pontiac Sunbird 93 automatic 4 cyl excellent turquoise ABS Asking $1350 or BO Call 253-0279

AUTO FOR SALE

1999 Toyota Camry fully loaded. 75K, Mint condition. Call 413-348-4191

EMPLOYMENT

Make money taking online surveys earn $10 to $125 for surveys. Earn $25 to $250 for focus groups www.cashforstudents.com/umass

Nanny position for 2 boys ages 6 & 9. Perfect schedule for student. Part time Spring. Full time Summer. Prior experience necessary. 413-625-2288

EMPLOYMENT

Earn lots of $$ and have fun on the water this Spring & Summer. Raft guides needed at Crab Apple Whitewater in Charlemont, MA. Fun Summer job, no experience necessary. We will train. 413-625-2288.

MISCELLANEOUS

$$$$ EARN EXTRA CASH!!! $$$$ Get friends, family, and fellow students to play fantasy baseball and earn cash. No risk. Go to www.rotoleague.com/affiliate for details.

ROOM FOR RENT

350 per month 413-335-5226

SERVICES

Legal Questions? We have answers. Student Legal Services Office, 922 Campus Center, 545-1995.

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance 549-1906

TRAVEL

XXX Night Montreal Weekends $89 Montreal Express.net 1(781)979-9001

TRAVEL

One Bed and Studio (Four Queen Beds) at Deerpark one mile from Loon Mountain Available 3/11-3/18 Ken 335-9775

Bahamas Spring Cruise 5 Days $299! Includes Meals, Celebrity Parties! Panama City, Daytona $159! Cancun, Jamaica, Acapulco, Nassau $499! Award Winning Company! SpringBreakTravel.com 1-800-678-6386

TRAVEL

Spring Break 2005
Only 6 weeks left... Lowest Prices Biggest Parties Earn 2 Free Trips Exclusive with Sun Splash Tours www.sunsplash-tours.com 1800-426-7710

#1 Spring Break Vacations! Cancun, Jamaica, Acapulco, Bahamas, & Florida! Best Parties, Best Hotels, Best Prices! Limited Space! 1-800-234-7007 www.endlesssummertours.com

Place a classified ad.
Call 545-3500.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS TUESDAY

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 2005 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

UMass takes on FSU

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

In the midst of an up and down Atlantic 10 conference schedule, the Massachusetts men's basketball team (12-9, 6-5 A-10) is faced with a legitimate challenge from the always-powerful Atlantic Coast Conference (ACC) this evening.

Tonight at the Mullins Center, the Minutemen are hosting Florida State (11-13, 3-8 ACC) for a 7 p.m. tip-off. The game will be the last non-conference game for both squads as they gear up for their respective conference tournaments.

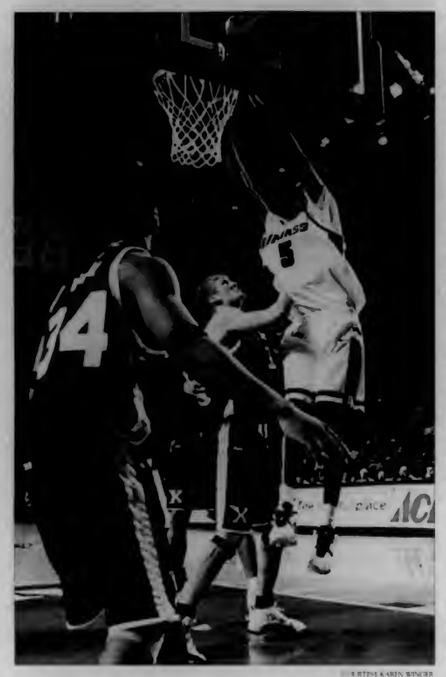
The Seminoles are best known this year for their improbable 91-83 victory over then No. 3 Wake Forest on Jan. 18. The game was only FSU's second conference game of the season, with its first being a 64-63 loss to the University of Miami four days earlier.

Some would say that the victory was the last positive for the Seminoles this season as they went on to lose five of their next six games, including an embarrassing 87-48 loss in a rematch against Wake Forest on Saturday.

UMass coach Steve Lappas has heard talk about Florida State's problems over the past few weeks, but is quick to cast off any doubts about this team. He understands that a team that struggles in the ACC is a little different than a floundering team in a lesser mid-major conference.

"The writer from the St. Petersburg paper said to me this morning 'well you're playing a struggling team' and I said 'whoa, (Florida State) is a struggling team that struggled against Maryland, Duke, North Carolina and Georgia Tech ... that's a little different."

Leading the way for FSU has been the offense of sophomore guard Van Wafer. Wafer had led the Seminoles in scoring in eight of of their last 10 games. He also has the highest scoring output on the team, putting up a solid 14.4 points per game (ppg.).



Wafer's best weapon has been his proficiency from behind the arch, over the course of this season he has hit 61 threes shooting an extraordinary .442 from behind the arch. Lappas, whose team has struggled at times against strong perimeter games, is well-educated in Wafer's shooting prowess.

"The kid Von Wafer is a tremendous player, one of the best shooters in the country believe it or not. He made seven threes against Wake Forest, he's a great 3-point shooter," Lappas said.

Conversely, the Minutemen have been going through a bit of a dry spell from three-point land. UMass hit only one three pointer in Saturday's 63-56 loss to Fordham and have shot a mere .319 percent on the season.

Putting a further damper on this statistic is the

See MEN'S HOOPS on page 8

COURTESY KAREN WINGER

Sophomore forward Stephane Lasme goes up for a dunk against Xavier on Jan. 8. Lasme and the Minutemen face off against Florida State at home tonight at 7 p.m.

Putting the game together

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

Originally, tonight's game between the Massachusetts men's basketball team and Atlantic Coast Conference foe Florida State wasn't even supposed to happen. Now, it is a crucial non-conference litmus test for UMass, and it's up to the Minutemen to make it happen. When head coach Steve Lappas and his staff sat down prior to the season and began compiling non-conference games for the 2004-05 season, annual foes like Connecticut and Boston College were the first to be added, along with Dec. 4's Battle in Seattle against Gonzaga.

From there, Lappas added the usual array of mid-majors; local schools such as Boston University and Northeastern, along with credible out-of-towners Davidson and Birmingham Southern before filling in the final pieces here and there with the likes of Rider and Yale.

ACC newcomer Miami was one of the final pieces, and when the Hurricanes signed on the dotted line to agree to play UMass in a home-and-home set over this season and next, there was one last remaining hole in the schedule.

"We were scrambling for our last game and wanted to play somebody of a decent caliber," Lappas said. "We were going to play St. John's or Georgetown, but both of them bailed on us at the last second."

Left without a final game with hardly any time to spare before the schedule needed to be finalized, Lappas called on an old friend to see if he could set something up.

"We were calling around like crazy, and I called Leonard Hamilton," Lappas said. "I knew him from our Big East days when he was at Miami and I was at Villanova, and we got lucky when we found out [he needed a game.

"I said we'd like to play in February, and they had their week off from the ACC this week, so it worked out perfect."

While the scheduling of the game worked out perfectly, scouting an ACC team isn't necessarily as simple. As Lappas explains, ACC coaches adhere to an unwritten edict of not divulging information on other conferences teams outside of the league.

"ACC guys are not allowed to give information on other ACC schools," Lappas said. "[Georgia Tech coach] Paul Hewitt is one of my best friends, and I would call him first, but I don't want to put him on the spot. We really did not speak with anyone in particular about Florida State."

Nonetheless, Lappas was able to obtain numerous tapes of the Seminoles, and can rely on his prior knowledge of Hamilton's style in preparing for the game — a game the Minutemen could sorely use in their quest to finish strong and secure a postseason bid.

"They're easy to prepare for because they've played a ton of games on TV, so we have all their tapes," Lappas said. "We've seen their last 10 games on tape and I know Leonard Hamilton, so I think we have a pretty good idea what they do.

"It's mostly just about us going out there and making some shots, because this is a game that would really help us to win and gain momentum from."

The game is also a rarity in that it is a non-conference matchup smack dab in the middle of A-10 play, as the Minutemen played Fordham this past weekend and will return to conference action this Saturday at La Salle.

Yet Lappas feels as if it is a well-placed game in his team's schedule, and will not only provide a good break from the rigors of conference play, but prevented UMass from having to endure an extremely difficult stretch earlier in the season.

"For us, I like the idea of playing one of these games in February, otherwise you end up playing UConn, BC, Gonzaga, Miami and Florida State all within a three week period in December," Lappas said. "I'd much prefer to play one of those games later in the year. I think it's better for us."

New England's Largest College Daily • Est. 1890

The Daily Collegian

Wednesday, February 16, 2005 www.dailycollegian.com Volume CXIV Issue 81

STEM program aims to recruit students

By David Fonseca
Collegian Staff

With a $500,000 grant from the National Science Foundation, the University of Massachusetts STEM Bridge Program is recruiting students from UMass and surrounding community colleges for math and science teaching careers.

The University of Massachusetts Science, Technology, Engineering and Mathematics Bridge Program, a collaboration between the STEM Institute and the School of Education, will use the $500,000 it received from the National Science Foundation Robert Noyce Scholars Program toward 52 yearly scholarships averaging $8,000.

The scholarships are available to UMass juniors and seniors who are interested in becoming math or science majors. Students must also be enrolled in the secondary education teacher program by their senior year to remain eligible for the scholarship.

In addition, for every year that a student receives a scholarship, they must commit to working two years in a school district which the National Science Foundation defines as high need. The National Science Foundation defines a district as high need if it meets any one of the following criteria; 50 percent of the students are on subsidized lunch programs, 34 percent of the teachers do not have an academic major or minor in the subject they teach a majority of their classes, the school's teacher attrition rate has been over 15 percent for the last three years.

The grant comes at a time when the need for math and science teachers is high. "There's a shortage of qualified math and science teachers," said Morton Sternheim, director of the Institute. "The financial assistance is substantial."

The UMass School of Education produces about 30 teachers a year. "We're actually one of the largest programs in the state. Which also gives you and idea of what the problem is in terms of the production of math and science teachers. There's a greater need then there is a supply.

Especially in the math and physical science area," said Allan Feldman, a professor of education at UMass and the associate direc-

See GRANT on page 2

UMass TV raises money for UNICEF

By Matt Pilon
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts TV-19 station launched a dating campaign this weekend that half of the proceeds will be donated to Children's AIDS Awareness.

Union Video Center TV-19 raised and gave half of $926.30 to UNICEF on Saturday night during its Children's AIDS Awareness Dating Auction at the Campus Center Auditorium.

Twenty-two contestants from all over the university population, ranging from resident assistants to members from the AIANA community were sold off to the highest bidders for a date, according to organizer, UVC-TV president, Communications major Ayana Crichton. Locally donated prizes encouraged bidders, ranging from restaurant gift certificates to an all-expenses-paid weekend trip to New York City complete with a complimentary helicopter ride awarded for the event's highest bid, which turned out to be $120, Crichton said.

Even with another dating auction happening close by in Herter at the same time, possibly drawing others away from the UVC TV event, organizers were "shocked by how much money was made at the end of the night.

"Crichton recounted. "It really just started picking up and everyone was getting into it."

Co-organizer and UVC-TV underwriter David Snowdon reached out to local businesses for donations. "At first I was a little nervous but everything really gelled together well at the end," he remembered. According to Snowdon, 11 local businesses donated prizes. "The restaurants in town are extremely supportive," Crichton said appreciatively, so supportive in fact, that they will all be allowing UVC-TV to film the various dates at their respective businesses to air at a later date. Snowdon said UVC-TV hopes to eventually upgrade

Students from the UMass community participate in the Children's AIDS Awareness Dating Auction Saturday. Half of the proceeds made will be donated to UNICEF to help spread AIDS awareness.

See TV/19 on page 3

Judge sentences Shanley to prison

By Denise Lavoie
Associated Press

CAMBRIDGE— A judge sentenced Paul Shanley Tuesday to 12 to 15 years in prison for child rape, condemning the defrocked priest for using his revered status to prey on a vulnerable little boy.

Shanley, one of the most notorious figures in the Boston Archdiocese's clergy sex abuse scandal, was convicted last week of repeatedly raping and fondling the boy at suburban parish in the 1980s, beginning when he was 6 years old.

The sentencing was seen as an important milestone by victims who packed the courtroom to watch the once-popular priest receive his punishment. As a wobly Shanley was led from the courtroom in handcuffs, many in the audience burst into applause and one man called out " Goodbye."

Judge Stephen Neel said Shanley used his position as a priest to gain the trust of his victim.

"It is difficult to imagine a more egregious misuse of trust and authority," he said.

Shanley, 74, once known for a being a hip "street priest" who reached out to troubled children and homosexuals, will be eligible for parole after eight years. He was also sentenced to 10 years' probation.

"He used his collar and he used his worshipped status in that community," said prosecutor Lynn Rooney, who asked for a life sentence. "There has been no remorse shown on the part of this defendant. There has been no acceptance of responsibility."

Shanley's lawyer, Frank Mondano, said the prosecution's case was built on "vilification, half-truths and lies."

"This process ... is one that has been profoundly distorted by emotion," said Mondano, who did not make a specific sentencing recommendation.

Shanley's accuser, now a 27-year-old firefighter in suburban Boston, said the former priest would pull him from Sunday morning catechism classes and rape and fondle him at St. Jean's parish in Newton.

The case hinged on the reliability of the victim's memories of the abuse, which he said he recovered several years ago as the clergy set abuse scandal unfolded in the media.

"I want him to die in prison, whether it's of natural causes or otherwise. However he dies. I hope it's slow and painful," the man said in a victim impact statement read in court by Rooney.

His father told Shanley: "You robbed my little boy of his innocence. You destroyed his understanding of good and bad and right and wrong."

District Attorney Martha Coakley said afterward that the victim was disappointed with the sentence. "I think he very much wanted to hear the word 'life,'" Coakley said.

But Coakley said the man also understands that given Shanley's age, "as a practical matter, the sentence imposed today will be life."

She said if Shanley is released on parole, prosecutors would seek to have him civilly committed for the rest of his life under the state's sexually dangerous persons law.

During the trial, the victim man broke down and sobbed on the witness stand as he described in graphic detail being abused by Shanley in the church bathroom, rectory, confessional and pews.

"He told me nobody would ever believe me if I told anybody," he testified.

Mondano asked Neel to allow Shanley to serve his sentence in the less-violent county lockup, rather than in state prison, but the judge turned down the request.

Another notorious pedophile priest, John Geoghan, was killed in a state prison, allegedly by a fellow inmate.

Victims of abusive priests and their advocates were happy with the sentence.

"The important thing is that he's off the streets," said David Clohessey, national director of the Survivors Network of Those Abused by Priests. "We're relieved and grateful and believe Massachusetts is a safer place because of this decision."

Shanley worked with Boston's troubled youth in the 1960s and '70s. Even then, allegations began surfacing about sexual contact with some of the young boys he was supposed to be helping.

He was one of the few priests among

See SHANLEY on page 4

State Supreme Court endorses eduction plan

By Karen Testa
Associated Press

BOSTON — The state's highest court gave a resounding endorsement on Tuesday to the state's ongoing efforts at education reform, rejecting a lawsuit from students in low-income districts that claimed Massachusetts was shortchanging their schooling.

For months, the governor and lawmakers had been bracing for a decision that would force the Legislature to come up with millions of dollars more to fund court-mandated reforms. But the Supreme Judicial Court ruled that the state, which has funneled $30 billion into its schools since 1993, already is moving in the right direction.

"No one, including the defendants, disputes that serious inadequacies in public education remain," Supreme Judicial Court Chief Justice Margaret Marshall wrote in the 5-2 decision. Still, she said the state "is moving systematically to address those deficiencies and continues to make education reform a fiscal priority."

The court dismissed the case, leaving no avenue for further appeal.

Brockton High School junior Julie Hancock, 16, the lead plaintiff, said students are suffering while waiting for the fruits of the state's reform efforts. Classrooms in her school are still overcrowded and there aren't enough computers to go around, she said.

"I'm surprised that the court wants us to be patient and give more time," she said.

The lawsuit was brought by students in 19 school districts — led by Springfield, Brockton, Winchendon and Lowell — who said the state had neglected its constitutional duty. They cited overcrowded classrooms, run-down facilities and inexperienced teachers in those four districts as being emblematic of problems statewide.

State attorneys said problems were limited to certain districts, and that a troubleshooting process was under way.

Superior Court Judge Margot Botsford, who prepared a 350-page report for the high court last year, agreed with the students that the state underfunds poorer districts. She recommended that the high court order a cost study and implement whatever funding and administrative changes are needed.

That raised the possibility that lawmakers would have had to rewrite the state's landmark 1993 Education Reform law, passed in response to an earlier an SJC ruling.

But the highest court found the state had made education reform a fiscal priority and said it was not the role of the court to intervene as reforms are being enacted.

"The court recognized it is not the court's job to run our schools, and in fact it does not work when they do," said Attorney General Tom Reilly, whose office argued the state's case.

Still, all sides acknowledged there are unacceptable achievement gaps that need to be addressed. Reilly said the responsibility for fixing those is now rightly in the hands of the governor and the Legislature.

"We need to make sure we don't confuse our happiness in victory in court with a belief that the job is anywhere close to being done," said James A. Peyser, chairman of the state's Board of Education.

Korhonen shines in IC4A

By Daniel Hillman
Collegian Staff

Saturday, two individuals, as well as two relay teams, qualified for the IC4A Championship, as the UMass Men's track team competed in the Boston University Valentine Invitational.

UMass Senior, Jon Korhonen, was one of the Minutemen to qualify for the IC4A Championships on Saturday with his performance in the Mile Run. He finished 10th overall at a time of 4:08.50. Korhonen continued to show his versatility to the team on Saturday. A week ago at the "Rhody Mega Meet", Korhonen placed 1st in the 3,000 meter run.

Junior, James Godinho also qualified for the IC4A Championships by finishing second in the 500 meter. His time of 1:03.31 was good enough to land him in second place.

His performance on Saturday was a personal best. Finishing ahead of Godinho, was Boston University's Lucjan Zaborowski. (1:02.77). Prince Anderson of Coppin State rounded out the top three with a time of 1:04.34

The UMass relay teams also exhibited great effort and in return gained success. The 4x4 Relay team clocked in at 3:18.64, a time that landed them at 12th place in a very competitive field. Their effort on Saturday will also be sending them to the IC4A Championships as well.

The last to qualify for the elite invitation competition was the 4x8 relay team. Their time of 7:45.55 earned them first place in the relay. They beat out tough performances from Elizabethtown College (7:47.54) and Southern Connecticut State (7:49.70).

The IC4A Championships will be held on Saturday and Sunday, Mar. 5 and 6 in Boston. Should any of the qualifiers for this invitational do well enough, they will be invited to travel to Sacramento, Calif. the following week for the NCAA Championships.

In addition to the great performances on the track, Minutemen impressed in other individual events as well. Senior Henry Smith once again impressed as he took 8th place in the Triple Jump with a leap of 45 feet and 10.75 inches. Smith's leap Saturday was his best of the season.

The Minutemen also showed great performance in the shot put event. There, the tandem of freshmen, Ryan Logan and Sean Calicchio dazzled the competition. Logan finished in eighth place with a throw of 49 feet 11.2 inches. While Calicchio finished close behind him in 10th place, with a throw of 48 feet 8.25 inches. The two freshmen shot-putters continue to improve which each throw, as they close out their freshmen year.

Next on tap for the Men's Track Team is the Atlantic 10 Championships. One of the more important meets of the season will begin at 10 a.m. in Kingston, R.I.

Anderson may sit with hurt back

Senior captain Anthony Anderson may not play in the Massachusetts men's basketball team's 7 P.M. game with Florida State at the Mullins Center, according to head coach Steve Lappas.

Anderson has been battling a back injury for much of the season, an injury Lappas said flared up in the days leading up to and during Saturday's loss at Fordham. He will be a game-time decision.

"We don't know if Anthony is going to be playing, so obviously that's something that is a concern," Lappas said. "His back [was] bothering him [yesterday]. We're going to make a game day decision on him, but we're going to assume now that he's not going to be playing."

A four-year starter for the Minutemen, Anderson is currently averaging 11 points and 4.6 rebounds per game. With him out of the lineup, it will be up to senior Chris Chadwick and Sophomore Maurice Maxwell to fill in at the point and run the offense. From there, the onus will be on UMass' younger players to step up and help fill the void in a depleted rotation that already includes a less-than-healthy Jeff Viggiano.

"[Chadwick's] role doesn't change at all. Maurice Maxwell's does because now he has to play some point," Lappas said. "Artie Bowers needs to obviously start playing some more minutes again, and Jeff Viggiano has to play more around the perimeter. That changes the food chain with Lawrence Carrier and Big Deli in there too.

Nonetheless Lappas feels as if his team is confident in its ability to win even without Anderson.

COURTESY KAREN WINGER

Senior captain Anthony Anderson

"I don't doubt that our guys will be fine and know they can win without him, that's not even an issue," Lappas said. "It just obviously hurts our depth, and it's about winning with one less guy, especially a perimeter guy."

— Mike Marzelli

ANDREW SAMUELS/ASSOCIATED PRESS

Job Hunting

Stockbridge student Steven Rejniak and MJS Landscape Olex Beck speak to Matt Siano, a representative for the Career Fair yesterday. The annual fair is being held this week in the Campus Center Auditorium.

New Homeland Secretary confirmed by U.S. Senate

By Lara Jakes Jordan
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Senate confirmed federal judge Michael Chertoff as the nation's second Homeland Security secretary on Tuesday, placing the tough-on-terrorism former prosecutor in charge of a bureaucracy prone to infighting and turf wars.

Chertoff, 51, has promised to balance protecting the country with preserving civil liberties, as head of the sprawling agency that was created as a result of the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks.

The 98-0 vote came nearly two weeks after Chertoff faced pointed questioning from Democrats about his role in developing the U.S. investigation immediately after the attacks.

Chertoff headed the Justice Department's criminal division when hundreds of foreigners were swept up on relatively minor charges and held for an average of 80 days. Some detainees were denied their right to see an attorney, were not told of the charges against them, or were physically abused.

At the Feb. 2 hearing before the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, Chertoff defended the investigation strategy but conceded it "had not always been executed perfectly."

Few expected Chertoff to face widespread opposition in the Senate. But his confirmation was delayed by Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., to protest being denied Justice Department information about the treatment of terror suspects at Guantanamo Bay.

Levin unsuccessfully sought an unedited copy of a May 2004 secret FBI memo that discussed interrogation techniques to see if it mentioned or involved Chertoff. The department denied Levin's request but said the memo did not refer to Chertoff "by name or otherwise."

See HOMELAND on page 4

Bakanowski vaults to success

By Ian Kilpatrick
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts women's track and field team traveled to Boston University this past weekend to compete in what Coach Julie LaFreniere referred to as a "tune-up" for the fast approaching post-season.

For the Minutewomen the 2005 Boston University St. Valentine Invitational was highlighted by another record tying performance by pole vaulter Kristen Bakanowski. The freshman's 12 foot jump was good enough for second place in the event. Boston College's Saki Sugano came in first, clearing 12 feet as well, but in fewer attempts.

Bakanowski's feat earned her a second Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Week honor and the UMass Athletics/Dinn Brothers Athlete of the week award this Monday. It was also in Boston when Kristen first tied the School's record and earned the prominent honor of Eastern College Athletic Conference (ECAC) Athlete of the Week.

Many members of the team have good reason to feel confident going into the Atlantic 10 Indoor Championships next weekend in Kingston, Rhode Island due to their continued improvement.

Several of UMass's women set season best marks including Christina Huff in the 200-meters (25.48 feet,) and Rebecca Rufo and Katelyn O'Toole in the high jump (both 5-feet 2.25 inches.) Huff finished third in her section, while Rufo and O'Toole tied for 15th in their respective events. In Huff's best event, the 55-meter dash, she placed 10th overall out of 53 with a time of 7.33 seconds.

As a believer in team chemistry, LaFreniere was slightly concerned before the meet since the team was forced to split up over the weekend as half of the events took place on Friday and the other half on Saturday, but the Minutewomen were more than able to carry over their strong team effort of last week to this past weekend by coming in first overall among 20 teams in the 4x400 relay with a time of 3 hours 47.25 seconds. After dominating the competition last week in the Distance Medley, the team placed fourth out of 10 with a time of 12 minutes 17.19 seconds.

This being the final check point before the most important part of the season, LaFreniere hadsbeen pushing her team to fight through any fatigue and really put forth the hard work and effort needed to achieve personal and team goals. Little hope is left for an A-10 Championship this year, but the Maroon and White have made promising progress as a team and many athletes still have great chance to make their mark in upcoming tournaments.

Canseco's book is turning heads

COURTESY ASSOCIATED PRESS

Jose Canseco just released the book, "Juiced: Wild Times, Rampant 'Roids, and How Baseball got Big."

By Ronald Blum
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Jose Canseco's autobiography accusing several top players of steroid use and charging that baseball long ignored peformance-enhancing drugs appeared to be a hit on its first day in bookstores.

Amazon.com listed "Juiced: Wild Times, Rampant 'Roids, Smash Hits, and How Baseball Got Big" as third on its best seller list Monday.

The book had an initial printing of 150,000 copies and Regan Books does not disclose sales figures, spokeswoman Jennifer Suitor said.

"I don't think it's a good thing, obviously, because it's bringing a bad light to the game," New York Yankees captain Derek Jeter said Monday. "This is a time, obviously, baseball is in a negative light and Jose is not helping out. In terms of his accusations, the only people that know are him and whoever he is accusing. The unfortunate thing is, if it's not true, you're looking at guys having to defend themselves over something they haven't done."

Mark McGwire, one of the former teammates Canseco accused of using steroids, issued a written

See CANSECO on page 8

ARTS & LIVING

Soloist plays Bowker

World renowned cellist Julie Albers visits UMass tomorrow night.

PAGE 7

EDITORIAL/OPINION

Talking about Tasers

Taking a look at UMass and the use of Tasers by the police force.

PAGE 5

WEATHER

TODAY Rain, H52°, L24°
TONIGHT Sunny, H37°, L16°
TOMORROW Partly Cloudy, H28°, L9°

SPORTS

BACK IN THE GAME

UMass Men's Hoops defeat FSU last night at the Mullins Center.

PAGE 14

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center
University of Massachusetts
Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief Peter Foundas
Managing Editor Mike Marzelli
Business Manager Rich Pacheco
Production Manager Cory Rosenberg
Night Supervisor Meghan Healy
Advertising Manager Tiffany Sugalski
Editorial Production Samantha M. Nielsen
Arts & Living Editor Michael Basack
Comics Editor Alyson Zillmann
Editorial Editor Yousef Munayyer
Editorial Editor Allison Edles
News Editor Erika Lovley
Photo Editor Alex Demosthene
Sports Editor Bob McGovern
Circulation Manager Kristen Weiss
Classified Advertising Marty Pappas
Distribution Manager Josh Riggens
Finance Manager Hirak Shah
Accounting Clerk Virginie Frecaut
Human Resource Sandra Marquez
Assistant Operations Linda Wallack
Assistant Advertising Josh Greenberg
Assistant Business Nathan Chomsky
Assistant Finance Thomas Hecht
Advertising Production Rachael Bruno
Graphics Assistant Charlie Higgins
Asst Arts & Living Matthew O'Rourke
Asst Arts & Living Chris Gazzara
Assistant News Julie O'Donnell
Assistant News Dan O'Brien
Assistant Photo Megan Brinster
Assistant Sports Jeff Howe

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts calendar semester. The Collegian is independently funded operating on advertising revenue. Founded in 1890, the paper began as Alpha Life. As the College Signal in 1902, the Weekly Collegian in 1914 and the Tri-Weekly Collegian in 1958. Published daily since 1967, The Collegian has been printed since January 1994. For advertising rates and information, call 545-3500 between 8:30 a.m. and 5:30 p.m.

Production Crew
On staff today

Night Editor
Meghan Healy
Photo Technician
Andrew Tamulynas
Copy Editor
Matthew Reid
Production Supervisor
Cory Rosenberg
Production Staff
Josh Wesser, Nate Freedman

policelog

Former Student Government Speaker arrested

TuesdayFebruary8

8:20 a.m. Following a traffic stop, David Lewis, 25, of Cambridge, was arrested for operating a motor vehicle with a suspended license.

WednesdayFebruary9

2:50 p.m. Two vehicles were reported to have been scratched by keys in the parking lot behind the Mullins Center. The cars were towed from the lot and photos of the damage were taken.

5:19 p.m. A large quantity of copper wire was reported stolen from the Morrill Science Center. The wire was valued between $500 and $1000.

ThursdayFebruary10

1:22 a.m. A vehicle was reported leaving after it had struck another vehicle in the parking lot in front of Kennedy Hall. The vehicle had damage to the wheel well and pieces of the vehicle had fallen off of it. A suspect could not be located.

7:26 p.m. Hubcaps were reported stolen off a vehicle in the parking lot behind Sylvan. The value of the hubcaps was estimated at $80.

10:48 p.m. Two people, Kevin Devine, 19, of Hingham and Michael Barry, 18, of Newburyport, were arrested for being minors in possession of alcohol.

FridayFebruary11

7:57 p.m. After being asked for date of birth confirmations, Joseph Contois, 20, of Auburn, and Matthew Herron, 20, of Auburn, were arrested for being minors in possession of alcohol in the parking lot across the street from Southwest.

9:41 p.m. Matthew McGonigle, 20, of Tewksbury, was arrested for being a minor in possession of alcohol.

SaturdayFebruary12

1:51 a.m. Following a traffic stop and a Field Sobriety Test, Matthew Philos-Jenson, 19, of Barnstable, was arrested for operating a motor vehicle under the influence of alcohol, possession of an open container and being a minor in possession of alcohol in a motor vehicle.

7:58 a.m. Four hubcaps were reported stolen off a vehicle in the parking lot behind Sylvan. An officer stated that the hubcaps were found in the woods.

2:57 p.m. An ice skater was reported to be hit while on the ice. An ambulance transported the skater to the hospital.

6:48 p.m. Sean Connolly, 19, of Cohasset, was arrested for being a minor in possession of alcohol, and possession of a false identification and Robert Powers, 19, of Milton, was arrested for being a minor in possession of alcohol. These arrests took place in the parking lot across the street from Southwest.

9:27 p.m. Following a requested date of birth confirmation in the parking lot across the street from Southwest, Alexander Smith, 18, of Newton, was arrested for being a minor in possession of alcohol and possession of a false identification.

9:48 p.m. Mark Bortz, 18, of Franklin Lake, N.J., was arrested for being a minor in possession of alcohol in the Southwest Circle.

11:18 p.m. Following a traffic stop, Ryan Leblanc, 19, of Fiskdale, was arrested for Operating a motor vehicle under the influence of alcohol, and being a minor in possession of alcohol.

SundayFebruary13

1:38 a.m. A police officer stated that subjects in the parking lot behind Sylvan were running, following a car alarm going off.

Police officers investigated and found several damaged vehicles. The vehicles had broken windows with stereos stolen from them. One subject, Robert Fournier, 17, of East Hampton, was arrested for breaking and entering, larceny over $250, and destruction of property.

6:11 a.m. Four hubcaps were reported stolen off a vehicle. The hubcaps were valued at $30.00.

1:34 p.m. A mirror was reported broken off a vehicle on Thatcher Way. The damage was estimated at $100.00.

MondayFebruary14

1:18 a.m. A vehicle was found on the sidewalk appearing to have hit a street sign. A field sobriety test was given, and Patrick Higgins, 21, of Milton, was arrested for operating a motor vehicle under the influence of alcohol.

9:09 a.m. Following a traffic stop, Keith Kelley, 21, of Framingham, was arrested for operating a motor vehicle with a suspended license.

1:28 p.m. A person stated that graffiti was written on their ceiling and walls with glow in the dark ink in Dickinson Hall.

— Brendan Heck

Aide to Springfield Mayor found dead

SPRINGFIELD (AP) — An aide to Mayor Charles Ryan was found dead in his home Tuesday, the apparent victim of a shooting, police and the mayor's office said.

Stephen C. Pegram, 32, a neighborhood liaison for the mayor's office, was found inside his home on Dunmoreland Street about 2 p.m., authorities said. Police were investigating.

Juan Gerena, the city's community development director, told The Republican newspaper that Pegram had not reported to work on Tuesday and had not checked in by telephone.

Ryan went to the scene with his son, Timothy J. Ryan, who chairs the city police commission.

Prior to joining Ryan's staff, Pegram had been a software consultant for the city schools.

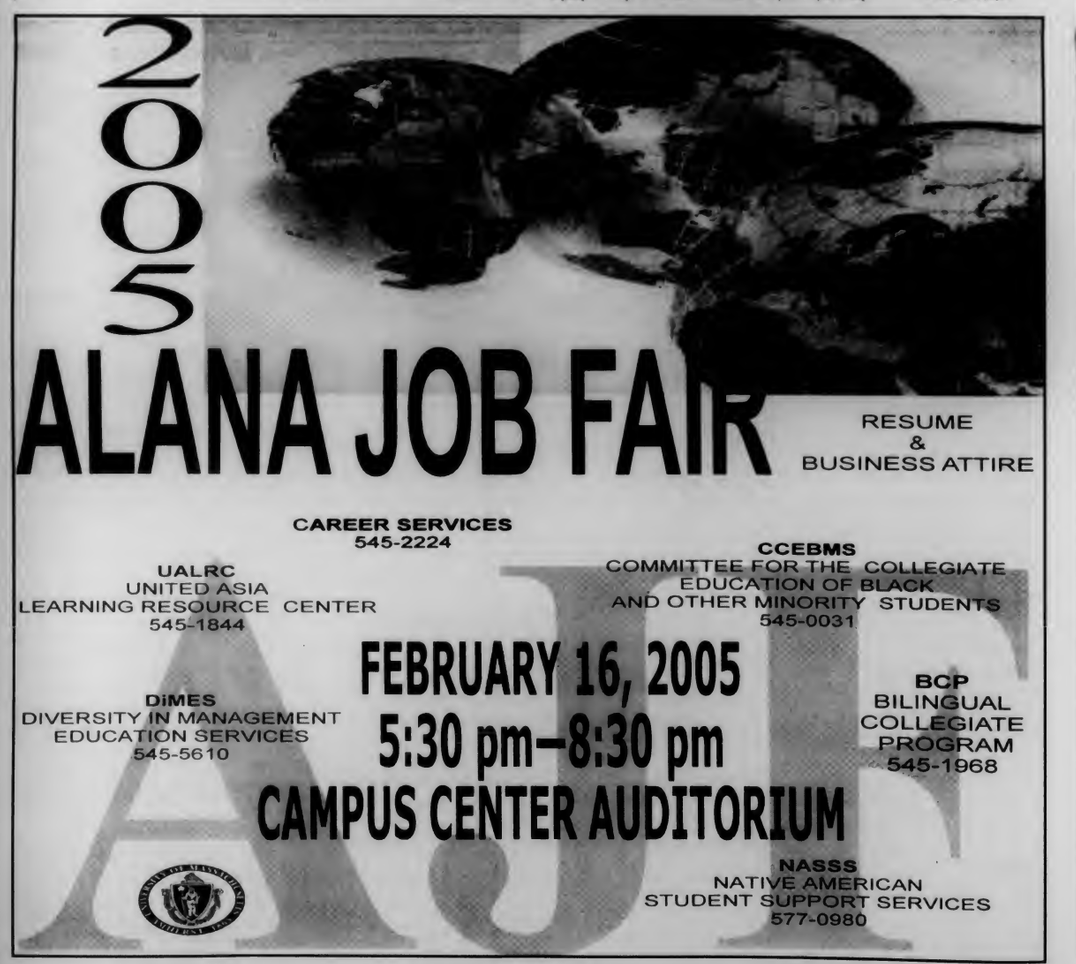
—Associated Press

Program aims to recruit students

GRANT from page 1

tor of the STEM Institute.

STEM Institute points to undergraduates' considering teaching as an option later in their academic careers as one of the main reasons for the lack of math and science teachers. "How do you find potential teachers when you don't know who they are, and they don't even know who they are," Sternheim said.



"It's partly due to the nature of secondary school teaching, because we have a lot of undergraduates in the elementary and early childhood programs saying, 'I'm going to college to become a teacher.' While you have people who are majoring in math and the sciences who go to college and major in a subject because they are interested in the subject," Feldman said.

To get students thinking about teaching earlier, part of the STEM Institute's function involves altering the way math and science courses are presented to freshman. "We work to reform freshman courses to try and put student's on the path. We want to make the classroom more interactive and fun, and so far we've had some success," Sternheim said. "We're not trying to change minds. But if you're open to suggestion, we'd like to talk to you about teaching. These scholarships make that financially viable."

The program is also pushing to recruit non-traditional and minority students from surrounding community colleges as well as the University Without Walls at UMass. "We've done a ton of recruiting at the community colleges," he said. "We've also done a lot of advertising on our campus, putting posters on buses and mass e-mails are about be sent out."

"We're working very closely with the community colleges in

See GRANT on page 3

Angry mob attacks Syrian workers

By Sam F. Ghattas
Associated Press

Bodies of those who were wounded and killed are carried out of the wreckage left from a bomb that went of in Lebanon on Sunday. The blast killed Lebanon's former Prime Minister.

BEIRUT, Lebanon — An angry mob attacked Syrian workers in southern Lebanon Tuesday, blaming Damascus for the assassination of former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri, and the interior minister suggested the killing may have been carried out by a suicide bomber.

Syria has denied any involvement in Hariri's assassination, which raised fears that Lebanon might revert to the political violence of the 1970s and '80s, and the U.S. Embassy in Beirut warned Americans in the Lebanese capital to exercise extreme caution.

Condemnation and expressions of shock came from around the Arab world and beyond. In Washington, White House spokesman Scott McClellan on Tuesday called Syria's presence a "destabilizing force," and said Lebanon must shake free of occupation by Syria, which maintains 15,000 troops here since the civil war ended in 1990 and has the final say in internal Lebanese politics.

Before his assassination, Hariri had positioned himself in opposition to a faction more solidly backed by Syria.

French Foreign Ministry spokesman Herve Ladsous said the U.N. Security Council was working on a declaration demanding that the Lebanese government bring to justice those responsible for the assassination and could adopt it later Tuesday.

"For us, it is very important that the text can effectively express today and without waiting the unanimity of the international community in condemning this criminal and odious act," Ladsous said.

Interior Minister Sul-

See LEBANON on page 4

UVC TV-19 raises funds, donates money for AIDS

TV/19 from page 1

the electronics in the station with the other half of the proceeds, he explained.

With the AIDS epidemic as a worldwide problem and news of a recently discovered drug resistant strain of HIV, UVC-TV's timing could not be more crucial.

The proceeds given to UNICEF went specifically to the Jamaican branch, a decision that was made in part by Crichton, who has worked in Jamaica and has family there. "AIDS is a really big deal down there," she said.

"Ten million children are orphaned by AIDS [worldwide]. A huge chunk of them are from the Caribbean," she continued.

According to UNICEF reports, 1.6 people in a thousand have HIV/AIDS in Jamaica as opposed to .193 people per thousand in the U.S. Of the afflicted, 8 percent are children, most of whom have grim prospects for the future. UNICEF estimates that just fewer than 500 Jamaican children had HIV/AIDS in 2003 as well as that four fifths of infected children live in poor households, and that one out of four will be abandoned.

UVC-TV has future plans to further the cause.

"We're hoping to make this an annual event," Crichton said. Next on UVC-TV's list of events is an Alumni Fair to be held at Pasta Y Basta "right around Spring break," said Snowdon.

Crichton said that the Children's AIDS Awareness Dating Auction will air on UVC-TV 19 at 9 p.m.

UVC TV-19 symbol.

15-year-old blames Zoloft drug for murdering his grandparents

By Bruce Smith
Associated Press

CHARLESTON, S.C. — A 15-year-old boy who claimed the anti-depressant Zoloft drove him to kill his grandparents and burn their house down was found guilty of murder Tuesday and sentenced to 30 years in prison.

The jury took six hours to reject Christopher Pittman's claim that he was "involuntarily intoxicated" by the drug and could not be held responsible for the crime.

The trial was the first case in the United States in which it was argued that the antidepressant led a youngster to kill, Pittman's lawyer said. It came at a time of heightened government attention to the use of antidepressants by children and growing evidence that the drugs can lead to suicidal impulses.

Pittman was 12 in 2001 when he killed his grandparents, Joe Pittman, 66, and Joy Pittman, 62, with a pump-action shotgun as they slept in their rural home, then torched their house and drove off in their car. He was charged as an adult.

Pittman hung his head as the verdict was read. "I know it's in the hands of God. Whatever he decides on, that's what it's going to be," he said quietly, just before Judge Danny Pieper handed down the minimum sentence. The boy could have gotten life in prison.

About a month before the slayings, Pittman was hospitalized after threatening to kill himself. He was prescribed the antidepressant Paxil and was later put on Zoloft.

A psychiatrist testified for the defense that the Zoloft was to blame for the killings, and a former Food and Drug Administration official testified that the crime was an angry, rash, manic act "that was chemically induced."

Pittman's lawyers urged the jury to send a message to the nation by blaming Zoloft. They said the negative effects of Zoloft are more pronounced in youngsters, and the drug affected Pittman so he did not know right from wrong.

"We do not convict children for murder when they have been ambushed by chemicals that destroy their ability to reason," attorney Paul Waldner said.

But prosecutors called the Zoloft defense a smokescreen, saying the boy knew exactly what he was doing. Prosecutor Barney Giese said the real motivation for the crime was the boy's anger at his grandparents for disciplining him for choking a younger student on a school bus.

And he reminded jurors how the boy carried out the killings — shooting his grandfather in the mouth and his grandmother in her head while both lay sleeping.

"I don't care how old he is. That is as malicious a killing — a murder — as you are ever going to find," the prosecutor said. He pointed to Pittman's statement to police in which he said his grandparents "deserved it."

'McLibel' case ruled unfair

By Jan Sluva
Associated Press

BRUSSELS, Belgium — Two vegetarian activists convicted of libeling fast-food giant McDonald's Corp. did not receive a fair trial in Britain, the European Court of Human Rights ruled Tuesday.

The Strasbourg, France-based court said David Morris and Helen Steel should have received legal aid from the British government when they were tried in what became widely known as the "McLibel" case, the longest in English history.

The two activists passed out flyers in 1984 that claimed the U.S.-based company was selling unhealthy food, was to blame for starvation in the Third World, and was destroying rainforests.

The European Court threw out a British court's 1987 guilty verdict, also saying English law unfairly had put the burden of proof on the defendants to justify every word in the leaflets they distributed but didn't write. The court awarded Morris and Steel damages of $25,934 and $19,451, respectively.

The British government has three months to appeal.

Activists against McDonald's were recently granted a new trial.

In London, Morris and Steel said in a statement they hoped the European court's ruling would "result in greater public scrutiny and criticism of power-ful organizations whose practices have a detrimental effect on society and the environment."

"The McLibel campaign has already proved that determined and widespread grass-roots protest and defiance can undermine those who try to silence their critics, and also render oppressive laws unworkable," the statement said.

Morris, 50, and Steel, 39, later went back to the spot outside a McDonald's branch in central London where they first handed out the flyers, setting up a banner that read "Celebrate 20 years of global resistance to McWorld."

"Obviously we are elated. It is a total victory in terms of the ruling," Morris told a crowd of supporters, photographers and journalists.

McDonald's U.K. office said the case related to a claim made against the British government, and it was therefore "inappropriate" for the company to comment on the case or its outcome.

New grant helps STEM program

GRANT from page 2

terms of recruiting transfer students, especially Springfield Technical Community College, Holyoke, Greenfield, and also University Without Walls. So, by non-traditional students we mean people who have not gone from high school directly into college. Among the non traditional students you are more likely to find minority students and people who have fewer resources," Feldman said.

The STEM Institute is also working to recruit minority students from within the UMass campus by working with multi-cultural groups such as the ALANA.

"We have a committee that works on scholarship recruitment, and we have representatives from each of those organizations on that committee," Feldman added. "The number of minority students in the math and sciences is very low. It's a real challenge to produce minority teachers in those areas because the students aren't even enrolled in those majors to begin with. That's one of the reasons we need to go outside the university and recruit elsewhere."

This is not the first time the STEM Institute has received a large grant. The Science, Mathematics, Engineering, and Technology Teacher Education Collaborative has received approximately $6.3 million in the last eight years. STEM connections, a program designed to put graduate students in middle school classrooms, has received $1.5 million over the last three years.

The deadline for scholarship applications is April 2005, however, applications received after that date will still be considered if funds are still available. Applications can be found on line at the STEM Bridge For Novice Scholars Web site, www.umassk12.net/bridge/.

MAKE $12/HR PLAYING POKER

In just a few days we will be adding poker to our stable of skill games and for an extremely limited time we're looking for a VERY SELECT FEW to join us right at the start. Yes, we will PAY YOU to play poker, as well as giving you a chance at other offers "regular" players will never see.

For more information:
www.gamesgrid.com/mas

GamesGrid Poker
Make your best play.

your byline could be here..

Write for NEWS

GREAT Reasons to use UHS Eye Care Services

1. Savings on routine eye exams for students at UMass
2. A great place to get contact lenses
3. FREE sample start-up contact lens solutions
4. Same day replacement of disposable contact lenses, in many cases
5. Contact lenses mailed directly to your home or office
6. FREE eyeglass adjustments and one year warranty on frames

SPECIAL OFFER: 10 PERCENT STUDENT DISCOUNT ON ALL FRAMES AND EYEGLASS LENSES!*

"I invite you to use the Eye Care Services"

Frederick H. Bloom, O.D.
Director, UHS Eye Care Services

* Cannot be combined with other insurance discounts.

For appointments or questions, call 577-5383
UHS EYE CARE SERVICES

Congratulations to the World Champion
New England Patriots

We won the wager...

Let's continue to celebrate and enjoy a feast on UPenn!

- Philly Cheese Steaks
- Pork Roll
- Soft Pretzels
- Tastykakes

Also enjoy a chance to win a Patriots Super Bowl Kit

Thursday, Feb. 17th
5-8 pm in all DC's

DINING SERVICES
UMassAmherst

Study shows benefits of coffee

By Randolph E. Schmid
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) — That hot cup of coffee may do more than just provide a tasty energy boost. It also may help prevent the most common type of liver cancer.

A study of more than 90,000 Japanese found that people who drank coffee daily or nearly every day had half the liver cancer risk of those who never drank coffee.

The American Cancer Society estimates that 18,920 new cases of liver cancer were diagnosed in the United States last year and some 14,270 people died of the illness. Causes include hepatitis, cirrhosis, excess alcohol consumption and diseases causing chronic inflammation of the liver.

Animal studies have suggested a protective association of coffee with liver cancer, so the research team led by Monami Inoue of the National Cancer Center in Tokyo analyzed a 10-year public health study to determine coffee use by people diagnosed with liver cancer and people who did not have cancer.

They found the likely occurrence of liver cancer in people who never or almost never drank coffee was 547.2 cases per 100,000 people over 10 years.

But for people who drank coffee daily the risk was 214.6 cases per 100,000, the researchers report in this week's issue of the Journal of the National Cancer Institute.

They found that the protective effect occurred in people who drank one to two cups of coffee a day and increased at three to four cups. They were unable to compare the effect of regular and decaffeinated coffee, however, because decaf is rarely consumed in Japan.

It's the caffeine in coffee that makes some people nervous and it has been shown in other studies to prompt mental alertness in many people. Some studies have suggested caffeine aggravates symptoms of menopause or intensifies the side effects of some antibiotics. Heavy caffeine use has been linked to miscarriage. But studies have also shown that a skin cream spiked with caffeine lowers the risk of skin cancer in mice.

"It's an excellent, interesting and provocative study and their conclusions seem justified," commented Dr. R. Palmer Beasley of the University of Texas M.D. Anderson Cancer Center in Houston.

"It will provoke a lot of new work here," said Beasley, who was not part of the research group.

While the study found a statistically significant relationship between drinking coffee and having less liver cancer, the authors note that it needs to be repeated in other groups.

And the reason for the reduction remains unclear.

However, Inoue's team noted that coffee contains large amounts of antioxidants and several animal studies have indicated those compounds have the potential to inhibit cancer in the liver.

In their study, the team also looked at green tea, which contains different antioxidants, and they found no association between drinking the tea and liver cancer rates.

"Other unidentified substances may also be responsible" for the reduction in cancers, they said.

A separate study reported in the same issue of the journal reported no relationship between drinking caffeinated coffee or tea and the rates of colon or rectal cancer.

However, that analysis did find a 52 percent decline in rectal cancer among people who regularly drank two or more cups of decaffeinated coffee.

ANDREW TAMI/DAILY COLLEGIAN

Coffee may not be as harmful as you think; it could be beneficial.

U.S. Senate confirms Chertoff as new Homeland Secretary

HOMELAND from page 1

Known as a fiery, wiry workhorse, Chertoff had previously been confirmed three times — as a 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals judge, Justice Department assistant attorney general and U.S. attorney in New Jersey.

He takes over the 180,000-employee Homeland Security Department in the wake of new regulations replacing salaries based on workers' seniority with a merit pay system. The regulations are being challenged in federal court by four labor unions who represent the agency's employees.

Chertoff replaces Tom Ridge, who stepped down Feb. 1.

COURTESY CNN.COM

President Bush stands along side Michael Chertoff, a former prosecutor who was confirmed yesterday as Homeland Security Secretary.

Mob scenes erupt after bombing

LEBANON from page 3

eiman Franjieh suggested that, based on the crater in the middle of the road and preliminary reports, the attack may have been carried out by a suicide bomber who rammed Hariri's motorcade with a vehicle laden with explosives.

Although most suspicion has fallen on Syria or its supporters in Lebanon, it was clear the possibilities also might include rogue Syrian intelligence operatives, or even factions among the country's myriad religious groups. Claims of responsibility by Islamic militants also raised the possibility that Hariri had been targeted because of his close ties to Saudi Arabia.

Justice Minister Adnan Addoum played down that possibility, and Hariri's political allies openly accused Syria and its Lebanese allies of being to blame.

In Hariri's hometown of Sidon on southern Lebanon's Mediterranean coast, dozens of demonstrators attacked Syrian workers Tuesday, slightly wounding five before police intervened. Hundreds of others marched in the streets. Black banners and pictures of the slain leader covered the streets as the country began three days of official mourning.

On Monday night, a mob attacked the offices of the Lebanese chapter of Syria's ruling Baath Party in Beirut with stones and set fire to shacks used to exchange money and sell cigarettes in front of it.

Police said the toll from the bombing was 14 dead and about 120 injured. A claim of responsibility by a previously unknown Islamic militant group — Support and Jihad in Syria and Lebanon — was not considered credible, with Addoum warning it could be an attempt "to mislead the investigation."

At the site of the bombing, cordoned off by troops, experts combed rooftops and the street for evidence. Residents swept debris from their balconies; at the HSBC bank, workers cleared glass shards and blinds from shattered windows, throwing them down to the street.

Hariri's political allies are openly accusing Syria and its Lebanese government allies for the bombing, and Hariri's family on Tuesday also hinted at their possible role.

Asked by reporters the reason for the assassination, Hariri's son, Saaddeddine, replied in his first public comment: "It's obvious. Isn't it?"

He did not elaborate, but on Monday evening he had sat next to a group of opposition politicians who held a symbolic meeting at Hariri's Beirut mansion, then came out with a statement blaming Syria and the Lebanese government for the assassination.

Saaddeddine Hariri told reporters at the bombing scene Tuesday that he hoped justice will be served. "My father served Lebanon all his life, and we will keep serving Lebanon also, like him."

Syria is the main power broker in Lebanon, and Hariri, who was Lebanon's prime minister for 10 of the last 14 years, began moving in recent months closer to the opposition, which has waged an unprecedented political campaign to pressure Damascus into withdrawing its army.

Hariri, who resigned in October but whose party was competing in upcoming elections, had the wealth and prominence to maintain a degree of independence from Syria. His death at age 60 deprives the political scene of an influential voice of moderation and skillful builder of coalitions.

Defrocked priest sentenced

SHANLEY from page 1

hundreds implicated in the scandal to face criminal charges. Most others escaped prosecution because the statute of limitations ran out long ago. But in Shanley's case, the clock stopped when he moved out of Massachusetts.

He was arrested in California in May 2002 and charged with raping four boys at St. Ann's. All four claimed they recovered memories of the abuse after the scandal broke.

But the case ran into numerous problems. In July, prosecutors dropped two accusers in what they said was a move to strengthen their case. Then, on the day jury selection began, they dropped a third accuser because he disappeared after a traumatic experience on the witness stand at a pretrial hearing last fall.

The clergy abuse scandal began in early 2002 when Cardinal Bernard Law acknowledged he shuffled Geoghan from parish to parish despite evidence the priest had molested children.

It intensified later in 2002 when the church released Shanley's 800-page personnel file. He argued for acceptance of homosexuality and pushed for gay rights — a violation of church teachings. He called himself a "sexual expert" and advertised his counseling services in the alternative press.

He resigned from parish work in 1989 and moved to California. At the time, Law, who resigned as archbishop in December 2002 at the height of the scandal, praised his "impressive record." Boston church officials recommended him for a job in the Diocese of San Bernardino as a priest in "good standing."

UMassAmherst Student Activities Center
UP TO THE MINUTE

February 16
Music Injection Wednesdays
Bring your lunch and get a healthy dose of live music between classes!
Student Union, Cape Cod Lounge
11am -1pm Free

February 17
Spike Lee
in the Cage!
8 pm Free

February 18
Brother to Brother
A feature-length drama invoking the glory days of the Harlem Renaissance. Winner of the 2004 Special Jury Prize at the Sundance Film Festival.
Campus Center, Room 174-76
9pm Free

Something Every Friday:
Bridget Jones, The Edge of Reason with Renee Zellweger
Campus Center, Room 163C
9pm Free

February 19
Dance the night away at the
Harlem Renaissance Ball
Featuring the Jeff Holmes Big Band, Hors d'Oeuvres and Cash Bar
Campus Center Auditorium, 7:30 pm
Tickets are available at Tix in the Student Union
$5 – UMass Amherst Students $10 – UMass Amherst Faculty and Staff

February 20
Sunday Night Movie:
Bridget Jones, The Edge of Reason with Renee Zellweger
Campus Center, Room 163C
8pm Free

February 22
Jazz History: Jazz Ensemble I
Listen to a variety of period and contemporary works for the big band.
Student Union, Cape Cod Lounge
2:30pm - 4:00pm Free

Student Union Craft Center daily hours:
Monday -Thursday 11am – 5pm, Friday 11am – 6pm,
Saturday 1pm – 6pm.

Support your local student businesses!
In the Student Union: Bike Coop, Campus Design & Copy, Earthfoods Café, People's Market, and Tix Unlimited. In the residence halls: Greenough Sub Shop, Sweets 'N More (Field), and Sylvan Snack Bar (McNamara).

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
EDITORIAL OPINION
WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 2005 "I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." -Voltaire EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

TASERs may prove deadly for UMass students

The need for certain innovations certainly pushes forward the advance of technology. Weapons, particularly in war time, are a solid example of this. Tools developed to deal with a particular situation that confronts us in the field. The stun gun, also known as a TASER, is precisely the same thing.

Though it is not classified as a lethal weapon, such as combat weaponry or even the standard police issued handgun, the TASER is responsible for its share of physical pain and many also claim death.

The TASER's practical purpose is beneficial to the job of the police officer. In fact, in situations where an officer may be dealing with a lethal encounter that involves weapons such as blunt objects or knives, the officer that has the alternative of reaching for the stun gun to disable the attacker instead of having to use a handgun, can avoid permanently injuring, disfiguring or killing the target.

Still the opposition to the TASER is quite clear. Many skeptics do not believe the "it's good for you" rhetoric which the TASER is marketed with. Certainly those skeptics would prefer that the "less than lethal" weapon is not used at all and argue against police even carrying such weaponry.

A CBS report from last October estimated that over 70 people have died after being shocked by stun guns. The makers of the stun guns refute any accusations, claiming that their product does not kill. Skeptics scoff at the very nature of the term "less than lethal." When the issue of TASERs was raised at UMass, after a report on the purchase of TASERs by the UMass Police Department, student groups reacted in opposition.

The Chicago Tribune reported that just last week a 14-year-old boy was put into cardiac arrest after an officer used a stun gun to restrain him. The boy had lunged at a police sergeant prompting the officer to put him down. There is no report of the boy using any weapon of any sort and this raises questions of the possible alternatives an officer can use to restrain violence. Amnesty International has condemned the use of stun guns on children, calling it an "excessive and cruel use of force," unless it is in response to an immediate threat.

Still the latest victim of the stun gun was a boy of 14 years, and though this incident raises many questions about the nature of the stun gun and the willingness of officers to use it, it does not parallel to the situation at the University of Massachusetts where the targets of stun guns would be older, legal adults over the age of 18.

This however does not provide sufficient cause or need for the use of the stun gun. Though officers at the university have dealt with riotous behavior in the past, other methods have been used to deal with crowd control and those tactics on their own have caused heated debate on the issue of police brutality and excessive force. Before the student body had an opportunity to fully address the issue of pepper ball guns, they are now confronted with a seemingly more dangerous, yet euphemistically less than lethal weapon.

Though the stun gun has not been found to be a direct cause of death, it has caused injury, and in the cases where victims have died after being jolted other factors have been in play namely drugs or alcohol. The presence of these substances change heart rates in the body and can cause dehydration making the effect of the stun gun much more potent and in many cases deadly.

It does not take a doctor, however, to recognize that riotous behavior at UMass is catalyzed by the consumption of alcoholic beverages. This fact alone should raise serious doubt about the use of the stun gun on UMass students.

Unsigned editorials represent the majority opinion of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian Editorial Board

STATE TREASURER SAK

WHAT SAY WE ROUND OFF THE SHORTFALL TO A JILLION KILLION SQUILLION DILLY-DILLION? IT SOUNDS BETTER.

UMass Amherst Inc.

Andrew Freeman

Every year brings more fee increases at the University of Massachusetts — the latest is $598 for in-state students. This complicated and thorny problem can be reduced to a single statement: we don't get enough money from the state to pay for expenses, so students must fork over the difference.

Some people are being priced out of their educations, while others must carry heavy debts into the working world. Of course, the obvious solution of raising state income taxes is grossly unfair, since the good people of Massachusetts cannot stand to pay more. However, after much soul-searching, and not a little inspiration from our esteemed president, I have come up with the answer: privatize.

To prepare UMass for years of glorious expansion, we need to fundamentally remake the campus, starting with the basic philosophy. Too many state colleges prize abstract qualities, like education, or providing valuable life skills, while refusing to acknowledge their true obligations: to ensure a profit to their shareholders. The first step, then, is to launch an IPO for UMass Amherst Inc. to get shareholders the nation and world over. With this influx of capital, we can begin the ambitious project of creating a profitable institution.

With a cabal of greedy investors at our back, it is important to take some further philosophical and legal measures. As a full-fledged corporation, UMass Amherst Inc. should rename all of its denizens "associates," rather than continuing with the archaic descriptor of "students." This way our "associates" will realize they are only loosely tied to the company, and as such can be eliminated at any time. Furthermore, we should require all prospective associates to sign legal release forms eliminating the company's liability, for reasons discussed below.

With these reforms complete, it's time to increase revenue. First, all associates should be required to come from outside of the state — since such individuals would have to pay approximately $9,000 more than those within Massachusetts. This would be a mere enhancement of the UMass Amherst Master Financial Plan, which hopes to add 1,500 students, primarily from other states, to the campus.

As a full-fledged corporation, UMass Amherst Inc. should rename all of its denizens "associates," rather than continuing with the archaic descriptor of "students."

Following these changes, we must take advantage of our most valuable resource — the associates themselves. Many are engaged in activities that, while fun and perhaps educational, do nothing to enhance UMass Amherst's revenue. Therefore, I propose the establishment of the UMass Slave Study Program, in which all associates are required to enroll. This program would be modeled in part on the current Work Study program, except that It would, whenever possible, ignore state and federal labor laws, to minimize expenses.

Our new Slave Study Program could attract important industries, as well as provide associates valuable work experience for future jobs in the slavery sector. A potential model of this would be the Fang Lin schoolhouse in China, where students produced fireworks until 2001, when an accidental explosion killed over 40 people.

Since these industries might endanger the associates' lives, not only is the legal waiver absolutely necessary, but also UMass Amherst Inc. should take out life insurance on all its associates. Utilizing policies called Corporate Owned Life Insurance, a company can make money off the deaths of their employees, so by creating an unsafe and unhealthy environment, the campus stands to prosper.

Sources of further revenue abound. Throw out Efollet, and create a store that directly conspires with publishers — the minimum price for each book should be $100, providing both the textbook makers and UMass Amherst Inc. with gargantuan profits. Convert the Old Chapel into a nightclub. Require the SGA and all RSOs to pay taxes. Move Health Services to Holyoke so they don't have to treat any associates who live on campus. Sell alcohol and drugs to associates, and then charge them for rehab services. And don't get me started with faculty cuts. Once you add a profit motive and shed your scruples, the possibilities for exploitation are endless.

Now, maybe the education wouldn't be so good, but that's not the point, is it? The point is that, thanks to privatization, we avoided raising taxes. Because after all, what's more important — having a quality university, or having low taxes?

Andrew Freeman is a Collegian columnist.

End of War on Terror

Todd Hanaburgh

On Sept. 11, 2001, thousands of lives were lost to terrorism. But the Bush administration's response was as if it was the first time it had ever happened. From a global perspective the idea that any nation, no matter how powerful, could stamp out terrorism is ridiculously arrogant. Yet, this is precisely what George W. Bush was proclaiming he would do.

The War on Terror, like the War on Drugs, is ultimately unable to be won on its own terms, matching violence and provocation with more violence and provocation. The War on Drugs was fundamentally flawed by the criminalization of drugs, alienating users from the state/federally-sponsored institutions, health or treatment programs and law-enforcement officials who previously could've had some hand in steering the crisis to manageable levels.

In kind, it is fairly obvious that our own War on Terror has and will continue to create more terrorists. By simply parading down Nationalist Avenue, the United States will snowball resentment into full-fledged hatred aimed at us by our neighbors abroad. We have already seen deep divisions forming between current US policy and that of even our staunchest allies.

Europeans have a saying that goes like this: "In America, sex is an obsession. Everywhere else, it's a fact."

Now the same is true for terror, except in this case here at home, it is also a paradox. George W. Bush penned the following definition of terrorism himself (or at least we should hope) in an Executive Order on Sept. 24, 2001: (a) the term "person" means an individual or entity; (b) the term "entity" means a partnership, association, corporation, or other organization, group, or subgroup; (c) the term "United States person" means any United States citizen, permanent resident alien, entity organized under the laws of the United States (including foreign branches), or any person in the United States; and (d) the term "terrorism" means an activity that — (i) involves a violent act or an act dangerous to human life, property, or infrastructure; and (ii) appears to be intended — (A) to intimidate or coerce a civilian population; (B) to influence the policy of a government by intimidation or coercion; or (C) to affect the conduct of a government by mass destruction, assassination, kidnapping, or hostage-taking."

It is fairly obvious that our own War on Terror has and will continue to create more terrorists. By simply parading down Nationalist Avenue, the United States will snowball resentment into full-fledged hatred aimed at us by our neighbors abroad.

The rest of the world has lived with terrorism on their soil for decades. In some cases, the United States has participated in this, directly or indirectly, often using the CIA. This is an easily verifiable fact. Go to the CIA's own web site, www.cia.gov, and look at unclassified documents made available through the Freedom of Information Act, especially those related to Honduras, Chile, Ba'athist Iraq, Iran, Indonesia and Afghanistan, to name a few. Under Bush's own definition of terrorism, the United States' pre- and post-invasion actions in Iraq could be considered terrorism.

Yet, in places like Germany and Japan, where there are actually war crimes charges pending against Bush, Cheney and Rumsfeld, the diplomatic approach is to dub these actions "aggression," which defined loosely, is an unprovoked or unjustified military attack on a nation or people. These war crimes charges also include flagrant violation of the guidelines set by the Geneva Convention for the treatment of Prisoners of War.

However, it seems to be the US government's policy to ignore the rest of the world and even International Law, which our representatives helped to draft and pass by democratic means in the United Nations.

In 1997, Dick Cheney and Donald Rumsfeld, along with a now globally infamous host of others, created The Project for the New American Century, a radical-right wing forum for "opinion leaders" to disseminate information and discuss global issues. It is here that the notion of invading Iraq was discussed ad nauseam — from PNAC's inception until the invasion actually happened. Visit their web site, www.newamericancentury.org, and explore.

Start with PNAC's Statement of Principles, take note of its signatures at the end and proceed to the Defense and National Security section and read Rebuilding America's Defenses, principal author, Thomas Donnelly. The document is 80-90 pages long, so be prepared to invest some time. Try to keep in mind, for the purposes of perspective, that it was drafted in Sept. 2000.

Some readers, if they've continued this far, may take offense to this column. However, I am addressing these issues because I love my nation. It is my home and has been my family's home for 13 generations. I firmly believe in freedom and democracy, but neither hypocrisy nor apathy. This is our nation, and it is up to us to guide it. Ours is a government not only for the people, but also by the people. But that's just my opinion.

Todd Hanaburgh is a Collegian columnist.

Be yourself and no one else

Colin Jones

The list of metaphors and allegories that attempt to define or explain life in some way are seemingly endless. Some say that it's a game in which some people are better players than others. Others say that it's a series of moments, or a box of chocolates. Personally, I like to think of it as a journey. Quest isn't the right word, but it's the first word that comes to mind. The thing about it is that there isn't a set destination. You never know where you're goin' until you get there. As time passes, if you're willing to let yourself have the necessary depth, you might find that you have questions you never knew you had. Who are you? What do you want?

In contemporary society, and in particular the microcosm known as higher education that we are all a part of, adolescence has been delayed until the mid-to-late-20s. Because of the fact that our generation doesn't really have a cultural movement for us to grab on to, or a struggle such as a war, famine or depression to teach us just how valuable and precious life is, many of us are in an identity crisis. We are the products of a mind-controlling media that has blurred the lines between entertainment and news to the point where they cannot be distinguished from one another, and we are bombarded with images of icons telling us who we are supposed to be.

With so many things left up in the air, and so much pressure to look and act a certain way, a lot of us behave in ways that are not reflective of who we really are.

Although women have been pressured by the media to be thin and beautiful for some time now, the degree to which this pressure is pervasive in television, movies and magazines is almost frightening. And now even men feel that they are supposed to look a certain way, evidence that can be seen in the metrosexual movement, the male response to this same pressure. Our grandparents had the Great Depression and World War II. Our parents had Vietnam and Woodstock. What are we left with? Reality TV. Britney Spears. "Newlyweds." And they wonder why suburban drug use is so popular.

There is a harsh reality that, sometimes, we're our own worst enemies. With so many things left up in the air, and so much pressure to look and act a certain way, a lot of us behave in ways that are not reflective of who we really are. A guy who is kind and sensitive at heart might act like an immature jerk. A girl who is actually intelligent and thoughtful might act superficial and conceited.

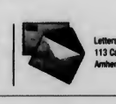
Jim Morrison, famed American poet and philosopher, once said, "The most important kind of freedom is to be who you really are. You trade in your reality for a role. You give up your ability to feel, and in exchange, put on a mask." Some of the biggest barriers that we come across on the road to happiness are the ones we put there ourselves.

So what can we do? If we stay positive, we'll figure things out. Time will tell us what we need to know if we keep our minds and hearts open. In many ways, college is just an extension of high school; a fantasy in which responsibilities are low and priorities are out of line. I don't know exactly when I personally began the transition from being someone I didn't like to being the person I wanted to be, but I know that it has something to do with the fact that the real world isn't that far away. Pretty soon, no one is going to care what I did last weekend or even what grade I got on my last test. And I know that I still have a lot to learn, but I have recognized several things that I feel are particularly important, and not just for myself but for all of us.

We should stay focused on our goals, but be humble about achieving them. We should try to help someone else if we can, and swallow our pride enough to ask for help when we need it. We should give others the benefit of the doubt until they give us a reason not to. We should apologize wholeheartedly for our wrongdoings and accept the earnest apologies of those who have wronged us. Who knows ... if we can let the goodness within us out, just seeing it might be all someone else needs.

Colin Jones is a Collegian columnist.

SUBMIT A LETTER OR OPINION



In order to be considered for publication, all submissions must include the writer's name, address, and telephone number or e-mail address. Letters should be no longer than 450 words in length and addressed as 'Letters to the Editor.' Commentaries should be no more than 750 words and addressed as 'Editorial/Opinion.' Submissions may be edited for clarity and condensed. You may write, fax, or e-mail your submissions to:

editorial@dailycollegian.com

413-545-3099

Letters to the Editor
113 Campus Center
Amherst, MA 01003

Education: a tool of oppression

Amelia Sabadini

I was 12 years old in 1982, and the infamous proposition had just decimated the public schools of Massachusetts. I sat quiet and still in the back of my seventh grade class as Mr. Osborne explained how, due to the sudden loss of funds, there wouldn't be any field trips this year, not even for the advanced placement division seated before him. That's when a wave of indignation rose up over his humble exposition and broke in angry pubescent tones where the delusions of indemnity had shattered.

Osborne tried to stem the tides of "no way" and "not fair" with patient reasoning about the expenses of admissions and transportation. "There's also the cost of gas for the buses we'd take." He pleaded for a rational consideration of the facts with his arms stretched out wide, making himself an easy target.

From the middle of the room one of the kids launched another proposition like a spitball. "Why don't we let the normal kids push the bus?" The class erupted with laughter. I said nothing that day. I had already applied for a transfer out, to be normal again. Most of the gifted children of Quincy were sanguinary, while I was already anemic.

Every human alive has a certain inclination towards oppressing others. The problem is that instead of acknowledging this and striving to temper it, most people look for ways to exonerate themselves for trespassing against others.

Those words and their warm reception still haunt me to this day. Those words echoed a sentiment that is still prevalent, ringing out just as loudly now as it did back then, if not louder. It's an amendment to Machiavellian thought. The ominous "might makes right" doctrine has become "academic might makes right". This adaptation is no less fearsome than the original.

We live in a world where whether or not a person is treated as though they deserve to make a living wage is dependant upon their education level. If you don't have a college degree and you don't have formal training in a skilled trade (which is not as easy to come by as some might think, and don't forget about getting into a union) your best shot at being able to make enough money to pay the rent on an apartment is to try like hell to get a job that most people with a choice in the matter wouldn't do.

Maybe, if you're lucky, you could work in the post office and have your joints and disks crushed. Maybe you could work in sanitation and be subjected to evidence supporting the claim that people are pigs. Or maybe you could work in a hospital and endure spine crushing work loads and liberated bodily fluids. For all your efforts you'll just barely be able to get by. People with better jobs (more education) than you will at best, be dismissive, but more often they will be trying to figure out how to get you to do more work for less money. Their jobs will usually be to make you more efficient, more machine-like, better at pushing buses. That's what you're here for, normie.

Every human alive has a certain inclination towards oppressing others. The problem is that instead of acknowledging this and striving to temper it, most people look for ways to exonerate themselves for trespassing against others. Children find out quickly that certain groups of people can be regarded with contempt and subsequently treated like machines and exploited. One of the places kids find this out the fastest is at school.

Our educational system doesn't just dole out hand stamps for access to ever increasing tiers in an oppressive hierarchy; it plays a crucial role in forging and maintaining this hierarchy. I don't say this as an indictment of everyone working within the educational system. Most educators are well intentioned, indeed some of the most altruistic people I've ever met are educators, but ultimately we're all influenced by our social context.

For the most part, in our culture, any seeming lack of knowledge is grounds for derision. Not all teachers are willing to question themselves. If someone doesn't understand something that you've just explained it's less of a threat to your self esteem to think the limiting factor is their capacity for comprehension rather than your ability for expression. Inquiry, the attempt to acquire knowledge, is simultaneously an admission that we either lack knowledge or doubt the validity of what we already know. Yet when knowledge has become a commodity to be hoarded, people are less apt to risk inquiry. It's tantamount to admitting to poverty or deflating the value of what you have.

Learning without questioning is what the revolutionary educator and philosopher Paulo Freire describes as "the banking concept of education" in his work "The Pedagogy of the Oppressed." Freire contends that this sort of passive learning in the classroom primes people for a passive existence in the world and that the traditional methods of education make it a tool of oppression. Is it any wonder that the conservative right is seeking to increase its presence in higher education?

If education is currently a tool of oppression, then it can't serve to truly liberate and enlighten anyone, regardless of what the political leanings of the highest ivory towers are. A tool of oppression makes an oppressor out of whoever wields it. It corrupts and calls out to its master. Sounds like the one ring to rule them all? Same difference, the educational system as it stands is doing a great deal of harm and if the conservative right comes to dominate it once again ... the world probably will be plunged into darkness.

Amelia Sabadini is a Collegian columnist.

Slammy Awards: Bad artists and why I hate them

Thomas Naughton

Watching the Grammy Awards has proven to be a perennial disappointment of monumental proportions. Nothing seems to change. The same crappy so-called "artists" are awarded for the same crappy regurgitations of less-than-passable music, while most legitimate artists who are doing breakthrough work are overlooked.

To put icing on this cake of crap is the red carpet shenanigans of Star Jones, who is the biggest idiot to ever emerge in the media. Alongside Jones is the ever vigilant "Z-Lister" Kathy Griffin who asks stupid questions to musicians on the red carpet to seem "spontaneous" or "out of control." Oh, that Kathy Griffin, she's out of control with her short legs and her red hair and asking people about deli products! What will they think of next?!

You know you're a failure when your audience would choose Joan and Melissa Rivers over you. At least Joan Rivers gave us something to contemplate: the mathematical force of tension exerted on her hairline by her numerous facelifts and the actual volume of alcohol she consumed before beginning her red-carpet coverage that night.

Although some "artists" are left out of the running for the Grammy's, somehow being shut out of a category doesn't seem to send the message that I think needs to be made plainly clear to these bands, namely that they are terrible. And what of the terrible artists that are somehow nominated due to the idiotic populace's adherence to blind idolatry? I now present a solution, The Slammy Awards, a different kind of award ceremony.

There's no red-carpet banter, no sugar-coating and fake worship of crappy musicians: The Slammy Awards are dedicated to making it clear to bad musicians, Grammy winners or not, TRL heavy-hitters or not, that they should no longer play music. What will this illustrious Award ceremony offer? A roster of bands/artists who need to retire immediately and the reasons why they are terrible, awful, bad, horrible, unbearable and unmusical. Who decides which musicians/artists are Slammable? Me, because not only am I always right, but also because I am never wrong.

Bands/ "Artists" who need to go away or stop recording if they haven't already:

Although some "artists" are left out of the running for the Grammy's, somehow being shut out of a category doesn't seem to send the message that I think needs to be made plainly clear to these bands, namely that they are terrible.

Linkin Park.

Why: Rap-rock is so 1999. I'm glad that they can write lyrics that speak to mallrats, but what about the rest of us? When I trash this band, people always snap at me "those songs are, like, exactly what I'm feeling". Of course, usually the people who are snapping at me are 12-years-old or have no personality.

What this band should do instead: Work at a mall kiosk, that way they can be in touch with their fan-base without bothering the rest of the population who have ears. And leave my beloved Jay-Z alone.

Christina Milian.

Why: Her one hit, "Dip it Low" where she instructs young ladies to "Popta, popta, pop that thing" sounds like a commercial for an acne treatment and her voice sounds like a cartoon cat that has smoked a lot of pot.

What she should do instead: Pro-Activ commercials. Together with Jessica Simpson and Vanessa Williams, Milian could sing some kind of theme song for Pro-Activ complete with a music video where they wear mud masks and do the Roger Rabbit.

The White Stripes, The Killers, The Sounds, The Vines, The Hives, Franz Ferdinand and The Strokes.

Why: We're cleaning out the garage, people, because we've all had enough. These bands need to come to grips with the fact that they are one-trick ponies, all riding the garage-rock wave of pop-fickleness. Remember when ska was popular? I rest my case.

What they should do instead: Work at clothing stores at the same mall as Linkin Park so that they will all have something to do on the weekends.

Ashlee Simpson.

Why: Because she is terrible.

What she should do instead: Nothing. She should have a million babies in the Midwest and get amazingly obese and then become the minister of a church with her children as its congregation. I can't wait for that "Where Are They Now?"

Gretchen Wilson.

Why: I'm glad that you're a "redneck" and everything, but I'm missing the part where you are supposed to be proud of that. I think I missed that memo when President Heehaw got elected for the second time.

What she should do instead: I don't really know, pray for a tornado-free summer?

John Mayer, Dave Matthews, Five for Fighting, Gavin DeGraw, Jason Mraz, Maroon 5.

Why: This is the "My voice sounds like an old woman being strangled" crew. I don't want to hear about your triumph over your high school, crashing into women, being some kind of bird, where you stick your fingers, or you being "yourself" because frankly, I don't like you.

What they should do instead: Work at the record store in the mall where Linkin Park and the Garage Rock kids work so that they can talk about how "intense" the new Tom Petty record is and start a Phish cover band together.

We now conclude this year's Slammy Awards. As with most award shows, we were unable to showcase every instance of horrendous musical activity in the recording industry. Unfortunately for the listening population, there are just too many bad acts to follow and way too many award shows giving them props. Until one day when artists like Three Doors Down, Hillary Duff and I-Kwon are tarred and feathered in the streets for making terrible music, I remain your faithful servant and decipherer of all that is crap in pop culture.

Thomas Naughton is a Collegian columnist.

UMass social scene limiting

Becky Martins

Given the once infamous reputation of UMass' social scene, it is hard to believe oftentimes there is little to do on weekends. But with each passing year, this university comes closer to losing its title of 'The Zoo.'

Upon arriving at UMass freshman year, almost every student can attest to having a few crazy experiences. Suddenly, we found ourselves surrounded by thousands of our peers with little supervision. For many, this marked our first time away from the watchful eyes our parents. It was also a delicious first taste of independence. In the beginning, whether we left campus or not, it made no difference. In most cases, very few factors were needed to create a 'Zoomass' worthy night.

But like any new thing, the lifestyle of dorm room parties, fraternities, etc. soon got familiar and lost some of its initial appeal. No longer was it exciting to simply drink in the room down the hall. Frat parties became synonymous with beer-soaked clothes, ill-mannered guys and girls behaving with little self-respect. Essentially, or at least in my experience, a change of scenery became completely necessary.

I then realized the difficulty of my situation: was there much to do for the age group too young to drink legally, but over the scene we experienced as freshmen?

Upon returning to UMass this year, I wondered what my weekends would entail. Greek life proved dissatisfying. A new residential area did bring a scenery change, but I found it offered little more to do than my old dorm had. Even the University seemed to offer few options for students looking to try something different. I then realized the difficulty of my situation: was there much to do for the age group too young to drink legally, but over the scene we experienced as freshmen?

Over winter break, I visited a friend who went to school in West Virginia. Though I only spent a weekend there, I left feeling completely satisfied that my trip had gone well. There was always something to do, whether it was a school function, party, or a 19-plus club/bar that actually remained open beyond 1:00 a.m. While in West Virginia, I found myself wishing my college experience was similar to the one I was currently experiencing. But I knew upon returning to UMass, I would find myself bored with the same weekend routines everyone seemed to follow.

Personally, I believe the social aspect of UMass has gone downhill. I do not condone more drinking or substance abuse on campus. Personally, I don't need alcohol to have fun, and I certainly don't appreciate being kept awake by drunken students at 4:00 a.m. But I believe both UMass and local businesses need to realize who their entire 'cliental' is. Not everyone just turned 18 and is new to going out. Not every person is 21-plus either, or able to illegally use a fake ID.

If local clubs/bars, such as those in Amherst or even Springfield, took notice of all of their potential customers, they could certainly increase their profits. I suggest making more establishments 19-plus, yet 21-plus to drink, thus ensuring the crowd will be more mature, yet more representative of a college campus. Students in their sophomore and junior years would actually have somewhere to go, legally. Lowering the age of such businesses could even decrease the use of fake IDs and possibly underage drinking. Not every person's night centers around alcohol. There are people who simply like to go out, yet in this area, they find their options limited.

I also believe it would be beneficial to have more cultural events on campus. Personally, I enjoy going to club sponsored events, such as those thrown by the Black Mass Communication Project. Such affairs encourage cultural awareness, tolerance and promote the idea of diversity. As made evident this fall, UMass still has many problems regarding such issues. Such a positive environment for all to share could certainly help alleviate some of these concerns.

No longer am I a naive freshman, but I do feel the consequences of being under 21. I also know I am not the only person who wonders what's going on each weekend. If our local area became more aware of its residents, I believe many could benefit. Not everything should center on alcohol. Our nights also shouldn't have to end at 1:00 a.m., just because there is little else to do. But I believe more should be done to cater to a larger portion of the UMass and local college community. People do say college should be some of the best years of our lives. I just wish more opportunities existed to make it so.

Becky Martins is a Collegian columnist.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

PALESTINIAN ARGUMENTS ONE-SIDED

Recently, articles by Yousef Munayyer have appeared that all but call for the destruction of the State of Israel. Munayyer sees to it that the Palestinian cause is well spoken for, something I happen to agree with. I agree that the time has come for the Palestinians to have a country of their own.

However, Munayyer's judgments and arguments have been so one-sided and anti-Israel, you'd almost think that he's ready to blow himself up in Jerusalem for his beliefs. Yousef, it's time to open your mind just a little bit and see that all of Israel, namely Jews, aren't the evil child murderers you portray them to be. How many innocent children have Palestinian terrorists blown up on a public bus driving down the street?

You don't see Israeli citizens walking down the street of Jericho or Gaza City with a bomb under his jacket, waiting for the moment to kill as many people as possible. Please, take a step back, leave your emotions behind you for ten minutes and give us fair and balanced articles, articles all of the students of this university deserve to read.

Marc Lerman
UMass student

SCHOOLGIRL'S DEATH HOLDS DISCREPANCIES

Yousef, it was very nice of you to apologize for your mistake in Tuesday's article. I hope you're prepared to apologize again for yet another of your mistakes targeted at Israel. Nuran Dib, the girl whom you wrote about, was a 10 year-old schoolgirl allegedly shot by the Israel Defense Forces. However, Reuters reported that Israeli soldiers were 600 meters away and could not have possibly shot her. In fact, according to the Jerusalem Post, the Palestinian Authority has arrested a Palestinian man for her death. I am deeply saddened at her unfortunate death, but do not pin this on the Israeli Army.

Talya Mazor
UMass student

POOR CHOICE IN ROLE MODEL

I am writing in response to the recent editorial "Time to Change the Box," wherein Ben Duffy calls for the university to hire conservative faculty in order to expand student horizons and offer an education "outside the box."

It is not with this proposition that I find fault, but rather in his candidate. Duffy proposes Dr. Michael Savage as the epitome of conservatism and seems convinced that Savage would open our minds and further our intellects. However, he makes no mention of Dr. Savage's very public history of vicious homophobia.

Some time ago, Dr. Savage hosted an MSNBC show "Savage Nation," which he used to publicly assault homosexuals. He questioned a caller one night, asking if he was "one of those sodomists." Once the caller affirmed this, Savage told him "to get AIDS and die, you pig." He also publicly referenced the Million Mom March as the "Million Dyke March" in May of 2000. This sort of prejudiced and bigoted behavior from a professor is hardly going to enhance our education or "expand horizons."

So the question arises, must a staunch conservative also be hateful to appease the conservative element of our campus? In light of Savage's incendiary history, how likely is it that our GLBT and allied students would feel comfortable in such a hostile classroom environment? We are all for diversity on campus, political as well as otherwise, but how is hiring an open bigot going to facilitate diversity?

Michael Tsapatsaris
UMass student

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY Collegian NOTICE: The Collegian is hiring an assistant Editorial/Opinon Editor. Stop by the Collegian office in the evening and speak with Allison or Matt if interested.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
ARTS & LIVING
WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 2005 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Soloist takes center stage

By Marina Solovyov
Collegian Correspondent

It's not often that you get to see a child prodigy.

Julie Albers began studying the violin at the age of two. She later decided to switch to the cello at the eager age of four. Since her transition to cello, Albers' has become a ruthless and masterful cello player.

Although born with a gift for playing music, Albers has worked diligently to prepare for her success, and has also made a great deal of sacrifices to get to where she is today.

Julie Albers
Thur. Feb. 17
Bowker Auditorium
UMass
$10, $7

Originally raised in Longmont, Col., Albers made a career-oriented decision early during her junior year of high school. Albers said goodbye to family and friends and moved to Ohio to study with the Young Artists Program at the Clevlaend Institute of Music.

Albers' talents were quickly recognized. At only seventeen, she made her debut with the Cleveland Orchestra. Since her debut, Albers has begun touring internationally. She has been invited to play at New Zealand's Dunedin Sinfonia and Auckland Philharmonia, Germany's Philharmonisches Orchester Ausburg and Osnabrucher Symphonieorchester. She even has done a tour of France with the Orchestre Symphonique de Douai.

In 2002, Albers won a second prize from Munich's Internationalen Musikwettbewerbes der ARD and in 2001 was appreciated with the Wilhelm-Weichsler-Musikpreis der Stadt Osnabruck award. It is no wonder then why Albers' talents have been highlighted from one concert to the next and her name has gained a lot of attention.

In 1998, the Roanoke Times was one of the first critics to observe Albers potential stating, "Albers is destined to be one of the most acclaimed and beloved American artists of the 21st century." In 1999, Evansville Courier & Press said "Albers musicality, dramatic flair, brilliant style, and control establish her as a world class virtuoso." Albers' critics have only words of praise and awe for tactful and mature playing that improved even more with time.

Tomorrow night, at 7:30 p.m. in the Bowker Auditorium, don't miss a stunning and invigorating performance given by this rare and entrancing player. Albers will deliver her signature cello playing made up of a colorful tone and gorgeous vibrato. Albers, 24, will be accompanied by pianist Angela Jia Kim in a program that features Beethoven's Variations in E-Flat major on "Bei Mannern" and Sonata No.3 in a Major for Cello and Piano, Op. 70 and Massenet's meditation" from Thais.

If you can't wait until tomorrow night to see Albers, you can catch her today. Prior to the show, Albers will be giving a lecture and demonstration at the Forest Park Middle School in Springfield from 10:00-11:00 a.m. and also at 6:00-7:00 p.m. in the Bezanson Recital Hall.

'Woolf' shows its teeth

Edward Albee's 1962 classic sizzles in pre-Broadway tryout at Boston's Wilbur Theater

By Joe Pietrafette
Collegian Staff

BOSTON — You are cordially invited to George and Martha's house for fun and games. Here, the liquor flows like rain and the insults flow almost as freely. Nick and Honey, a young couple new to the college town "Who's Afraid of Virgina Woolf" is set in, are the unknowing guests caught in the middle of George and Martha's darkly comic and often sadistic night of exhausting mind games.

Such is the premise for the revival of Edward Albee's groundbreaking 1962 drama "Who's Afraid of Virgina Woolf?" When "Woolf" originally opened in the fall of 1962, it was greeted with wild acclaim, and catapulted Albee into the stratosphere with the likes of such great modern playwrights as Tugene O'Neill, Tennessee Williams and Arthur Miller. With the recent passing of Miller, it leaves only Albee as one of the greatest living American dramatists.

Uta Hagen and Arthur Hill played Martha and George in that initial run, and during its over 600 performance run, it swept the 1963 Tony Awards winning five awards, including Best Play. In 1966, a then unknown Mike Nichols tackled "Virginia Woolf" for the big screen, and it was greeted with the same acclaim it found on the stage. Filling the shoes of George and Martha on the big screen were Richard Burton and Elizabeth Taylor respectively. The film was nominated for 13 Academy Awards, including Best Picture, and won five, including a Best Supporting Actress statue for Sandy Dennis who played Honey and Best Actress for Elizabeth Taylor, for her ferocious portrayal of Martha.

'Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf'
Until March 6
Wilbur Theater
Boston
$25-$85

Now, over 40 years after its explosive debut, "Virgina Woolf" is back and packs an impressive punch. The sultry and husky voiced Kathleen Turner, who makes a triumphant return to Boston after her sellout run in "The Graduate" in 2002, stars as vicious Martha, and theater clown Bill Irwin stars as the impish yet extremely sharp George. Relative theater newcomers David Harbour and Mirelle Enos star as the unsuspecting young couple, Nick and Honey, who are lured into the psychotic web of George and Martha.

The cast is tight and intimate, only having four players, and they all give outstanding performances. Irwin's portrayal of George is a revelation and Turner is sensational as the beastly Martha. Harbour and Enos don't seem quite as connected to the material as Irwin and Turner, but that will no doubt be tuned during previews, and by the time "Virgina Woolf" opens in New York next month, they will be up to par.

Under the skillful direction of Tony Award winner and frequent Albee collaborator Anthony Page, "Virginia Woolf" (which clocks in at just over three hours) keeps a fairly brisk pace, but does falter in some areas. During Act II, which is about 75 minutes, there are quite a few lulls that, again, once it opens in New York, should be ironed out.

The design team is also top notch. Costuming legend and 14-time Tony Award nominee Jane Greenwood outfits the cast quite nicely, and accentuates Ms. Turner's curves. Set designer John Lee Beatty has given George and Martha a tastefully appointed house in which to destroy each other and Tony Award winner Peter Kaczorowski's subtle yet important lighting design is perfect.

"Virgina Woolf" deals with themes and issues that were considered taboo when it premiered in the early 60s and have lost a little of their luster in today's "anything goes" society. Most theatergoers however, will still find the play to resonate just as loud today as it did when it originally shocked America. Many of the domestic taboos and relationship issues "Woolf" tests are still in the forefront of society today. Expect quite a few rave reviews come opening night, and a slew of 2005 Tony Award nominations to follow, especially one for Mr. Irwin's stunning portrayal of George and for designers Mr. Beatty and Mr. Kaczorowski's stunning work. Make a date to spend an evening with George, Martha, Nick and Honey before they pack up and leave for the Big Apple in this tantalizing new production. Now, who's up for a game of get the guests? Hump the hostess?

Tickets for this pre-Broadway engagement, currently playing at the wonderfully intimate Wilbur Theatre, are priced from $85 to $35. Tickets are available via the Wilbur Theatre Box Office www.ticketmaster.com or by calling (617)-931-2787. "Virginia Woolf" will also participate in Broadway in Boston's $25 student rush program. $25 tickets an hour before curtain.

(COURTESY ARWIN/AIRIGHT) (CONCRETE AFRICA/SCARLET)

Some critics have called Edward Albee one of the great American playwrights of the twentieth century.

Hip-hop artists build bridges between divided generations

By Paul H. Johnson
The Record

PASSAIC, N.J. — Tru/Fam rocks back and forth quietly on the black carpet of the Passaic recording studio, spitting out their lines while the engineer fires up the computer to load the music.

"Girl move your body like oh!" The words flow from Young Shai's mouth. "Make me want to say oh!" chants the teen whose real name is Shareef Nealy.

To some, the lyrics from the song "Dip Low" may make no sense, but to Nealy and his friends in the group Tru/Fam, the song is a party anthem, a call to get on the dance floor.

"Excuse me miss, I ain't twisted, but I can make your body twist," raps Just I. Shareef Nealy's twin brother Tyreef.

Tru/Fam, which stands for True Family, is acutely aware that many people think hip-hop is just a collection of booty-shaking, vulgarity-filled songs.

"Some people think hip-hop is the devil's music," said Anthony Davis, a 17-year-old high school senior in Paterson, N.J., who goes by the name Murk.

But Tru/Fam wants to be different, to be suggestive and fun without being obscene or profane. "We're trying to let people know all hip-hop is not like that," Davis said.

It's been 30 years since rap hit the scene at the block parties of the South Bronx, where teens would rap over blaring music, and 25 years since the first hit rap record blew up. The genre is now an established phenomenon that allows young people to record their thoughts and dreams.

Hip-hop is the biggest-selling genre of music in the United States. According to Nielsen SoundScan, 61 percent of the top 100 hits of 2004 were rap or hip-hop-influenced R&B records, up from 53 percent in 2003. But the music has created a generation gap between those who grew up with the blaring beats and rhymes and those who still see hip-hop as some sort of musical felony.

Even rappers like Tru/Fam believe that sometimes rap goes too far and distance themselves from the misogyny and violence that often populate the lyrics.

"We're not doing profanity and we're not degrading women," said Melvin Little, 17, who goes by the name I Flow in Tru/Fam.

Jeff Chang, author of "Can't Stop Won't Stop: A History of the Hip-Hop Generation," said hip-hop artists write what they see and hear. It's a reflection of the culture they inhabit.

"It's definitely in the tradition of going all the way back to Africa of wordplay and storytelling," Chang said. "In a lot of ways, hip-hop has not changed that much. What has changed is the context."

Hip-hop is more than music. It's a culture. It's more than telling stories. It's the flashy clothes and cars, the bling. It's movement, like break-dancing, and street art, like graffiti. And all have drawn strong reactions.

The emergence of graffiti and the loud block parties that occasionally broke into fights in the late 1970s and early 1980s drew the first negative attention to hip-hop.

"Graffiti is sort of the loudest announcement that this generation is here," Chang said.

It also drew the sharpest counteraction. States passed tough anti-graffiti laws. In New Jersey, minors can have their driver's licenses revoked for being convicted of graffiti crimes, and spray paint is sold from behind locked cages.

It wasn't until the appearance of gangsta rap, which grew out of the rhymes of teens from Watts and South Central Los Angeles, in the late 1980s and early 1990s that a broad schism between young African-Americans and their elders became apparent. The music celebrated gang life and told tales of violence and retribution.

"There's no dignity in this rap," C. DeLores Tucker, head of the National Council of Negro Women, told CBS in 1993. Tucker had marched with the Rev. Martin Luther King in the 1960s and couldn't bear to listen to the music produced by the offspring of the civil rights movement. "We were marching to stop those who were using speech against us. They were calling us all kinds of names, the very same names that these rappers are using."

Tucker, along with then-U.S. Education Secretary William Bennett, launched a campaign to force corporations to divest themselves of hip-hop companies. The pair successfully persuaded Time Warner to drop its support of Death Row Records.

The violent imagery in much of gangsta rap came to life in September 1996 when rapper Tupac Shakur was murdered in a drive-by shooting in Las Vegas. His counterpart Christopher Wallace, aka Biggie Smalls, was killed seven months later.

The deaths sparked a movement to tame hip-hop's association with violence. Calls questioning rap's connection with violence only grew after the 2003 murder of Jason Mizell of Queens; as Jam Master Jay, Mizell was part of the pioneering rap group Run DMC. Now, members of the hip-hop generation are trying to connect with their elders.

Last June, members of the hip-hop community joined with their elders at the first annual hip-hop political convention in Newark. The gathering was an attempt to find common ground between the civil rights activists of the '60s and the generations of the '80s and '90s.

"It was a priority for the folks at the convention to make intergenerational dialogue happen," said Chang, an organizer of the event. "It was something that everyone talked about very deeply."

Hip-hop mogul Russell Simmons started a campaign to repeal harsh 1970s drug-sentencing laws in New York City and led protests to improve public school education in New York City. Sean "P. Diddy" Combs tried to get more young people to vote and started a "Vote or Die" effort during the 2004 presidential election.

Hip-hop was political. Rappers tried to show that their lyrics and concerns weren't trivial. They were hoping that mainstream America, which had embraced their clothes and rhymes, would now stand up for their causes.

For years, hip-hop artists have been documenting the struggles of the black community, poverty, guns and drugs. It's a similar call to action made by their predecessors in the civil rights movement, the same people the hip-hop community often took to task.

"What happened? You were supposed to have a revolution and save us and instead it's gotten worse," Chang said.

The members of Tru/Fam think the tide is changing and that violent and disrespectful rap will be eclipsed by lighter fare, like the music they produce.

"Right now, it's getting better," Anthony Davis said.

Shareef Nealy said in the end, people just want music to dance to, and that's what Tru/Fam hopes to deliver.

"We just want to bring back the fun part of hip-hop, the part I remember," he said.

Twins Shareef Nealy, left, and Tyreef Nealy of Tru/Fam rehearse in a Passaic, New Jersey recording studio. The group hopes to be suggestive and fun without being obscene or profane.

Artists Christo and Jeanne-Claude unveil 'Gates' in NYC

By Miriam Hill
Knight Ridder Newspapers

NEW YORK — To create their huge works of art, the wrapping of Berlin's Reichstag building, the surrounding of 11 islands in Florida's Biscayne Bay with swaths of pink polypropylene, the artists Christo and Jeanne-Claude must marshal squadrons of workers, run experiments in wind tunnels, and battle bureaucracy, often for decades.

So it is perhaps no surprise that their project in Central Park that opened Saturday, 7,500 16-foot gates draped in saffron fabric covering 23 miles of paths, tempts the pair to assert control over every detail.

Before an interview, Jeanne-Claude, Christo's wife, requires that reporters read a section labeled "common errors" on their Web site. During the phone interview, she interrupted to say: "You know you must say you are talking to Christo and Jeanne-Claude." The reporter mentioned that this required his presence.

Jeanne-Claude directed her assistant to put her husband on the phone.

"Hello, Philadelphia Inquirer," said a male voice, laced with the accent of Christo's native Bulgaria. "I am good but very busy. We have a few days and a hundred things to be done."

Christo is busy finishing drawings for The Gates, some of which will be sold to defray the $20-million-plus cost of the project, all of it financed by the couple.

No grants. No Medici-style patronage. No city funds.

The Gates, which will be unfurled at 8 a.m. Saturday and be up only through Feb. 27, is expected to draw millions of visitors to New York.

The project has been a long time coming.

Christo and Jeanne-Claude, who have been doing public projects since 1961, first proposed The Gates in 1979. They also dreamed of wrapping the Museum of Modern Art or a Times Square building in fabric. But the city and building owners weren't biting. At the time, Central Park was in ruins. Christo and Jeanne-Claude's original proposal for The Gates called for digging holes, raising fears of damage to grass and tree roots.

Christo and Jeanne-Claude, however, are paragons of patience. They pestered city officials.

"The Christos have a wonderful racket, but we don't need them here," Henry J. Stern, then parks and recreation commissioner, told the New York Times in 1999. "If they want public attention, why not try wrapping Trump Tower."

Christo and Jeanne-Claude persisted with other projects that gained worldwide attention, including Running Fence, a 24.5-mile fence of nylon fabric erected in Northern California in 1976. The 1995 wrapping of the Reichstag brought more than five million people to Berlin and transformed the seat of the German parliament into a shimmering evening gown of a building.

The Gates became a reality after Michael Bloomberg was elected New York's mayor in 2001.

Bloomberg had collected the couple's work and promoted the project. Christo and Jeanne-Claude also figured out how to avoid the holes. A deal was struck.

"Impressive and imaginative works of art have enhanced New York City's public spaces throughout history and have greatly contributed to the city's status as the cultural capital of the world," Bloomberg said in a letter introducing The Gates. "It is in this grand tradition of public art in New York City that the internationally acclaimed artists Christo and Jeanne-Claude will present The Gates."

This week, Central Park is beginning to look like a giant slalom course. On Monday, about 600 paid volunteers began erecting the 16-foot vinyl poles, topped with a horizontal pole that holds the fabric, which is currently rolled up.

The artists' chief engineer, Vince Davenport, conducted tests to make sure the project would withstand strong winds, Jeanne-Claude said. In 1991, the artists constructed 3,100 28-foot-wide umbrellas in Japan and the United States. A freak storm caused one umbrella to break loose and hit a viewer, who fell and died after hitting her head on a rock.

The couple's Web site, christojeanneclaude.net describes The Gates as "a golden river appearing and disappearing through the bare branches of the trees and will highlight the shape of the footpaths."

The size and unusual nature of their projects prompt people to ask: "Is it art?"

Such questions arise from a stodgy view of what art is, said Arthur Danto, the art critic for The Nation and a friend of the couple.

"There is sometimes beauty in astonishment," he said. "We think of the wrapping of the Reichstag. That was so audacious. It made me think of the Reichstag in a way I wouldn't have thought of it before."

The temporary nature of their work adds to its beauty, Danto said.

"It's like an aesthetic party of some kind," he said, "and parties don't just go on. For a period of time, you participate in a performance and you're relating to the park in a way you've never related to it before."

Displayed along 23 miles of paved paths throughout Central Park, 'Gates' is the largest public art display in New York City history.

The Collegian Dating Game

CHECK OUT YOUR MATCHMAKING SKILLS!

We rounded up
3 Men and 3 Women
You paired them up!

Find out where the couples are going:
Date Package #1 Online
Date Package #2 TODAY
Date Package #3 TOMORROW

www.dailycollegian.com

STSTRAVEL.COM
Join America's #1 Student Tour Operator
CANCUN
ACAPULCO
JAMAICA
BAHAMAS
FLORIDA
SPRING BREAK '05
Sell Trips, Earn Cash & Travel Free
1-800-648-4849 www.ststravel.com

Need A Fundraiser?
Sell something EVERYONE needs!
A Proven Best-Seller!
We'll Pay... $5.00
for each qualified Massachusetts Daily Collegian subscription sold by an on-campus organization.
For more details call our Circulation Department at 413-545-3500 or email circulation@dailycollegian.com and ask about fundraiser opportunities for your organization.
The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

Discover Your Lover: Round Two

Boxing, fine gourmet dining and karaoke

By Sheyene Desillier
Collegian Correspondent

AMHERST — Discover Your Lover's second date package brings the couples to Northampton for boxing at Pioneer Valley Boxing Center, dining at Brasserie 40-A, and into Sunderland for singing and drinking at Seven O's.

Northampton's Pioneer Valley Boxing Center, located at 518 Pleasant St. suite 102, is where the couple will head first for a joint lesson in boxing. The two will work together, learning about each other as they realize strengths of their own in boxing. The Pioneer Valley Boxing Center is well known for its approach to the sport, introducing people of all levels in easy step-by-step instruction, guiding the student towards mastery.

Owner Djata Bumpus comes highly praised as a former professional heavyweight and is serious about his role as an educator. He issues a syllabus to his pupils, an element of study that many college students are familiar with. Classes are given on three levels, considering a student's comfort and skills. On average, each level can be completed within four weeks by meeting three times a week for a lesson. Each lesson is provided at times convenient for the student. The web site, www.westernmassboxing.com, contains many testimonials to his teaching success by past students. In an open letter to the curious student, Bumpus admits that people often harbor various feelings when it comes to boxing, and he urges people to understand the benefits of training in the sport. It is a road toward self-discovery as students are coached into unknown abilities. Training in boxing offers the benefits of physically tuning the body, sharpening the mind, and strengthening self-reliance.

After a shower, the date resumes at restaurant Brasserie 40-A of 41 Strong Ave. in Northampton. Housed on the first floor of the Baystate Hotel, the restaurant offers a variety of foods on its international menu and boasts of a beer list of over 50 beers as well as an enticing array of wines with the option of ordering by the glass or bottle. The emphasis on excellent food and service shows as his mission is stated on the web site. "Our goal is to provide the highest quality of food, at great prices with professional and attentive service." Upon contrasting against dark brown wood inside the interior of the restaurant an orange glow. Hanging glass fixtures above the bar is an example of the warm lighting to the eye-pleasing decor. Lower ceilings do not come since the restaurant seems to have limit on customers.

Seven O's at 330 Amherst Road in Sunderland is the final stop. Here the couple will unwind in the form of karaoke, one of the most popular Thursday events occurring on Sunderland strip. Wednesday, the annual anniversary of Seven O's is commemorated. Drinks, pool tables and television are provided for recreation. The crowd is a good mix of locals and college students. Seating at the bar is three to four people deep. Eight pool tables are available for use. Eight year round bartenders serve drinks that could be ordered at the bar. Discussing the atmosphere, the couple are friendly. The bartenders will know your drink.

CAREER FAIR TIME!

TODAY! FEBRUARY 16, 2005

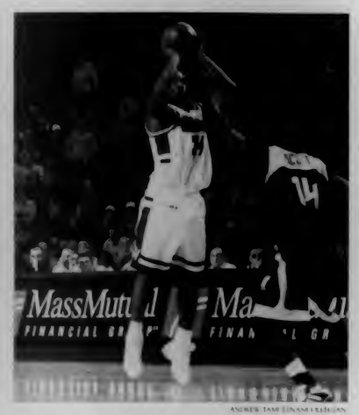
Campus-Wide Career Fair
10 am - 3 pm
Campus Center Auditorium

Life Sciences and Environmental Careers Fair
10 am - 3 pm
162 Campus Center

ALANA Job Fair
5:30 pm - 8:30 pm
Campus Center Auditorium

phone: 413-545-2224
fax: 413-545-4426
web: www.umass.edu/careers
CareerServices
The Career Services Office
University of Massachusetts Amherst
511 Goodell Building

UMass knocks off FSU



MEN'S HOOPS from page 14

[illegible] had a good plan and had the guys ready to play us," Florida State coach Leonard Hamilton said. "They took it to us on both ends, and we weren't able to respond to [illegible]."

Florida State was holding a four-point edge with just under 14 minutes remaining when the Maroon and White took hold of the game's first swing of momentum with a 13-2 run.

Back-to-back lay-ups by Freeman pushed UMass out in front by three, before the Minutemen's depleted backcourt took center stage with two of the game's more impressive hoops.

First it was Bowers who extended the lead to three when he knifed under the basket from the wing and flipped a reverse lay-up off the glass for two.

ANDREW TAM/DAILY COLLEGIAN

Sophomore Art Bowers chipped in with 12 points on 4-of-9 shooting. Bowers also dished out a season-high seven assists on the evening.

Then it was Maxwell who one-upped his backcourt partner, taking a laser-beam pass from Jeff Viggiano and connecting on a reverse lay-up of his own while being fouled. After adding the free throw, UMass' lead was six, at 48-42.

The Minutemen then went to their big man to finish off the run, getting a pair of free throws from Jeff Salovski and a Lasme lay-up off another feed from Viggiano to give UMass its largest lead of the game at 52-42.

However, after being held quiet for the first three-quarters of the game, Wafer then finally made his presence felt to get the Seminoles back into the contest.

Scoring 10 consecutive points on his own, including his first two treys of the night, the sophomore guard was personally responsible for a 10-3 FSU run that cut the UMass lead to 55-52 at the 6:47 mark.

Yet in the end, the Minutemen were not to be denied. Utilizing an aggressive offense and arguably their best interior defense of the season, UMass regained control with a 10-3 run of its own.

Stymieing FSU inside with a flurry of blocks on possession after possession, UMass carried that intensity into the offensive end and got aggressive hoops on nearly every trip.

After Freeman began the run with an easy hoop down low, Viggiano went to the hoop himself and tossed in a lay-up before Maxwell picked up a loose ball off an FSU turnover and cruised in for an uncontested hoop that solidified UMass' edge at 61-53.

Wafer added a free throw for the 'Noles on their next possession, but Viggiano responded immediately with another strong lay-up, and Maxwell beat the shot clock with a last-second 3-point heave to keep UMass in front at 68-56 with 1:27 left in the game.

The Maroon and White shot 5-of-7 from the foul line down the stretch and hung on easily to collect its 15th win of the season.

"This was a huge game for us," said Viggiano, whose 26-minute effort Lappas deemed "terrific" and "unbelievable."

"To show that we can play together gives us the confidence we need as a team heading back into conference play."

Both teams came out firing in the first half, with the Seminoles using a 9-3 run to grab an early 11-7 lead and eventually pushing the edge to as many as six.

The Minutemen were able to hang tough and keep the score close throughout the half, using good perimeter shooting by Art Bowers and Lawrence Carrier and solid defense on Wafer, who was held to 2-of-5 from the floor and 0-of-3 from 3-point range in the frame.

Tied at 27, UMass was able to hold for the last shot of the half but Bowers dribbled into traffic and threw the ball out of bounds.

Todd Galloway then took the inbounds pass with under three seconds on the clock and dribbled up court before nailing a running 3-pointer just before the halftime buzzer to send the 'Noles into halftime leading 30-27.

Minutemen able to win without captain

ANDERSON from page 14

UMass coach Steve Lappas has noticed the trend but sees it as more as a coincidence than anything else.

"Anthony is such a good team player that he hits in well the way we're trying to do things," Lappas said. "I think that there is some coincidence, but there are probably some guys — Lawrence Carrier, Artie Bowers — that know they are going to play more and relax a little bit more, who knows."

If anything, Bowers has reaped the benefits of Anderson's absence. In the four games that Anderson didn't dress, Bowers has averaged 15.3 points per game, as opposed to the 7.5 ppg he has averaged to date.

Bowers has been efficient in other aspects of the game as well. He grabbed five rebounds on top of 13 points against Davidson, and dished out seven assists last night.

The Minutemen had five players in double figures last night, showing a type of cohesion that has not been the norm this season. Adding to this balanced scoring attack was the aggressive play of junior Jeff Viggiano.

In Anderson's absence, Viggiano was the most experienced player on the floor, with three years of playing time under coach Lappas. He had 11 points, three assists and two rebounds on the night, showing that his previously injured ankle is recovering as planned.

Viggiano was quick to mention how helpful Anderson was on the sidelines. In the character of a true captain, Anderson was a vocal member of the team.

"When we were in the huddle and we were in the time-out huddles, he was just trying to keep us motivated," Viggiano said. "When the game got close he was telling us not to worry. I think he would make a great coach because he thinks just like Coach Lappas."

Another player who picked up his game with Anderson on the bench was sophomore Maurice Maxwell. Maxwell had a career game against the Seminoles, dropping 19 points, with five rebounds and six steals.

Before the warmups, and well before game time, Anderson took Maxwell aside and told him what he needed to do.

"He talked to me before the game and told me I had to step up and not to pass up open shots," Maxwell said. "He told me to keep up the energy and keep everybody up. When you have a player like him, it's impossible to take it for granted. I know we need him."

Although the Minutemen have had an unusual amount of success with their captain on the bench, it is clear where they stand. No one questions how valuable Anderson is when he's available, or whether or not they are a better team with him.

Quite the contrary, actually. It seems that the Maroon and White takes it upon itself to pick up the slack and mirror the intensity of its fallen leader, whenever he isn't on the court.

"We all knew with Anthony being out, our leader and our go-to guy, that our offense would have to step up," Viggiano said. "Of course you want Ant [Anderson], but there is nothing we can do to change that, we just had to step up and give a little more."

Atlantic 10 tournament finals next on tap for Massachusetts swim teams classmen to guide the team. Sophomore Nicole LeBarge (first overall, seven times) and junior Kelly Hoffrage (seven first or second place finishes) helped UMass pull out several victories. Rookies Samantha Dempty and Susan Allen give the program a bright future, while junior Aimee Bourassa was very effective in both the individual competitions as well as the team medleys, and sophomore diver Mary Jenkins made an impact all season long.

SWIMMING from page 14

Although excitement engulfs the entire team, there is an element of emptiness as the seniors compete in their fourth and final A-10 championship. Senior captain Lynette Sweeney put in a strong four years at UMass and has been preparing for this final A-10 championship for months.

"It's something that we've been working for all year, and for my whole career," Sweeney said. "It is very exciting. I've worked so hard my whole life, and now it's coming to an end."

Sweeney was consistent and effective, swimming multiple events including the 1650-yard freestyle, 200-yard individual medley, 400-yard individual medley and the 100- and 200-yard backstroke. Sweeney was also part of several medley relays. Fellow captain Colleen Wasson had an impressive season in such events as the 100- and 200-yard breaststroke as well as several medley relays.

"I'm exited to be done, I've been doing this since I was seven," Wasson said. "I feel like it's my last chance to show what I can do, so it's kind of nerve-racking and exciting at the same time."

The third leg to the tripod of captains is Jay Yankowski, who was most effective swimming in the 200-yard freestyle and throughout the season, but also gave UMass an advantage in the 1000-yard freestyle.

"It's kind of sad that my senior swim season is almost over," Yankowski said. "Swimming took up a good portion of our lives, and I have made many close friends that I can trust."

As one of three senior captains, Yankowski knows how anxious the younger swimmers may be before the A-10 championship, but she tries to ease that nervousness through example.

"As seniors, we need to show that we're relaxed," Yankowski said. "We need to encourage the younger swimmers and make sure they're not too nervous."

While the seniors will be sad to be finished, Newcomb has seen a senior class leave the program 20 times before.

"I never like to lose seniors; you watch them grow up. Most of the time when they come here, they're goofy little 18-year-old women," Newcomb said. "But by the time they leave they've matured, they have a goal in life; they have real focus in what they want to do."

Winning the A-10 would end the team's championship dry streak of four years since winning the A-10 in 2001.

On the men's side, they will look to make it five A-10 championships in a row. Led by six-time A-10 coach of the year Russ Yarworth, the team finished the season without losing a single duel meet and placing first in every invitational.

"While it feels good to win, our main focus is the championship," senior Justin Zeimetz said. "It is important to prepare mentally and to also be confident."

Zeimetz has been instrumental in the team's success this season, placing first in his individual events 11 times. The achievements are universal on the UMass team, with Jake Hogue, Evan Swisher (placed first in the 200-yard backstroke eight times in a row), Greg Chartier, Ryan Mathews and Reuben Rappe making huge impacts all season long.

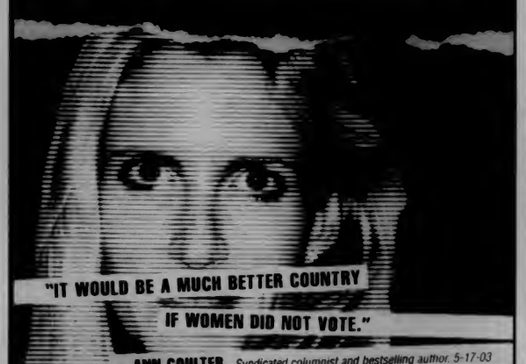
Co-captains Dylan Smith and Owen Scollan have been winners both in the pool and out, showing the underclassmen the ropes.

"All of these guys are psyched and ready to attack," Yarworth said. "They all have that championship attitude, and the seniors lead both verbally and by example."

Both the men and the women will compete for the A-10 championship in Buffalo, NY through Saturday.

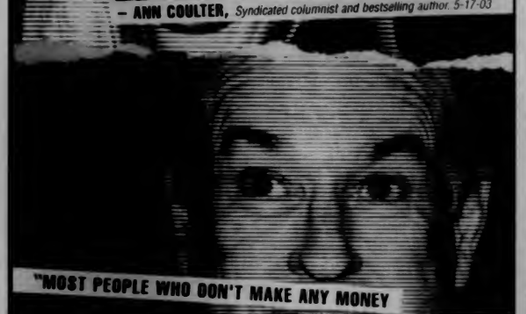
No Cals Last Call No Carbs
No Hangover
All-Natural Anti-Hangover & Nutritional Drink
Last Call is available now at:
Liquors 44, Four Season's Liquors, Stoney's Pub, Holyoke Liquor Mart, Pop's Liquors, R&P Liquors and Niedbala's.
Ask for it at your favorite bar and restaurant
Campus Rep Opportunities Available, Call for more information
Distributed By Baystate Beverage Distributors, Westfield, MA 413-642-0150
Please Drink Responsibly

OPTION BURTON M6 RIDE SPECIAL BLEND
fatTrax
SNOWBOARDS • BMX • SKATEBOARDS
MID-WINTER CLEARANCE
25% Off Snowboards, Boots & Bindings
20% Off Jackets & Snowboard Pants
25% Off Back Packs & Snowboard Bags
20% Off Gloves & Goggles
FAT TRAX LOCATIONS:
Rte. 5, Take I-91 to Exit 18, Easthampton, MA 01027, 413-586-8766 Phone, 413-586-7137 Fax
Rte. 63, East Longmeadow, MA 01028, 413-781-5142 Phone, 413-737-7412 Fax
NORTHWAVE 686 HOLDEN K2 ROXY FORUM
DAKOTA SANTA CRUZ ALIAS ELECTRIC CONSPIRACY RIXON HOUDINI SUMMER DRAKE OAKLEY GMC RED DEFCON DRAGON



THE ATLANTIC 10 SHOOTOUT
WIN $10,000
QUALIFYING EVENT THURSDAY, MAR 3, 6:00 PM, CURRY HICKS CAGE
CO-ED CHAMPIONSHIP SATURDAY, MAR 5, 2:00 PM, MULLINS CENTER
FREE to STUDENTS
Free Food, Drinks, T-shirts and more
Win Airline Tickets!
Firestone GMAC Pontiac XBOX
WWW.ATLANTIC10.ORG/SHOOTOUT
or visit the Intramural office for more details
CURLEIGH SPALDING FUZE

UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS AMHERST
New Students Program Summer Counselors
AMBASSADORS, LEADERS.
Not BIG on Sleep.
WE'RE HIRING for 2005 Summer Orientation
KEEP READING, IF YOU ARE.....
• a current undergraduate at UMass Amherst with a minimum GPA of a 2.5
• enthusiastic about UMass Amherst and ready to talk about it
• someone who looks forward to meeting new people
• familiar with the residential, academic, and social opportunities at the university
• involved in RSO's, intramurals, or other campus activities
• a person with high energy and high stamina - (if you need 8 hours of sleep, stop here)
STILL INTERESTED? CHECK OUT THE JOB BENEFITS.
• networking with parents in many areas of employment (think life after graduation).
• improved public speaking, time management, and communication skills.
• connections with faculty and staff members from across campus.
• $2874.00 in salary and health coverage.
• free room and board on campus during orientation
• campus employment options after orientation is over - or head to the beach
STILL READING? WE'D LIKE TO MEET YOU.
Submit an [illegible] Feb. 18, 2005
New St[illegible] http: www.umass.edu newstudent nsp_employment.html



COMPARE AND SAVE
ROUND 2
StudentUniverse.com
-vs-
Student Travel in Amherst
StudentUniverse.com book flights online any time
Those Other Companies wait to book in line every time
Round Trip to London: $391
COMPARE AND SAVE
Round Trip to London: $423
StudentUniverse.com

the sports section needs writers
sports@dailycollegian.com

WHO DEFINES YOUR VALUES?

"IT WOULD BE A MUCH BETTER COUNTRY IF WOMEN DID NOT VOTE."
– ANN COULTER, Syndicated columnist and bestselling author. 5-17-03

"MOST PEOPLE WHO DON'T MAKE ANY MONEY ARE NOT EDUCATED BECAUSE THEY DIDN'T WANT TO GET EDUCATED."
– BILL O'REILLY, Host of The O Reilly Factor. Fox News Channel. 1-13-05

"STATE UNIVERSITIES ARE BREEDING GROUNDS, QUITE LITERALLY, FOR SEXUALLY TRANSMITTED DISEASES (INCLUDING HIV), HOMOSEXUAL BEHAVIOR, UNWANTED PREGNANCIES, ABORTIONS, ALCOHOLISM, AND DRUG ABUSE."
– DR. JAMES DOBSON, President, Focus on the Family. Life On The Edge (2000)

This is the face of today's conservative movement.
This is THEIR idea of America.
Conservatives in Washington are attacking our personal freedoms. Young Americans fight and die in a war built on their deceptions. They've saddled us with an enormous national debt, made it harder to attend college without crushing loans, harder to get a decent job and health care after we graduate. Now they want our generation to pay $2 trillion for their risky plan to phase out Social Security.
DON'T JUST SIT AROUND AND WATCH.
CONNECT. ENGAGE. SPEAK UP.
{CAMPUS*PROGRESS}
Get started. CampusProgress.org
A project of the Center for American Progress
Paid Advertisment

UNIVERSITY HEALTH SERVICES
Mental Health Groups Spring 2005
COED SELF-EXPLORATION GROUP FOR UNDERGRADUATE STUDENTS
Mondays, 2:00-3:30 pm -or- Wednesdays, 3:30-5:00 pm
For college men and women who experience difficulties in interpersonal connections or who have concerns about their relationships.
WOMEN'S EATING ISSUES GROUP
Tuesdays, 3:00-4:30 pm
This is a group for women who are interested in changing negative eating patterns, decreasing food and weight concerns and enhancing self-acceptance. Members will have an opportunity to learn about the underlying dynamics contributing to eating issues and to develop coping strategies.
COED BEREAVEMENT GROUP FOR UNDERGRAD & GRADUATE STUDENTS
Tuesdays, 3:45-5:00 pm
A support and exploration group for college men and women who have experienced the death of a close family member, friend, or intimate partner within the last several years. Members will have an opportunity to share experiences of mourning, support one another's grief process, and develop new ways of living with loss.
COED SELF-EXPLORATION GROUP FOR GRADUATE STUDENTS
Thursdays, 3:45-5:00 pm
For graduate men and women who experience difficulties with interpersonal connections or who have concerns about their relationships. Members will have an opportunity to explore personal relationships, work, studies, and other relevant concerns.
INTERPERSONAL RELATIONSHIPS FOR GAY/BISEXUAL/QUESTIONING MEN
3:45-5:00 pm - Day to be announced
For gay/bisexual/questioning men who experience difficulties in interpersonal connections.
MINDFULNESS-BASED STRESS REDUCTION (MBSR)
Thursdays, 3:30-5:00 pm
Mindfulness is a particular way of paying attention:
➢ with mindful intention
➢ in the moment
➢ without judgement
Although MBSR embraces the acceptance of things as they are without striving, research has shown that, with regular practice, it has the potential to lower stress, anxiety, and depression. It can promote relaxation, improve concentration, raise self awareness, and enhance the immune system. Referrals and inquiries may be made to Kathryn Proulx at 545-2337.
Groups are conducted by Mental Health Division staff. Payment is deducted from your UHS Basic Plan, Student Health Insurance Plan, GIC, or Health New England plan subject to plan limitation and co-pays.
Groups require an initial screening that can be arranged by calling 545-2337 or stopping by at 126 Hills North, Monday - Friday 8 am-5 pm.

STUDY THE GLOBAL VILLAGE IN GREENWICH VILLAGE

Master of Arts in Media Studies
Join more than 400 students from across the country and around the world in the oldest yet most progressive Media Studies M.A. program anywhere.
Our commitment to the integration of theory and practice across comparative media offers unparalleled options: on site and online courses; professional facilities in audio, video, film, and digital media; an M.A./Ph.D. program; a certificate in Media Management; and a faculty of distinguished scholars, artists, and entrepreneurs. Discover why we have been in the vanguard of media thought, technology, and trends for more than 30 years.
Offerings include: Media Theory, Media Criticism, Media Management, Audio & Video Production, 16mm Film Production, Digital & Web Design.
CALL FOR MORE INFORMATION OR TO REQUEST A CATALOG:
800.862.5039
WWW.NEWSCHOOL.EDU/MEDIASTUDIES
Fall 2005 application deadline: March 15
New School University
The New School
66 West 12th Street New York NY 10011
THE NEW SCHOOL

Trot Nixon starts the Sox-Yanks feud early

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

FORT MYERS, Fla. — Trot Nixon wasted no time in hueing the Red Sox-Yankees rivalry, criticizing Alex Rodriguez on Tuesday.

Two days before the official opening of Boston's training camp, the Red Sox outfielder praised Rodriguez's playing ability but said the third baseman wasn't the "Yankee type."

"I don't look at him as that. He might be in a lot of people's eyes," Nixon said.

"He's done some great things on the field. He's one of the [best] baseball players in the game and probably will be when it's all said and done.

"But when people ask me about the Yankees, I tell them about (Derek) Jeter and Bernie Williams and (Jorge) Posada. I don't tell them about Rodriguez.

"He can't stand up to Jeter in my book or Bernie Williams or Posada."

He also criticized Rodriguez for slapping the ball away from Red Sox pitcher Bronson Arroyo along the first-base line during Game 6 of the American League Championship Series.

Boston became the first major league team to overcome a 3-0 postseason deficit and beat the Yankees for the AL pennant.

The Red Sox then went on to sweep the St. Louis Cardinals for their first World Series title since 1918, ending an 86-year drought.

Nixon also criticized A-Rod for bragging about his workout regimen, among other things:

"Like Rodriguez says, you know, he's running stairs at 6 in the morning while I'm sleeping and taking my kids to school. I'm like, well I'm not a dead-beat dad, Alex."

Rodriguez's spokesman, Steve Fortunato, did not respond to an E-mail or telephone message seeking comment. Yankees position players report Sunday and start workouts Feb. 22.

NHLPA says it will accept a salary cap

By Ira Podell
Associated Press

NEW YORK — In what could be a last-second breakthrough, both sides of the NHL lockout have given significant ground: The players' association will accept a salary cap, and the league has backed off its demand for a link between revenues and player costs.

Now they just have to figure out the money, and time has all but run out.

Even while the negotiations were going on, NHL commissioner Gary Bettman already had planned to announce the cancellation of the season Wednesday, a source close to the negotiations told The Associated Press on condition of anonymity Monday.

Bettman was slated to speak Wednesday in New York, but the NHL declined to give details beyond the time and location.

The NHL offered to give in on linkage, a "significant move in the players' direction" the union said early Tuesday following a meeting in Niagara Falls, N.Y.

But when the players offered to accept a cap at $52 million in return — the first time they came off their opposition to a ceiling on salaries — the offer was rejected by the NHL. The league insisted on a salary cap that topped out at $40 million per team.

"It is indeed unfortunate that with the major steps taken by both sides we were unable to build enough momentum to reach an agreement," players' association senior director Ted Saskin said.

The NHL had no comment Tuesday on the union's statement.

No new talks were immediately scheduled, but with the philosophical differences now bridged, there appeared to be room for the sides to negotiate dollar figures.

"We probably could've gotten this thing done in the summertime," Chicago forward Matthew Barnaby said. "Am I mad, no? I want to get back to work. But at the same time, I'm just a little disappointed that it went this far to play poker and to have someone call your bluff."

The 24 percent rollback on all existing contracts, originally offered by the union on Dec. 9, as well as more aggressive luxury tax rates and thresholds, were included in the players' counteroffer.

Buffalo Sabres player representative Jay McKee was surprised Tuesday when he heard the union would accept a cap.

"If that's where we were going, I wonder why now," he said.

With the major stumbling blocks now out of the way, the sides are only $12 million apart on what each team's cap should be. With the salary rollback, only eight of the 30 teams would be above $40 million.

Until now, Bettman insisted that the 30 teams know what their costs will be each season. The only way, he said, that could be achieved was to tie to the amount of player costs to a percentage of league revenues.

That was a solution the players' association refused.

NHL chief legal officer Bill Daly was the only other person involved in the meeting that wrapped up early Tuesday. The NHL reported that no progress was made, but didn't reveal any details of what was discussed.

If a deal is not reached quickly, the NHL would become the first major professional league in North America to lose an entire season because of a labor dispute. The Stanley Cup has been awarded every year since 1919, when a flu epidemic canceled the finals.

But more than two-thirds of the season and the All-Star game already have been lost to a lockout that started Sept. 16.

Bettman said the sides needed to start putting a deal on paper by last weekend if the NHL was going to hold a 28-game season and a full 16-team playoff. The regular season normally is 82 games.

Even a session with a federal mediator Sunday in Washington couldn't produce an agreement. But it did lead to the breakthrough in talks Monday.

Bettman had said teams needed to have cost certainty to survive and the only way he could guarantee that was with a salary cap that linked league revenues to player costs. Now that position has changed for the first time since the NHL started gearing up for the lockout in 1998.

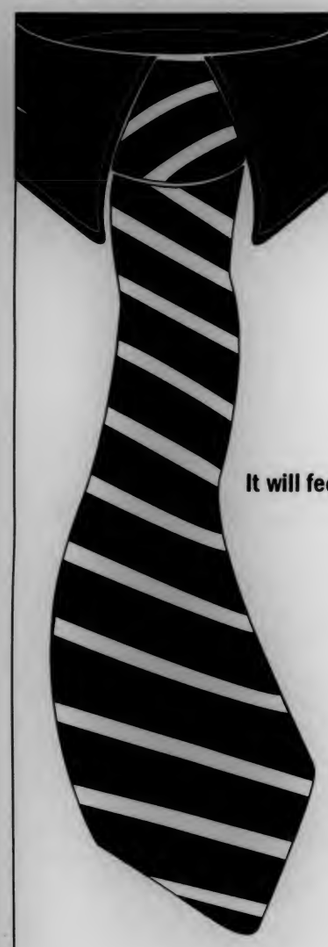
The league has said teams lost $273 million in 2002-03 and $224 million last season, and an economic study commissioned by the NHL found that players get 75 percent of league revenues. The union has challenged those figures.

A cap had been an automatic deal-breaker for the union even though it agreed that the financial landscape was flawed. The players' association contended that there are many other ways to fix it.

"There is no question the system has to change," said New Jersey Devils president Lou Lamoriello, who took part in earlier negotiating sessions. "We just have to keep working to find a solution. It's unfortunate we have to come this.

"If the season does end, we can't stop. We have to continue working at this and get it rectified as soon as we possibly can."

Monday, the 152nd day of the lockout, was to have been the last day of the All-Star break; the festivities in Atlanta were called off months earlier. Through Monday, 824 of the 1,230 regular-season games have been lost.



"Everybody has to take responsibility," Lamoriello said.

The sides have traded proposals throughout the lockout, but the salary cap had always been the sticking point. Other issues such as arbitration, revenue-sharing, and rookie caps never reached the true negotiating stage because the sides couldn't agree on the big issue.

In recent days, the union and league seemed adamant that they wouldn't budge.

"We're done," Saskin said Thursday after talks broke off.

On Sunday, Daly said: "We will not be reaching out to them."

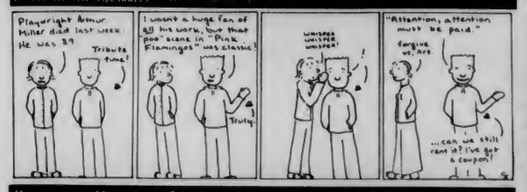
It will feel less constricting at a great job.

FORTUNE® 100 BEST COMPANIES TO WORK FOR 2004

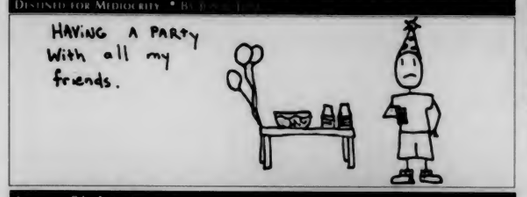
At Ernst & Young, the opportunity for growth is enormous. We offer over 7,000 professional development programs — some of the best formal learning programs in the country — because our philosophy is People First. We recognize that our employees are essential to the firm's growth and success. And in order to attract the best talent, we've built an environment that Fortune® magazine has consistently recognized as one of the "100 Best Companies To Work For." So whether you're looking for a place to grow or a great place to work, look for our recruiters on campus. ey.com/us/careers

Audit • Tax • Transaction Advisory Services

ERNST & YOUNG
Quality In Everything We Do



Mr. Stick Robot's Laugh O'Rama



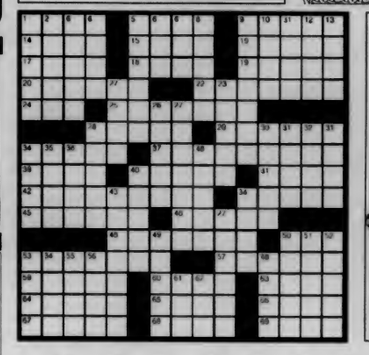
Jeff, Goth & Goat

Valley of the Squirrels

Destined for Mediocrity

Caveman RA

Quote of the Day



"I don't use drugs, my dreams are frightening enough."

— M. C. Escher

ACROSS
1 Demonstrate
5 Smile expansively
9 "The Medium" or "The Bar"
14 Vegas game
15 Gymnast Korbut
16 Heroism
17 Absorbed by 18 Legal claim
19 Follow
20 Exchanged
22 Bull's-eyes
24 Liquid sample
25 Breakfast grains
26 Kitchen gizmo
29 Tell secrets
34 Paradigm
37 Authorized
39 Peruse
40 Man from Manchuria
41 Year of the NBA
42 Gawky
44 Oct.-style poetry
45 Francis or Dahl
46 Dazzling success
48 Discomposes
50 End of command?
53 Thuler
57 Suffer from deprivation
59 Witchful
60 Feathery accessories
63 Per ___ (for each day)
64 Danger
65 Reverse an action
66 Hosiery shade
67 Fidgety
68 Earth orbiter
69 Dissenting votes

DOWN
1 Comic routines
2 Painter Matisse
3 At hand
4 Lumber
5 More daring
6 Actor Wallach
7 Mature
8 Kind of ray
9 Supervised
10 Sharp spasm
11 Otherwise
12 Disorderly retreat
13 War god
21 Environmental ad
23 Illinois city near St. Louis
26 "Touched by an Angel" star
27 Some weasels
28 Core group
30 Entice
31 Small combo
32 Give temporarily
33 Advantage
34 "___ la Douce"
35 Remnant of the woods
36 Actor Hollman
38 Temporary fix
40 Single-celled organism
43 Senselessly
44 River of NYC
47 Practice session
49 Photo collection
50 Winter Jong
51 ___ so often
52 Story-telling uncle
53 California valley
54 "The Virginian" writer Wister
55 Trade center
56 Eye part
58 Middle Eastern gulf
61 Lennon's love
62 Bother

Find today's answers online
www.dailycollegian.com

THE HARP
NEW!!! Wireless Internet
OCMP & All Credit Cards accepted
Irish Pub
February Special!
$1.50 PBR Bottles: Honey Brown, Molson
$2.00 A pint / $6.50 a pitcher
WED. ·Busted Vacuum
THU. ·The Amity Front
FRI. ·Irish Sesiun
SAT. ·Savoy Shuffle
"Come Party Like You're Irish!"
413-548-6900 www.theharp.net
163 Sunderland Rd. - N. Amherst
Just north of the apartments

H·O·R·O·S·C·O·P·E·S

aquarius • Jan. 20-Feb. 18
There is a big spot on your shirt. It has been there for a week.

pisces • Feb. 19-Mar. 20
It's OK to slam a door or two if you have to.

aries • Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Today you will know thirst as never before.

taurus • Apr. 20-May 20
Imagine what life would be like without your cell phone.

gemini • May 21-Jun. 21
Perhaps it's best if you don't speak for the next 24 hours.

cancer • Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Today you're going to lose your favorite pen. It is a sad day.

leo • Jul. 23-Aug. 22
Today you should put on some cute spandex-wear for the gym.

virgo • Aug. 23-Sept. 22
It seems like fun until you lose what you have won.

libra • Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Something very little will make you happy today.

scorpio • Oct. 23-Nov. 21
You are one funny person, and you know it.

sagittarius • Nov. 22-Dec. 21
If you look at your pretty poster it will help you fall asleep.

capricorn • Dec. 22-Jan. 19
Keep your burping under control, at least while you're in class.

Blow away your competitors, advertise with The Collegian
Call 545-3500

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

Activities

Foam party Montreal weekends $89 Montreal Express.Net 1(781)979-9001

Announcements

$600 Group Fundraiser Scheduling Bonus 4 hours of your group's time PLUS our free (yes, free) fundraising solutions EQUALS $1,000-$2,000 in earnings for your group. Call TODAY for a $450 bonus when you schedule your non-sales fundraiser with CampusFundraiser. Contact CampusFundraiser, (888)923-3238, or visit www.campus-fundraiser.com

Apartment for Rent

Brandywine Apts. Now Leasing, 1&2 bedroom apts. Leases begin Jun, July, Aug or Sep. First come, first serve. Get them while they last. www.brandywine-apts.com stop by or call 549-0600

Center of town, 1, 2, 3 bedrooms; hardwood floors. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstlincol-nrealty.com 253-7879

Hobart Condos 3 bedroom, hardwood floors, study area in basement. Cable, telephone (internet access) in all bedrooms and study. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstlincol-nrealty.com 253-7879

Auto for Sale

Pontiac Sunbird 93 automatic 4 cyl excellent turquoise ABS Asking $1350 or BO Call 253-0279

1999 Toyota Camry fully loaded. 75K, Mint condition. Call 413-348-4191

Childcare

Nanny position for 2 boys ages 6 & 9. Perfect schedule for student. Part time Spring. Full time Summer. Prior experience necessary. 413-625-2288

Employment

Prestigious Trail's End Camp- Pennsylvania Summer Camp – Guaranteed Experience of a Lifetime; Limited openings for Sports Specialists, Crafts Specialists, Waterfront Counselors (Lake and Pool) and General Counselors; June 19th – August 14th – Gain practical experience working with kids. www.trailsend-campjobs.com

Make money taking online surveys earn $10 to $125 for surveys. Earn $25 to $250 for focus groups www.cashforstudents.com/umass

Employment

Earn lots of $$ and have fun on the water this Spring & Summer. Raft guides needed at Crab Apple Whitewater in Charlemont, MA. Fun Summer job, no experience necessary. We will train. 413-625-2288.

Room for Rent

350 per month 413-335-5226

Services

Do you know your rights as a student, renant, worker, and consumer? The Student Legal Services Office can help with your questions. Come to 922 Campus Center or call 545-1995.

Services

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth-control, and Emergency Contraception. Affordable and confidential. STI Screening and Treatment. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992.

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance 549-1906

Travel

One Bed and Studio (Four Queen Beds) at Deerpark one mile from Loon Mountain Available 3/11-3/18 Ken 335-9775

Travel

XXX Night Montreal Weekends $89 Montreal Express.net 1(781)979-9001

Spring Break 2005 Only 6 weeks left... Lowest Prices Biggest Parties Earn 2 Free Trips Exclusive with Sun Splash Tours www.sunsplashtours.com 1800-426-7710

Bahamas Spring Cruise 5 Days $299! Includes Meals, Celebrity Parties! Panama City, Daytona $159! Cancun, Jamaica, Acapulco, Nassau $499! Award Winning Company! SpringBreakTravel.com 1-800-678-6386

Travel

#1 Spring Break Vacations! Cancun, Jamaica, Acapulco, Bahamas, & Florida! Best Parties, Best Hotels, Best Prices! Limited Space! 1-800-234-7007 www.endlesssummer-tours.com

Wanted

Egg Donors Needed. Help make a couple's dream of becoming parents come true by becoming an egg donor. Very generous compensation and expenses paid. Ages 21-32. Non-smokers only. For more information please visit our website at www.robertmi-chubes4.com or contact Christine or Liz at 781-769-6900.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS WEDNESDAY

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 2005 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

UMass chops down FSU

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

Just when they make you think they're fading, just when they make you think they're coming apart and just when they make you think they're ready to be counted out, the members of the Massachusetts men's basketball team have consistently found a way to remind you of something.

They're not.

Playing without senior captain and point guard Anthony Anderson and coming off a disappointing loss at Fordham, the Minutemen came together and produced their most balanced offensive attack of the season, breaking open a close game in the second half to storm past Atlantic Coast Conference rival Florida State 78-68 before 4,690 at the William Mullins Center.

UMass	78
Florida State	68

UMass (13-9, 6-5 Atlantic 10) returns to action on Saturday when it will resume conference play at La Salle in Philadelphia. Tip-off is set for 4 p.m. at Tom Gola Arena.

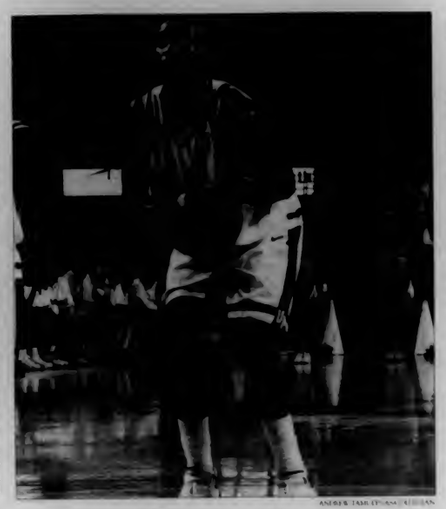
"We played a terrific basketball game," UMass coach Steve Lappas said. "We've been preaching the same thing all year: we're going to get better as the year goes on ... the guys are fitting in and starting to understand things now.

"I knew we'd be good, but I also knew we'd be a work in progress. We're not a finished product yet and we may not be great right now, but we're certainly good."

Running the point for significant minutes with Anderson out, sophomore guard Maurice Maxwell produced game-highs in points with 19 and steals with six to lead UMass on both ends of the court.

Classmates Rashaun Freeman (13 points) and Art Bowers (12 points) joined Maxwell in double figures, along with junior Jeff Viggiano and freshman Lawrence Carrier who chipped in with 11 points apiece.

"I thought we did a great job on the offensive end, and our half court offense was as good as it's been all year," Steve Lappas said. "I thought our guys moved the ball as well as they have all year. We took great shots and had great looks and ... we were making five or six passes per possession. For us, more passes equal more points."



The Minutemen lost the battle of the boards to the Seminoles 33-24, but asserted themselves physically in the lane with strong shot blocking from Stephane Lasme and outscored Leonard Hamilton's club 34-24 in the paint — something Lappas views as evidence of his team's tenacity.

"Our guys were really tough tonight," Lappas said. "Even though we didn't rebound the ball particularly well by numbers, I thought we were very game and I thought we fought hard and we didn't give them an inch. It says something about the tenacity of our guys."

FSU (11-14, 3-8 ACC) star guard Von Wafer bounced back from a slow start to lead his team with 16 points, and point guard Todd Galloway added 11 points and six assists.

"[Lappas] deserves a lot of credit

See MEN'S HOOPS on page 10

ANDREW TABLER/COLLEGIAN

Sophomore forward Rashaun Freeman's 13 points were part of a balanced offensive attack that produced the Maroon and White's highest scoring output of the season.

Playing for Anderson on the court

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

Before every game, the Massachusetts men's basketball team huddles up with senior captain Anthony Anderson in the middle. They jump, holler and go through a three-beat chant before they break off and hit the trenches.

Last night was slightly different.

Anderson was still in the middle of this pre-game ritual, but this time he was in street clothes. Ailing with back injuries that flared up during UMass' 63-56 loss to Fordham on Saturday, Anderson sat and watched as his teammates picked up the slack and downed visiting Florida State 78-68.

Yesterday is a further illustration of the fact that the Minutemen don't need their ideal starting five to win. However, it has shed light on a rather peculiar trend.

In all games that Anderson has not dressed, the Maroon and White have gone 4-0. During Anderson's midseason suspension, the Minutemen went on to win three straight games over Davidson (Dec. 19), Rider (Dec. 23) and Boston University (Dec. 28). The three-game win streak was also sandwiched between two losses, both with Anderson starting.

See ANDERSON on page 10

Terriers take home Beanpot

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

Ho hum.

The winner of the annual Terrier — eh hem, Beanpot — Tournament was once again Boston University, which outlasted Northeastern 3-2 in overtime on Monday night at the FleetCenter in front of an announced crowd of 17,565.

Fittingly enough, Chris Bourque, the son of legendary Boston Bruin, Ray, scored the game-winner 14:10 into the extra frame to give Boston University its 26th Beanpot crown in the tournament's 53-year history.

Bryan Miller took the puck down the left side of the ice and put a shot on the Northeastern net that hit the left post twice before gliding across the crease straight to a streaking Bourque, who was able to knock home the goal past a diving Keni Gibson.

BU capitalized twice on some rare sloppy play by the Huskies in the first period. With Northeastern on a power play, Miller stole the puck before skating most of the ice with a BU defender in his hip pocket and put a tough shot that deflected off Gibson's left shoulder and rolled into the net.

The Huskies rallied back from a two-goal deficit and finally tied the score with 2:05 left in regulation. Tim Judy fired a slap shot on net that Terrier goalie John Curry couldn't find, and lared Mudryk put the finishing touches on the goal to ultimately send the game into overtime.

Bourque was named the tournament MVP.

Serino stands ground on protecting goalies

Boston University goaltender John Curry picked up the win in the Beanpot in his first hockey action since injuring his shoulder on Jan. 27, against Merrimack.

Curry was run over behind the net at Agganis Arena by Merrimack senior Jeremy Wilson, who was chasing a loose puck. He was given a game disqualification among two five-minute majors at 17:24 of the second period.

The hit sparked a fracas that saw 10 penalties, including four players from each team receiving 10-minute misconducts.

Wilson was given the mandatory one-game suspension by the NCAA, but when he and MC coach Chris Serino looked at the play together on the game film, they agreed that he could have done more to refrain from such a heavy hit on Curry, and Serino suspended his player for an extra game. Serino said after UMass' 3-1 over the Warriors on Feb. 5.

HOCKEY EAST Notebook

It wasn't the first time that Serino saw a goaltender go down with an injury, as former Warriors' goalie Joe Exter collided with Boston College's Patrick Eaves during the first game of their Hockey East playoff series on March 7, 2003.

He suffered a fractured skull and a severe concussion and spent considerable time in a Boston hospital recovering from the hit.

Halfway to Hobey

Monday was the midway point of the preliminary voting for the Hobey Baker Award, which is given to college hockey's most outstanding player.

Two Hockey East players, both from Northeastern, were in the top-10 at the time.

Senior goalie Keni Gibson was in third place and senior forward Jason Guerriero was right behind him in fourth.

Gibson has been the Hockey East Defensive Player of the Week four times, and he is 12-13-4 on the season with one shutout, a .921 save percentage and only allows an average of 2.36 goals per game.

Guerriero has tallied 13 goals and 23 assists for 36 points on the season.

Colonials freshman nearing assist record

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

When all is said and done, Kimberly Beck may just have one of the most spectacular rookie seasons of any Atlantic 10 player in recent years.

George Washington University's freshman sensation racked up A-10 Co-Rookie of the Week honors this week after averaging 9.5 points, 7.5 assists, 3.5 rebounds and three steals in two victories over Dayton and Duquesne.

It is the fifth time this year Beck has garnered the award, more than any other freshman in the A-10 this year, and ties former GW players Ugo Oha and Elisa Aguilar for the most in a season since 1996-97.

Needless to say, she has become as much of a staple in the Colonials' (16-7, 9-3 A-10) offense as fellow All-America candidate Anna Montanana.

The A-10 assist leader tallied a career-high nine assists in Thursday's game against the Dukes, and is currently one assist shy of the GW freshman record for assists in a season with 121 so far.

With four games left to go in the season, the chances of that record being broken are a sure thing. However, if she keeps her current pace (5.3 assists per game), she won't just break it — she will shatter it.

The 5-foot-8 guard out of Fairburn, Ga. shares this week's honors with another stellar rookie guard in Massachusetts' own Pam Rosanio.

The 5-foot-10 Rosanio has been making quite a name for herself not just within UMass (13-10, 6-6 A-10), as this is her third such award this season. In two games against St. Bonaventure and Dayton, Rosanio averaged 13.5 points per game, 3.5 rebounds and two assists per game while shooting 45 percent from the floor.

A-10 East all nested up

While the race to capture the West division crown of the A-10 may come down to the last game of the season (Xavier is 10-2, GW and Richmond are each 9-3), the Temple Owls are already gearing up for a post-season first round bye.

Following an easy 70-56 defeat of the Rhode Island Rams (5-18, 3-9 A-10) on February 13, the Owls moved to a perfect 12-0 conference record, 20-3 overall, to clinch the A-10 East division for a second straight year and third in four years.

The downing of URI also extends TU's winning streak to a school record 17 games, the second longest in the nation, and also has them looking at a No. 1 seed in the A-10 Tournament next month in Washington, D.C.

Temple is miles ahead of the rest of its in-division competition, its closest competitors in the standings being second place UMass (6-6), Fordham and St. Joseph's (t-3rd, 4-8).

The division was clinched thanks to an incredibly-balanced offensive attack by the Owls' starting five. All five starters reached double figures on the afternoon, the highest a 16-point, three-rebound, two-steal effort by senior guard Cynthia Jordan — including a perfect six-for-six from the free throw line. Kameisha Hairston (nine rebounds) and Jennifer Owens tallied 12 points each, while Candice Dupree (five rebounds, three blocks) and Ari Moore (six rebounds) chipped in with 10 points apiece.

Despite having the edge on field goal percentage (44.9 percent), it was the all-too-familiar turnover factor that ultimately did the Rams in at TU's Liacouras Center. URI committed a total of 25 turnovers in the game, 17 of them coming off of steals. Moore led the way with five steals, followed by Dupree and Hairston with four each.

UM swimmers set for A-10's

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

After months of preparation, practices and meets, the Massachusetts men's and women's swimming and diving team's seasons are boiled down to four days. Four days in which UMass will look to stand at the top of the Atlantic10 conference.

Tonight, the Maroon and White travel to Buffalo, N.Y. to compete in the A-10 championship meet. Both the men and the women have been anticipating this week all season and hope that their hard work will payoff.

"It doesn't matter what anybody did leading up to this meet, what matters is what happens during those three-and-a-half days," UMass coach Bob Newcomb said. "They have worked so hard and the volume of work that they put in is pretty impressive. They really don't get much time to allow their bodies to recover."

The Minutewomen finished the regular season by winning three out of seven duel meets while placing second at the Rhode Island Invitational, but Newcomb stressed that success during the regular season does not reflect what happens in the championship meets.

Throughout the season, the team depended both on the senior veterans as well as the under-

See SWIMMING on page 10

KAREN WINGER/COLLEGIAN

Massachusetts swimmer Dylan Smith and the rest of the Maroon and White will look to put the finishing touch on their season by winning their fifth consecutive Atlantic 10 championship.

UMass ski team fairing well after an impressive start

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts men's skiing team — coming off an impressive start — placed fourth in last weekend's meet in Loon Mountain, N.H.

It was the Minutemen's fourth meet of the season, and their only finish outside the top three so far.

In their previous three meets this season, the team has posted solid performances. In the UMass/Smith Carnival at Berkshire East on Jan. 14, UMass finished in first with the help of a first-place finish by Rush Hawkins (1:35.03 in the giant slalom and 1:00.83 in the slalom) and solid performances by Marc Epstein, finishing 10th in the giant slalom (1:39.09) and 19th in the slalom (1:05.71).

On Jan. 22, in the UMass/Plymouth Carnival in Water Valley, N.H., the team tied for first in the slalom and finished second in the giant slalom. Hawkins finished first in the slalom with a two-run time of 1:28.17, and Jason Small finished in fifth with a two-run time of 1:29.80.

Last weekend at Loon Mountain, Rush Hawkins led the Minutemen with a two-run time of 1:22.44 in the slalom event, followed by teammate Jason Small finishing second with a two-run time of 1:24.80. Marc Epstein finished 16th with a two-run time of 1:31.18, while James Green and James Burke placed 26th and 50th to round out the Minuteman lineup.

While UMass did well in the slalom event, the giant slalom is where the team lost some ground. Hawkins finished first in the giant slalom with a two-run time of 1:46.93 and was the only skier to place in the top-20 for the Minutemen.

Rush Hawkins, after being awarded the honor of All-American at last year's national finals, has lit up the competition, finishing first in five of six events this year along with one second-place finish.

New England's Largest College Daily • Est. 1890

The Daily Collegian

Thursday, February 17, 2005 www.dailycollegian.com Volume CXIV Issue 81

UMass Board of Trustees vote to increase fees

By Matt Elder
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Board of Trustees voted to increase the fees of all four University campuses yesterday during a meeting at the UMass Lowell campus.

The increase would be an average of $596, with $266 going to increasing mandatory student fees and $330 going to increase room and board rates.

Overall, the Amherst campus will be hit slightly harder by the increase. In-state undergraduate students can expect to pay $598 more, which would raise the total cost to $15,795. Out-of-state undergraduates can expect an extra $864, for a total of $24,586. Out-of-state graduate student fees will be increased by $853.

Out of the four campuses, out-of-state undergraduates at the Lowell campus receive the highest rise, $942.

Last week, the University's finance committee proposed the increase, but it needed to be voted on by the full Board of Trustees before it became finalized.

The increase averages out to about 3.2 percent, which is slightly under the rate of inflation last year. Inflation for the past year was estimated at 3.5 percent, as measured by the consumer price index for the Northeast Urban Region.

The lowest fees have been in recent years was in 2001, when in-state undergraduates paid $4,681. After that, fees started to increase, including a $2,491 jump from 2003 to 2004.

The recent increase means that next year will be the fourth in a row that the cost to attend the University has risen.

Spokesman Robert Connolly told the Associated Press that he was confident that students wouldn't be forced to pay for any more funding gaps.

"We feel comfortable that we can run the ship with this amount of fee revenue," he said.

At public universities like the University of Massachusetts, tuition goes to the state and fees go to the school. Tuition itself will not go up.

Comparatively, UMass will now be the eighth most expensive state school. Connecticut residents pay $14,600 to attend the University of Connecticut.

"We don't expect to be any higher than eighth place after next year's planned increases," Connolly said.

Last week, Student Government Association President Eduardo Bustamante expressed his disappointment in the decision. Bustamante said that he thinks the University is moving its focus to upper class students so the school can get wealthier alumni. "They're going to privatize a public school," he said.

University President Jack Wilson, who recommended the increase, told the AP that the school will try to give more financial aid to students who have a hard time with the continued increases.

"It's disappointing," UMass student Dan O'Brien said to the AP. "UMass should be a place where lower-to-middle-income people can get a quality education. The cost of that now is astronomical."

A $32 increase was also issued to the University's Medical School in Worcester.

ALEXANDRA DILAZARO/COLLEGIAN

The fee increase for the University of Massachusetts students will average about 3.2 percent.

Former SGA speaker Higgins arrested for DUI

According to the University of Massachusetts Police Department, former Speaker of the Student Government Association, Patrick Higgins was arrested for drunk driving charges in the early morning hours on Monday, Feb. 14.

Higgins, who resigned from the SGA Speaker position last September due to the now infamous "KKK-Nine" scandal, was officially charged with operating under the influence of liquor and marked lanes violations. Police allegedly found Higgins' vehicle crashed into a street sign on a Fearing St. sidewalk at 1:18 a.m. He was arrested after he allegedly failed a field sobriety test.

Higgins' previous actions as SGA Speaker made local headlines in November after it was found that he had been secretly corresponding through e-mail to Vice Chancellor Michael Gargano in an effort to remove at least one member of the Office of African Latino Asian Native American Affairs. The e-mail correspondence took place between June and Sept. 2004.

In September 2004, Higgins was accused of being insensitive, among other accusations, after an ALANA member discovered photographs of the speaker and eight members of the SGA and the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy drinking alcohol in the SCERA office. The photograph showed the nine students drinking in front of a marker board where a caricature of the Ku Klux Klan was drawn with the words "I love ALANA," shown floating in a voice bubble above.

Higgins resigned as SGA Speaker just two weeks after the photographs surfaced. In his resignation letter, he said the photographs represented an "an irresponsibility and insensitivity that is unbecoming of a student representative."

Higgins could not be reached for comment at press time.

-Dan O'Brien

COURTESY PORTSTUDIO

Dave Madsen is an anchorman for ABC40 in Springfield and is a journalism professor at UMass.

MEGAN BRINSTER/COLLEGIAN

Dave Madsen teaches his broadcast journalism class in Bartlett Hall yesterday. He was stalked over a period of seven years by a crazed viewer.

A journalist's worst nightmare

Reporter Dave Madsen was attacked by fan

By Matt Elder
Collegian Staff

Every journalist's worst fear was lived out by University of Massachusetts professor Dave Madsen, in a chilling tale that spanned over seven years, multiple court appearances, and culminated with a baseball bat and a hunting knife.

It all started near the end of 1996. Madsen, who also works as a news anchor at ABC40 in Springfield, got calls at the television station from a man who said that the anchors were talking about him on the air. The disturbed man would call after the telecasts, swear at whoever answered, and for some reason focused his anger on Madsen.

"Somehow or another, I got his attention," Madsen said. Eventually, the calls escalated from an annoyance to violence. One night, after Madsen left, the caller phoned the station and threatened Madsen's life.

The UMass professor and ABC40 anchorman called the police and filed harassment charges, but nothing happened because the police didn't think that the caller posed any real threat. Madsen said he got the impression that the caller wasn't mobile.

Fast forward to July 7, 1997. Several TV station employees, excluding Madsen, were standing inside a garage at the station, watching a thunderstorm. At around 9:30 p.m., a car pulled up into the station. The driver asked for Madsen.

"Someone let this guy into the station," a still frustrated Madsen remembers. "I was thinking 'you got to be kidding me!'"

Eventually, the caller met up with Madsen in the building. He was no longer a voice on the phone, but a deranged stalker, who was merely feet away.

The man behind the voice

Stanley Taylor is now 57. A former Greenfield resident, Taylor has a history of mental problems, including schizo-affective disorder of the bipolar type. He is also an alcoholic who refuses to take his medication for his illnesses.

For one reason or another, Taylor believes that television personalities are talking directly to him and about him. According to Madsen, Taylor even videotaped the telecasts for proof. Months later, when police entered Taylor's apartment, they found the residence filled waist-high with trash, including over 1600 beer bottles. Taylor had to stay in hotels because of the poor sanitary conditions.

He was also convinced that Madsen, who has worked at ABC40 for 13 years, was talking to him during his telecasts.

"Mr. Taylor has a long-standing belief that newscasters and television personalities refer to him on television periodically, speak to him from the television and periodically use his words in their own broadcasts," said Doctor

See MADSEN on page 3

Murphy feels tasers will not come to campus

By Julie O'Donnell
Collegian Staff

Matt Murphy, Student Trustee for the Student Government Association announced last night that he feels confident that the highly controversial tasers will not be brought to the University of Massachusetts next fall.

Murphy and President of the SGA Eduardo Bustamante attended the Board of Trustees meeting yesterday in Boston, where they met with high-ranking legislators and lawmakers.

Murphy, who was able to speak to the Chair of the Board of Trustees in Executive Session found that they were not all in favor of UMass attaining the rights to purchase and use the non-lethal weapon. The sudden implementation of taser training has led to controversy amidst the UMass campus and severe opposition, especially from members of the SGA who said they feel that this is leading to "militarization on this campus."

Murphy said that he "feels fairly confident that tasers will not be used [on this campus]."

He also referenced the front-page article on USAToday that talked about the death that can be associated from any kind of stun gun. "[The Chair of the Board] told me that he wasn't even happy that university police have guns," Murphy said.

Murphy felt quite confident that it will be decided at the next Board of Trustees meeting, which is at the end of the academic semester, that tasers will not be used on this campus.

"My impression is that it increases the militarization on this campus," Murphy said, "and I think that a motion to ban tasers on all campuses will be approved."

In addition to Murphy's report, there were a number of orders of business that SGA members discussed and passed. Speaker Mark Morrison appointed his Associate Speaker, Maxine Dube, and told the Senate that he felt confident in his decision.

"I interviewed five candidates," Morrison said. "I looked for several things, mostly how long they were going to be around, leadership experience, knowledge, initiation and drive."

Dube, a junior, Biology major said that she also feels that she can do the associate job efficiently. She mentioned that she has been involved in positions with the Every Woman's Center as well as various volunteer positions.

She additionally said that she would feel ready to assume the Speaker position if Morrison could no longer fulfill his duties.

"I can definitely handle it," Dube said. "Otherwise, I would not be here."

After Dube was appointed, Morrison spoke to the Senators about his need to work with all the vice chancellors including Michael Gargano.

See SGA on page 4

EDITORIAL/OPINION
TUITION WOES
Fee increases prove to be battle of public versus private.
PAGE 5

ARTS & LIVING
CHEMICAL PUNK
Not-so-average rockers say they are here to stay.
PAGE 6

SPORTS
FIELD TRIP
Minutewomen set to host URI on Field Trip Day.
PAGE 12

WEATHER
TODAY Sunny, H40°, L20°
TONIGHT Snow, H25°, L-20°
TOMORROW Scattered snow, H30°, L7°

GREEN DAY

"GREEN DAY ARE STILL ONE OF THE BEST LIVE SHOWS IN ROCK."
BLENDER

"ROARING THROUGH A SONG-BY-SONG PERFORMANCE OF THEIR LATEST DISC, THE TRIO EVOKED EVERYONE FROM PHIL SPECTOR TO THE WHO." 4 STARS
ROLLING STONE

"SKILLFULLY EXECUTED, HIGH-ENERGY ARENA ROCK."
- WASHINGTON POST

"WELCOME TO PUNK PARADISE."
- DALLAS MORNING NEWS

"ONE OF THE MOST MUSICALLY SOPHISTICATED AND LYRICALLY AMBITIOUS ALBUMS OF THE YEAR... AND THE SONGS WERE GREAT FOR MOSHING TOO."
- NEW YORK NEWSDAY

"WHAT MAKES GREEN DAY A GREAT LIVE BAND IS NOT JUST THE MUSIC BUT ALSO A GENUINE AFFECTION FOR ITS AUDIENCE"
- LOS ANGELES TIMES

"I HAVE SEEN THE FUTURE OF PUNK ROCK. AND ITS NAME IS BILLIE JOE ARMSTRONG. GREEN DAY PUT ON ONE OF THE MOST POWERFUL AND BEST CONCERTS OF THE YEAR."
- MINNEAPOLIS STAR TRIBUNE

SAT. APRIL 30 8PM

ON SALE FRIDAY AT 10AM

MULLINS CENTER

UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS AMHERST

IN STORES NOW!

Tickets on sale at the Mullins Center Box Office, online at ticketmaster.com, by phone at (413) 732-2500 or at all TicketMaster outlets. For additional information call the Mullins Centre at (413) 545-0100.

Presented by MassConcerts MassConcerts.com

GREENDAY.COM

Anchorman was attacked by mentally ill viewer

MADSEN from page 1

Debra Pinales, director of forensic evaluation at UMass Medical Center in Worcester in a recent court appearance.

Taylor is a Vietnam War veteran who has experienced mental problems since the war. Madsen said that he isn't sure where he was stationed, but he said he thought that Taylor, who has a 30-year history of mental illness, was stationed somewhere on a ship.

"For some reason, he saw me as the cause of all his problems," Madsen said.

"He started pounding on the back of my head."

Now, during a thunderstorm and before a broadcast, Taylor was standing right across from Madsen in the ABC40 studios.

"I told him that I wanted him to get out of the building right now," Madsen said of the encounter with Taylor. Taylor refused, and attacked Madsen. Eventually, people in the studio separated the two, and Madsen called the police.

However, since Taylor was let into the building, the police could not arrest him for trespassing and therefore let him go. If Madsen wanted to, he could pressed charges for assault.

Soon after, Taylor was admitted into a hospital at Northampton, where he was held for a month. Madsen said that the police filed assault and battery charges, which would be dropped if Taylor stayed away from Madsen.

"I thought that was the last I would hear of this guy," Madsen said.

In the fall of 2001, Taylor was back at it, making hundreds of phone calls to various television stations about their on-air personalities talking about him.

On July 7, 2004, exactly seven years since the thunderstorm incident, Madsen was outside landscaping when a car pulled up to his house. Madsen said he didn't recognize the driver, until the man started talking.

"He just said 'stop talking about me'. I thought 'you've got to be kidding me,'" Madsen said. Again, as he did at the ABC40 studios seven years earlier, Madsen told Taylor to leave.

However, Taylor again refused and attacked the journalist. The two men wrestled briefly.

"[At] one time he got on top of me and started pounding the back of my head." Madsen said.

Eventually, a man who was helping Madsen build a patio in his backyard came to his aid and separated the two. Neither Madsen's wife, nor his two older sons, were home. Madsen said that he didn't want Taylor going anywhere.

"I wanted to keep him there for the cops to come," Madsen said. Once again, Madsen called the police and filed a report.

The two soon went to court. Madsen said he didn't think that Taylor, who showed up to court in a golf shirt and a pair of shorts, knew the severity of what had happened.

"I think that he thought he would go home from there," Madsen said, adding that the assistant district attorney said, "this guy is dangerous."

Anchorman Dave Madsen laughs during an ABC40 broadcast. Madsen has worked in broadcast news in Springfield for the past 13 years.

Legal Issues

Eventually, the two ended up back in court last year on Dec. 4. The Superior Court ruled that Taylor was not guilty by reason of insanity.

"He knew what he did was wrong," Madsen said.

Taylor was admitted to Worcester State Hospital for a period of 40 days. Court testimony revealed that Taylor punched a patient at the hospital, and that many of the people who treated him are afraid of him.

Madsen said that Taylor's own psychiatrist was afraid of him.

"He's severely mentally ill," he said.

Court documents showed that Taylor kept a hunting knife and a baseball bat in his car, and Madsen believed that Taylor would have used the knife on him.

"I believe that given the opportunity, he would have used the knife," Madsen said.

Taylor was ordered by the courts to be held for six months at Worcester State Hospital for observation. He could be forced to take his medicine, and might be released into a halfway house.

Madsen doesn't think that the latter will happen.

During court sessions, Taylor was handcuffed and shackled, and Madsen had a police officer next to him the whole time. He said that Taylor got agitated anytime anyone mentioned his name, as well as when the doctors were talking about him.

Looking back, the UMass professor said that he has a new-found appreciation for the court system and victims, although he does not think that he is in fact a victim in the whole situation.

Madsen said he was extremely impressed at the way many of the police and the district attorneys helped him in the situation. The news station he works for never covered the case, because they were afraid that Taylor would really be upset if they actually did talk about him.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center
University of Massachusetts
Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Peter Foundas
MANAGING EDITOR Mike Martelli
BUSINESS MANAGER Rich Pacheco
PRODUCTION MANAGER Cory Rosenberg
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Meghan Healy
ADVERTISING MANAGER Tiffany Sugalski
EDITORIAL PRODUCTION Samantha M. Nielsen
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Michael Busack
CLINICS EDITOR Alyson Zillmann
EDITORIAL EDITOR Yousef Munayyer
EDITORIAL EDITOR Allison Edles
NEWS EDITOR Erika Lovley
PHOTO EDITOR Alex Demosthene
SPORTS EDITOR Bob McGovern
CIRCULATION MANAGER Kristen Weiss
CLASSIFIED ADVERTISING Marry Pappas
DISTRIBUTION MANAGER Josh Kaggona
FINANCE MANAGER Hinak Shah
ACCOUNTING CLERK Virginie Frecaut
HUMAN RESOURCES Sandra Marquez
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Josh Greenberg
ASSISTANT BUSINESS Nathan Chomsky
ASSISTANT FINANCE Thomas Hecht
ADMINISTRATIVE PRODUCTION Rachael Bruno
GRAPHICS ASSISTANT Charlie Higgins
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Matthew O'Rourke
ASSI. ARTS & LIVING Chris Gazzara
ASSISTANT NEWS Julie O'Donnell
ASSISTANT NEWS Dan O'Brien
ASSISTANT PHOTO Megan Brunster
ASSISTANT SPORTS Jeff Howe

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS CALENDAR SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY FUNDED, OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE. FOUNDED IN 1890, THIS PAPER BEGAN AS KOLEGE LIFE. RENAMED THE COLLEGE SIDING IN 1901, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1904 AND THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1936. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967, THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN BROADSHEET SINCE JANUARY 1994. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL 545-3500 BETWEEN 8:30 A.M. AND 3:30 P.M.

Oldest known human remains date 195,000 years

By Malcolm Ritter
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Bones discovered nearly 40 years ago in Ethiopia now appear to be the oldest known fossils of modern-looking humans, says an analysis that suggests they come from around the dawn of the species.

Researchers determined that the specimens are around 195,000 years old. Previously, the oldest known fossils of Homo sapiens were Ethiopian skulls dated to about 160,000 years ago.

Genetic studies estimate that Homo sapiens arose about 200,000 years ago, so the new research brings the fossil record more in line with that, said John Fleagle of Stony Brook University in New York, an author of the study.

The fossils were found in 1967 near the Omo River in southwestern Ethiopia. One location yielded Omo I, which includes part of a skull plus skeletal bones. Another site produced Omo II, which has more of a skull but no skeletal bones. Neither specimen has a complete face.

Although Omo II shows more primitive characteristics than Omo I, scientists called both specimens Homo sapiens and assigned a tentative age of 130,000 years.

Now, after visiting the discovery sites, analyzing their geology and testing rock samples with more modern dating techniques, Fleagle and colleagues report in Thursday's issue of the journal Nature that both specimens are 195,000 years old, give or take 5,000 years.

He did the work with geologist Frank Brown of the University of Utah in Salt Lake City and Ian McDougall of the Australian National University in Canberra.

Fleagle said the more primitive traits of Omo II may mean the two specimens came from different but overlapping Homo sapiens populations, or that they just represent natural variation within a single population.

To find the age of the skulls, the researchers determined that volcanic rock lying just below the sediment that contained the fossils was about 196,000 years old. They then found evidence that the fossil-bearing sediment was deposited soon after that time.

Paul Renne, director of the Berkeley Geochronology Center, which specializes in dating rocks, said the researchers made "a reasonably good argument" to support their dating of the fossils.

"It's more likely than not," he said, calling the work "very exciting and important."

Rick Potts, director of the Human Origins Program at the Smithsonian Institution's National Museum of Natural History, said he considered the case for the new fossil ages "very strong." The work suggests that "we're right on the cusp of where the genetic evidence says the origin of modern humans ... should be," he said.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Michael Busack
PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Matthew Reed
COPY EDITOR
Mean Brinster
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Molly Eggleston
PRODUCTION STAFF
Meloch Natal, Lauren Egavian

Panda East
Enjoy our fine Chinese and Japanese cuisine while helping aid the Tsunami fund
Thank you for dining at Panda East. With this coupon, $1 of your bill will be donated to the Tsunami fund. Thank you for your support. www.pandaeastamherst.com
103 No. Pleasant St., Amherst
256-8923 • 256-8924
Delivery Hotline: 549-0077

MAKE $12/HR PLAYING POKER
In just a few days we will be adding poker to our stable of skill games and for an extremely limited time we're looking for a VERY SELECT FEW to join us right at the start. Yes, we will PAY YOU to play poker, as well as giving you a chance at other offers "regular" players will never see.
For more information: www.gamesgrid.com/mas
GamesGrid Poker
Make your best play.™

No Cals Last Call No Carbs
No Hangover
All-Natural Anti-Hangover & Nutritional Drink
Last Call is available now at:
Liquors 44, Four Season's Liquors, Stoney's Pub, Holyoke Liquor Mart, Pop's Liquors, R&P Liquors and Niedbala's.
Ask for it at your favorite bar and restaurant
Campus Rep Opportunities Available, Call for more information
Distributed By Baystate Beverage Distributors, Westfield, MA 413-642-0150
Please Drink Responsibly

Where else would you celebrate
The Great Guinness Toast
Than Amherst's Great Irish Pub?
(There IS no other place)
Free Raffle Prizes! Giveaways!
THE HARP Irish Pub
"Come Party Like You're Irish!"
Free Traditional Irish Sesium
Party Starts at 9. Worldwide Toast at 11.
163 Sunderland Rd. - N. Amherst, just north of the apartments 413-548-6900

MASSACHUSETTS HOCKEY
FRIDAY @ 7 PM
ICE HOCKEY VS. BU
FREE WHITE OUT T-SHIRTS
1st 5,000 fans!!!
3rd Annual
WHITE OUT NIGHT
WHITE OUT THE TERRIERS!!!
1st 5,000 fans!!!
FREE WHITE OUT T-SHIRTS
sponsored by:
D.P. Dough delivers calzones The Pizza Alternative 256-1616
YOUR PLAN
Rao's Coffee
how YOU doin'?
MULLINS CENTER
THE HARP Amherst, MA
THE ZONE sports radio 640
ALUMNI ASSOCIATION
Bueno Y Sano
DAILY HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE GAZETTENET.com
Managed by GLOBAL SPECTRUM a subsidiary of Comcast-Spectacor KRAFT
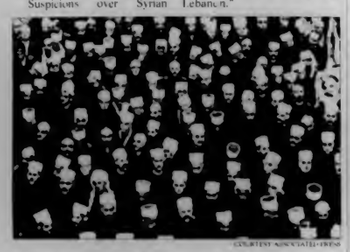
STUDENT TICKETS FREE!!!

Thousands mourn slain former Prime Minister

By Bassem Mroue
Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — Mourners holding banners saying "Syria Out!" crowded around the flag-draped coffin of former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri, and his family warned the pro-Damascus government to stay away Wednesday as hundreds of thousands of people turned his funeral into a spontaneous rally against Syria.



Along the funeral route through downtown Beirut, the Lebanese flag was hung from balconies and pictures were posted of Hariri, who was assassinated Monday by a massive car bomb that also killed 16 others.

Angry mourners shouted insults at Syrian President Bashar Assad to "remove your dogs from Beirut" — a reference to Syrian intelligence agents, part of an overall contingent of 15,000 troops deployed here since 1976.

Suspicions over Syrian involvement in Hariri's death further charged the atmosphere, and pressure mounted from abroad to find his killers, with Washington recalling its ambassador from Syria and the U.N. Security Council demanding justice.

William Burns, an assistant secretary of state for Middle East affairs who attended the funeral, renewed a call for Syria to withdraw its troops.

"Mr. Hariri's death should give — in fact it must give — renewed impetus to achieving a free, independent and sovereign Lebanon," Burns said after a meeting later in the day with Lebanese Foreign Minister Mahmoud Hammud. "And what that means is the immediate and complete implementation of the U.N. security resolution 1559, and what that means is the complete and immediate withdrawal by Syria of all of its forces in Lebanon."

COURTESY ASSOCIATED PRESS

Hundreds of thousands of mourners fill the streets of Beirut to mourn the death of former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri.

Morrison says focus should be on students

SGA from page 1

Last November, the Senate voted 'no-confidence' in Gargano after he refused to release specific information requested by the SGA. The Senate found Gargano to be lackluster in his ability to serve the UMass campus, as well as his commitment to diversity.

"We should be doing much more for our students," Morrison said. "I am working with Vice Chancellor Gargano from now on; he controls our budget and too our space allocation. He can take it all away."

Morrison also said that Bustamante is continuing to do great things for the SGA and the student body, but he reiterated that the Senate must work with the vice chancellors.

"It's not easy to represent a minority," he said, "but we need to represent to the students."

During the bulk of the meeting, the UMass Outing Club members came to the SGA and gave a formal presentation about why they had requested and emergency funding from the SGA.

UMOC, one of the largest student clubs at UMass had spent their yearly allocated budget and asked for an additional $8,300 for necessary equipment like canoes, kayaks, helmets, life preservers and various other tools.

After a lengthy factual presentation and video, Senate members voted unanimously to award UMOC the money.

Members of the club presented the Senate with examples of their old equipment that was broken, had holes or was not suitable for today's safety requirements.

Senator Sean Bliss was pleased to see that the SGA was able to represent the students in such a positive way.

"This is a great opportunity for Senate to do something good for the students," he said.

MEGAN MONTGOMERY/COLLEGIAN

Student Trustee Matt Murphy speaks at the Student Government Association meeting last night.

Tsunami 'Baby 81' reunited with parents

KALMUNAI, Sri Lanka (AP) — "Baby 81," the infant claimed by nine couples after he miraculously survived the tsunami, was reunited with his parents Wednesday in the joyous conclusion to an agonizing custody battle that captured hearts around the world.

Smiling with relief, Jenita Jeyarajah took the baby, dressed in blue, from a doctor's arms in a courtroom packed with onlookers after the judge said DNA tests confirmed the baby is her 4-month-old son Abilass.

"Look how happy he is! He knows the scent of his parents!" gushed the father, Murugupillai Jeyarajah. "After returning to us, he still hasn't cried."

The couple went straight from the court to a Hindu temple to give thanks for their son's return and smash a coconut in ritual fulfillment of a vow. Relatives joined them, chanting prayers and raising their hands in worship as the father carried the child around the shrine.

It was just the first of many temples the couple planned to visit Wednesday.

The relieved parents also paid a brief visit to the rubble of their home, where the raging waters snatched the boy from his mother's arms on Dec. 26.

He was later found on a beach among bodies and debris and taken to the Kalmunai hospital.

Baby 81, so-called because he was the day's 81st admission, was quickly claimed by nine couples, including the Jeyarajahs, symbolizing the anguish of thousands of families who lost children in the disaster.

Associated Press

Boy places hundreds of prank 911 calls on stolen cell phone

By Jim Suhr
Associated Press

ST. LOUIS — A teenager has been accused of using a stolen cell phone to swamp dispatchers with hundreds of bogus 911 calls over a matter of weeks, at times talking of killing some of the responding officers he could see.

The 15-year-old boy sometimes was such a nuisance he called in new emergencies at the same address where officers already were standing, St. Louis County Police spokesman Mason Keller said Wednesday.

Such was the case Sunday, when the young culprit was tracked down only after dispatchers fielded 25 bogus calls within 75 minutes to the same area where the officer already had arrived, Keller said.

The boy has been referred to St. Louis County Family Court, where information on possible charges was not immediately available Wednesday. He was not identified because he is charged as a juvenile.

Despite all of the bogus reports, emergency officials only responded three times, given the ability of dispatchers to either recognize the voice of the prankster or the calls came so quickly in succession, involving the same address or neighborhood, Keller said.

Authorities say such abuses could slow dispatches to real emergencies or put responders at risk when emergency crews needlessly rush to what turn out to be bogus calls, Keller said.

"Any time the 911 system is abused, it takes valuable time away from actual emergencies," Keller said.

Keller said the teen used a stolen cell phone that despite being deactivated could still call 911. Dispatchers can track the location of 911 calls from landline phones but not from wireless ones.

FEATURING
MONGOLIAN BARBEQUE
ALL YOU CAN EAT
BUFFETS

WITH COUNTLESS COMBINATIONS OF VEGETABLES, POULTRY, FISH, MEATS AND SAUCES.

Great Live Entertainment on Weekends!

Friday 2/18: Brogue
Saturday 2/19: Swing Set

A FANTASTIC FULL BAR!

OPEN 7 DAYS A WEEK FOR LUNCH AND DINNER
SUNDAY BREAKFAST
DESIGN YOUR OWN OMELETS AND PANCAKES

413-584-5155 • WWW.ALLFIREDUPHADLEY.COM • 48 RUSSELL STREET, ROUTE 9, HADLEY

comedy CONNECTION
HUKELAU
413•593•5222
705 Memorial Drive in Chicopee

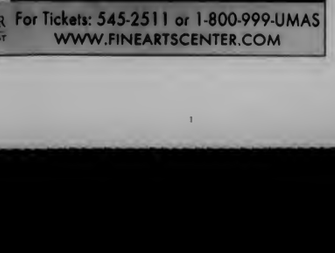
THIS SATURDAY!
7PM Only!

From NBC's "Last Comic Standing" and VH1's "Celebrity Fit Club"
RALPHIE MAY

MARCH 5TH
a.k.a. "Dr. Dirty"
JOHN VALBY

MARCH 19TH
From "In Living Color" and "The Bonnie Hunt Show"
DAVID ALAN GRIER

Spring Performances 2005



Experience it all
from the edge of your seat!

Wednesday, March 2
Hubbard Street Dance Chicago
Recognized worldwide for it's exuberant, athletic, and eclectic repertory, Hubbard Street incoporates diverse influences from ballet to American musical theatre to cutting-edge choreography. Program includes "Rooster" in homage to the rolling stones
Sponsered by Florence Savings Bank, Valley Kids, The River 93.9 and WFCR 88.5
Concert Hall at 7:30pm

Saturday, April 9
Jazz at Lincoln Center's Afro-Latin Jazz Orchestra
Led by Arturo O'Farrill
Experiance how the music of Machito, Maria Bauza, Chico O'Farrill, Rene Hernandez, Antonio Carlos Jobim, and other Latin greats ignited the dance floor and revolutionized Jazz.
THIS PERFORMANCE IS PART OF A DAY-LONG HIGH SCHOOL JAZZ FESTIVAL SPONSERED BY THE FINE ARTS CENTER AND THE UMASS DEPARTMENT OF MUSIC AND DANCE.
Concert Hall at 8:00pm

THE FINE ARTS CENTER
UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS AMHERST
For Tickets: 545-2511 or 1-800-999-UMAS
WWW.FINEARTSCENTER.COM

UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS AMHERST
New Students Program Summer Counselors
AMBASSADORS. LEADERS.
Not BIG on Sleep.
WE'RE HIRING for 2005 Summer Orientation

KEEP READING, IF YOU ARE.....
- a current undergraduate at UMass Amherst with a minimum GPA of a 2.5
- enthusiastic about UMass Amherst and ready to talk about it
- someone who looks forward to meeting new people
- familiar with the residential, academic, and social opportunities at the university
- involved in RSO's, intramurals, or other campus activities
- a person with high energy and high stamina - (if you need 8 hours of sleep, stop here)

STILL INTERESTED? CHECK OUT THE JOB BENEFITS.
- networking with parents in many areas of employment (think life after graduation).
- improved public speaking, time management, and communication skills.
- connections with faculty and staff members from across campus.
- $2874.00 in salary and health coverage.
- free room and board on campus during orientation
- campus employment options after orientation is over - or head to the beach

STILL READING? WE'D LIKE TO MEET YOU.
Feb 18, 2005
http://www.umass.edu/newsstudent/nsp_employment.html

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 2005

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it" Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Fee increases cause battle of public versus private

With the University of Massachusetts once again raising its fees, the UMass Finance Committee has presented students with a very difficult situation. Being the fourth year in a row that fees were increased, it is very complicated for the students to try and step outside themselves for a moment and attempt to see the necessity of the increases.

Oftentimes, the terms "tuition" and "fees" are lumped together incorrectly. When they are used in this way, almost interchangeably, the student body is bound to have misconceptions. The money the University students pay towards tuition doesn't actually go to the University itself, but to the state of Massachusetts. The money paid towards fees is what goes directly to the University. The difference is subtle but very distinct.

Regardless of the technicalities surrounding the terminology, the increase, no doubt, will anger many students; especially since it may seem like right now that this is all the Administration is doing. In order to understand the reasoning behind it, one must look at the bigger picture.

The University of Massachusetts is a state-run higher education facility in Massachusetts. However, in recent years, it seems that the reputation of the University is dwindling. Granted, the recent budget cuts haven't helped the situation. The budget cuts have removed the amount of state funding for the University and have shifted many costs from state to student. Consequently, the increase in fees is an attempt to regain some of that money lost in order to keep the University up to its current standards.

However, for out-of-state students, UMass' reputation is a lot more credible and appealing than it is for in-state students. As with any state university, in-state students usually take it for granted that it's there. Consequently, the state school becomes a safety school, or a safe choice to fall back on if no other school will accept them.

These fee increases are an attempt to better the University as a whole. The idea is to better the reputation and prestige of UMass (all four campuses included) in comparison to other schools across the country. There is very heavy competition in the business of higher education and UMass is just trying to get back in the game.

The effects of the increases may not be felt immediately. It will take time to work out a game plan and time to get past the frustration of everyone negatively affected the University's current actions. However, if in the long run the prestige of the University is raised, students' education will be worth more. Employers will come to see the University of Massachusetts as a school with credit and a good reputation, which will speak highly of the graduate before them.

The issue at hand, aside from the increases, is public vs. private. UMass is a public University and, as such, is responsible for accepting a certain amount of in-state students, in addition to making sure there is a level of affordability for them since their taxes go to the school. One stigma that public schools also carry with them, unfortunately, is the previously mentioned lower standing in the grand scheme of things. Compared to private universities, UMass lacks in reputation. The fee increases are intended to better the image of the University so that students and employers alike can step back and know that their University can stand its own with the best of them.

Unsigned editorials represent the majority opinion of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian Editorial Board.

The paradox of moral killing

Joseph St. John

Oh Mitt, what are you thinking? How can you possibly consider bringing the death penalty back to Massachusetts?

After my representative from Northampton, Bill Nagle fought so hard against a similar proposal in 1988, and defeated it by one solitary vote, why do you want to undo years of social growth? You say you can create a bill that is safe from condemning innocents to death row, through the use of DNA testing, and rewording of the law from "beyond a reasonable doubt" to "no doubt", still, these are steps backwards.

Massachusetts is one of 12 states that has a punishment system unlike medieval Europe. Most of the world abolished capital punishment this century. Not only did we not, but our government is one of only eight to have executed people under eighteen years old since 1990, and we executed the most.

Calling for DNA testing and "no doubt" verdicts is a good start for the other forty states in the Union that still use capital punishment, but it would be a step backwards for Massachusetts. In this Land of the Free, one hundred and sixteen people have been cleared from death row, sometimes hours before their executions, since 1973. Who knows how many innocent people were not so fortunate?

Some proponents of the death penalty argue that if capital punishment deters other criminals from murder, then potential lives are saved.

Capital punishment has never been proven to deter criminals from violent crime, and studies show that in states like Texas where capital punishment is used more frequently, there are sometimes higher rates of murder. Too much money is spent on court costs and not enough on real detective work to find the actual criminals.

Since Mitt Romney is such a moralist, and worries about the souls of microscopic stem cells in petri dishes, it seems he should be concerned for the souls of fully developed human beings too, whether they be criminals or non-criminals. He should therefore look into programs that actually reduce crime, such as education. This would protect victims from murderers, and protect innocent people charged with murder from wrongful punishment.

Since Mitt Romney is such a moralist, and worries about the souls of microscopic stem cells in Petri dishes, it seems he should be concerned for the souls of fully developed human beings too, whether they be criminals or non-criminals

Although Romney says his new death penalty bill would be flawless, and have the most safeguards out of any other legislation, there really is no way to be 100 percent sure with any case. The system could easily be abused. Evidence can be tampered with, falsified, and destroyed, and the verdict is decided by people who are capable of making mistakes. Every human measurement has some error in it, and there is no way for a jury to be completely impartial and sure that all the facts and all the pieces of evidence are accounted for.

Racism is a huge flaw in the US justice system. Amnesty International reported that "Of the 624 people executed between 1977 and April 2000, more than 82 percent were convicted of the murder of a white person — even though the number of blacks and whites murdered each year was almost equal."

It is not ethical to put people's lives in the hands of biased juries. To deny that modern juries are not biased is to reject reality.

Another argument against the death penalty is that it costs more to execute someone than it does to keep them confined to life in prison. The cost of the appeal process and court fees is ridiculous. We should not execute or save people on an economic basis, but why spend tax dollars on state sponsored killing when effective programs could be put in place to actually reduce violent crimes? Why advocate an archaic system proven to have no effect on crime rates whatsoever?

Capital punishment is not about achieving justice, it is about getting revenge on anybody to make oneself feel better about the pain of losing a loved one. It is a way for victims' friends and families to move on, to put a face to their feelings of hatred, and then see that face suffer. This may sound harsh, but killing is not the answer to killing, no matter what.

In elementary school we were taught that two wrongs don't make a right. Mitt Romney must have missed that lesson somewhere along the line. Someone has to tell him that we do not want the death penalty back in Massachusetts, and that violence does not end violence.

Joseph St. John is a Collegian columnist.

Trying to stave off 'The Lorax'

Aaron Wodin Schwartz

The Kyoto Protocol came into force on Wednesday, a full seven years after it was initially negotiated to reverse climate change and global warming trends. Signatories must reduce greenhouse gas emissions, principally carbon dioxide, to below the levels they were at in 1990 (different regions and countries have different targets) between the years 2008 and 2012. The pact is widely acknowledged by both supporters and detractors to be vastly insufficient to truly curb rising atmospheric levels of these destructive gasses, but is nevertheless an important start.

The most fascinating and promising aspect of the Kyoto agreement is its application of neo-classical economics to a global environmental problem. Given the lack of effective political cooperation or framework for environmental governance, any global solution must be incentive-based and easily enforceable. Thus, the authors of the protocol applied market principles to the pollution reduction measures by building in a carbon credits trading system. Companies are awarded credits based upon 1990 or more recent carbon dioxide emission levels (one credit is worth one metric ton of carbon dioxide) that they trade after accounting for all of their emissions. By contrast, companies that do not have enough credits to cover their carbon dioxide production must purchase the lacking credits from selling companies. After the government assigns carbon credits, their trade is dictated by the market, with the price rising in colder, drier months when carbon emissions are higher for electricity production.

The most developed signatories of the treaty have more prestigious targets (the top 39 countries all must cut emissions by at least 5.2 percent by 2012) than developing countries and least developed countries in order to maintain the relative fairness of trade. This means that a great number of the Kyoto accession states will actually be doing very little to limit their own emissions levels. As these countries develop, however, they will be expected to meet reduction criteria in the next stage of Kyoto that begins in 2013. By that time, India and China will account for more than 20 percent of world carbon dioxide levels and must step up and hold their industry responsible for upgrading equipment and reducing greenhouse gas emission.

The agreement's greatest deficiency is the absence of the United States. While Kyoto's 140 signatories account for some 62 percent of world carbon dioxide levels, the United States alone produces 25 percent more. In fact, the US ranked 45th in the 2005 index of environmental sustainability prepared by researchers at Yale and Columbia Universities, which is based upon 75 different measures including the rate at which children die from respiratory diseases, fertility rates, water quality, overfishing, emission of heat-trapping gases and the export of sodium dioxide, a crucial component of acid rain. Ahead of the US were countries such as Japan, Botswana, the tiny Himalayan kingdom of Bhutan, and most of Western Europe.

The agreement's greatest deficiency is the absence of the United States. While Kyoto's 140 signatories account for some 62 percent of world carbon dioxide levels, the United States alone produces 25 percent more.

Since atmospheric pollution is a global problem, the efforts by Kyoto states will be of little value to them if there is a lack of a comprehensive worldwide struggle. Being far behind Europe in terms of clean technology, the United States sees little cost incentive in joining the Kyoto Protocol and forcing both costly industry reform and the purchase of foreign carbon credits. The US will instead "free ride" the agreement and thereby gain a competitive advantage over their European counterparts by maintaining lower production costs for the same product.

Of course, in the Bush White House the story is always more complicated and corrupt than simple financial calculations. It is no secret that Bush is little more than a puppet for powerful American industries, especially when it comes to issues of energy and the environment. He has headed a string of industry-friendly legislation that has made its way through Congress and actually increased the rate of carbon dioxide emissions, amongst other things. Most recently, Bush has thrown his support behind Republican lawmakers in the Senate formulating more environmentally damaging legislation.

The Clear Skies Act of 2005 proposed by Senator James M. Inhofe of Oklahoma, Republican and chairman of the Environment and Public Works Committee, as an amendment to the woeful Clean Air Act, is a Senate-led assault on proper environmental legislation. While the bill attempts to establish an emissions trading system similar to that of Kyoto, it targets only sulfur dioxide, nitrogen oxides, and mercury – three human health hazards that are already on the out in most places. It refuses to set caps on carbon dioxide, which continues to deny US responsibility in addressing global warming, and allows companies to announce their environmentally-friendly reforms without actually making any significant alterations. Not wishing to anger his favorite lobbyists in the coal industry, Mr. Inhofe has openly opposed any sort of carbon dioxide cap, calling global warming "the greatest hoax ever perpetrated on the American people."

Aaron Wodin-Schwartz is a Collegian columnist.

Dynamite resolutions, gosh!

Matt Brochu

Welcome to February, quite possibly the worst month ever. Let's just say that if February were a jellybean, it'd be a licorice one that someone dropped on the dorm shower floor. It's still freezing outside, half the nation is forced to be romantic for a 24-hour span (while the other half eats Ben and Jerry's and watches "Waiting to Exhale"), and on top of that, our three-week grace period has come to an end and we finally have to take the plastic wrap off our textbooks. At least we don't have to worry about getting a detention if our grocery-bag-book-cover falls off in our backpacks.

As pointless as this month may be, February has become infamous for one thing (well two, if you count the silent "r" that no one pronounces): and that's forgotten New Year's resolutions. We've all been there. You get inspired by the upcoming year as midnight approaches (or you just get really drunk) and before you know it, you've butchered the words to "Auld Lang Syne", downed a whole bottle of Andre (the first horrible decision of the year, and it's only been like 5 minutes), and made a year-long promise of abstinence that would make Gandhi say, "Damn."

And that's why I'm here today - to serve as a reminder of the good intentions that paved your way to those resolutions in the first place, all with the help of this week's co-columnist Napoleon Dynamite (and I'll put everything Napoleon says in quotes, just to show you exactly how little I actually had to write). So what am I going to write this week? What ever I feel like writing, GOSH.

And that's why I'm here today - to serve as a reminder of the good intentions that paved your way to those resolutions in the first place, all with the help of this week's co-columnist Napoleon Dynamite.

1) WEIGHT LOSS – "I see you're drinking 1% milk. Is that 'cause you think you're fat?" 'Cause you are fat. It's weird what going out four nights a week and sitting around all day watching MADE reruns will do to you. Sure, you try to cut carbs by drinking Michelob Ultras, but guess what? It does nothing if you suck down ten of them in three hours. Let's face it. Even though the dining hall food sucks, everyone gets fat in college. But no one's going to want to hang out with you if "you go around ruining everyone's lives and eating all their steak". So when a friend calls you up and says, "Tina, you fat lard, come get some dinner!" just politely decline and "go make yourself a dang quesadilla," because tater tots clearly aren't an option for you anymore.

2) MAKE NEW FRIENDS – Connecting with your hall mates isn't easy when you spend most of your days "training to be a cage fighter". Believe me, I know from experience. Sure, you've got friends at home, but you need to stop reliving your high school football memories and get out of the past. Let's be honest. If your coach had put you in fourth quarter, you wouldn't have won state. You probably would've gotten your ass kicked. This is why you need a few buddies, to have your back and stuff. So why don't you have friends? Take a look around. You're the only guy on your floor who has a mustache.

The solution? You need to hit up the mall.

Step 1) Start off with a haircut and a shave at the Cut n' Corral.

Step 2) Suck up and splurge on a new wardrobe. You think you can make a good impression dressed like Peter Pan? Forget about it.

Step 3) Pay Glamour Shots a visit to build some confidence.

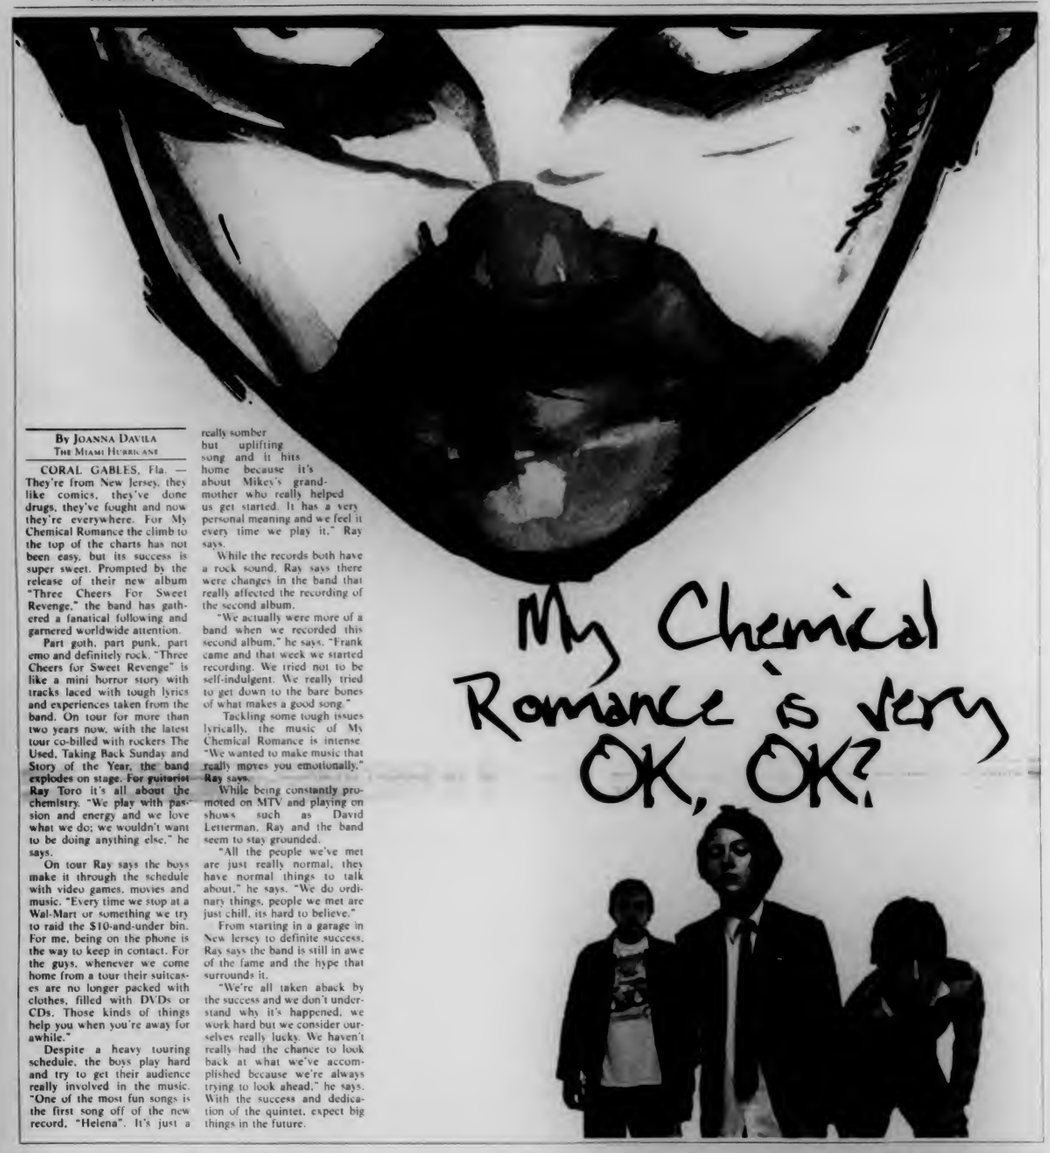
Step 4) Toss the football around in your hallway and film yourself in the process. If you haven't assembled an entourage by then, even a magical liger couldn't help you out.

3) DRINK LESS – You might have better luck trying to make it "summer all year round."

4) FINDING A GIRLFRIEND - Ok, so maybe you already have the ideal body, a sweet bike, and some trendy boondoggle key chains to match ("a must-have for this season's fashion"), but you need a little more than that to find a girl who will investigate pointless fights and have sex with you on a regular basis. What else do you need? Skills, my man, and lots of them. "Girls only want boyfriends who have great skills. You know, like nunchuck skills, bow hunting skills, computer hacking skills." Stuff like that.

You see, right now you're going about it all wrong. Maybe you like this one girl, and maybe you two chat on AIM for like two hours every day. "So you'd say things are getting pretty serious, but you're really just kinda TO'd because she hasn't even posted a full body shot" on Facebook yet. But here's a head's up. No one's "jealous because you chat online with babes all day." So here's a hint. Meet her in person. Tell her you like her hangs. "Build her a cake. Draw a picture of her or something." And if you get the shading on her upper lip just right, maybe, just maybe, she'll be yours, always and forever.

So what was my New Year's Resolution? To find a second job so I can make myself some sweet moolah and pay off my damn credit card bill. Have I already given up on it? Heck yes I have. But even though I'm a hypocrite, keep reading my columns anyway, because if you do, "all of your wildest dreams will come true."



Matt Brochu is a UMass graduate student.

Material from the film "Napoleon Dynamite" was used in this column courtesy of MTV Films.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 2005 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

My Chemical Romance is very OK, OK?

By Joanna Davila
The Miami Hurricane

CORAL GABLES, Fla. — They're from New Jersey, they like comics, they've done drugs, they've fought and now they're everywhere. For My Chemical Romance the climb to the top of the charts has not been easy, but its success is super sweet. Prompted by the release of their new album "Three Cheers For Sweet Revenge," the band has gathered a fanatical following and garnered worldwide attention.

Part goth, part punk, part emo and definitely rock, "Three Cheers for Sweet Revenge" is like a mini horror story with tracks laced with tough lyrics and experiences taken from the band. On tour for more than two years now, with the latest tour co-billed with rockers The Used, Taking Back Sunday and Story of the Year, the band explodes on stage. For guitarist Ray Toro it's all about the chemistry. "We play with passion and energy and we love what we do; we wouldn't want to be doing anything else," he says.

On tour Ray says the boys make it through the schedule with video games, movies and music. "Every time we stop at a Wal-Mart or something we try to raid the $10-and-under bin. For me, being on the phone is the way to keep in contact. For the guys, whenever we come home from a tour their suitcases are no longer packed with clothes, filled with DVDs or CDs. Those kinds of things help you when you're away for awhile."

Despite a heavy touring schedule, the boys play hard and try to get their audience really involved in the music. "One of the most fun songs is the first song off of the new record, "Helena". It's just a really somber but uplifting song and it hits home because it's about Mikey's grandmother who really helped us get started. It has a very personal meaning and we feel it every time we play it," Ray says.

While the records both have a rock sound, Ray says there were changes in the band that really affected the recording of the second album.

"We actually were more of a band when we recorded this second album," he says. "Frank came and that week we started recording. We tried not to be self-indulgent. We really tried to get down to the bare bones of what makes a good song."

Tackling some tough issues lyrically, the music of My Chemical Romance is intense. "We wanted to make music that really moves you emotionally," Ray says.

While being constantly promoted on MTV and playing on shows such as David Letterman, Ray and the band seem to stay grounded.

"All the people we've met are just really normal, they have normal things to talk about," he says. "We do ordinary things, people we met are just chill, its hard to believe."

From starting in a garage in New Jersey to definite success, Ray says the band is still in awe of the fame and the hype that surrounds it.

"We're all taken aback by the success and we don't understand why it's happened, we work hard but we consider ourselves really lucky. We haven't really had the chance to look back at what we've accomplished because we're always trying to look ahead," he says. With the success and dedication of the quintet, expect big things in the future.

Cosmo editors look to sex it up with new Kama Sutra book

By Sara Eads
The Maneater

COLUMBIA, Mo. — The Kama Sutra, an ancient Indian sex guide, has been used for centuries as a guide to sexual enjoyment and sensual pleasures. The editors of Cosmopolitan magazine have put a new twist on an old manual in their latest offering, "The Cosmo Kama Sutra: 77 Mind-Blowing Sex Positions."

The "Cosmo Kama Sutra" includes 77 sexual positions that are "Cosmo's" twists on the original Kama Sutra poses and 12 "Lust Lessons." The 77 sexual positions are mostly variations of the classic positions — guy on top, woman on top and from behind. There are two full pages devoted to each position. On one page is a diagram that can be very helpful for visual learners. The second page consists of "Erotic Instructions," "Why You'll Love It," "Cosmo Hint" and the "Carnal Challenge" rating. "Erotic Instructions" are explicit and clear.

In some positions, bodies are entangled, and it can often be difficult to determine whose foot and arm is whose in the illustrations. The instructions also do a nice step-by-step job of guiding the couple into the correct positions, though it can be confusing at times. "Why You'll Love It" emphasizes the goal of the sex position from G-spot orgasms in the position "G-Spot Iggy," to the guy enjoying carnal control in "Side Wind-her."

"Cosmo Hint" focuses on how to enjoy the sexual position. Although "Erotic Instructions" is a technical guide to the sex positions, "Cosmo Hint" encourages such things as self-stimulation and varied thrusting. The "Carnal Challenge" rating ranges from two to five flames. The more flames a position has, the harder it is but the bigger the payoff. The bigger and better payoff does not really seem to hold true, but the positions garnering a five-flame rating usually require one or both partners to have a background in gymnastics.

"Arc de Triomph" requires the male participant to be able to sit and put his face almost to his knees and for the female partner to have her legs almost flat behind her back. Unlikely. Several of the sex positions have comment boxes in the diagram that highlight the purpose or reward of the position.

"Hang Ten," a from-behind position with both partners standing, is deemed the perfect quickie position and "Tight Squeeze," a reverse missionary position with the woman on her stomach and the guy on top entering from behind, is perfect for extra-long lust sessions.

Besides offering 77 sexual positions, the "Cosmo" guide includes 12 "Lust Lessons" interspersed throughout the handbook. The lessons range from finding your G-Spot to the low-down on using the right lube. Especially interesting is "Lust Lesson #8," a sizzling mock menu that includes sexual appetizers, the main course and dessert and a guide to moving from position to position within one sex session.

Many of the positions offered in the book appear to be the same thing, but the slight differences can change the sensations. At the very least, this book is fun to look through and will get you talking with your partner or your friends.

The editors of Cosmopolitan Magazine have recently released a new book that finds a unique approach to the age old teachings of the Kama Sutra. The book shares 77 different sexual positions.

Lucky lovers get pampered with day spa, dinner and drinks

By Cameron Methner
Collegian Correspondent

The "Discover your Lover" campaign, sponsored by The Daily Collegian, has chosen three single men and three single women out of all those UMass students who were interviewed, who have agreed to go on a blind date. UMass students have been able to vote online for which two singles they think should go out with each other on this blind date.

After the couples are decided they will each go on a date that includes three different places in the area that are giving complimentary services specifically for the date. Each date includes an activity first, dinner, and then drinks at a pub or bar. A writer, photographer and video camera will follow the couple during their date.

The third date package contains three different places for the couple to go. The first is the Ochoa Day Spa located in South Hadley, which has been open since 1995. The spa has 12 private rooms that offer full day spa treatments. These treatments include such services as facials, massages, hydrotherapy, pedicures, manicures, waxing, body wraps, and much more.

Ryan Ochoa, the marketing manager, says that, "The Ochoa Day Spa is about nurturing you inside and out; we have friendly staff and personalized services that will make you want to come back week after week and month after month."

The couple will receive a complementary "Siddha Body Detox" where pouches of herbs are swept across the body. The detoxifying process is used to remove toxins from the body and can be compared to an exfoliate. This type of detoxifier, using pouches of herbs, is an ancient Indian technique. After the couple's detoxifying, each will enjoy a "Steam" which is like a sauna, but does not use dry heat or rocks. Moisture is used along with aromatherapy.

The last and final service the Ochoa Day Spa includes in the package is a "Hydrotherapy Tub" service; the couple will be in individual tubs and will have the chance to relax. The tub will have seaweed and other herbs along with jets to calm and soothe.

After their spa treatment the couple will travel to Main St. and Pleasant for dinner at Spoleto's Restaurant. The couple will enjoy the vibrant and lively atmosphere at this fine restaurant. Spoleto's has been open in the same location for almost 17 years and still has had the same head chef since their opening. The restaurant has a large Italian menu and specializes in their pasta dishes. The margaritas are made from scratch and there is always a welcoming feeling with a large local customer base to make a more familiar appeal to the restaurant.

Jenny Kipp, a manager at Spoleto's, quotes a popular slogan there, "We love what we do and it shows," she says, "It is a lively and fun place to be."

The couple will be given a complementary appetizer, entrée, and dessert. Along with dinner the couple can have two cocktails or a bottle of wine under $30.

When dinner is done the couple will be welcomed at the Amherst Brewing Company, (ABC), A pub and restaurant, ABC boasts a wide range of drinks and brew their own beer. There is often jazz or blues playing live downstairs giving a different atmosphere than most bars, while upstairs the pool tables and dartboard provide a place to relax and play.

Dean Sulia, the general manager, says, "ABC's atmosphere is a pub scene without the smoke, it's an up-scale place to be."

The couple will spend some time downstairs with live music to entertain them and complimentary ABC draft drinks. Then the couple will have a reserved pool table waiting for them upstairs. Here they will end the date package.

Hopefully magic will happen between the two, but if not, they still have a great date in store for them.

STUDENT LEGAL SERVICES OFFICE
UMASS, AMHERST

HELPING STUDENTS PROTECT THEIR RIGHTS FOR 30 YEARS

Free Legal Advice, Referrals, Representation and Counseling for UMASS Students

Student & Workers Rights, Family & Criminal Law, Landlord/Tenant & Consumer Disputes

CALL 545-1995
or stop in at 922 Campus Center

Who Controls The Democratic Party?

www.DiscoverTheNetwork.org

Tired of the Dorms?

•IT'S NEVER TOO EARLY TO LOOK FOR AN APARTMENT WITH LINCOLN REAL ESTATE•

Lincoln Real Estate

25 N. Pleasant St.
253-7879
www.amherstlincolnrealty.com
Now accepting applications for June 2005

STUDENT TRAVEL
MAKE YOUR BREAK
Spring Break '05

Beach
»Cancun $709 — Air + 1 week at Club Verano Beat, located on the beach
»Jamaica $719 — Air + 1 week at the Fun Holiday Beach Resort, located on the beach

Europe
»Amsterdam $432 — Air + 6 nights at the Bulldog Hostel near central station
»Paris $515 — Air + 6 nights at the Aloha Hostel

Alternative
»Costa Rica $688 — Air + 6 nights at San Jose / Manuel Antonio
»Montreal $511 — Air + 1 week at HI Montreal

Packages include roundtrip airfare from Boston and/or New York and accommodations. Subject to change and availability. Taxes and other applicables fees not included.

STA TRAVEL
www.statravel.com
(413) 256.1261

At Quinnipiac University School of Law, you'll find all the tools you need, in a setting you can appreciate. From rigorous academics to live-client clinics to real world externships. From accessible and distinguished faculty to the most advanced technology. Everything you need to succeed. For more information, visit http://law.quinnipiac.edu or call 1.800.462.1944.

QUINNIPIAC UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF LAW

Application for Admission
Office of Admissions
275 Mount Carmel Avenue • Hamden, CT 06518-1948
E-mail: ladm@quinnipiac.edu

CRIMINAL | DISPUTE RESOLUTION | FAMILY | HEALTH | INTELLECTUAL PROPERTY | TAX

Seeking Admission to:
SOLVE PROBLEMS FOR A LIVING.

Eve loses necklace, joins the party, and gets in an accident

Original Sin

Eve

Imagine relying on a necklace to maintain tranquility in life. I never thought I would until the events of last weekend took place. The necklace was a gift from an old friend who told me, "This is for luck, always wear it, and only great things will happen to you." So I decided to put it on and give superstition a chance.

It is a black, round, shiny chunk of some unknown material, hung by a simple black leather string that barley ties properly. I wouldn't say that it is of the highest quality for a piece of jewelry, but it quickly grew on me.

Last weekend, I took it off for the first time in months, and slowly watched my luck fade away due to circumstance.

I have a close group of guy friends who all happen to be roommates in a decent-sized house off-campus. Saturday night was the night that one of them had finally turned twenty-one, and of course, we threw a party in his name. However, this wasn't just a party; this was a combination of many kegs, many people, and a few DJ's with two turn-tables and four very nice speakers. We were just asking for trouble.

I believe it took only a few hours before the Amherst Police interrupted our little get-together, but it was enough time to be fully liquored up. Everyone left quickly, all scrambling for their jackets, wallets, and taking last sips of their drinks. Everyone was leaving to avoid arrest, but why would anyone get arrested for having fun?

I suppose that is why I chose to stay, until I realized the severity of the situation.

"Put your hands behind your back and stop talking." I heard the clasp tighten and shut around three out of the four roommate's wrists and there was nothing I could do about it. "You are under arrest for noise and town bylaw violations; we are taking you down to the station."

I watched as they escorted my friends out the door and into the police car. Moments later, one of them slipped me his wallet and whispered in my ear, "Take my bank card and bail us out, here's my password."

I agreed, the door slammed shut and they were gone. I looked at his wallet, then at my surroundings. I scanned the barren parking lot for any sign of life, but all I could see were parked cars and snow. Suddenly, I saw them, two of my closest friends and the remaining roommate that had escaped just in time. I couldn't have been more relieved.

"Hey, guys. Let's bail them out together, and then maybe you all want to get some pizza?"

The process took much longer than we had all anticipated. Three long, painful hours later our friends were free and we were all exhausted and agitated by the conclusion of our night. I dropped them all at home and offered one of them a ride to his house somewhere far outside the Amherst area. I don't know why, but I guess I was feeling helpful that evening.

We all said our solemn goodbyes to our friends, and left toward our next destination. I looked over and smiled at the guy sitting next to me. He is a good friend, with great humor, a wonderful heart, a beautiful face, and a girlfriend, but there is nothing wrong with enjoying his company, right?

We drove for miles, talking comfortably about nothing, and fully enjoying the countryside together. I didn't notice the length of the drive, the numerous trees, the lack of streetlights, or the icy roads.

"Be careful," he said. "I totaled my car here yesterday." I nodded in response and kept driving.

"Turn here," he directed as he pointed to a steep driveway that sloped downward toward his home. I turned in and descended slowly toward his front door.

We hugged goodbye, and I turned the car around to make my way back home, but I didn't get that far.

My car failed to get up past the middle of the driveway. The more I accelerated, the faster my car slipped backward down the road. I pulled the handbrake and accidentally swerved the tail end of my car off the road by a wooded area.

Why? I thought. I was stuck in the middle of nowhere, in the woods, in the freezing cold, in the snow, with high-heels, and no necklace. It was just my luck.

I had no choice but to call him, but of course, there was no reception. So I walked with my heels in knee-deep snow all the way back to his house and begged for his help. We spent an hour trying to dislodge my car and put it back on its natural course. We shoveled, we pushed, we burned lots of rubber, and absolutely nothing made any difference.

The only other option was AAA. We sat in my car and waited, both sharing our life stories, and both trying hard to enjoy each agonizing minute together in the cold. I would say the situation was romantic, but I was slightly too numb to feel.

The sun was rising when AAA finally arrived. They managed to pull my car out, despite the fact that they did not have four-wheel-drive and they were still wearing braces. It was now time for bed.

I gave my friend a warm embrace and finally made my way home. My empty gas light clicked on. I had twenty miles to drive, I couldn't feel my feet, and I still didn't have my necklace, but somehow I managed to make it back all in one piece.

Eve is a Collegian columnist.

Tourism down, Disney upset

By Brad Foss
Associated Press

Mickey Mouse has a bone to pick with Uncle Sam.

Some U.S. travel executives, including those who run Disneyland and Walt Disney World, think the government needs to do more to improve the country's image with foreign tourists who increasingly are choosing other places for their vacations.

Tourism officials ascribe the decline partly to anti-Americanism that arose after the country launched military action in Afghanistan and Iraq and to the "hassle factor" associated with new visa application and airport security procedures.

Aggressive campaigns by other countries to lure tourists have had an impact, too.

"It's more than just an image decline," said Jay Rasulo, president of Walt Disney Parks & Resorts, a Lake Buena Vista, Fla.-based unit of The Walt Disney Co. "I think other countries are out there competing for tourists and we have not been."

Rasulo and other travel executives said tourism to the United States, while rising again after several down years, is not as robust as it should be, with an estimated 10 percent fewer international visitors in 2004 than in 2000. Although the weak dollar has brought more visitors in recent months, the overall trend is still disappointing to the industry.

The stakes involved are huge. Visitors from abroad accounted for about $93.5 billion in spending and economic activity in the United States in 2004, according to Commerce Department estimates. That's slightly larger than U.S. exports of automobiles, engines and parts.

Homeland Security Department spokesman Dennis Murphy said the new procedures are intended to correct vulnerabilities exploited by the Sept. 11 terrorists, without impeding trade or travel. "We can't allow our system to be abused again," he said.

"Because the system was not enforced rigorously in the past, any change to enforcement postures become significant changes in the minds of people who used it before," he added.

Tourism officials emphasized that they aren't opposed to the Bush administration's homeland security objectives; what concerns them is the manner in which policies are implemented.

"We have developed an image in many countries as fortress America," said Betsy O'Rourke, senior vice president for marketing at the Travel Industry Association of America, a Washington-based trade group. O'Rourke said tourists should be greeted as "customers," not potential "invaders."

Alan Chick of Brighton, England, has traveled to the United States once a year, on average, for the past 18 years and said that while there is some truth to the perceived hassle factor, the problem has been vastly overblown and shouldn't deter foreign tourists.

"Unfortunately, the Americans don't do very much to dispel these things," said Chick. "They don't really do anything to say 'Hey, it's really not that bad.'"

The commission that investigated the Sept. 11 attacks said the nation's beefed-up border screening system needs to become more efficient and friendly, and it noted that visa applications in 2003 were down 32 percent compared with 2001.

"There is evidence that the present system is disrupting travel to the United States," the commission said.

Meanwhile, a November poll of 8,000 consumers from eight industrialized nations found that 55 percent of respondents had an increasingly negative perception of that United States, according to Seattle-based market research firm GMI Inc.

That rankles some travel officials.

The image problem aside, the U.S. tourism industry is already losing global market share as borders in many parts of the world have become easier and cheaper to cross, and as countries from Spain to Singapore outspend the United States in tourism marketing and advertising.

"I don't know if it's naiveté or arrogance that we feel people know the U.S. so well that we don't need to invite them," said Marilyn Carlson Nelson, CEO of Carlson Companies Inc., the Minnetonka, Minn.-based owner of travel agencies, hotels and restaurants.

Either way, Nelson said it is critical for the U.S. government to market its national parks and other attractions more forcefully, lest it concede more tourism business to other countries and allow "the perception that foreigners might not be welcome" to fester.

Thirty-nine state governments spent about $20 million in 2003 on international advertising and other promotions, according to a nationwide survey. This was down 11 percent from the year before, but still more than twice as much as the federal government has allocated for 2005.

Officials likened the U.S. tourism industry's woes to the recent experience of American universities, which have seen declining applications from foreign graduate students since 2001. Education officials attribute the drop-off to the same three factors cited by travel executives: tighter U.S. immigration policies, negative attitudes toward the United States and increasing competition from other countries.

Angela Aggeler, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Bureau of Consular Affairs, a division of the State Department, said the agency has added staffing and improved technology at consulates around the world in order to streamline visa-application procedures and make one message clear: "The welcome mat is out."

She conceded that requiring face-to-face interviews, digital fingerprints and other personal data as part of the visa application process may have sent the opposite message. "But how do you address those perceptions?" she said.

Disney's Rasulo said the U.S. government needs to spend more money on marketing and advertising. "If the source of that image is the nightly news, I don't think that paints a particularly good picture of the United States as a tourist destination," he said.

Disney and many other American tourist destinations are complaining about the lack of visitors since the War on Terror began.

Pregnant?
Would you like to talk?
Information can help clear away the confusion.
We offer free, confidential counseling with caring counselors who understand your concerns. We provide information about your options so you can make the best decisions for your baby and you!
Open Adoption Available: Choose your baby's parents, meet them and stay in touch. Medical and living assistance available.
CALL 1-877-777-7774 toll free/24 hrs
E-mail:info@brightsideadoption.org
www.brightsideadoption.org
Brightside Adoption Resource Center
2112 Riverdale Road • West Springfield
413-827-0515

Discover Your LOVER
The Collegian Dating Game
CHECK OUT YOUR MATCHMAKING SKILLS!
We rounded up
3 Men and 3 Women
You paired them up!
Find out where the couples are going:
Date Package #1 Online
Date Package #2 Online
Date Package #3 TODAY
www.dailycollegian.com

Four Seasons
WINE • LIQUOR • CIGARS
333 Russell St., Rt. 9
Hadley, MA 01035
584-8174
Sale date 02/17 - 02/23
not responsible for typographical errors.
Wine
Blackstone Winery 1.5 lt Cabernet, Merlot.....$15.99
Gossamer Bay 1.5 lt Chard, Cabernet, Merlot.....$7.99
Graceland Cellars 750 ml Blue Suede Chard, King Cabernet, Jailhouse Red.....$9.99
Corbett Canyon 3.0 lt box White Zinfandel, Pinot Grigio, Chard.....$7.99
Wyndham Estates 750 ml Merlot, Cabernet, Shiraz.....$7.99
Canyon Road 750 ml Cabernet, Shiraz, Merlot & Chard.....$5.99
Solaris Winery 750 ml Cabnernet, Chard, Merlot, P.Noir.....$10.99
Beringer 750 ml White Zinfandel.....2 for $10.00
Liquor
Bushmills Irish Whiskey 1lt.....$22.99
Jameson Irish Whiskey 1 lt.....$22.99
Jagermeister 1 lt.....$20.99
Malibu Coconut Rum 1 lt.....$16.99
Sauza Gold Tequila 750 ml.....$13.99
Alize 750 ml.....$14.99
Dr. McGillicuddy's Schnapps 750 ml.....$10.99
Jim Beam Bourbon 750 ml.....$10.99
Cruzan Flavored Rums 750 ml.....$10.99
UV Flavored Vodkas 750 ml.....$8.99
Hours: Monday - Saturday 9am - 11pm, Sunday 12pm - 11pm

UMass and URI to collide in Amherst

WOMEN'S HOOPS from page 12

UMass is not the numbers she puts up in the scoring column. Her main role is to do the dirty work on defense and under the boards for the Minutewomen.

Campbell has excelled in this role as she is fourth in the conference in both rebounds (8.4 pg) and steals (2.5 pg). Not coincidentally, Campbell's improved play has coincided with the Minutewomen's recent surge.

Both Campbell and Dacko hope UMass can continue to build some momentum in the last two weeks before postseason play begins.

"We're really trying to fight to get that bye," Campbell said. "We want to keep playing the way we've been playing."

"We're coming off a good weekend of basketball," Dacko said. "We executed fairly well in Dayton, but at the same time, against Xavier we needed to execute down the stretch in the final three minutes, and we weren't able to do that.

"So we've got to be able to execute. Our kids are playing with more and more confidence. We've just got to make the bunnies when we're wide open."

Karen Wingard/Collegian

Monique Gowan and the Minutewomen will be playing in front of 1,000 screaming kids today at the Mullins Center for Field Trip Day.

Field Trip Day will work in UM's favor

FIELD TRIP from page 12

other, know what plays [Dacko] called. Everybody was on the same page. It was a better atmosphere."

Two weeks ago, when they traveled to Olean, N.Y. to take on the Bonnies, the atmosphere was still loud, just not as intense. The Reilly Center set a new attendance record for a women's basketball game, but it was unusual for a notoriously hostile crowd that last season didn't hesitate to tell Govan to "lay off the steroids" and call the team "a bunch of men", as they did last season.

"I think bringing the kids in definitely helped calm the usual people who say stuff down. They wouldn't be saying the same stuff in front of kids that they normally would," Nelson said. Whether or not the screams of the 1,700-plus fans had any effect on their playing is debatable; what's not is their poor shooting. They lost 49-35 to the Bonnies on a 29 percent day from the floor.

When the Minutewomen come to the Mullins today, the 1,000 or so youths will be on their side, a welcoming change.

"I'm really happy," Dacko said. "Any time we can get people to come and see our teams play locally, I think it's important. I think our kids are great role models to younger, adolescent kids, and I think they can find a lot of fun, joy and excitement in watching our team play basketball."

Bettman nixes rest of season without deal

NHL from page 12

Before Monday, the idea of a salary cap was a deal-breaker for the players' association but the union gave in and said it would accept one when the NHL dropped its insistence that there be a link between revenues and player costs.

That still wasn't enough to end the lockout that started on Sept. 16 and ultimately wiped out the entire 1,230-game schedule that was to begin in October and run through the Stanley Cup finals in June.

And now those concessions are off the table.

"By necessity we have to go back to linkage since no one knows what the damage to the sport will be," Bettman said.

The NHL's last game came in June, when the Tampa Bay Lightning beat Calgary 2-1 in Game 7 to win the Stanley Cup.

Since then, a lot of stars have moved on, going overseas to play. Jaromir Jagr, Vincent Lecavalier, Teemu Selanne, Joe Thornton and Saku Koivu are among the over 300 of the league's 700-plus players who spent part of this season playing in Europe.

Whenever a deal is reached, there won't be a clear-cut way to determine the draft order. Washington had the No. 1 selection last year and grabbed Russian sensation Alexander Ovechkin. No doubt the lowly Capitals would love to go first again to pick Crosby.

Shortly after Bettman took over as commissioner, a lockout cut the 1994-95 regular season to 48 games, still more than half the schedule.

The NHL began preparing for the possibility of another lockout in 1998 when each team contributed $10 million toward a $300 million war chest. The collective bargaining agreement, which expired on Sept. 15, was extended twice after it was originally signed in 1995. That allowed for the NHL to complete its expansion plans without interrupting play.

"We lived through a decade of a collective bargaining agreement that didn't work," Bettman said. "It doesn't matter whose fault it was."

A year ago, there were those who said at least one season was sure to be lost and that two was not out of the question. With the former now the reality and the latter a distinct possibility, both sides are regrouping for a longer fight.

"When emotions are high, things are said, things are done," Wayne Gretzky, now a managing partner with the Phoenix Coyotes, said on ESPN. "Ultimately, these players want to play. I know too many of them love the game too much, and I just can't imagine these players not playing in the National Hockey League for two years. To me, I hope that doesn't happen because I don't know how we would recover."

Stores suffering without hockey

By Sylvia Lee Wingfield
Associated Press

BOSTON — Boston Bruins fans and hockey-dependent businesses who have endured a winter without major league games felt the blow Wednesday when word came down that the NHL season was officially canceled.

"It's huge," said Brian Ducary, kitchen manager of McGann's Pub, half a block from the FleetCenter.

Even though Boston Celtics fans would be filling McGann's and nearby establishments again in a few hours, the news was tough. The loss of hockey games has meant business is down by about half, he said.

"Bruins fans spend a little bit more money than the Celtics fans. The waitresses' tips aren't as good as they were," Ducary said.

Bruins fans Billy and Kathy Mazzone of suburban Needham stopped by the Irish-themed pub as part of a day off in the city.

"I think it's brutal," Billy Mazzone said. "I feel bad for the businesses. I feel bad for the fans. Everybody suffers."

Kathy Mazzone added, "It's too bad that the kids have to see something like this. It shouldn't be about money or salary." They have two sons, 10 and 20 years old.

Billy Mazzone has been been watching college games on TV and has been to an AHL game, where he appreciated the lower ticket prices, but said it's not the same.

"I miss the big boys," he said. "I miss the pros."

In a year when the Red Sox won the World Series and the Patriots took their third Super Bowl title in four seasons, the biggest on-ice moment at the FleetCenter has come from the son of a Bruins great. Boston University freshman Chris Bourque, the son of Hall-of-Fame defenseman Raymond Bourque, scored in overtime Monday night to defeat Northeastern 3-2 in the Beanpot championship.

At an afternoon news conference that followed the league's cancellation announcement, Bruins officials also expressed their disappointment that the team won't be taking the ice anytime soon.

"Tragic is a word that comes to mind," team president Harry Sinden said.

NHL Commissioner Gary Bettman announced the cancellation of the major league season Wednesday after last-minute negotiations failed. The league and players' union traded a flurry of proposals and talks Tuesday night, but could never agree on a core issue.

Sinden said it was unfortunate that some members didn't believe what they were told about the league's current economic situation.

"I think you will see the league and its member clubs go to work to get ready to play next season," Sinden said. "We will come back with a product that works."

Coach Mike Sullivan said he'd been optimistic until Wednesday afternoon that a deal could be reached between the league and the players' union in last-minute meetings over a proposed salary cap. "I'm first and foremost a fan," he said.

The lockout that has hurt nearby businesses has also brought losses to the FleetCenter, said Bruins executive vice president Richard Krezwick, who is also president and CEO of the FleetCenter. He wouldn't disclose figures.

"For this season we've been a one-team building," he said, and Celtics games supplemented by college hockey and other entertainment hardly made up the Bruins gap.

looking for somthing to do this summer?
Come to the
Summer, Co-op & Internship Opportunities Fair
TODAY! February 17, 2005
10 am - 3 pm
Campus Center Auditorium
Summer & Semester Positions with High-tech, Camp and Liberal Arts Employers
All Majors
Undergraduate & Graduate Students Welcome
phone: 413-545-2224
fax: 413-545-4426
www.umass.edu/careers
CareerServices
Career Services Office
UMass Amherst
511 Goodell Building

Mixed bag of feelings for Sammy Sosa fans

JEFFREY BOAN/MIAMI HERALD

Sammy Sosa will no longer be making his homerun swing as a member of the Chicago Cubs, as he was traded to the Baltimore Orioles in the offseason. Fans and writers have mixed feelings of Sosa.

CHICAGO — The e-mail arrived at 2:19 a.m. on Jan. 30, and its subject line read, "Please don't speak for me."

Zak Chesson had not liked my column bidding good riddance to Sammy Sosa, and he especially had not liked the way I had presumed to speak for an entire city. That's why his blood was boiling in the wee hours of a winter night. And as I reread my column, I saw that he was right, that I had made it seem as if everyone in Chicago was happy to see Sosa hit the road.

But that wasn't why his e-mail had been tapping insistently on my shoulder the past two weeks. It was because of something else in that e-mail.

"I'm 28 years old and cried for about 45 minutes when I heard the deal last night," Chesson wrote. "My girlfriend, the mother of my 14-month-old son, came rushing from our bedroom thinking that someone had died. She's from Minnesota, where I live now. I told her that she wouldn't understand. I told her that I've lost something that I've known longer than I've known her. Know what? She got it."

I didn't get it, but I wanted to. I wanted to know how Sosa's move to Baltimore could activate a 28-year-old man's sprinkler system.

"I cried like a baby," he said in a telephone interview Monday from Minneapolis. "The last time I cried was when the Cubs clinched against the Pirates in 2003. This just hurt. I can't explain it. I'm not some crazy stalker-type man. I just thought through thick and thin I've always been with him. I think this is a case of two hard-headed entities that couldn't sit down and hash it out."

If you've read my columns the past four years, you know I'm not a fan of Sosa's. Unless Sosa finds a cure for cancer or brings lasting peace to the Middle East, my opinion is unlikely to change. He is one of the most selfish athletes I've ever come across, and that's saying something.

But no matter how much I might question their eyesight, some people see Sosa as a gift. And I suppose, deep down, I envy their passion, the way they have stitched him into the fabric of their lives. I envy anyone who can get an adrenaline rush without a bungee cord.

"I appreciate him," Chesson said. "I appreciated him running out there like a crazy man before every home game. He was the greatest Cub to me. He messed up, there's no denying that. But he did so many wonderful things. The passion that he played with — I don't know. I thought he was great. I still think he's great."

Chesson grew up in Aurora, has a bachelor's degree in political science from the University of Wisconsin, worked as a preschool teacher for physically and sexually abused children, is a bartender now and took the LSAT last weekend in hopes of going to law school. His girlfriend, Amara, works for American Express, and their son, Sajan, is busy being a handful. Chesson seems to be a normal, well-adjusted man. And yet ...

"I've been having dreams about being at a Cubs game and Sammy not being there and me being very confused as to why Sammy's not at the game," he said. "It's very strange. I love the Cubs. They're my favorite team in all of professional sports. I've loved them since I was a kid.

"But it's even strange to me that I'm having dreams about being at Wrigley. That's a little bit too much, I suppose, a little over the top."

He's so angry about the Sosa trade that he's not sure whether he'll go to Wrigley Field when he comes to town this summer. He stayed away for a few years when the Cubs didn't re-sign Greg Maddux in 1993.

But he knows he and the team eventually will reconcile.

"When I go to Wrigley, my heart still pounds like when I was a kid going to the games with my grandma and my uncle," he said. "It's magic to me. I can't imagine that's going to change. I'm upset now, but I'm always going to want to go."

He doesn't believe Sosa's walkout during the last game of last season was as big a transgression as others did. And until there is concrete evidence, he will not believe Sosa used steroids.

He brought Sajan to a Cubs-Astros game in August and told his son Sosa was going to hit a home run for him. It wasn't exactly Babe Ruth pointing to center field, but Sosa hit a homer on the next pitch. That's why Chesson likes Sammy.

In a September game against Pittsburgh, Sosa struck out two times in an 0-for-4 day but made the game-saving catch with the bases loaded in the eighth inning. That's why Chesson likes Sammy.

He can't understand why the Cubs and Sosa can't see things the way he sees them, with love in his eyes.

"Sammy wanted out of there as badly as the Cubs wanted him out," Chesson said. "To me that's hardheaded. They couldn't sit down. They couldn't get along. They couldn't figure something out. The fact he didn't want to retire a Cub, the fact he was willing to not hit his 600th home run in a Cubs uniform — I'm just shocked. I'm absolutely shocked."

I'm not. I'm not surprised a bit. But, as someone who has seen too many contract squabbles, too many egos and too many labor disputes over the years — as someone who has lost some of his sports religion because of occupational hazards — I wish I had Chesson's zeal.

On Wednesday, Cubs pitchers and catchers report to Mesa, Ariz., for spring training, and Chesson will be busy examining his faith. Help is on the way. His girlfriend ordered him a Sosa Orioles jersey as a Valentine's Day gift.

Rick Morrissey is a Knight Ridder columnist.

Things different for Norm Chow these days

By Tim Kawakami
Knight Ridder

TARIQ ZAINI/SAN JOSE MERCURY NEWS

Norm Chow has spent the last two years coaching USC quarterback Matt Leinart, who just won this year's Heisman Trophy.

SAN JOSE, Calif. — I felt like a quarterback who just called the wrong audible and now had Norm Chow's voice barking at full decibel-level into my earpiece.

"Hockey?" the new Tennessee Titans offensive coordinator boomed over the phone after I casually mentioned the 11th-hour NHL talks. "Hockey! Yeecch!"

Hey, nobody told me that Chow was funny! So add funny to: self-deprecating, innovative, commanding and groundbreaking for Asians in coaching. . . .

And still somehow Norm Chow is not a head coach, after decades as an elite college assistant, the past four directing USC's powerhouse offenses and producing two Heisman Trophy-winning quarterbacks.

And still, though the 58-year-old Chow wanted the job badly, Walt Harris is the new football coach at Stanford.

"Don't get me started on that," Chow said about Stanford.

I'd heard about Chow's reputation for being slightly dour; I'd heard that administrators simply didn't feel he had a "head-coaching personality," whatever that is.

Then we spoke for the first time, and I thought: This guy is about as dour as Vince Lombardi.

So let's try to figure out why he's not a head coach again.

"Hey, maybe they're not comfortable with me. But I ain't changing who I is," Chow said, dropping into exaggerated slang.

"I'm proud of who I am. Extremely proud, like I'm sure you are. I don't think Asians, for the most part, are football guys. But I talk about it because I think it's important.

"There aren't many Asians in the sportswriting business, either, right? There aren't many in coaching. So I think we're scrutinized a little more .... But maybe after seeing what I do, someone else follow along, and it'll be easier."

Chow, a Chinese-American, grew up in Hawaii, then played at Utah before his 27-season tenure on LaVell Edwards' staff at BYU. There, he tutored Jim McMahon, Steve Young and Ty Detmer, among others.

After being bypassed by BYU once Edwards retired, Chow moved to North Carolina State in 2000, then was brought to USC in 2001 by Pete Carroll at the start of USC's fledgling dynasty.

Chow conceded that he had decent chances to become a head coach at Kentucky and Arizona in recent years but that neither seemed right.

"The last thing you want to do is go somewhere," Chow said, "and get smoked."

But Stanford, after Buddy Teevens was forced out a few months ago?

"That was different," said Chow, who was named as a finalist and interviewed with Athletic Director Ted Leland. "I thought it all fit ...

"I was excited about it. My wife was excited about it. But you know what? Bottom line, we weren't even close to that job. I bet you I finished in 500th place. I was not going to get that job."

It was time to leave USC.

Chow said, because he and the effusive Carroll had been moving apart for years. Carroll wanted to make room for young assistant Lane Kiffin and was encouraging Chow to look for a new challenge.

Several Stanford administrators loved Chow's offensive mind and the fact that he has a BYU doctorate in educational psychology. But when the hire was made, Leland went with his old friend Harris, who was not without his own credentials.

"Maybe it was my Pidgin English," Chow said sardonically — his English, though tweaked with Hawaii slang, is as clear as a bell.

"Maybe I don't interview well. I thought I did. I spent a lot of time with Pete, and he's a master of being interviewed. . . .

"Ted Leland hired a buddy. I'm not going to fight that. That's the way it was going to happen. OK, but why take my time if you know that?"

On Tuesday, a Stanford spokesman said that the school does not comment on past hiring decisions.

Chow denied a report that, before USC's devastation of Oklahoma in the Orange Bowl, he predicted that his offense would demonstrate to Stanford fans precisely what they had passed up.

"That's baloney — before that game, I'm worried about getting one first down and nothing else," Chow said. "But we did get a bunch of first downs, didn't we?"

What happens if he energizes Jeff Fisher's Titans team? Will Chow have his pick of head-coaching slots?

"Hopefully, we don't lay an egg." Chow said with a low chuckle. "I don't want to come across as a dummy here, but I don't know why this is happening.

"Maybe I'm not vocal enough or demonstrative enough, but I can't change who I am. Too much Asian blood, you know?"

I do know about that one. Yao Ming and Ichiro are superstars. The sports world is changing. Some day, there will be an Asian head coach.

And Norm Chow isn't going to change who he is, nor should he have to, when that day comes.

84 Foundations Worth over $87 Billion Fund the Political Left

www.DiscoverTheNetwork.org

Need A Fundraiser?

Sell something EVERYONE needs!

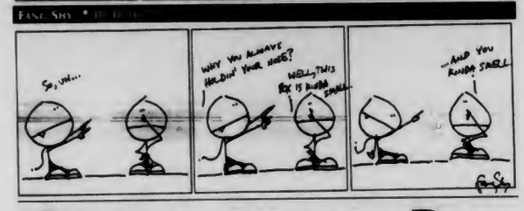
A Proven Best-Seller!

We'll Pay... $5.00

for each qualified Massachusetts Daily Collegian subscription sold by your organization.

For more details call our Circulation Department at 413-545-3500 or email circulation@dailycollegian.com and ask about fundraiser opportunities for your organization.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian



circulation@dailycollegian.com

Quote of the Day

"If you don't know where you are going, any road will take you there."

—Lewis Carroll

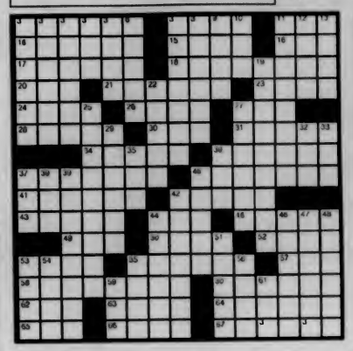
ACROSS
1 Groups of eight
7 Colors
11 Sch. near Harvard
14 Share a book project
15 Sicilian spouter
16 Brew bread
17 Souffle
18 Make level
20 Choose (to)
21 Rodeo ropes
23 St. Louis eleven
24 Verse work
26 Superman's gal
27 Evergreen
28 River of Pakistan
30 Overweight
31 Spanish lariat
34 Largest moon in the solar system
36 India/Pakistan region
37 Hopeful one
40 Headliner
41 Tightly closed
42 Middle East peninsula
43 Beelzebub
44 Pig
45 Lanterns
49 Inhuman ones
50 Not working
52 Hurdle
53 Fencer's foil
55 Fuss of passion
57 East
58 Musician on the road
60 From that place
62 Abbr for a bus
63 Fairy-tale start
64 Add grass to greens
65 Cutler's peg
66 Cooking vessels
67 On an annual basis

DOWN
1 Couple with sixteen arms?
2 Redeemable certificate
3 Quizzed
4 Moose and McBain
5 Cultivate
6 Baseball theft
7 German mercenary
8 Maximum
9 Slaughter of Cooperstown
10 Tome and Principe
11 Indian prince
12 Agenda part
13 Sawbucks
19 Occurring every third year
22 To date
25 Disfigures
27 Thrifty
29 Alluring women
32 __-o'-shanter
33 Simpson __, grandpa
35 Actor Danson
36 Fastening device
37 Dunderhead
38 Black or White
39 Quiet perseverance
40 Sacred book
42 Stable seats
44 Make movie
46 Nastier
47 Developer's purchase
48 Fast
51 Ledger item
53 Give off
54 Long (for)
55 Tuscany river
56 You, to a Quaker
59 High point
61 NASA's ISS partner

Find today's answers online

www.dailycollegian.com

The Moan and Dove



our mug club

drink 144 beers in a year, get your legend emblazoned on a 26oz mug downtown mug club

drink 144 beers in a year, get herpes emblazoned on your mug.

themoananddove.com
460 West St. • Rte. 116
Amherst, MA • 256-1710
3pm 'til 1am every day

Want to Jumpstart your business?

Advertise with the Collegian

H·O·R·O·S·C·O·P·E·S

aquarius • Jan. 20-Feb. 18
Today's your lucky day. Buy a lottery ticket.

pisces • Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Your day will get a lot better as soon as you've passed in your paper.

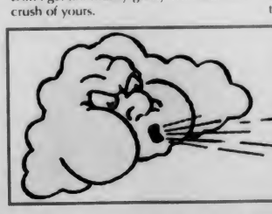
aries • Mar. 21-Apr. 19
You're at the gym more than Schwarzenegger was in his youth.

taurus • Apr. 20-May 20
A game of Scrabble is certainly in order for this evening.

gemini • May 21-Jun. 21
You only see what people want you to see.

cancer • Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Don't get too mushy-gushy with that new crush of yours.

leo • Jul. 23-Aug. 22
There has never been a better time to try new things.



virgo • Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Don't work too hard. You need to have some downtime for yourself.

libra • Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Don't worry about being the center of attention today.

scorpio • Oct. 23-Nov. 21
It's ok to eat food off the ground every once in a while.

sagittarius • Nov. 22-Dec. 21
"Tomorrow, Tomorrow, there's always Tomorrow; it's only a day away."

capricorn • Dec. 22-Jan. 19
One of your professors would love to talk to you after class.

Blow away your competitors, advertise with The Collegian

Call 545-3500

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

Activities

Foam party
Montreal weekends
$89 Montreal Express.Net
1(781)979-9001

Announcements

$600 Group Fundraiser
Scheduling Bonus 4 hours of your group's time PLUS our free (yes, free) fundraising solutions EQUALS $1,000-$2,000 in earnings for your group. Call TODAY for a $450 bonus when you schedule your non-sales fundraiser with CampusFundraiser. Contact Campus-Fundraiser (888)923-3238 or visit www.campusfundraiser.com

Apartment for Rent

1 Bedroom Available North Amherst $425 includes heat & electric bright clean washer/dryer in condo On bus route 1 mile to UMass female preferred Call Liz 508-367-8893

Hobart Condos 3 bedroom, hardwood floors, study area in basement. Cable, telephone (internet access) in all bedrooms and study. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

Apartment for Rent

Brandywine Apts. Now Leasing, 1&2 bedroom apts. Leases begin Jun, July, Aug or Sep. First come, first serve. Get them while they last. www.brandywine-apts.com stop by or call 549-0600

Center of town, 1, 2, 3 bedrooms; hardwood floors. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

Auto for Sale

Pontiac Sunbird 93 automatic 4 cyl excellent turquoise

Auto for Sale

ABS Asking $1350 or BO Call 253-0279

1999 Toyota Camry fully loaded. 75K, Mint condition. Call 413-348-4191

Employment

Top Boys Sports Camp in Maine! Play & Coach Sports * Have Fun * Make $$$ Camp Counselors Positions Available Summer 2005 Apply Online www.campcobbossee.com or call 1-800-473-6104

Make money taking online surveys earn $10 to $125 for surveys. Earn $25 to

Employment

$250 for focus groups www.cash-forstudents.com/umass

Nanny position for 2 boys ages 6 & 9. Perfect schedule for student. Part time Spring. Full time Summer. Prior experience necessary. 413-625-2288

Earn lots of $$ and have fun on the water this Spring & Summer. Raft guides needed at Crab Apple Whitewater in Charlemont, MA. Fun Summer job, no experience necessary. We will train. 413-625-2288.

Room for Rent

350 per month 413-335-5226

Services

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth-control, and Emergency Contraception. Affordable and confidential. STI Screening and Treatment. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992.

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance 549-1906

Travel

One Bed and Studio (Four Queen Beds) at Deerpark one mile from Loon Mountain Available 3/11-3/18 Ken 335-9775

XXX Night
Montreal Weekends
$89 Montreal Express.net
1(781)979-9001

Spring Break 2005
Only 6 weeks left...
Lowest Prices
Biggest Parties Earn 2 Free Trips
Exclusive with Sun Splash Tours
www.sunsplash-tours.com 1800-426-7710

Travel

Bahamas Spring Cruise 5 Days $299! Includes Meals, Celebrity Parties! Panama City, Daytona $159! Cancun, Jamaica, Acapulco, Nassau $499! Award Winning Company! SpringBreakTravel.com 1-800-678-6386

#1 Spring Break Vacations! Cancun, Jamaica, Acapulco, Bahamas, & Florida! Best Parties, Best Hotels, Best Prices! Limited Space! 1-800-234-7007 www.endlesssummertours.com

Your Ad Could Go Here: Call 545-3500.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS THURSDAY

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 2005 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

UMass to take on the Rams

Two teams going in different directions

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

A big crowd is expected for the Massachusetts women's basketball team's matchup with Rhode Island today at noon. Over 1,000 area students will be in attendance as the Minutewomen host the first annual Field Trip Day at the Mullins Center.

The Minutewomen are returning home, where they are 6-2 this season, after splitting a pair of games in Ohio over the weekend. UMass will face the Rams twice in the next 10 days, as the teams meet again in the final game of the regular season on Feb. 27, in Rhode Island.

Rhode Island comes to Amherst with a slightly misleading conference record. The Rams are 3-9 in Atlantic 10 play (5-18 overall), but have dropped five of those games by five points or less. In total, URI has lost nine games by six points or less.

The two teams appear to be going in different directions coming into today's game. UMass (13-10, 6-6) is looking to secure the No. 2 spot in the A-10 East division to clinch a bye in the first round of the conference tournament, while URI is simply looking to snap a five-game losing streak.

This game has all the makings of a trap game for the Minutewomen as they take on Richmond (18-5, 9-3 A-10) this Sunday at home, but UMass coach Marnie Dacko understands that every game at this time of the season is important and doesn't expect a letdown from her troops against URI.

"If we can keep our composure and control the game's tempo, I think the game will be in our favor," Dacko said. "URI is athletic, and they play hard. They can force a scrappy game, but we just need to be able to keep our composure."

Despite the sub-par record, one area the Rams are proficient in is causing turnovers. URI is second in the A-10 in that category, having forced opponents into an average of 21.7 turnovers per game. Seeing that in the scouting report has to cause some concern for Dacko, because turning the ball over has plagued the Minutewomen all season, as they average 19.4 per game.

While Dacko acknowledges URI's ability to create turnovers, she feels it will be important for her team to dictate the pace of the game.

"They throw about three or four different pressures out there," Dacko said. "We need to be able to contain their pressure. At the same time, we want to try to get a running game established. We want to come out and try to extend some pressure on them as well. It could be a really nicely executed game or it could be a severely ugly game."

One player Dacko will rely on to ensure that UMass controls the game is Brooke Campbell. The senior forward is coming off an excellent weekend, as she put up big numbers in both the win at Dayton and the loss to Xavier.

Campbell flies under the radar for the most part, but she proved on Sunday that, when called upon, she is more than capable of carrying the scoring load. Against Xavier, she led the Minutewomen with 18 points, 11 better than her season average.

While the points are a nice bonus, Campbell's true worth to

See WOMEN'S HOOPS on page 9

KAREN WINCZEWSKI/COLLEGIAN

Katie Nelson will look to lead the Minutewomen past Rhode Island today at noon at the Mullins Center on Field Trip Day.

Field Trip Day will help Minutewomen

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

When the Massachusetts women's basketball team returns home to the Mullins Center today at noon for their 55th matchup with long-standing rival Rhode Island Rams, it will be a relief in more ways than one.

The Minutewomen (13-10, 6-6 Atlantic 10) hold the all-time series lead over the lowly Rams (5-18, 3-9 A-10) and are currently 6-2 at home this year, their only losses coming to Duquesne and No. 22 Boston College, and have won 21 of their last 33 in the Mullins Center.

On top of that, today's battle has a special promotion tied to it. Today's game is officially billed as Field Trip Day, and you know what that means. Oh yeah, there are going to be kids there — lots of fidgety, shrieking little children — and that can only mean one thing: It's going to be a little tougher for the away team to communicate out there.

The Minutewomen sure know what it's like to be the visiting team in a Field Trip Day environment, having experienced it earlier this season at Saint Joseph's and St. Bonaventure.

"There's tons of kids screaming, you can't really hear what's going on, what your coach is calling, the plays," point guard Katie Nelson said. "There's hardly any verbal communication because you can't really hear. It's just hard to communicate what plays you're going to run."

Needless to say, Hawk Hill and the small, sweaty confines of its Alumni Fieldhouse provided a bit of a hostile territory when it hosted the Minutewomen on Jan. 13.

The shrieks of all the little tykes made it very difficult for coach Marnie Dacko to call out plays to her five women on the floor, and in turn, it made things difficult for Nelson and backup point guard Monique Govan to set things up on the court. The result was a lot of unforced turnovers, sloppy ball-handling and difficulty creating baskets. The score at the half was a then season low 17-14, with UMass trailing by three.

But something happened. In the second half, the kids started to leave, back to their schools around the Philadelphia area, and the Maroon and White were able to communicate better. The result? UMass won by a lowly score of 42-33, the least they would allow an opponent to score until last Friday at Dayton.

"It was definitely a little bit of relief, you want to be able to communicate with your teammates," Nelson said. "When they started leaving, we were able to hear each

See FIELD TRIP on page 9

Minutemen poised for strong performance at A-10 meet

By Daniel Hillman
Collegian Staff

This Saturday the Massachusetts men's track team will face the rest of the conference in the Atlantic 10 Championships in Kingston, R.I. This meet marks the closure of the indoor track season and a preview for the outdoor track season, which picks up during the spring.

Going into the meet on Saturday the odds-on favorite to win the team competition is Rhode Island. The Rams have gone the entire season undefeated, and are looking to defend the championship they won last season. A win in this year's championship would give the Rams four of the last five A-10 titles. La Salle, the 2003 A-10 champion, is the front-runner to finish in second place.

The rest of the field should be very competitive as St. Joe's, Temple, Fordham, Richmond and UMass all will be fighting to one up each other, and possibly upset the top teams to take home the grand prize.

"The last three or four seasons, the A-10's have finished much of the same way. The rest of the schools and us have battled hard against each other," UMass coach Ken O'Brien said. "It should be very competitive on Saturday."

UMass will be looking for big performances from several athletes.

"We've brought back a core of four or five guys from last season that we're hoping will do well," O'Brien said.

Of those core guys, most of the attention will be focused on the team's co-captains, senior sprinter Joe McCormack and senior jumper Henry Smith.

McCormack has been a standout all season long in the 55-meter dash. Going into Saturday, he will be the favorite to take home first place while Smith will look to defend his title in the triple jump.

In other events, the Minutemen will hope that Jon Korhonen continues to run well in the distance events. Korhonen, who has been versatile in several long distance events, will be running the mile on Saturday. He has run very well in consecutive weeks.

The Minutemen are also looking for strong performances from freshman thrower Sean Calicchio and senior James Godinho. Calicchio, who had his first throw of the season just two weeks ago, is expected to finish well in the shot-put event. The favorite for this event is Rhode Island standout André Reid, who is coming off ECAC and URI Athlete of the Week honors, after an impressive performance at BU when he broke his own school record in the shot-put by two feet.

Godinho, who will compete in the 500-meter run, is coming off a second-place finish at the BU's Valentine's Invitational in the same event.

In addition to individuals, the 4x4 and 4x8 relay teams are expected to do some great things on Saturday. Going into the meet, the teams have been widely touted as one of the best in the Atlantic 10.

Saturday in Kingston is sure to be a big day for the men's track team one way or another. They've worked hard all winter long, and a good performance this weekend will be a boost for the Spring season.

UM women's track team set for Atlantic 10 Championships

By Ian Kilpatrick
Collegian Correspondent

This Saturday, in Kingston, R.I. the Massachusetts women's track team will get one of its last chances to show how hard they've worked and pushed themselves all season when they compete in the 2005 Atlantic 10 Indoor Track and Field Championships.

This time of year is special, especially for UMass' seniors, whose time to achieve goals and show off their hard work is dwindling. For this reason alone, you can expect not only the seniors to bring their highest level of competition to Rhode Island, but the whole team as well.

Massachusetts will have to deal with the dynasty that the URI women's track team is if they want to take home the title for the first time since 1998. The Lady Rams of Rhode Island have captured four out of the last five A-10 titles, including last years.

The year so far for the Minutewomen has been tough and inconsistent, but the team has been gaining confidence and receiving better times as the year has progressed. One of the team's bright spots this season has been the somewhat unexpected success of freshman pole vaulter Kristen Banakowski, who looks forward to her first Atlantic 10 Championship.

"I'm pretty confident going in, and I'm sure other seniors are, too, because it's a big meet for them because it's their last one," Banakowski said. "I'm not too worried about it because a meet's a meet to me, and I just always try to do my best."

Banakowski hasn't always been this confident though, and even failed to clear the bar once in a few meets earlier this season. Still, she is as relaxed as ever going into Saturday's meet.

"I didn't have any confidence in myself, so it's been off and on," the pole vaulter admitted. And when asked where the change in attitude came from she responded, "I think it's getting used to college, and I put too much pressure on myself at the beginning."

Bakanowski's goal is to break the school record of 12 feet, which she tied earlier this season in Boston. If Bakanowski clears 12 feet again this weekend, she will get three chances at conquering 12-feet-6 inches, but in track and field six inches can be a towering mountain to climb.

"Six inches in pole vaulting is a big deal, Bakanowski claims. "I could stay at 12 feet the rest of my life, but I really don't want to."

UMass will face, if not tougher competition, a wider variety of competition than they have faced all year at a Rhode Island track that they are fairly familiar with and have performed well on.

Coach Julie LaFreniere was very pleased two weeks ago when her team had a strong showing at URI, knowing that the A-10's were going to be on the same course just three weeks later. Rhode Island's track is known to be on the slower, less comfortable side, unlike the tracks in Boston where the rest of the post-season takes place, which may add a "home track" advantage to URI's already clear skill advantage.

But for the seniors, that fact is irrelevant and all that matters is that their dedication pays off one last time individually, and as a team.

Bettman ends season

By Ira Podell
Associated Press

NEW YORK — A hockey season on the brink is now a season gone bust.

The NHL canceled what was left of its decimated schedule Wednesday after a round of last-gasp negotiations failed to resolve differences over a salary cap — the flash-point issue that led to a lockout.

It's the first time a major pro sports league in North America lost an entire season to a labor dispute. The resulting damage could be immeasurable to hockey, which already has limited appeal in the United States.

"This is a sad, regrettable day that all of us wish could have been avoided," NHL commissioner Gary Bettman said.

"Every day that this thing continues we don't think it's good for the game," NHLPA executive director Bob Goodenow said in Toronto.

To begin with, all momentum gained in the final days of negotiations has been lost — late offers that appeared to bring the sides close to a deal are now off the table, and there's no telling when the NHL will get back on the ice.

No Stanley Cup champion will be crowned, the first time that's happened since 1919, when the 2-year-old league called off the finals because of a flu epidemic.

Without an agreement, there can be no June draft. The sport's heralded next big thing, Canadian phenom Sidney Crosby, won't pull on his first NHL sweater anytime soon.

Then there is the parade of aging stars — Mario Lemieux (39), Mark Messier (44), Steve Yzerman (39) Brett Hull (40), Ron Francis (41), Dave Andreychuk (41) and Chris Chelios (43) — whose playing days could be ending on someone else's terms.

"This is a tragedy for the players," Bettman said. "Their careers are short and this is money and opportunity they'll never get back," Bettman said.

Despite being the NHL's best-known star, there was never a chance that Pittsburgh's Lemieux, the first owner-player in modern American pro sports history, would side with the players.

"A few years ago, I thought the owners were making a lot of money and were hiding some under the table, but then I got on this side and saw the losses this league was accumulating," he said Wednesday.

Hockey was already a distant fourth on the popularity scale among the nation's major league sports. The NHL lost the first season of its two-year broadcasting agreement with NBC that was supposed to begin this season, a revenue-sharing deal in which the network is not even paying rights fees.

Taking a year off, or more, will only push the league further off the radar screen.

"The scary part now for hockey is do the fans come back? We're not baseball, we're not the national pastime," Nashville forward Jim McKenzie said.

Between shifts of a pickup game at the Denver rink where the Avalanche used to practice, fan Don Cameron called the cancellation "a shame."

"When they come back, it's not going to be as easy to pay for a $90 season ticket," he said.

Not to mention how difficult it will be for all the ushers, trainers, officials, Zamboni drivers and businesses near arenas that will continue to be affected.

"We profoundly regret the suffering this has caused our fans, our business partners and the thousands of people who depend on our industry for their livelihoods," Bettman said.

"If you want to know how I feel, I'll summarize it in one word — terrible," he said.

Bettman said the sides would keep working toward an agreement.

"We're planning to have hockey next season," he said.

Goodenow stressed that the players had already given a lot of ground. "Every offer by the players moved in the owners' direction," he said.

"Keep one thing perfectly clear," Goodenow said. "The players never asked for more money — they just asked for a marketplace."

The league and players' union traded a flurry of proposals and letters Tuesday night, but could never agree on a cap. The players proposed $49 million per team; the owners said $42.5 million. But a series of conditions and fine print in both proposals made the offers further apart than just $6.5 million per team.

"We weren't as close as people were speculating," Bettman said.

Although Bettman was unequivocal in announcing the cancellation, Yzerman held out hope that some kind of a miracle was still possible.

"If you read into what (Bettman) said, it sounds like there is still an opportunity to get things done," the Detroit Red Wings captain said. "The principles are there to make a deal, so I still think something can happen in the next day or two, because we're really not that far apart."

Goodenow was less optimistic.

"I think it's a fresh start and everything is off the table," he said. "It's a totally new environment. That much is for sure.

"As far as anything happening this afternoon, it's not happening."

See NHL on page 9

JERRY LOUKIS/THE PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER

Roman Cechmanek won't be making any sprawling saves on Gary Roberts this season, as the players and owners couldn't end the lockout. Commissioner Gary Bettman cancelled the season yesterday.

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY • EST. 1890

The Daily Collegian

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 2005 WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM VOLUME CXIV ISSUE 83

GEO argues against UMass international fees

By Dan Terk
Collegian Staff

LOWELL – The University of Massachusetts Graduate Employee Organization (GEO) presented arguments to the UMass Board Of Trustees Wednesday morning, hoping to persuade the Board to eliminate fees charged to international students who attend UMass campuses, except the Amherst campus.

The fee was abolished at UMass Amherst after GEO won a biding labor arbitration case against the university. The arbitrator found that the fee was a violation of the non-discriminatory clause of GEO's contract and that "the only protection provided to foreign graduate student employees in though their inclusion in the collective bargaining."

Jennifer Turner, the president of GEO, presented the case to the Board of Trustees at the meeting held at UMass Lowell. She argued if the fees were discriminatory in Amherst, then "its discriminatory 100 miles away on our sister campuses."

Other issues were discussed to the Board. In addition to the abolition of the International Student Fee, Turner also spoke about the current protracted bargaining negotiations between GEO and UMass.

"The University has really given us a poor economic package," Turner said. "Only giving us a two percent raise and at the same time they are asking for significant take backs in terms of heath care and child care benefits. By the end of the third year of the contract our members will be in a net deficient. We obviously think this is unacceptable."

GEO member John Donahoe, who was also at the Board of Trustees meeting, was glad the Board got to listen to his group's issues.

"It was good that we went and let them know about our issues," he said.

Donahoe, like many GEO members, would like to see the negotiations end soon since they have been going on for almost a year now.

"It is really a shame that [the University] is going back to the bottom line," he said. Donahoe believes that the administration is more interested in cutting costs than creating a quality education for both graduates and undergraduates.

GEO is planning to start a petition that can be signed by graduate and undergraduate students to show the administration that all the students, from all over the state support the abolition of the International Student fee. It was noted by Turner that these fees greatly undermine the ability of the University to attract and retain graduate students

Turner said the Board of Trustees "did seem at least be open minded to [his] argument "

"In general the faculty is very supportive of our union and our efforts," he said.

Matt Murphy, the Student Trustee of the UMass Amherst Student Government Association is a non-voting member of the Board of Trustees. He felt that the board might have been unaware of the fees situation because in the past it has been dealt with on a campus-to-campus basis.

Murphy also expressed disappointment in the fact that the union representative to the Board of Trustees was not at the meeting to deal with this largely union issue.

"I imagine that if the case went to court it would be found to be discriminatory…I have been committed to working with GEO and I plan to help them on this issue."

UMass Chancellor John Lombardi was asked for comment via e-mail, but deferred to the UMass New Office, which said, "our feeling is that this is a non-Amherst issue."

MATTHEW REECE/COLLEGIAN

Jennifer Turner, president of the Graduate Employee Organization spoke on behalf of the GEO at a meeting with the UMass Board of Trustees Wednesday morning.

Professors study the threats of drinking water

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

While the nation is dealing with such problems as terrorism, drugs and war, Professor David Reckhow is honing in on a slightly different threat: drinking water.

Reckhow, a professor of civil and environmental engineering at the University of Massachusetts, is the head of a project that is researching the effects of chlorine and debris in reservoirs and other drinking water utilities.

Through a $400,000 grant from the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency, Reckhow, along with colleagues Paula Rees and Klaus Nusselein, will be scouting various reservoirs around the nation over the next two years in hopes of preventing organic matter from entering drinking water sources.

See WATER on page 2

UMass group wins $4 million in contracts

By Jonathan Vega
Collegian Staff

Four contracts totaling over $4 million have been awarded to the University of Massachusetts' Center for Educational Assessment. The contracts will be used to improve state and federal assessments of students in educational programs throughout the country.

Under the first grant, the CEA is working in conjunction with the Buros Center for Testing at the University of Nebraska in order to comprehensively assess the National Assessment of Educational Progress or NAEP. Professor Steven Sireci, who is a co-director of the CEA, points out that NAEP is often considered 'the nation's report card' by the US Department of Education. The scores are often used to compare state-by-state performance in order to increase academic standards for the country.

"In the past ten years, there has been such an explosion in educational testing," Sireci said. "Now we have 'No Child Left Behind,' which by the way, is one of the few bi-partisan endeavors in any field."

NAEP provides a 'grade' to determine how students are performing in various educational systems over time, rather than providing feedback.

"We analyze the testing programs and try to judge the fairness of the programs to the people being tested," Sireci said. "We are trying to promote fairness among constituents of the test."

The National Assessment of Educational Progress dates back to Kennedy presidential administration and the first national educational assessment tests were administered in 1969. Sireci explains that NAEP was meant to evaluate the progress of an educational system.

"[The evaluations] have provided some useful information regarding where students are strong and weak; it has put pressure on students to achieve more." Sireci said. "Massachusetts always does well on the tests, we're usually in the top ten or so."

The CEA will use its $1 million grant to assess the strengths and limitations of NAEP, which draws $100 million in federal funding per year.

Another contract the Center has been granted will fund quality control assessments of the Massachusetts Comprehensive Examination System (MCAS) examination. The MCAS has become synonymous with educational reform in Massachusetts and the center is gearing up to inspect its framework.

See CONTRACTS on page 3

Certified Iraqi election results announced

By Chris Tomlinson
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — A Shiite alliance won a slim majority in Iraq's new National Assembly, according to certified election returns announced Thursday, but it may take weeks to form a government. Meanwhile, interim Prime Minister Ayad Allawi cautioned against excluding all Saddam Hussein's supporters.

Because a two-thirds majority in the 275-member parliament, or 182 seats, is required for confirming the top positions in the new government, the United Iraqi Alliance will have to make deals with the other parties. The alliance won 140 seats, while Kurdish parties got 75, secular Shiites took 40 and nine smaller parties shared 20, the final returns of the Jan. 30 elections showed.

Shiite and Kurdish leaders have already agreed that they must reach out to prominent Sunnis to participate in the government if they want it to be considered legitimate among Sunnis and to have any hope of ending the country's largely Sunni-led insurgency.

The Sunni-led Iraqis Party won only five seats in parliament, because many Sunni Arabs avoided the elections — either out of fear of violence or to support a boycott call by radical clerics opposed to the U.S. military.

Allawi told The Associated Press that the alliance must change its platform of purging Sunnis who were members of Saddam's Baath Party from government positions if it wants national unity.

"The alliance talks about de-Baathification. I hope if they get control and they're chosen to be the ones running the country, I sincerely hope that they revisit these issues in their program and rediscuss it with a view of having reconciliation and national unity," Allawi said.

"We cannot afford in this country, for now, to go on a route different to that of national unity," said Allawi, who spoke English in the interview. Otherwise, "it will throw the country into problems, severe problems."

The key challenge for the new government will be ending the insurgency that kills dozens of people every week. Most Iraqis say only negotiations will end the attacks.

A U.S. soldier was killed and three others were wounded in a car bomb attack while on patrol in the northern city of Mosul, the military said Thursday.

In Baqouba, 35 miles northeast of Baghdad, Iraqi police killed two men with suspected links to al-Qaida's affiliate in Iraq and arrested five others during raids, the city's police chief, Major Gen. Adel Molan, said Thursday.

"We found huge amounts of weapons, including mortars, assault rifles, and explosives. We also found computers and CDs which show the beheading of several hostages in addition to letters which they were about to send to Osama bin Laden," Molan said of Tuesday's raids.

In the latest hostage ordeal, a Swedish citizen kidnapped in Iraq appeared in a video with a gun pointed at his head, appealing to the pope and Sweden's king to help win his release from insurgents, Swedish media reported. A group calling itself "Martyr of al-Hawy Brigades" said it kidnapped the Swede of Iraqi descent as he traveled from Mosul to Baghdad this month.

The National Assembly will be in power for only 10 months, and its main job will be to draft a constitution so new elections can be held in December.

But it won't convene until disputes are resolved over who will become prime minister — the top post in the new government.

Wrangling over who will become Allawi's successor may take days or even weeks to resolve, several people close to the talks said after the electoral commission certified the results of the elec-

See ELECTIONS on page 2

KAREN MINASIAN/AP

The Independent Electoral Commission of Iraq announced the nation's certified election results from its headquarters in Baghdad yesterday. The Shiite alliance won the election by a narrow margin.

MATTHEW REECE/COLLEGIAN

Eating to Victory

Dining Services Director Ken Toong takes a bite out of victory after a bet with the UPenn dining services director that the Patriots would win the Super Bowl.

Windfarm debate strikes again

BOSTON (AP) — Massachusetts officials are trying to redefine the state's coastline in a move that could give them more control over a proposed electricity-generating wind farm off the shore of Cape Cod.

State officials said Tuesday that a recently discovered pile of rocks in Nantucket Sound could change the state's offshore border and expand state-controlled water by about 12 square miles. That would push back federal territorial water and could affect a developer's bid to erect the nation's first offshore wind power farm in the sound.

Gov. Mitt Romney, Sen. Edward Kennedy and others oppose the wind farm, which would consist of 130 turbines standing more than 420 feet high in Nantucket Sound. But they have little control over it, since it's planned for federal water.

Opponents say the turbines would harm wildlife, destroy the offshore view and harm the fishing and boating industries.

Changing the state's border to include the rocks appears to extend state water into as much as 10 percent of the proposed wind farm's area, affecting 10 to 13 turbines, state officials said.

States are allowed to count as part of their area any naturally occurring offshore rocks that are exposed at median low tide. State water extends three miles from where officials draw the border.

The U.S. Minerals Management Service is expected to post a notice about the border change in the Federal Registry by the end of the month, said Jon Carlisle, a spokesman for the Executive Office of Transportation, which oversees state boundaries.

"From our review of the landmass, that's the appropriate new border," Carlisle said.

He would not say if Romney pushed for the new borders in order to curtail the wind project.

"Really, one thing has nothing to do with another," he said.

Last July, Romney asked the Army Corps of Engineers to postpone its review of the proposed wind farm, arguing the newly discovered pile of rocks, which is about the size of an SUV, might require changing the state border. He suggested that might force the developer to redraw plans or seek new permits from state agencies.

-Associated Press

EDITORIAL/OPINION
TEXTBOOK SYSTEMS FLAWED
Textbook prices are out of control and need an immediate solution, one that needs continuous attention.
PAGE 4

ARTS & LIVING
'DANCES' TAKES FLIGHT
"Dances of China" showcases Chinese history and folklore at Fine Arts Center.
PAGE 5

SPORTS
MINUTEWOMEN DOWNED
UMass loses in final seconds to Rhode Island at the Mullins Center.
PAGE 10

WEATHER
TODAY Mostly Cloudy. H31°, L7°
SATURDAY Mostly Sunny H30°, L12°
SUNDAY Mostly Sunny, H27°, L20°

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center
University of Massachusetts
Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief Peter Foundas
Managing Editor Mike Marzelli
Business Manager Rich Pacheco
Production Manager Cory Rosenberg
Night Supervisor Meghan Healy
Advertising Manager Tiffany Sugalski
Editorial Production Samantha M. Nielsen
Arts & Living Editor Michael Busack
Copy Editor Alyson Zillmann
Editorial Editor Allison Edles
Editorial Editor Matthew Reid
News Editor Erika Lovley
Photo Editor Alex Demosthene
Sports Editor Robert McGovern
Circulation Manager Kristen Weiss
Classified Advertising Marty Puppo
Distribution Manager Josh Riggans
Finance Manager Hirak Shah
Accounting Clerk Virginie Prevost
Human Resources Sandra Marquez
Assistant Operations Linda Wallack
Assistant Advertising Josh Greenberg
Assistant Business Nathan Chomsky
Assistant Finance Thomas Hecht
Advertising Production Rachael Bruno
Graphics Adviser Charlie Higgins
Asst. Arts & Living Matt O'Rourke
Asst. Arts & Living Chris Garesano
Assistant News Julie O'Donnell
Assistant News Dan O'Brien
Assistant Sports Jeff Howe

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts calendar semester. The Collegian is independently funded, operating on advertising revenue. Founded in 1890, the paper began as Aggie Life, became the College Signal in 1901, the Weekly Collegian in 1914 and the Tri-Weekly Collegian in 1936. Published daily since 1967. The Collegian has been broadsheet since January 1994. For advertising rates and information, call weekdays between 8:30 a.m. and 5:30 p.m.

Production Crew
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Matt Ekler
PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Matthew Reed
COPY EDITOR
Monique Jemmott
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Alyson Zillmann
PRODUCTION STAFF
Tiffany VonLangen, Amanda Allen

Correction

The Daily Collegian incorrectly quoted Brietta Costa as "Brietta Jones" in Correspondent Matt Sullivan's article about male birth control Feb. 10. We apologize for this error.

UMass professors studying water

WATER from page 1

This project is not focused on one specific area, but rather the entire nation as water treatment centers all over the United States use chlorine to disinfect the diseased water. While this situation is not looked at too often by the public eye, it is beginning to reach the surface. Awais Katzelnik, a junior engineering major at UMass feels that Reckhow and company should absolutely pinpoint this problem and attempt to fix it.

"If they're pretty sure about it, and if it's causing major problems, then I think that it needs attention," Katzelnik said. "Since they're spending a lot of time and money on this, this makes me think that it's a major problem, so I think they should go for it."

The problem that Reckhow's group looks to resolve dates back to the 1960s when chlorine was being used in water treatments plants to reduce certain diseases that were living in the drinking water. While the chlorine was valuable as a decontaminator, it was later discovered by chemist Johannes Rook that in certain incidences, chlorine mixed with organic compounds resulted in the production of carcinogens in the water.

Courtesy UMass.edu

Professor David Reckhow

Drinking water is established when rain passes over the watershed and is then filtered through different aquifers that may contain nontoxic, non-hazardous organic materials. Once this water continues into water treatment centers, the chlorine added to this organic material makes the water potentially dangerous.

Reckhow understands, despite the negative outcomes, that the chlorine is instrumental in preventing many various diseases.

"It's a wonderful, marvelously effective disinfectant that's been responsible for protecting us from all sorts of pathogens," Reckhow said. "We've reveled in its success for a long time."

The problem lies not in the chlorine, but in the organic matter that can cause substantial problems in the drinking water. The past year has consisted of Reckhow accumulating data from various sites in order to figure out a way to resolve the problem of organic matter in the water supply.

Drinking water is a debated topic and has been for decades. Reckhow hopes to make a big step in the reduction of organic matter in reservoirs and water-sources alike. As of now, a few possible solutions include the installation of barrier strips that would take the problematic organic matter and filter it out of the water.

Reckhow, a Tufts University graduate who has been with UMass for 20 years, has been involved in other projects that analyze the problems related to water treatment prior to this one.

FBI informant testifies in court

NEW YORK (AP) — An FBI informant who was set to be the star prosecution witness in a terror trial until he set himself ablaze outside the White House took the stand for the defense Thursday, saying he had sought $5 million for leading prosecutors to a Yemeni sheik he says gave Osama bin Laden money, arms and fighters.

"I deserve that," Mohamed Alanssi said through an Arabic-English interpreter. "After I chase the terrorist and I bring him here to America I deserve even $10 million."

Alanssi quickly laid out some of the government's most serious allegations against Sheik Mohammed Ali Hassan al-Moayad, who is charged with supporting al-Qaida and Hamas, and with conspiring to fund and attempting to fund the terror groups.

"He told me he gave bin Laden more than $20 million" before the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, Alanssi told jurors in federal court. "He told me he helps al-Qaida with money and arms and he send mujaheedeen to Chechnya and Afghanistan."

Alanssi was the sole source of some of the government's most dramatic claims about al-Moayad, including that the sheik said he personally handed $20 million to bin Laden.

Alanssi was dropped from the government's witness list after he set his clothing on fire in front of the White House in November to protest what he called the FBI's failure to make good on promises of wealth and U.S. citizenship.

Without Alanssi, who was burned over a third of his body, the government relied more heavily on surveillance tapes and the case began to center almost entirely on the Hamas allegations.

By calling Alannssi as a hostile witness, defense lawyers were taking a gamble. They hoped to damage his credibility and blunt the damage from the tapes, secretly recorded over four days in a Frankfurt, Germany, hotel.

Alanssi allegedly lured al-Moayad and his assistant, co-defendant Mohammed Mohsen Yahya Zayed, to Germany by posing as the fixer for another informant who wanted to donate $2.5 million to Hamas and al-Qaida.

The tapes show al-Moayad and Zayed apparently promising to help the informants donate the money, with a 10 percent commission for the defendants' Yemeni charities. Jurors also saw al-Moayad and Zayed on the tapes discussing code words for ammunition and weapons and condemning Americans and Jews.

Al-Moayad and Zayed were arrested and extradited to the United States.

Al-Moayad could receive a 60-year prison sentence if convicted of all charges. Zayed, accused of conspiring to fund and attempting to fund Hamas and al-Qaida, could serve three decades behind bars if convicted.

—Associated Press

Electoral commission announces results

ELECTIONS from page 1

tions, clearing the way for the country's first democratic parliament in half a century.

The Kurdish parties have apparently agreed to support the alliance's candidate for prime minister in return for the largely ceremonial presidency, though they have also offered to produce a compromise candidate for prime minister, if needed. Kurdish officials have said they would not accept a theocratic government.

"We will reject, and we won't allow, the establishment of a theocratic state; we want separation between religion and state," said Noshirwan Mustafa, an aide to Jalal Talabani, the Sunni Kurd who is expected to become president.

Ali Hashim al-Youshaa, one of the United Iraqi Alliance's leaders, said the coalition has recruited eight lawmakers from other political parties to join the bloc in parliament, and that talks were under way to recruit many more.

There is no timetable for convening the National Assembly, and the current government will work with incoming lawmakers to set a date to convene. Once the assembly meets, there is also no deadline for appointing the president and two vice presidents, who will in turn name the prime minister.

Most observers don't expect the assembly to appoint the president until there is consensus on who will be prime minister and who will be in the Cabinet. Once the president is appointed, a prime minister must be named within two weeks.

The two leading candidates to be the alliance's nominee for prime minister are interim Vice President Ibrahim al-Jaafari and Iraqi National Congress leader Ahmad Chalabi.

Allawi, whose secular party won 40 seats, insists he is still in the running as a compromise candidate.

Al-Jaafari said Thursday he expects the alliance to agree on a nominee within the next two days, but it wasn't clear if he expected the candidate to have the backing of the 182 lawmakers needed to win, or the support only of the alliance.

"We are having free discussions about who is going to be the prime minister and it probably will take two or three days to announce who is going to be the prime minister," al-Jaafari said following certification of the election results.

Congress tightens lawsuit restrictions

By Jesse J. Holland
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Congress sent President Bush legislation Thursday aimed at discouraging multimillion-dollar class-action lawsuits by having federal judges take them away from state courts, a victory for conservatives who hope it will lead to other lawsuit limits.

The legislation the House passed, 279-149, is the first of Bush's 2005 legislative priorities to win congressional approval. The Senate voted 72-26 for the bill Feb. 10. The president has described class-action suits as often frivolous, and businesses complain that state judges and juries have been too generous to plaintiffs.

"This bill is an important step forward in our efforts to reform the litigation system and to continue creating jobs and growing our economy," said Bush, who is expected to sign the bill Friday.

But Democrats say the legislation is aimed at protecting GOP business donors and hurting trial lawyers, a traditional part of their base. They also warn that Republican changes to the legal system will only make it harder for people to sue over injuries caused by corporations.

The legislation is "a payback to big business at the expense of consumers," said House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif.

Changing the legal system — including class-action, medical malpractice and asbestos injury lawsuits — has been a priority of Bush, the GOP and the business community. They have criticized what they see as a litigation crisis that enables lawyers to reap huge profits while businesses and consumers are stuck with the bill.

"This is the beginning of meaningful efforts by the Congress to curb lawsuit abuse," said House Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis.

The legislation would ban state courts from hearing large multistate class-action lawsuits. Such courts have been known for issuing multimillion-dollar verdicts like they did against tobacco companies.

When the bill becomes law, cases against corporations and businesses accused of wrongdoing against large groups of people will be heard by federal judges. Critics of the current situation have said federal jurists are not as likely to let multimillion dollar class action lawsuits move forward.

Bush and other Republicans say greedy lawyers have taken advantage of the state class-action lawsuit system by filing frivolous lawsuits in certain states where they know they can win big dollar verdicts. Meanwhile, those lawyers' clients get only small sums or coupons giving them discounts for products of the company they just sued, GOP lawmakers contend.

In response, Republicans said, companies have had to raise prices on products to recoup their costs, Republicans said.

House Majority Whip Roy Blunt, R-Mo., said that moving those cases to federal court will ensure that state judges will no longer "routinely approve settlements in which the lawyers receive large fees and the class members receive virtually nothing."

But Democrats say Republicans just want to protect corporations from taking responsibility for their wrongdoing by keeping them clear of state courts that might issue multimillion-dollar verdicts against them.

Federal courts are expected to allow fewer large class action lawsuits to go forward, which Democrats say means more businesses will get away with wrongdoing and fewer ordinary people will be protected.

"It's the final payback to the tobacco industry, to the asbestos industry, to the oil industry, to the chemical industry at the expense of ordinary families who need to be able go to court to protect their loved ones when their health has been compromised," said Rep. Ed Markey, D-Mass. "And these people are saying that your state isn't smart enough, your jurors aren't smart enough" to hear those cases.

Republicans will try the same thing with other types of lawsuits, Democrats warned.

"Today we will attempt to pre-empt state class action," said Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich. "Next month we will take up a bankruptcy bill that massively tilts the playing field in favor of credit card companies and against ordinary consumers and workers alike. On deck are equally one-sided medical malpractice bills and asbestos bills that both cap damages and eliminate liability to protect some of the most egregious wrongdoing in America."

—Associated Press

University of Massachusetts Amherst
New Students Program Summer Counselors
UMass Adopts LEADERS.
BIG
We're Hiring for 2005 Summer Orientation

KEEP READING, IF YOU ARE.....
• a current undergraduate at UMass Amherst with a minimum GPA of a 2.5
• enthusiastic about UMass Amherst and ready to talk about it
• someone who looks forward to meeting new people
• familiar with the residential, academic, and social opportunities at the university
• involved in RSO's, intramurals, or other campus activities
• a person with high energy and high stamina - (if you need 8 hours of sleep, stop here)

STILL INTERESTED? CHECK OUT THE JOB BENEFITS.
• networking with parents in many areas of employment (think life after graduation).
• improved public speaking, time management, and communication skills.
• connections with faculty and staff members from across campus.
• $2874.00 in salary and health coverage.
• free room and board on campus during orientation
• campus employment options after orientation is over - or head to the beach

STILL READING? WE'D LIKE TO MEET YOU.
Feb 18 2005
http://www.umass.edu/newstudents/employment.html

MAKE $12/HR PLAYING POKER
In just a few days we will be adding poker to our stable of skill games and for an extremely limited time we're looking for a VERY SELECT FEW to join us right at the start. Yes, we will PAY YOU to play poker, as well as giving you a chance at other offers "regular" players will never see.
For more information:
www.gamesgrid.com/mas
GamesGrid Poker
Make your best play.™

ALL FIRED UP! creative food & beverage
FEATURING MONGOLIAN BARBEQUE
ALL YOU CAN EAT BUFFETS
With Countless combinations of vegetables, poultry, fish, meats and sauces.
Great Live Entertainment on Weekends!
Friday 2/18: Broque
Saturday 2/19: Swing Set
A FANTASTIC FULL BAR!
Open 7 days a week for lunch and dinner
SUNDAY BREAKFAST
Design your own omelets and pancakes
413-584-5155 • www.allfireduphadley.com • 48 Russell Street, Route 9, Hadley

UMass & Northampton
FUN is HTC
Start the weekend off... on the fast track!
FRIDAYS!FRIDAYS!FRIDAYS!
UMass Amherst(chr) Hampton
1:35pm 1:45pm 2:10pm
3:35pm 5:45pm 4:10pm
NOHAMPTON - 1 Florence Plaza AMHERST - 70 S. Pleasant St.
UMASS - Minutes Store at Southwest Campus Service Office.
Harter Hall Copy Center
Peter Pan Bus Lines
800-343-9999 www.peterpanbus.com

Family and friends remember fire victims

PROVIDENCE, R.I. (AP) — In the two years since the Station nightclub fire in West Warwick killed 100 people and injured 200 others, the state's fire codes have been tightened, three people have been criminally charged and funds to help the victims have paid out millions of dollars.

But those stronger fire codes have been since been loosened, the criminal trial won't start until next year and some families continue to struggle with financial challenges brought on by crippling injuries or the deaths of their loved ones.

Two years after the Feb. 20, 2003, fire, the survivors and victims' families are still waiting for resolution.

Anne Marie D'Alessio, director of the Rhode Island Victims' Advocacy and Support Center, said that for many people, the second anniversary of the fire is harder than the first.

"Last year, people were still in shock," she said. Now, "reality is setting in more."

Nightclub owners Jeffrey and Michael Derderian, and Daniel Biechele, the former tour manager for the band Great White, pleaded not guilty in December 2003 to 200 counts each of involuntary manslaughter. Their criminal trial isn't expected to begin until January 2006 at the earliest.

The fire was started after the band's pyrotechnics set on fire highly flammable foam that had been placed around the stage as soundproofing.

For those affected by the fire, waiting for that trial is difficult, D'Alessio said.

"While people are still moving forward ... you're kind of held hostage," she said. "There's no closure. That's a myth. But you can close chapters."

Lawsuits against the three men, as well as members of the band, state officials and a host of companies, are on hold while the criminal case goes forward.

While the legal issues have crawled, there are signs of progress.

In September, the largest single source of charitable help for those affected by the fire, The Station Nightclub Fire Relief Fund, stopped providing direct financial assistance. It had distributed about $2.76 million for funerals, housing, emergency travel, food, clothing and a range of social services.

The remaining $510,000 in the fund and all future contributions are earmarked for five more years of case management for survivors and victims' families and to provide services and educational grants for affected children.

Other financial help has come from the state Crime Victims Compensation Fund. Survivors of the fire and victims' families qualified for the fund after the Derderians and Biechele were criminally charged.

—Associated Press

Relatives and friends of The Station nightclub fire victims view pictures during a memorial service held one year ago in Providence.

UMass group gets $4 mil. in contracts

CONTRACTS from page 1

The MCAS assessments will be conducted with Measured Progress, a non-profit test development firm in New Hampshire.

"This is a five year contract," Sireci explained. "Throughout this time we hope to measure changes and provide feedback for those who are creating [MCAS] tests from year to year. We'll see if there are any problems."

Through the years, the MCAS has been a hot topic for debate in Massachusetts. However, Sireci seems optimistic about the future of MCAS testing in public schools.

"As things are unrolling we are seeing that students are doing better, more and more tests scores are rising. The tests seem to be working and Massachusetts took a firm stand that seems to be paying off," said Sireci.

Researchers at the Center will focus on ensuring that procedures used to formulate and administer the MCAS evaluation are maintained and accurate over time. If the MCAS is to be used as a comparative tool for educators, the Center must ensure that a test today is equal to one administered three years ago even if the test questions are structured different.

"This last activity is critical for measuring students' progress as well as the degree to which Massachusetts' educational reform is meeting it's goals," said Sireci.

The Center has also been awarded a contract worth approximately $600,000, to help special needs education through a program that comes from the All Kinds of Minds Institute in Chapel Hill, N.C.

Bush puts on good face for Europeans

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Bush, about to embark on a fence-mending trip overseas, said Thursday that Europeans wrongly believe his only interest is America's security. "We also care deeply about hunger and disease," he said.

A primary objective of next week's trip is to make sure Europeans know that "as we move beyond the differences of the past, that we can work a lot together to achieve big objectives," Bush said.

Bush is very unpopular in Europe, particularly because of the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq. Europeans also are upset about other issues, from Bush's opposition to the Kyoto climate treaty to what is widely viewed as a go-it-alone foreign policy. Differences over Iran and China are high on the list, too.

The president will fly to Brussels, Belgium, on Sunday for three days of talks with allies, many of whom believe the United States has ignored their views and is unwilling to listen. French President Jacques Chirac, perhaps Bush's biggest critic, has been invited to dine with the president on Monday evening. Bush also will meet NATO leaders and then visit the headquarters of the 25-nation European Union.

Bush will talk with the leaders about specific steps to support the new government in Iraq, national security adviser Stephen Hadley said. He said the president will ask European nations to follow the U.S. lead in increasing money to help the Palestinian Authority build democratic institutions.

On Tuesday, Bush will meet separately with British Prime Minister Tony Blair, Italian Premier Silvio Berlusconi and Ukraine's new president, Viktor Yushchenko. Yushchenko said Thursday that withdrawal of his country's soldiers from Iraq is a priority.

From Brussels, Bush will travel to Mainz, Germany, for talks with Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder, and finally to Bratislava, Slovakia to see Russian President Vladimir Putin.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said the United States was troubled by the concentration of power in the Kremlin and the lack of independent media in Russia. But she said that isolating Russia would be a mistake. "It is, after all, only recently emerging from the Soviet Union," she said.

—Associated Press

President Bush pursuing free trade, liberalization agreements

By Martin Crutsinger
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Contending that Americans benefit from free trade, President Bush said Thursday he would keep pursuing liberalization agreements around the world, even as critics say his policies have resulted in record trade deficits and millions of lost jobs.

Bush's pledge came in his annual economic report to Congress, a 438-page document that argued that his economic policies, ranging from making his first-term tax cuts permanent to overhauling Social Security, will lead to greater prosperity.

"I believe that Americans benefit from open markets and free and fair trade and I am working to open up markets around the world and make sure that the playing field is level for our workers, farmers, manufacturers and other job creators," Bush said in his message to Congress.

The administration devoted an entire chapter to extolling the benefits of free trade and seeking to answer critics who contend the country's soaring trade deficits, which last year hit a record of $617.7 billion, were costing millions of jobs.

However, the report did not repeat an argument made last year that critics viewed as endorsing the idea that the "outsourcing" of American jobs to lower-wage countries represented a benefit to the U.S. economy.

This year's report contended that increased trade can affect the composition of jobs in the United States but not the overall total of jobs. It argued for increased retraining assistance for workers in industries that can't compete with overseas factories.

Gregory Mankiw, the head of the president's Council of Economic Advisers, became a target for Democratic critics last year after he defended the handling of trade in the 2004 economic report. He later apologized and said his remarks had been misunderstood.

The White House announced Wednesday that Mankiw was stepping down as the president's top economic adviser to return to his former career as an economics professor at Harvard University, where he gained renown as the author of two widely used college textbooks.

A leading contender to replace Mankiw is Ben Bernanke, a former Princeton economics professor who is currently on the Federal Reserve Board. Bernanke is also viewed as a top candidate to replace Alan Greenspan, who will step down as chairman of the Federal Reserve next Jan. 31.

In December, the administration released the forecast portion of the economic report, which also provides the economic assumptions the administration used in preparing the budget plan Bush submitted to Congress earlier this month.

The administration is forecasting that the overall economy, as measured by the gross domestic product, will grow by 3.5 percent this year and 3.4 percent in 2006, as measured from fourth quarter to fourth quarter. Last year, the econom

Mass. General in life support dispute

BOSTON (AP) — Massachusetts General Hospital said it will take a 79-year-old woman off life support next week — against the wishes of her daughter — and this time a judge has declined to block the move.

Barbara Howe has advanced stage amyotrophic lateral sclerosis, also known as Lou Gehrig's disease, an incurable and degenerative muscle condition. She has been in a hospital bed on a ventilator since 1997. She cannot speak and can barely move, but remains mentally alert, says her daughter, Carol Carvitti.

"Her face lights up when you talk to her," Carvitti said. "I visit her four times a week, and my sister visits her every single day. You can see the eye move back and forth and her mouth starts moving."

The hospital went to court last year to get permission to remove Howe from life support, but probate court judge John M. Smoot ruled in Carvitti's favor, barring the hospital from disconnecting her. But the judge also advised Carvitti to consider what was in her mother's best interest, not what she believed her mother would want.

Dr. Britain Nicholson, Mass. General's chief medical officer, said Wednesday that he ordered Howe taken off life support next week following an evaluation that determined her condition had worsened and she was suffering. He said he informed Carvitti with a phone call and a letter earlier this month.

Carvitti's lawyer, Gary Zalkin, went back to probate court seeking a temporary restraining order to stop the hospital from removing life support but was turned down last week.

—Associated Press

SUMMER OUTDOOR JOBS
Backpacking On Power Lines
Throughout New England applying herbicides (mostly Round-up) with a back pack sprayer to control small trees.
Drivers license, good physical condition and drug screen required upon job offer.
Also Mass herbicide applicator license required.
Send resume or request information/application to:
Vegetation Control Service, Inc.
2342 Main St., Athol, MA 01331
(800) 323-7706 or (978) 249-5348
Fax (978) 249-4784 email: vcsathol@aol.com
V.C.S. is an equal employment opportunity company

STSTRAVEL.COM
Join America's #1 Student Tour Operator
Cancun Acapulco Jamaica Bahamas Florida
Spring Break 2005
Sell Trips, Earn Cash & Travel Free
1-800-648-4849 www.ststravel.com

Citizens of humanity
ZANNA
downtown Amherst

To the World's best customers:
With the new extended hours of operation, you can dine late, even on weekends!
Hours of Operation
Worcester Dining Commons
Monday to Thursday 7:00 am to 10:00 pm
Friday 7:00 am to 9:00 pm
Saturday & Sunday 8:00 am to 9:00 pm
Franklin Dining Commons
Monday to Friday 7:00 am to 8:00 pm
Saturday & Sunday 8:00 am to 8:00 pm
Hampshire Dining Commons
Monday to Friday 7:00 am to 8:00 pm
Saturday & Sunday 8:00 am to 8:00 pm
Berkshire Dining Commons
Monday to Thursday 7:00 am to 10:00 pm
Friday 7:00 am to 8:00 pm
Saturday 8:00 am to 8:00 pm
Sunday 8:00 am to 9:00 pm
Dining Services UMassAmherst
Residential YCMP
www.umass.edu/diningservices

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 2005

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." -Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Textbook prices: too much talk and too little action

Much has been written about the high cost of attending the University of Massachusetts. Whether it is tuition increases, mysterious fees or the cost of room and board, UMass students have a right to complain about the fact that their university is one of the most expensive public institutions of higher learning in the country.

Then there's the issue of textbooks, perhaps the most dreadful of all costs for a student. Just when you think you're done paying for school for the year, you remember that you still have to pay hundreds of dollars for books.

Students across the country deal with the problem: publishers will print unnecessary new editions of textbooks and companies will sell these books at higher prices.

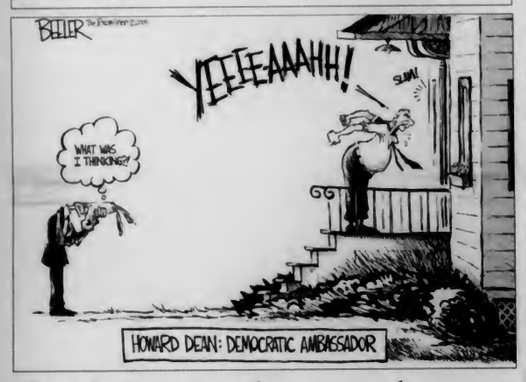
Many suggestions have been made about how to deal with the cost of textbooks. Students have been organizing different types of movements and programs, such as the textbook rental program, in the works from the Student Government Association.

Jeff Napolitano, press secretary of relations for the SGA, was previously quoted in the Daily Collegian as saying that "at the very least, whatever kind of rental system is going to exist in the fall, books will be cheaper for the student population." Another alternative to the annex is "Books for Books," a "for students, by students" program offering a method of trading textbooks at lower costs.

The problem with students taking the textbook issue into their own hands is the inability to sustain interest over an entire semester or year. It seems as though every semester students become outraged at the high prices of books, but after a few weeks they accept the inevitability of the situation and move on, only to have the whole process start up again next semester. Time will tell if the SGA, or other groups on campus, can finally implement a system to counterbalance the fees at the annex.

Another avenue is refusing to deal with the annex all together. Many professors are choosing to deal exclusively with bookshops in the downtown Amherst area, such as the Jeffery Amherst Bookshop, Amherst Books and Food For Thought Books.

Other professors require students to purchase course packets, which are collections of photocopied materials bound into one book. These packets benefit local businesses, and cut down on the costs that come from professors independently photocopying large numbers of course readings.



Online resources are also becoming more prevalent. Students can purchase used copies of books online, through sites such as EBay and Amazon, at fractions of the price they would pay at the Textbook Annex.

Take for example, the primary textbook for Biology 100, which runs a student $132 new and $99.25 used at the Textbook Annex. A student could purchase the book on Amazon for under $35. Students are creating other book sites, such as www.Jungalu.com, in an attempt to battle the high cost of books.

In an interview with the Collegian last month, Wayne Chang, one of the students behind Jungalu, described the site as a "localized EBay, all done in real time with no shipping time or charges." The site is essentially a modernized, more efficient and more interactive equivalent to hanging up flyers around campus advertising lost-cost books.

The Internet has been presenting students with real solutions to inflated textbook costs that don't straggle off after the first few weeks of the semester. However, other methods of getting inexpensive textbooks should be available for students, methods that need to be implemented all year round.

Unsigned editorials represent the majority opinion of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian Editorial Board.

Mockeries of marriage

"I'm getting married!"

Engagement is the new fad like pink is the new orange. Everybody's doing it, and so should you. If you don't, you're clearly a failure at life. God forbid you go to your five-year high school reunion without a blinding rock on your finger or a pretty woman on your arm that you didn't have to pay for. When you're engaged, you can prove to all your old friends and enemies that you're doing something with your life and made progress since the last time they saw you. You will be able to make all your exes jealous that they weren't the ones to tie you down first. Aren't you special?

Lisa McLaughlin

Every week now, I'm hearing new gossip about who else from my not-so-distant past is engaged to be married. And the first thought that comes into my mind isn't, "oh, how nice!" but, "what the hell?!" You might as well tell me that somebody just died. You know why? Because it makes me feel old. I shouldn't feel old at 21. Most of these people are my age, give or take two years.

I feel genuinely sorry for those who get engaged so young, because most of them have absolutely no idea what they're getting themselves into. My sister-in-law is wise when she advises me, "Don't get engaged before the age of 25. You won't believe how much you'll change between now and then." I could become a different person altogether, as I'm still in the process of maturing and gaining life experience. I'm already a different person from who I was when I began college. The once bible-thumping born-again Christian has been transformed into the liberal, pro-choice activist heathen I am today. Who would've thought?

People wonder why the divorce rate is so high. I'm not surprised that two-thirds of marriages end in divorce, because a lot of people become frivolous and stupid when they think they're in love. They believe they're ready to be committed to one person for the rest of their lives when they're not. If you think marriage is going to be as easy as pie, then perhaps you should take a step back and face reality: marriage isn't easy. It's nothing like dating where you can simply break up when things go wrong. Divorce costs a lot of money, pain on both sides and your catholic grandmother will disown you. People must think of these things beforehand if they want a lasting marriage.

I feel genuinely sorry for those who get engaged so young, because most of them have absolutely no idea what they're getting themselves into.

It amuses me when people are trying to prove something other than eternal devotion by getting married. Some of them are trying to prove that a) they're worthy of love, b) they're over an ex-boyfriend/girlfriend, c) they're a normal human being or d) all of the above.

Take my ex-boyfriend, for example. After three years of emotional abuse, a complicated breakup and doing the "just friends" thing, I told him in a very straightforward manner that I didn't want to see or speak with him ever again. Although he was hurt, he heeded my request. Six months later, he called my house out of the blue. I wasn't home, but my dad spoke to him briefly and politely asked how he was doing. When I came home that night, my dad informed me that said ex-boyfriend was engaged. Well whoopdeedoo, what do I care? Did he feel the need to inform me as a way of saying, "If you want to be with me, here's your last chance?" I laughed and contemplated sending his fiancée a sympathy card.

Another example is an old friend I occasionally talk to online. Recently his away message read, "I've lost 33 pounds and I'm getting married so I'm cooler than you!" If I cared I would have replied, "Well, I gained 50 pounds and had an abortion so that makes me automatically cooler than you." I mean, grow up. It's like an elementary school kid making faces and saying, "Na na na na na naaaaa ... I'm getting married and you're nooott!"

I say to these people: get over yourselves. I'm not going to be jealous of you. In fact, your efforts make me want to get married less. Go ahead and ostracize me, because I'm fine with the fact that I don't need to cling to somebody else in order to have a life. To those who get married for good reasons: thanks for "keeping it real." I congratulate you, and wish you the best of luck.

Lisa McLaughlin is a Collegian columnist.

Stigmas with UMass guys

By the time someone is in college they have probably heard the phrase, "you can't judge a book by its cover," millions of times. In fact, if you were to even go near a book with a funny looking cover, you wouldn't think twice because you know not to assume anything by your initial thought or how people look or what you've heard about them. This being the case, I would like to know why UMass guys get such a bad rap in the Five-College area, and get stereotyped as if we are all animals waiting to be released into the wild.

Michael Anmuth

At first I thought maybe it was just my perception of things, the thought that people knew I went to UMass and would therefore treat me differently at functions at the other four colleges. But, the more I looked around, I could definitely tell that I was being observed as if I was some sort of strange phenomenon rather than someone who proudly attended a four-year degree granting institution.

No longer were we two guys in a campus with mostly women; we were a group of UMass students who were identified rather early just by how we looked and interacted, and were ostracized for it.

I know that many people who go to the other colleges in the area think of the University as just another state school. However, being from outside Massachusetts, my perception is that UMass is not just another state school, but a very desirable state school where my degree will be worth more than just the paper on which it's printed.

That being said, I have experienced firsthand the strange looks and gestures given to UMass guys when we show up at the other colleges. I can understand the odd looks we received when a friend of mine and I were the only guys in sight at one of the women's colleges, and its understandable that we would be perceived with some trepidation in that situation. I won't lie to you, two random guys at an all women's school can seem rather sketchy; however, when you have the opportunity to take classes at any of the other five colleges, I am sure that it is a sight that has been seen before.

Okay, so maybe being the only visible guys on a campus full of women was a strange picture, but since my friend and I are male feminists, we were undeterred at the looks and whispers given to us on that trip. What I cannot figure out, however, is when we were at an event at another co-ed school that we were awarded the same questioning reactions. No longer were we two guys in a campus with mostly women, we were a group of UMass students who were identified rather early just by how we looked and interacted, and were ostracized for it.

My friends and I made light of the subject. After all, we found it just a tiny bit amusing that people wouldn't talk to us because we were from the state school down the street. We weren't particularly shocked or annoyed that people saw us as if we had three heads instead of just being a group of guys from another college.

While I cannot figure out how they identified us so quickly and then proceeded to exclude us from their inner circle of co-ed private college antics, I know that we weren't acting any differently than we would have at a coffee shop, or while standing next to the campus pond or in the middle of our beloved Campus Center.

Now I am faced with the conclusion that we were the odd books on the shelf, possibly with the torn covers, and maybe what people saw made them not even want to read any further. I'm speaking metaphorically, of course, but the message was certainly clear enough. "You guys are UMass guys, and we know all about you. Don't you set things on fire and riot when your teams win? Don't you come to other schools just to try to pick up girls and go to our parties, bringing your particular brand of rowdiness with you?"

To this I can only reply that this stereotype of gentlemen here is not only inapplicable to every guy, but I believe many would take offense to it. Yes, we do enjoy celebrating when our teams win and yes, it's often called ZooMass for a reason. To unilaterally apply those views to every single UMass guy, however, is both unfair and unreasonable. After all, we enjoy celebrating life just as much as the next person, whether he or she is in a private school, a state school, or simply showed up just to see if all of the rumors about us were true. To all of these people I say, welcome to the University of Massachusetts Amherst.

Michael Anmuth is a Collegian columnist.

In defense of movie lovers

For some people, the most wonderful time of the year is Christmas time, summer time, or March Madness. But for me, it's awards season. I'm not talking about the Grammy's, the MTV Video Music Awards or the Razzes, but rather the show that inspired every awards show in existence: the Oscars.

Erin McNamee

Every year I eagerly anticipate the Oscars and all that falls under its great umbrella of inflated egos and blinding loaner bling, from the gowns to the glamour to the "What did he just say?" acceptance speeches by the foreign film award recipients.

But when I'm in the mood to be completely honest with myself, I concede that award shows are actually pretty boring and more than a tad pretentious. However, it isn't the actual show that interests me but rather all the drama leading up to the awards. Every year I make it my job to see as many potential Oscar-nominated films as time and my wallet will allow.

I do this because I want to be all "in the know" by the time the Oscar nominations are announced; I want to be able to roll with the best of them in terms of debating the "should" win nominees versus the "will" win nominees. Watching the Oscars without seeing any of the movies nominated is as pointless as taking an exam without ever going to class. And besides, it's just plain fun going to see good movies.

For all the fun involved, however, I've noticed that being a movie lover isn't necessarily the most socially acceptable pastime. I find myself constantly having to defend myself to those who just don't understand why I "need" to see certain movies when they're in the theater and before the Oscar ceremony happens. I've been told this hobby of mine is "worthless," "a waste of time," and just plain "stupid."

But over the years I've developed little philosophical nuggets for just these occurrences that I keep simmering on the proverbial backburner in my mind.

These little guys sit there, undetectable yet alert, just waiting to accost the person who dares to question my integrity. For instance, whenever someone calls me silly or shallow for rabidly following Hollywood news, I simply point out that my hobby is no different than, say, that of following sports or music or the changing styles in basket weaving.

Whenever someone calls me silly or shallow for rabidly following Hollywood news, I simplypoint out my hobby is no different than, say, that of following sports or music or the changing styles in basket weaving.

Really, what's the difference between debating two actors' performances and two teams' chances of making it to the Super Bowl? If you think about it, the Super Bowl is to the NFL what the Oscars are to the film industry: they're both the pinnacle of a very long year in their respective industries. So what makes a movie lover inferior to a sports fan?

Well, I'm here to tell you that there's nothing inferior about us movie lovers. So what if we clear our whole schedule on the day of the Oscars so we can watch all the "pre-show" programming on E!, and demand that there be absolute silence during the actual show? I know plenty of die-hard sports fans that refuse to attend Super Bowl parties because they claim they need to "concentrate" on the game.

And so what if my away message on Oscar night reads, "and my Oscar winners are...."? The last time I checked, almost everyday last summer at least one of my friend's away messages read "go Johnny Damon!" so frankly I don't see what's so bad about mine saying, "go Johnny Depp!" Either way, it all comes down to being a hobby. Loving movies is not some weird obsession or delusional way to live vicariously through fictional characters. I'm sure there are people like that somewhere, but they're no different than kids who grow up wanting to be a football player or singer or the next great American novelist.

Essentially hobbies are a form of escape because they're fun and distracting from the "real" world and its real problems. If we didn't have hobbies we'd either be bored stiff or desperately unhappy. So I'll stick with my movie watching and you can stick with your basement Foosball tournaments or Popsicle stick collecting or whatever it is you do. In the meantime, I'll keep my mouth shut over your choice of pastime if you keep your mouth shut about mine.

Erin McNamee is a Collegian columnist.

SUBMIT A LETTER OR OPINION

In order to be considered for publication, all submissions must include the writer's name, address, and telephone number or e-mail address. Letters should be no longer than 450 words in length and addressed as 'Letters to the Editor.' Commentaries should be no more than 750 words and addressed as 'Editorial/Opinion.' Submissions may be edited for clarity and condensed. You may write, fax, or e-mail your submissions to:

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 2005

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

'Dances of China' to grace Fine Arts Center stage

By Matt Orr
Collegian Staff

Racing through 5,000 years of history, the "Dances of China" hopes to jumpstart the Lunar Year of the Rooster with a one-night-only performance at the Fine Arts Center.

Produced by the San Francisco Bay Area Performing Arts Association, the show attempts to illustrate as much of the country's culture as can be fit into one night. Founded in 1991, the CPA's mission is to serve the Chinese community in America, promote classical Chinese arts, and bring Peking opera, the CPA's first served as a springboard for many of the country.

Act I, Rainbow of the Land, features traditional dances, such as folk dances. In one dance, titled "The Lantern Festival," the Chinese New Year parade is highlighted with dancers waving a dragon and huge lanterns. "Pyrrus" is a very old Persian tradition that dates back to the ancient Persians. Dancers attempt to leave Mongolia in search of better land. Violence occurs. Courting Dances depicts attempts of four women to win the love of a female character. Here, the men compete for the women's affections in competitions as well as dances.

The act features many more artists, many of whom trained at the acclaimed Beijing Dance Academy. Guest choreographer Master Penwu Zhou has a master's degree in Chinese ethnic dance. Zhou compiled anthropological data in his many years of fieldwork in the Yunnan province, a region that borders Laos, Burma and Vietnam. Through his research, Zhou has incorporated many of the 56 different ethnicities into his routine.

Combining "Crouching Tiger, Hidden Dragon"-style acrobatics and martial arts with mythology, Act II, "The Dragon King" is where a great deal of the action begins. "The Dragon King" tells the story of a king, who rises on his birthday to become a celestial dragon to provide rain, easing a drought that has plagued the land for eight years. Fantastic creatures, such as fire fairies, and heavenly forces battle with heroic warriors in swordplay.

The Chinese Performing Artists of America artistic director, Lin Yang Yao, was the winner of the Dance Masterpieces of the Asia Cultural Gold award by Chinese for the "Yellow River Piano," one of the nation's highest cultural honors. His work has appeared on stages worldwide, including many United States and European cities.

The Dances of China" played at three Springfield Area schools: Duda School of Science and Technology, Chestnut Street School and Van Sickle yesterday, in tandem with Chinese language and culture teachers.

The event is sponsored by the UMass Arts and Culture program and will begin at 7:30 p.m. at the stage of the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall.

Dances of China
FAC
UMass
Feb 18

Upright Citizens Brigade invades NoHo

By Nick Romanow
Collegian Staff

Those familiar with the name, know that The Upright Citizens Brigade is synonymous with inventive, unique comedy. The UCB has a strong cult of fans based on their too-short-lived sketch series on Comedy Central, but those in touch with the national comedy scene also know about the highly renowned UCB Theatre based out of New York.

The UCB has become home to far more then the four comedians featured on the sketch show, and this Sunday the best of the best will be coming to the Iron Horse for what is sure to be a night filled with comedy the likes of which Northampton doesn't often see. Five of the touring company, Eli Newell, Tara Copeland, Chris Gethard, Chad Carter, and Bobby Moynihan, got on speakerphone in a "hot room" to talk to the Collegian about the show and about being in the UCB.

"I think we've all worked together before," Newell noted when asked about the grouping of the tour company.

"We've all worked together and in other shows," Copeland said, referring to the countless shows that are put on at the UCB theatre, "and most of us have been around UCB for a long time. I've been there for five-and-a-half years." The rest of them have also been there for many years.

"I've made this place approximately a quarter-million dollars," Newell joked about his tenure.

All of the touring company, and essentially everyone that's ever taken the stage at the theatre, started by taking courses there, often working their way up not only to performers but also teachers. Most of the group has similar stories: working their way up from sketch-groups and acting classes in college and discovering the UCB, opening up a whole new world of comedy for them.

Upright Citizens Brigade
Iron Horse
Northampton
Feb 20

There are countless aspiring and talented comedians at the theatre and when the idea of a touring company came up, the first real tour was only last fall, only the best and the brightest would be considered.

"It's a simple formula: the funniest people with nothing better to do," Newell joked. "It's just who's available. There's lots of great people here who are working on jobs and still like that and couldn't do it right now. All of us are in between things right now."

As for the show itself, the Company promises a good time.

"It's half sketch ... for math

See BRIGADE on page 7

The Upright Citizens Brigade of Comedy Central fame will entertain at the Iron Horse Music Hall on Sunday evening.

So you didn't 'Discover Your Lover' this Valentine's Day

The Mix Tape

Matt O'Rourke

Perhaps your Valentine's Day didn't go quite as you had planned or hoped for. Maybe you're feeling a little down, or perhaps that "first exam of the semester" stress is setting in. Well, look no further than this week's mixtape to express how you're feeling.

"I Am Trying to Break Your Heart" – Wilco (6:58)

What is considered by most to be their best album, Wilco's "Yankee Hotel Foxtrot" opens with this overture of sorts. Although a considerably upbeat track, the lyrics invert on the blend of various bright sounds, leaving the listener with a stark musical contrast. Near the end of the track, Jeff Tweedy can be heard singing "what was I thinking when I let go of you." Closing the track with a sort of pulse-meter, his final words (mixed in from another track off the same album) are "I'm the man that loves you." A great mix of emotions, and perfect for those with Valentine's Day blues. Appears on: "Yankee Hotel Foxtrot" (Nonesuch, 2002)

"You Almost Had It" – The Golden Republic (2:52)

On their tour with singer-songwriter Sondre Lerche last fall, The Golden Republic dedicated this track to the New York Yankees, something Red Sox fans will appreciate in particular. The lyrics here are also key. "You didn't know what you wanted, until it's gone." Simple, clever, and to the point. Not much thinking involved here, but the danceable Franz Ferdinand/glam-rock rhythm may tempt you to get up and jump around. Appears on: "The Golden Republic" (Astralwerks, 2005)

"Fake" – The Frames (3:59)

For a mixtape about love, one could easily use a host of U2 songs. Ironically enough, another Irish band, The Frames, provide the bitterness and regret that some may seek. "Come on the guy's a fake, what do you love him for?" Glen Hansard sings in the chorus. Also simple, but the band adds greatly to the overall effect. A heavy guitar and driving set rhythm combined with rock-violin boosts the track quality significantly. This song won't tempt you to get up and rock out, it will force you to. Appears on: "Burn the Maps" (Anti, 2005)

"Rain" – Patty Griffin (4:08)

For the fourth track of the mixtape, we turn to singer-songwriter Patty Griffin. Country music fans will indeed love her music, as will fans of the folk genre. The analogy Griffin uses to connect love to weather here is brilliant, as is the arrangement of the other musicians. She sings "Strange how hard it rains now/ Rows and rows of big dark clouds/When I'm holding on underneath this shroud/Rain." The track is guaranteed to make the listener feel as if they're sitting by a window on a rainy day and it's a great bridge to get into her music with. Appears on: "1000 Kisses" (ATO Records, 2002)

"Last Goodbye" – Jeff Buckley (4:35)

Considered to be one of the most influential (and also one of the most underappreciated) musicians of the 90s by many critics, Jeff Buckley provides what I consider to be the "perfect" breakup song. Passionate songwriting combined with masterful guitar composition, made Buckley one of the best of his generation. "This is our last goodbye/I hate to feel the love between us die, but its over" Buckley sings solemnly. Appears on: "Grace" (Sony, 1994)

"Everything's Not Lost" Coldplay (7:14)

As "I'm Trying to Break Your Heart" was the opener to Wilco's album, "Everything's Not Lost" is the closer to Coldplay's debut album, "Parachutes." No more Valentine's Day blues, as Coldplay provides the hope in this mixtape. Bright piano melodies, and Chris Martin's soft falsetto convey a positive, enlightening message. Listeners will find themselves singing along with the band's easy, uplifting lyrics. Perhaps these provide the most valuable knowledge of all- although events in life may get you down, realize that "everything's not lost." Appears on: Parachutes (Capitol, 2000)

Total running time: (29:48)

NBC combines Friday dramas

By Kate O'Hare
Zap2it.com

NBC's 'Medical Investigation' and 'Third Watch' will merge tonight to stop an enigmatic disease.

"This is a rarity in network television," says "Third Watch" executive producer Ed Bernero, "in that it's a crossover that actually makes sense."

On this Monday at Paramount Studios in Hollywood, Bernero is sitting on a low wall under a fake tree outside the National Institutes of Health office sets of "Medical Investigation." The freshman medical-mystery drama airs Fridays on NBC after the police/paramedic/firefighter drama "Third Watch," currently in its sixth season.

Friday starting at 9 p.m. ET, the two shows cross over in a storyline that tracks a mystery illness striking New York City, where "Third Watch" is set and filmed.

The story begins on "Third Watch," with "MI" (as it's called on the set) characters Dr. Stephen Connor (Neal McDonough) and Dr. Natalie Durant (Kelli Williams) coming to New York because a captured thief displays symptoms of a fast-spreading contagion, and his also-infected accomplice is still on the run. Musician Wyclef Jean guest-stars.

Then on "Medical Investigation," the symptoms strike "Third Watch" paramedic Carlos Nieto (Anthony Ruivivar), causing concern for his girlfriend, paramedic Holly Levine (Yvonne Jung, Ruivivar's real-life wife).

In the current scene, Levine stares helplessly through a window as Connor and "Third Watch" Detective Faith Yokas (Molly Price) have a disagreement at Ruivivar's bedside. They take their argument out into the hall, only to be interrupted when "MI's" Dr. Miles McCabe rushes in with an announcement.

The scene requires several takes, partly because when Connor asks McCabe if it's certain that a new patient has the same disease, Gorham must spit out a line that includes the tongue-twisting "maculopapular rash."

"Whatever that means," Gorham says. "I have no idea."

At one point, Gorham gets a big laugh by responding to Connor's "They sure?" with, "Yeah, come on."

The crossover storyline isn't a stretch because in "MI," Connor, Durant, McCabe and the other NH team member's travel all over America to probe outbreaks. In fact, the show's pilot was set in New York.

"And we deal with medical stuff," Bernero says. "We have paramedics. We don't have Boston detectives going to Las Vegas."

(That's a sideswipe at NBC's forensic drama "Crossing Jordan," which recently crossed over with "Las Vegas.")

"This makes sense," Bernero continues. "It's going to help both of us. It was easy, just write a script like any other Third Watch' script, and when they would normally call someone else, they just call these Medical Investigation' characters."

The following week McDonough and Williams are set to head East to film segments on the streets in frigid New York, but for right now, Price, Ruivivar and Levine are trying to enjoy their brief stint in sunny Southern California.

"I have the luck of the Irish," Price says. "Our show shoots exteriors, but this show's mostly interiors, so here I am in L.A. but I'm still locked in a cold room."

She's also getting a kick out of being on a studio lot. "The golf carts are cracking me up," she says. "They take you in a golf cart to your dressing room. We schlep eight blocks to the trailer when we go on location. Here, we're five minutes away, and there's golf carts."

Ruivivar, who's planning to take Levine and their 2-year-old son to Disneyland the next day, is padding around the set in slippers, a hospital gown, a robe and some bloody makeup.

"I fell asleep today in the hospital bed," he says. "We have jet lag. I shot on Third Watch last week till Friday, then I [illegible] the redeye to L.A., then I had to work Saturday here. So I'm trying to catch up in my hospital bed."

Originally excited to be part of the crossover, Ruivivar says, "Then I got reports that I was going to be bleeding from every orifice, so I was less excited. I mean the lightest stage now, and I still looked like death warmed over. Then they'll start adding the blood and sweat and other stuff. It'll be fun."

McDonough, a Massachusetts native, is eager to [illegible] the streets of Gotham, no matter how cold it is.

"I'm looking forward to it," McDonough says. "There's still going to be snow but it'll be muddy, nasty-looking snow, which is going to be great. I love it when it's cold outside. Whenever I visit here in California, I'm [illegible]. I can't deal with it."

The "Third Watch" cast has a little skeptical of McDonough's bravado.

"We're shooting their finale in the Navy Yards next week," Bernero says, "so we'll see how much he likes the cold. Two degrees in the Brooklyn Navy Yards."

"I hope he has galoshes and long johns," quips Price. "It's dreadful. You just do it. There's nothing to be done about it. In some ways, it helps makes you tough and gritty and angry, which is predominately what our show's about. There you are, ugly and freezing, nothing you can do about it."

"The blood we pour on our victims freezes," Reviver says. "The IVs are like ice. It's not fun. So this is great, with the sun."

Right now, neither drama has a pickup for fall, so a little cross-promotion couldn't hurt either show's chances.

But, optimism reigns as McDonough says, "Obvious signs point to us coming back for another year. I would be shocked if we weren't coming back for another year."

"I'm always confident," Bernero says of his show. "We've never actually ended a year picked up, so this is no different than any other year. I think this show's going to be on for 15 years. We're like a bad penny. They can't get rid of us."

Write for Arts.
Email arts@dailycollegian.com

Discover Your LOVER
The Collegian Dating Game

CHECK OUT YOUR MATCHMAKING SKILLS!

We rounded up 3 Men and 3 Women
You paired them up!
We are sending them on their dates and taking down every detail.

Look to see results of the dates and if they went smoothly, or if they went horribly wrong on:

Wednesday, February, 23rd

CUSTOM TEE Shirts 586-7133
Your Art
$6 ONLY each
Sunraise PRINTING & T SHIRTS

DWIGHT CHAPEL
Need a Ride to Church?
Just be at
UMASS Haigis Mall
at 10 AM
For the Free Sunday Shuttle
to Dwight Chapel
Only 12 minutes away!
FREE Bible with your first ride!
See you there!
885 Federal Street
Belchertown, MA 01007
413 256 8050
www.dwightchapel.org

CINEMARK
The Best Seat in Town
CINEMARK AT HAMPSHIRE MALL 8
367 Russell St. 413-587-4233
Schedule for 2/18/05 - 2/24/05
DIGITAL SURROUND SOUND IN ALL AUDITORIUMS
Purchase Tickets Online @ cinemark.com
• NO PASSES NOR SUPERSAVERS
Tickets & showtimes available at cinemark.com

Big companies take on laptop travel bags as source of new fashion trend

By Tamara Chuang
The Orange County Register

Brand-name labels such as the Gap have begun to manufacture stylish electronics carrying cases.

SANTA ANA, Calif. — The Performance Messenger bag at the Gap will set you back $34.50 and has room for your laptop computer and maybe a towel to wrap around the delicate machine.

But will you regret skimping on a quality computer bag when the canvas tote accidentally crashes to the ground at an airline's check-in counter?

Laptop bags promise to keep your computer safe, and many are tested to survive a 3-foot drop. Comfort tweaks and pockets of convenience are innovations from the specialty makers, such as leading manufacturer Targus Inc. and rival Mobile Edge, both based in Anaheim, Calif.

But the ergonomic handle, hidden airline-ticket pocket and extra padding are going to cost you. And people are willing to pay it.

"Computer bags are critical to business professionals who are carrying their precious computer with them, which can be $2,000 to $3,000 of equipment," said Peter Cobb, co-founder and senior vice president of eBags.com, an Internet retailer that sells more than 1,000 laptop bags on its site. "It has everything in their life in there ... their spreadsheets, documents. To some people in the population, it's pretty critical to protect their computer." Laptop bags began replacing briefcases in the 1980s as the availability of portable PCs grew. Targus, founded in 1983, was one of the early companies to pounce on this growing niche with its iconic black leather bag.

Laptop computer sales continued to grow, even as desktop PC sales foundered in recent years. Last year, laptop sales were on target to grow 21 percent to $57.3 million this year, according to market researcher International Data Corp.

Computer bags have likewise flourished.

"When you go into a store to buy a bag, it can be very overwhelming with 30 cases to choose from," said Todd Gormick, Targus' global business development manager.

His tips? Start with a bag that fits your personality, from a sporty backpack to the new trend of fashionable cases. Make sure your computer fits. And look inside.

"It's really about digging through the case and seeing the features and functions," he said. "You may look at the $99 price tag as expensive when you could buy a $19.99 bag at Old Navy, but then you see the construction, the quality." On its high-end bags, which top out around $200, Targus has AirTrak wheels, which are air-filled tires that offer a smooth, shock-absorbing ride. Its SafePORT Air Cushion is made up of a layer of foam and rubber and has small holes to allow air to escape when under pressure. Other features include a pullout water-bottle holder, a removable CD sleeve and a retractable ticket holder that slides in and out of its pocket.

As the market has grown, so has competition. I Bags carries some 50 brands of laptop bags, and everyday it adds more laptop-related products, Cobb said.

"In the laptop market, you get what you pay for," Cobb said. "The top brand names are making excellent products. What is interesting in the laptop category is that there is no true leader, and it has opened the market for some niche players, like Mobile Edge and Road Wired." Heavy competition almost persuaded David Cartwright to abandon the business after leaving a 15-year career at Targus. Then he discovered the undertapped market that mixed fashion and quality. His new company, Mobile Edge, sells bags with style, such as the pink suede laptop tote that shares 10 percent of its $200 price with the Susan G. Komen Breast Cancer Foundation.

"Most of the designer bags that say they fit a computer don't offer the protection," said Cartwright, whose company uses SafetyCell, a heavy egg-crate foam, to protect PCs.

Mobile Edge tests a bag by dropping it on its edge from 3 feet. On its premium messenger bags, it also added features such as gel-cushioned handles, a shock-absorbing bungee strap to alleviate shoulder pressure and a pocket made of zinc that kills wireless signals so a phone can't disturb a meeting.

For products geared toward women, Mobile Edge didn't skimp on materials or features. There's embossed leather, double-stitched handles to prevent thread breakage and special zippers from YKK fastening that won't fall apart.

"We use the same [illegible] material as Kate Spade," Cartwright said.

Brigade to perform at Iron Horse

BRIGADE from page 5

people I threw out that term, improv," Newell says about the other half.

Another voice exclaims, "100% amazing!"

"The sketch part," Newell continues, "is kinda fast and furious. I don't know how revolutionary it is but it's really tight and awesome. A lot of people have seen sketch, but what I really like toying with is the improv stuff. Not a lot of people have seen that – the improv style we do."

"A lot of people associate improv with 'Whose Line is it Anyway?'," one member says, referencing the popular TV show. Another immediately jokes, "I—ing bull——."

"What we do is kinda the opposite of that, in a lot of ways," the more diplomatic one says, "for people seeing it for the first time it's really an eye-opening thing. It's enjoyable to get out there and show it to them."

Throughout the interview, all of the performers will state how excited they are to be bringing the show to areas that don't have a local comedy scene, let alone a savior such as the UCB theatre. They will also say multiple times how good the show is. They aren't saying so in a cocky way, however, rather they are clearly professionals who are extremely proud of the show they've made, like a parent talking about their baby.

Coming from a place as reputable as the UCB theatre, you could probably take their word for it, but with a show this funny coming to town, why would you? Comedy lovers of all forms, those that know their way around the national scene, those that have never even seen live comedy, and everyone in between would do best to make it out to the Iron Horse Sunday night to check out what is sure to be one of the best, and funniest, events of the season.

Call 545-1361 to write for Arts

No Cals Last Call. No Carbs
with hangover & nutritional drink
No Hangover
All-Natural Anti-Hangover & Nutritional Drink
Last Call is available now at
Liquors 44, Four Season's Liquors, Stoney's Pub, Holyoke Liquor Mart, Pop's Liquors, R&P Liquors and Niedbala's.
Ask for it at your favorite bar and restaurant
Campus Rep Opportunities Available, Call for more Information
Distributed By Bayside Beverage Distributors, Westfield, MA 413-562-7000
Please drink responsibly

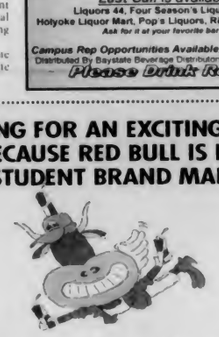
Soundtrack fails to 'Be Cool'

By Nathan Rothstein
Collegian Correspondent

Be cool. Be innovative. Be Chili Palmer. Be the producers of the "Be Cool" soundtrack and feature Earth Wind and Fire on the first track. Singing from the soul, and creating a "Fantasy," the dynamic soul group starts "Cool" the right way. With a beautiful harmony, and a catchy hook, "Fantasy" takes us back to a different time of music. A place in music that has been frequently sampled upon in the present day of ripping and burning. Puff Daddy, the sampler king (or pimp, whatever suits your style) could use this soundtrack for an album. When Diddy gets a chance to listen, he will jump out of his custom made suit and jump for joy. The next song, "Hollywood Swinging," by Kool & The Gang, made his Christian sidekick, Muse, a rich man. In 1997, Puffy and Muse, took the dramatic first chords, and turned them into a platinum record. A few songs later, James Brown boasts his rule as "The Boss." Again, Nas would sample this song in 2002 for his hit song, "Get Down." If you are interested in hearing the roots, instead of the 90s product, the first half of this album will take you back, before the time of samples.

Another highlight is the Brazilian number with the Neptune clap, "Roda." Before "Milkshake" and "Grindin" there was Latin American soul/jazz/funk music. What begins as a sound STAX would die for, Elis Regina combines a Janis Joplin-like voice with a poignant clapping beat. It is a very fresh sound that could be mistaken as contemporary world music, but its release, dates back to 1966.

The album takes a turn for the worst when it tries to feature artists that recently made music. In "Sexy," Black Eyed Peas say nothing numerous times, and then says a little more, of nothing. The only attribute that keeps the song bearable is a fantastic beat with and Arabian/Latin sound. The producers of the album saved their featured actress, Christina Milian, for the supposed meat of the album. The meat is not so tasty. Her first song, partially written by Alicia Keys, is an imitation of songs off of "Diary of Alicia Keys." It may sound good, but it is a redundant sound. Her next song, a ballad, is even slower, and less accessible.



"Be Cool" really slips when it delves into hip-hop. The songs are out of place, out of sync, and not close to as fresh as the 70s soul music that shines on the soundtrack. If it wanted to do hip-hop right, they should have convinced their actor, Andre Benjamin to collaborate. To not include a song from one-half of OutKast was a major mistake, and cost "Be Cool" from being anything special.

John Travolta and Uma Thurman co-star in 'Be Cool' the sequel to 'Get Shorty'.

Pregnant?
Would you like to talk?
Information can help clear away the confusion.
We offer free, confidential counseling with caring counselors who understand your concerns. We provide information about your options so you can make the best decisions for your baby and you.
Open Adoption Available: Choose your baby's parents, meet them and stay in touch. Medical and living assistance available.
CALL 1-877-777-7774 toll free/24 hrs
E-mail: info@brightsideadoption.org
www.brightsideadoption.org
Brightside
Adoption Resource Center
2112 Riverdale Road • West Springfield
413-827-4215

LOOKING FOR AN EXCITING JOB?
GOOD. BECAUSE RED BULL IS LOOKING FOR A STUDENT BRAND MANAGER.

Red Bull is on the lookout for a Student Brand Manager. An SBM is a reliable and motivated student whose responsibilities include relationship building, brand development on campus, and having a great time. (OK, that last one may not technically be a "responsibility" but we're going to hold you to it anyway.)
Our expectations from you are the following:
• You're going into your second year or higher at this school.
• You have a good knowledge of when/where things are happening.
• You're interested in marketing and have good communication skills.
• You're outgoing and have an entrepreneurial spirit.
• You can connect with different kinds of people.
• You have a flexible schedule.
Does this sound like you? If so, then please go to: www.redbullu.com.

comedy CONNECTION
HUKELAU
413•593•5222
705 Memorial Drive in Chicopee
From NBC's "Last Comic Standing" and VH1's "Celebrity Fit Club"
RALPHIE MAY
THIS SATURDAY!
7PM Only!
MARCH 5TH
a.k.a. "Dr. Dirty"
JOHN VALBY
MARCH 19TH
From "In Living Color" and "The Bonnie Hunt Show"
DAVID ALAN GRIER

"HOT" Yoga
BIKRAM YOGA AMHERST
www.bikramyoga.com
665-yoga
The room is heated to open you...
The series is powerful to challenge you...
The yoga is BIKRAM to change you...
Designed for all levels, BIKRAM yoga will challenge you physically...focus you mentally..and allow you to relax on a very deep level.
TRY IT FOR 10 CONSECUTIVE DAYS FOR ONLY $20!!!
On Rt. 116 across from Cliffside Apts.
Open 7 Days with generous student rates.

Minutewomen drop one late

BASKETBALL from page 10

the most the Minutewomen have given up in a half since allowing Duquesne to hit 41 in the first half on Jan. 21.

Trailing 6-5 three minutes into the game, Nelson stepped up and nailed her second of three treys, sparking a 21-4 run that saw Nelson and Campbell shell out several swift passes in transition, making the Minutewoman offense look almost foolproof.

But no lead is ever safe, not matter how small or large. Trailing by 10 to open the second half, URI's heavy press finally paid off, slowly, but eventually closing the lead to two with six minutes left before finally taking over a minute later. With 5:28 to go, Katie Stailing was fouled by Patrycja Gulak driving to the hoop and converted the three-point play on the ensuing free throw.

Yesterday's loss makes Sunday's battle at home against the Richmond Spiders (18-5, 9-3 A-10) all the more important. Arguably one of the toughest teams they will have to earn a win against, the Spiders are led by All-America candidate Kate Flavin, one of the premier forwards in the A-10. Flavin currently leads the A-10 in field goal percentage (.575) and ranks second in the conference in scoring (17.6 per game) and rebounding (9.1 per game).

"I think we'll come ready to play," Dacko said. "Richmond is just a better team, and we're usually up for those. We're just not where we need to be right now."

COURTESY UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

Alisha Tatham had one assist during UMass' 60-59 loss to URI yesterday. The Minutewomen will play Richmond in Amherst on Sunday.

UM ski team will follow Hawkins of Rush Hawkins, who has consistently destroyed the competition on local and national levels.

SKIING from page 10

"He dominates the league. He has won over 50 percent of the races last year and this year."

Hawkins has been nothing short of outstanding over the last two years. As a freshman in 2004, he finished first in seven of 11 events in races with over 60 competitors. He finished first in five of six giant slalom races, consistently beating the field by significant time.

In the USCSA Regional at Waterville Valley (also the site of this year's Regional), Hawkins opened eyes when he took first in the giant slalom and second in the slalom.

In the 2004 USCSA National, Hawkins finished second out of a field of 86 competitors with a two-run time of 2:08.31 in the giant slalom and was named an All-American.

But Hawkins' impact does not lie just with his numbers.

"It's great to be around him. As a younger player, if you know that this kid dominates the league, you can pace yourself after him," Pomeroy said.

The USCSA Regional is coming up on Feb. 26 and 27. The men's team took first in the Regional last year, and when reminded of it, Pomeroy added, "We're hoping to do the same this year."

UMass will play two with BU

HOCKEY from page 10

you start to not trust one another as much as you need to," Cahoon, the Hockey East Coach of the Year two seasons ago, said. "So one of those things we're going to try to bring out is a sense of trust in what we do and how we do it, and we're trying to put emphasis on that. We need the people in the locker room to embrace those concepts... as [much as] we can going into the most important part of the season."

Cahoon is no stranger to the Terriers, as he is a 1972 graduate of Boston University and served on Jack Parker's staff for a couple different stints after. He played left wing for the 1971 and 1972 national championship teams.

He won a few other championships during his time in Boston, too, as he was on the first BU team to win three consecutive Beanpots, so he knows a thing or two about playing in a regular season game following one of the greatest college sports traditions in the country.

And he doesn't think the Terriers will suffer from what he called a "Beanpot hangover."

The Minutemen will hope to christen Boston's newest 6,300 seat arena with a win tomorrow night, but they'll have to readjust their eyes when they get off the bus and realize they aren't walking into Walter Brown Arena anymore.

"I think that's a positive [that BU built a new arena]. Walter Brown was getting old. My senior year was the first class that ever played in there, and that's a long time ago," Cahoon said while laughing. "It's going to be a tough place to play, but it's another terrific venue that we get to go to."

UMass freshman Zech Klann fires a shot during the game Saturday night against New Hampshire. The Minutemen will play a home-and-home series with Boston University, beginning tonight at 7 p.m. in Amherst.

Randy Johnson surprised by backlash from Boston fans

By Ronald Blum
Associated Press

TAMPA, Fla. — Randy Johnson didn't think that merely by signing with the New York Yankees he'd join Alex Rodriguez as a target of the Boston Red Sox and their fans.

"I haven't done anything to them," he said Thursday.

Not yet, but his job is to lead the Yankees to their first title since 2000 and deny the Red Sox a second straight World Series championship.

"So they'll be mad at me if I pitch well against them? Bring it on then," he said, laughing.

"So I guess I'm a target, but I'm going to go out there and do the best I can," Johnson said. "I'm not going to be firing quotes and stuff like that to make myself more of a target, that's for sure. I'll leave that to other people that can do that better than I probably could."

As Johnson pitched his first bullpen session at Legends Field, former Arizona teammate Curt Schilling reported to Boston's training camp in Fort Myers, and new Red Sox and former Yankee David Wells added his own criticism of Rodriguez.

"I remember reading the press conference or something when he went there," Wells said. "He said: 'When we.' He said a 'we' in his comment about like he's won like three or four rings with them and he hadn't, and that kind of disturbed me.

"He shouldn't put himself in that category," added Wells, who helped New York win two AL pennants and one World Series. "You've got to earn it. It's like he's been there the whole time. But you can't take away what A-Rod has done for the game. He's a great player, and he will continue to be a great player."

During the offseason, Schilling criticized A-Rod, and earlier this week Red Sox outfielder Trot Nixon said of the former AL MVP: "He can't stand up to (Derek) Jeter in my book or Bernie Williams or (Jorge) Posada."

Schilling on Thursday added: "I'm pretty sure that me not liking Alex Rodriguez is not a groundbreaking story. I'm sure there are a lot of guys in the big leagues (who) don't like each other. The comments came about because of play on the field last year. That's the way I see it. I never really thought it was nearly as big a deal as people have made it. I'm pretty sure Alex could care less whether I like him or not."

Nixon also was irritated by Rodriguez's description of his early morning workouts, saying: "I'm not a deadbeat dad, you clown. That's what I said to myself. What's wrong with me taking my kid to school and then going to work out?"

Red Sox general manager Theo Epstein downplayed the comments.

"As a whole our team has been pretty modest in victory and respectful of the opposition, especially the Yankees, and focus on what we're having to do," he said. "If there's anything personal, I'm sure it's just a blip, and it will pass. But I know from knowing our guys that they're very, very respectful of the Yankees and what they've accomplished.

"I like the on-field Yankees-Red Sox rivalry. I've never cared much about the off-field stuff."

Sox doctor hurt from pink slip

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

FORT MYERS, Fla. — The doctor who conceived the ankle operation that allowed Curt Schilling to pitch in the World Series is still hurt by his dismissal. Especially now that the athletes he looked after are at spring training and he's back in Boston.

"I never told you it didn't break my heart" that his 18 years tending to Red Sox players had ended, Dr. Bill Morgan said. "As far as I can see, it's business. I'm certainly not going to let it get the best of me."

But he was disappointed that the meeting at which he learned of his dismissal in mid-December lasted just 10 minutes. He said he was surprised when he got the word from Red Sox president Larry Lucchino and general manager Theo Epstein.

"I think I did a good job. I think I did a great job with these (players) and human nature dictates you would like to have some acknowledgment," Morgan said in a telephone interview with The Associated Press. "All of us, if we feel like we've done the job, a pat on the back and 'nice going' would be nice.

"But we, as consultants, don't make those decisions."

Morgan said he had worked on one-year agreements and "was waiting for the other shoe to drop" ever since John Henry became principal owner before the 2002 season and started changing club personnel.

He thought he was safe after his work with Schilling and Boston's first World Series championship in 86 years. But the Red Sox told him they wanted to go in another direction.

They preferred a broader medical team and, on Wednesday, named Dr. Thomas J. Gill their team physician as part of a group at Massachusetts General Hospital. Morgan is an orthopedic surgeon at St. Elizabeth's Medical Center.

"It's never easy to make a change with an employee who's been a part of the organization for a long time," Epstein said Thursday. "We tried to handle it in as honest, straightforward manner as possible to be fair to him and we did spend an awful lot of time trying to be as thoughtful as possible."

He said the club was making "a philosophical change" by starting a new medical department with broader responsibilities — treating players, researching injury prevention and developing a program that would range from the team's rookie league squads to the majors.

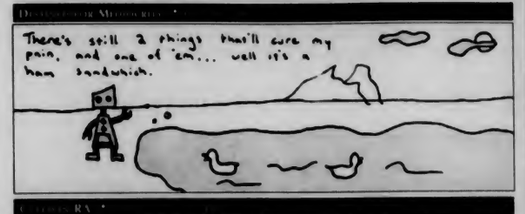
I want to work where a total lack of culture inspires me to escape the office each day at 5:01 sharp.

unoriginal@technicage.com

I want to work where a brilliant solution pops into my head while I'm getting a massage in the office.

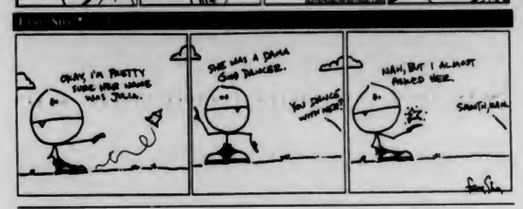
Send your resume with an unofficial copy of your transcript (with Software Engineer - UMass as the subject line) to collegejobs+umass@google.com.

Google has multiple openings at all degree levels (BS/MS/PhD) in computer science or related technical fields. Submission deadline is Sunday, February 20, 2005.



Google

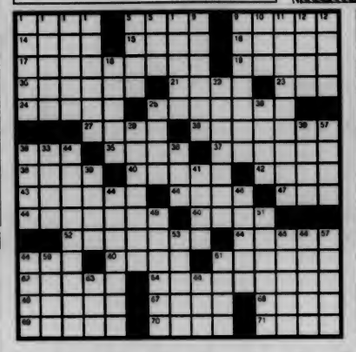
COMPARE AND SAVE
ROUND 3
StudentUniverse.com
-VS-
Student Travel in Amherst
StudentUniverse.com
$0
No Student ID Card
Round Trip to Paris:
$376
DING! DING!
COMPARE AND SAVE
Those Other Companies
Must Purchase
$22
Student ID Card
Round Trip to Paris:
$423
StudentUniverse.com



MAXIMUM Capacity SPORTS BAR
OLD SKOOL NIGHTS
-Break Dance Contest
-No Cover
FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 18TH
ONLY 20 minutes from campus!
LADIES' NIGHT
SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 20TH
DRINK SPECIALS:
$2.50 Patriots Drinks!
$1 Blue Razz Kamikaze Shots!
All Night!
WWW.MAXIMUMSPORTSBAR.COM
MEN IN MOTION

QUOTE OF THE DAY

"If only God would give me some clear sign! Like making a large deposit in my name in a Swiss bank."



—Woody Allen

ACROSS
1 Lose traction
5 Bitter quarrel
9 Kind of committee
14 Zola novel
15 Diamond Head's island
16 Unbound
17 Sumatran ape
18 Singer Haggard
20 City on the Penobscot
21 Brums of football
23 Distress signal
24 Pilot
25 Sardine
27 Bring up
29 Broke suddenly
32 J. Edgar Hoover's org.
35 Retaliated legally
37 Eyelike
38 Long, straight and limp
40 Nitty!
42 Cape Kennedy org.
43 Protest
45 Time entertainment
47 Raw wood
48 Indigents
50 E pluribus ___
52 Peformed with parallel lines
54 Shoestrings
58 Bombers, e.g.
60 Detective
61 Having two parts
62 "My Fair Lady" heroine
64 Origin
66 Union branch
67 Au naturel
68 Of limbs, prefix
69 Hatchery chatter
70 Pith
71 Pumpkin's beginning

DOWN
1 Name-droppers
2 Gold measure
3 Billy
4 Plant
5 Two squared
6 Halve a little lamb
7 Truck renter
8 Numbskulls
9 Reference volume
10 Unknown Jane
11 Boisterous frolicking
12 Capital by a bend
13 Mediocre grades
19 Tipper and Al
22 Word list
25 Captain's shelf
26 Roasted rapidly
28 Alpine country
30 Leisure
31 Shootout signal
32 Turkey
33 Rum pastry
34 Raw deal
36 New girl at the ball
39 Tucked away
41 Honor
44 Breakfast fare
46 Dutch bloomer
49 Natural fountain
51 Praying insect?
53 Boredom
55 Olivier's "Sleuth" co-star
56 Wear away
57 Council of churches
58 Assistance
59 ___ vera
61 Biorisch ingredient
63 Use a stun gun
65 LP replacements

Find today's answers online

www.dailycollegian.com

TONIGHT! AT THE HARP
Irish Pub
The Guiness Toast Party
Great Guiness Giveaways
N. Amherst 413-548-6900

Want to Jumpstart your business?
Advertise with the Collegian

H·O·R·O·S·C·O·P·E·S

aquarius • Jan. 20-Feb. 18
This morning you're going to wake up to the sound of birds chirping outside your window.

pisces • Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Don't be offended by something someone said without thinking.

aries • Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Buy the loudest, most colorful pair of rubber rain boots you can find.

taurus • Apr. 20-May 20
What thing did you forget in your room today? You know you forgot something.

gemini • May 21-Jun. 21
Recently, your musical tastes have been sub-par. Ashlee Simpson?

cancer • Jun. 22-Jul. 22
You have recently discovered the tremendous powers of Facebook.

leo • Jul. 23-Aug. 22
Don't do anything your mom wouldn't approve of.

virgo • Aug. 23-Sept. 22
For some reason, you are extremely cheeky today.

libra • Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Today someone will notice something about you that no one else has noticed.

scorpio • Oct. 23-Nov. 21
You're probably getting sick from hearing the same three songs on the radio all day.

sagittarius • Nov. 22-Dec. 21
You know you want to bust out the needlework again.

capricorn • Dec. 22-Jan. 19
Time for you to check out fifty pounds of books at the library.

Blow away your competitors, advertise with The Collegian
Call 545-3500

MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN MARKETPLACE

ACTIVITIES

Foam party Montreal weekends $89 Montreal Express.Net 1(781)979-9001

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Hobart Condos 3 bedroom, hardwood floors, study area in basement. Cable, telephone (internet access) in all bedrooms and study. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Center of town, 1, 2, 3 bedrooms; hardwood floors. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

Brandywine Apts. Now Leasing, 1&2 bedroom apts. Leases begin Jun, July, Aug or Sep. First come, first serve. Get them while they last. www.brandywineapts.com stop by or call 549-0600

1 Bedroom Available North Amherst $425 includes heat &

APARTMENT FOR RENT

electric bright clean washer/dryer in condo On bus route 1 mile to UMass female preferred Call Liz 508-367-8893

AUTO FOR SALE

Pontiac Sunbird 93 automatic 4 cyl excellent turqoise ABS Asking $1350 or BO Call 253-0279

CHILD CARE

Nanny position for 2 boys ages 6 & 9. Perfect schedule for student. Part time Spring. Full time Summer. Prior experience necessary. 413-625-2288

EMPLOYMENT

MAKE EXTRA CASH! Make your own hours! Sell T-Shirts to Sororities, Clubs & Groups & Make a commission on every sale. Guaranteed!!! Very Easy. Bonus's too! 413-586-7133 OR print@sunraiseinc.com

Earn lots of $$ and have fun on the water this Spring & Summer. Raft guides needed at Crab Apple Whitewater in Charlemont, MA. Fun Summer job, no experience necessary. We will train. 413-625-2288.

EMPLOYMENT

Make money taking online surveys earn $10 to $125 for surveys. Earn $25 to $250 for focus groups www.cashforstudents.com/umass

ROOM FOR RENT

350 per month 413-335-5226

SERVICES

Legal Questions? We have answers. Student Legal Services Office, 922 Campus Center, 545-1995.

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth-control, and Emergency Contraception. Affordable and confidential. STI Screening and Treatment. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992.

SERVICES

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance 549-1906

TRAVEL

XXX Night Montreal Weekends $89 Montreal express.net 1(781)979-9001

TRAVEL

One Bed and Studio (Four Queen Beds) at Deerpark one mile from Loon Mountain Available 3/11-3/18 Ken 335-9775

Bahamas Spring Cruise 5 Days $299! Includes Meals, Celebrity Parties! Panama City, Daytona $159! Cancun, Jamaica, Acapulco, Nassau $499! Award Winning Company! SpringBreakTravel.com 1-800-678-6386

TRAVEL

Spring Break 2005 Only 6 weeks left... Lowest Prices Biggest Parties Earn 2 Free Trips Exclusive with Sun Splash Tours www.sunsplashtours.com 1800-426-7710

#1 Spring Break Vacations! Cancun, Jamaica, Acapulco, Bahamas, & Florida! Best Parties, Best Hotels, Best Prices! Limited Space! 1-800-234-7007 www.endlesssummertours.com

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS WEEKEND

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 2005 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Downed in final seconds

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

When it comes to rivalries, one has to throw out the record books because anything can happen, and no lead is ever truly safe. Yesterday afternoon was no exception.

Despite careening out to a 14-point lead in the first half in front of a season-high crowd of 1,597 on Field Trip Day, the Massachusetts women's basketball team faltered to the lowly Rhode Island Rams (6-18, 4-9 Atlantic 10) with time winding down after a long two-pointer by Safi Mojidi put them up 60-59 with eight seconds to go.

Rhode Island	60
UMass	59

URI had a history of falling short this season, having previously been 0-8 in 2004-05 in games decided by eight points or less, but they finally crept up on somebody. That somebody just happened to be UMass (13-11, 6-7 A-10), who struggles to maintain the No. 2 spot in the A-10 East. Securing a first-round bye will be made much more difficult with their next two games coming against A-10 powerhouses Richmond and No. 20 Temple.

And they have Mojidi to thank. The quick and agile guard got her game winning shot off before freshman Pam Rosanio could even put her hands up. "I was just trying to play defense. I was trying not to let her go by me," Rosanio said. "I didn't put my hands up in time, and she got it off quick."

Mojidi led all scorers on the afternoon, throwing down 17 points to accompany a five-assist, two-steal day. Rosanio led the Maroon and White in scoring for the 10th time this season, hitting for 16 points on a 5-of-12 day from the field. Brooke Campbell (14 points, nine rebounds), Kate Mills (12 points) and Katie Nelson (12 points) were also double-figure scorers on a day that only saw UMass' bench contribute two points.

Brooke Campbell scored 14 points, grabbed nine rebounds, dished out six assists and tallied a pair of steals during UMass' loss to URI yesterday.

"I'm not happy with my bench play right now," coach Marnie Dacko said. "Our bench is inconsistent. We have some offensive scoring from our bench, some defensive presence from our bench but we don't get the combinations. So, it's hard for me to put the combinations on the floor right now."

The Minutewomen had one last chance to put themselves ahead following Mojidi's timely field goal. Rather than calling a timeout, however point guard Nelson came right at the Rams' full court press, immediately streaming up the near side of the court and dishing the ball off to Rosanio.

As she drove through the right side of the key en route to the basket, Rosanio was questionably hacked by two URI defenders, the ball partially deflected and then rebounded by Mills. "All four hands can't just hit the ball and not me," Rosanio said.

Mills was then blocked by Mojidi, screaming for a foul as time ran out.

Not much can explain the breakdown for the Maroon and White other than poor second-half execution. After shooting 60 percent from the floor in the first half (14-of-23), the Minutewomen went ice cold when they reemerged from the locker room clinging to a 10-point lead. UMass halved their shooting percentage, going just 30 percent on field goals (7-of-23) in the remaining 20 minutes.

The Rams went to work, however, totaling 37 points in the second half.

See BASKETBALL on page 8

Minutewomen lost lead when the assists stopped

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

Yesterday could have gone two ways.

"It could be a really nicely executed game or it could be a severely ugly game," Massachusetts women's basketball coach Marnie Dacko said before Thursday's game against Rhode Island.

Fortunately for Dacko and the Minutewomen, her prediction of a well-executed game was accurate for 13 minutes of yesterday's game. Unfortunately for Dacko, the final 27 minutes of the game would be better classified as ugly for UMass. The end result was a heartbreaking 60-59 loss for the Minutewomen.

In front of a season-high 1,597 fans, the Minutewomen came out on fire. URI (6-18, 4-9 Atlantic-10) didn't begin the game pressing as was expected, and UMass took advantage, picking apart the Rams defense with some crisp passing.

Just over four minutes into the game, URI called a timeout as UMass had taken a 12-6 lead on 5-of-6 shooting from the field.

UMass (13-11, 6-7 A-10) continued to execute sharply after the timeout. With 7:04 remaining in the half, UMass stretched its lead to a game-high 14 points, at 26-12. The most impressive part of the game was how easily UMass dissected URI's defense.

The Minutewomen had 11 assists on their first 11 field goals, with the majority of the baskets coming on lay-ups as a result of good interior passing to open cutters.

The turning point in the game came when URI finally began pressing UMass late in the first half. UMass handled the pressure to some extent, but by halftime its lead had shrunk to 10.

"Early on we were up by 14, and I thought we could have put the game away and we didn't," Dacko said. "Then they put the press on, and Katie (Nelson) didn't handle herself well in the press. We were still up 10 coming into the locker room, but Rhode Island had gotten the momentum going their way."

Nelson had an uncharacteristically poor day handling the pressure, as the point guard turned the ball over six times.

"We had a 14-point lead, and that went away because we just stopped passing," Nelson said. "They put the pressure on a little more, and I made a couple of bad decisions and we turned the ball over too much."

Although the deficit had been cut, the ball movement of UMass was strong in the first half. The Minutewomen had assists on 13 of their 14 field goals, with Brooke Campbell leading the way with five assists.

In the second half, URI utilized its pressure defense, forcing UMass into bad decisions and turnovers.

"We were trying to make long passes, and they were able to score off of that, and that killed us," Dacko said. "We practiced for three days against that pressure, and yet, it came back to haunt us."

The poor ball movement was reflected by the fact that UMass had only five assists after the break. The 18 assists tied the second-best total for the Minutewomen this season, but the inability to handle the pressure from URI in the second half overshadowed the Minutewomen's strong first-half execution.

"I think a little bit of it was fatigue," Dacko said about the Minutewomen's struggles in the second half. "I think Brooke Campbell was fatigued a little bit and Katie Nelson, mentally, didn't lead us."

UMass had been playing well lately, but a loss like this raises serious questions about the team's prospects of making a run in the post season. If the Minutewomen don't find a way to take care of the ball in the last three games of the regular season, their stay in the A-10 Tournament could be a short one.

Down the stretch

Rashaun Freeman has averaged 15.0 points and 7.3 rebounds per game this season, and he will lead the Minutemen (13-9, 6-5 Atlantic 10) into Philadelphia to take on the La Salle Explorers (8-15, 4-8 A-10) tomorrow afternoon at 2 p.m. UMass only has five regular season games remaining.

UMass to play two with BU

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

If the last seven days had any bearing on this weekend's home-and-home series between the Massachusetts hockey team and the Boston University Terriers, White Out Night would be canceled at the Mullins Center. UMass would put its first visit to Agganis Arena on hold and the locker rooms would be dark and empty.

Oh, but the last week of hockey doesn't have any weight on this weekend's games, and Hockey East action will continue as planned.

UMass (11-18-2, 5-13-2 Hockey East) is coming off its worst weekend of the season with a pair of lopsided losses to conference leader UNH, and BU (18-10-3, 12-4-2 HEA) won a road affair with Providence on Friday before finding its true love on Valentine's Day by taking home yet another — its 26th in the tournament's 53-year history — Beanpot championship.

The two teams will square off at the Mullins Center tonight and the month-old Agganis Arena tomorrow night with the puck scheduled to drop at 7 p.m. for both games.

The Minutemen are poised to start doing the smaller things right, as they only have five games left on the ballot before the Hockey East playoffs get underway on March 10.

COURTESY UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

UMass captain Stephen Werner will be looking to come up big this weekend during the team's home-and-home series with the Terriers.

"We're definitely trying to get better, and if we could win a few games along the way before the playoffs and try to get something going that would be great," UMass captain Stephen Werner said. "The important thing is that we're playing our best hockey in the first round of the playoffs, and hopefully we can build on that."

There is no hiding the fact that the Minutemen have been mired in their longest slump of the season, only 1-8-1 in their last 10 games, but UMass coach Don Cahoon isn't stressing the physical hockey aspects in the locker room right now; it has been the mentality of the players he is trying to improve.

"Confidence is a big factor when you go into these down cycles, and trying to develop confidence is easier said than done; if

See HOCKEY on page 8

Hawkins to lead UM ski team

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Correspondent

After winning the 2004 USCSA regional championship and posting a solid all-around performance in USCSA nationals (third place in the slalom and two crowned All-Americans), the expectations were high for coach Ken Thoman and the Massachusetts men's skiing team.

"We definitely think about it," assistant coach and former UMass skier Dave Pomeroy said about the season's expectations. "We usually get together as a team and talk about improving on stats from the previous year."

Although the Minutemen are young and promising (five freshmen and three sophomores), improving on last year's resume will not be an easy task.

The men's team is littered with young players, and in skiing events where one turn can ruin a race, inexperience could breed inconsistency.

"We definitely have a young team," Pomeroy said. "The older guys — Ken [Thoman] and myself — each have four years experience with races. Between the two of us, we know what it takes to succeed in this league."

Pomeroy mentioned that the adjustment for freshmen from high school meets to college meets has been crucial to the team's success. In high school, where not finishing a race is commonplace, the pressure is there, but relatively mild.

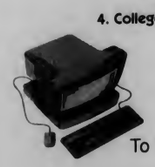
"The freshmen have come from a place where not finishing is okay," Pomeroy said. "College is a totally different world, five out of 10 races count on the day. We mess up once, and we don't qualify for nationals. That's the world of ski racing."

Of the younger skiers, James Green and Jason Small (both freshmen) have proved to be reliable in pressure situations so far this year. Green has been a paradigm of consistency, finishing 22nd, 26th, 20th and 26th in his first four races in 2005.

Jason Small has been steady as well with two top-five finishes already this year. Small placed fifth in the slalom race at Water Valley, N.H., finishing with a two-run time of 1:29.80, a slight 1.63 seconds off the lead, which was held by his sophomore teammate, the impressive Rush Hawkins. The next week Small placed second with a two-run time of 1:24.80 in the slalom event.

"Jason Small has been improving at a fast rate. He certainly has stepped up for us," Pomeroy added.

Despite the up-and-coming talent and the experience at the coaching positions, Pomeroy said there is one factor that impacts this team tremendously.



"He impacts the whole division," Pomeroy said

See SKIING on page 8

Sports Weekend Web Poll

Assuming the NHL resumes play at some point, what will your feelings be toward the league?

1. I will never watch a game again.
2. It will take some time, but I'll forgive the NHL and come back eventually.
3. My season tickets will be ready for use.
4. College hockey is better, anyway.

To Vote: visit DailyCollegian.com

New England's Largest College Daily • Est. 1890

The Daily Collegian

Tuesday, February 22, 2005 www.dailycollegian.com Volume CXIV Issue 84

Spike Lee addresses a packed crowd

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

Renowned film director Spike Lee spoke to a crowd of roughly 1,000 last Thursday night in the Curry Hicks Cage, urging students to follow their dreams, opening up the last half hour to a barrage of questions.

Sponsored by the Student Government Association, the speech was part of the University's celebration of Black History Month.

Clad in a gray suit with a pink collared shirt, the maker of hit films such as "Do the Right Thing", "Malcolm X" and "He Got Game" entered the stage to a standing ovation. After the applause simmered, Lee opened up the night with a bit of humor.

"One out away," the Brooklyn native muttered, alluding to the 2004 American League Championship series between the Boston Red Sox and his beloved New York Yankees. "Well, it'll be another 86 years before your Red Sox win another World Series."

After making note of Black History Month as "the truest month of the year," Lee got into talking about life as an adolescent in Brooklyn. Growing up, Lee told the audience, he never imagined he would ever pursue a career in film, let alone be successful at it. Although he didn't know what he wanted to do with his life, he knew one thing that was inevitable: college.

"Going to college was expected by my parents, there was no way around that," Lee said, adding that his parents were very supportive of his decision to pursue film after his sophomore year at Morehouse College.

MATTHEW REED — COLLEGIAN

Film maker Spike Lee speaks to the crowd at Curry Hicks Cage Thursday evening. His talk was part of the University's celebration of Black History Month.

Lee first got interested in film in the summer of 1977, when faced with no job he went around New York City with his eight-millimeter camera filming things for fun. When he got the idea that he should make his tapings into a movie, Lee decided film was for him.

"I feel as though I didn't choose film, film chose me," Lee said. "I was forced to find out what I love."

Which brought him to his next and arguably most important point of the night: a person's four years at college are really about finding out what it is they love, not finding a major that yields the most money.

"You don't want to be ten or fifteen years down the road from now and having to drag your ass out of bed every morning to a job you hate," he said.

See SPIKE LEE on page 2

UMass club helps tsunami victims

By Bill Donovan
Collegian Staff

Nearly 150 people attended the University of Massachusetts Art of Living Club's Fundraising Dinner for 1,000 tsunami disaster orphans from Srinivaspuram, India Saturday night in the Campus Center.

"We want to thank the UMass community and to all who have donated. Also, all who were here. We'll continue with the service projects, which we consider the most important to people who are in need," said Georgi Georgiev, Ph.d student of Isenberg School of Management and member of Art of Living Club.

The event was put together with the assistance of the Graduate Student Senate. The Hatch, Pranaza, the Hindu Student Association, and Earth Foods. GSS donated funds that helped provide the Indian food served to the large crowd. The Hatch gave the club some of its food items for the dinner also, with Earth Foods lending their kitchen for volunteer workers to prepare the meal.

Art of Living is a non-profit group on campus that offers yoga classes and conducts humanitarian programs. This group supports the International Association of Human Value — a groups which gives out humanitarian aid and is present in 40 countries across the globe. The organization is in special consultative status with the Economic and Social Council of the UN.

"This event was part of a big effort to relieve a shanty-town in India, which was very close to the beach and 1,000 children have been adopted by both groups, which are non-profit, educational groups," said Georgiev. "These two organizations have made a tremendous effort. This is just on of them, they helped out in Iraq, the war in Kosovo and much more.

These groups are dedicated to service, following the belief, which is Health, Hygiene, Harmony, Diversity, and Human Values. Volunteers go into fairly undeveloped locations and educate and modernize homes, water sup-

See TSUNAMI on page 2

Jhally gives speech about news media

By Matthew Reed
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON — A discussion on the current state of American media took place at Graham Auditorium, on the campus of Smith College last Friday.

The discussion was led by Sut Jhally, founder of the Media Education Foundation and professor of communication at the University of Massachusetts Amherst, and Judith Milestone, former senior vice president at CNN and a 1966 Smith graduate.

Jhally spoke on the world of "spin," which he defined as a person giving his or her interpretation of reality. He said that spin is something "inherent to all human beings, and something that you can never get away from."

The "new wave of journalism" in this country, an increased influence and reliance on public relations, is at the heart of the spin phenomenon, Jhally, quoting early public relations practitioner Edward Bernays, described public relations as an "invisible government that controls the government."

Expanding on this idea, Jhally noted that the government put the first full-scale systems of spin in place following the success of several political and cultural movements in the 1960s. The government has now made these systems a permanent fixture in society.

"Media is becoming addicted to the PR method of doing news," said Jhally, "which is evident in the dramatic reliance on video news releases, press releases and so on. Pre-packaged news stories are becoming far too common and accepted in media today."

Examples of video news releases, known as VNRs, were used to emphasize Jhally's point.

MATTHEW REED — COLLEGIAN

UMass communications professor Sut Jhally contributes to a discussion at Smith College on Friday about the role that public relations play in the news media.

These releases are put together by companies, such as certain pharmaceutical corporations, and shown on the local television news broadcasts. They are meant to look like news stories done by the local news channels, when in reality they are funded by the company they are advertising, in an attempt to sell and particular product or idea.

"These stories are simply not news," Jhally said.

Milestone also commented on VNRs, saying that she received large numbers of them when she was working at CNN, but refused to air them based on their content and origin.

According to Jhally, it is up to the journalist to break the habit of PR-controlled media in this country.

"Journalists must seek the truth, not just ask questions to the same, segregated group of people and think they've adequately done their job."

Only through education will journalists be able to "deconstruct the level of spin" that has become so prevalent in our society, Jhally said.

"I strongly believe that if there was availability to the proper education on the topic of PR spin, people would support the right policies

See SPEECH on page 2

Med school to hold health career talks

By Dan Tebk
Collegian Staff

Doctor Deborah Harmon Hines, associate vice chancellor for school services at the University of Massachusetts Medical School will visit UMass Amherst tomorrow to inform students about careers in the health care industry.

Hines will have two talks: one is open to the public and all are invited to attend; the other is specifically for disadvantaged students and what programs UMMS has to offer them. Half of Dr. Hines' job is student affairs-like business, but the other half focuses on outreach and getting more students with diverse backgrounds into the health care field. In addition to her vice chancellor position she is also a professor cell biology teaching human of gross anatomy and lectures on multicultural diversity.

Hines grew up in Memphis, Tenn. She started school the same year the Brown vs. The Board of Education was passed yet she attended segregated schools from first through 12th grade.

Hines said that her career choices were limited and that she "did not want to pick cotton" for the rest of her life. Even though

COURTESY UMASS EDU

Doctor Deborah H. Hines

"blacks were discouraged from doing things in science and math," Dr. Hines said, she enjoyed and excelled at those subjects the most.

"All the boys that I knew," she said, "I was helping with their math and science homework."

The adversity pushed her and made her drive to succeed. After attending LeMoyne-Owen College, a historically black college in Memphis, she got her doctorate in Human Anatomy from University of Tennessee Center for Health Sciences. After teaching at

See MED SCHOOL on page 2

Big Dig leaks could drive up price tag

By Catherine Tsai
Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) — Hundreds of leaks in the Big Dig tunnel could increase the project's $14.6 billion price tag, according to the U.S. Department of Transportation inspector general.

In the Feb. 16 memo, obtained by the Boston Globe, Inspector General Kenneth M. Mead said he would not authorize release of $81 million in federal funds for the Big Dig until he receives an accounting of how many leaks there are and how much it will cost to repair them.

The memo indicates that three months after the revelations about the tunnel leaks, the top federal overseer of the project remains unconvinced that the problem is under control, and that if the price of the project increases, the difference would be borne entirely by the state.

"Until these unknown are substantially resolved, we do not have a credible basis on which to conclude that the (Big Dig's) Finance Plan contains a cost estimate that is based on all known and reasonably expected costs," Mead's memo states.

Mead's memo went to the Federal Highway Administration, the agency that provides the funds to the states for transportation projects.

In the memo, Mead notes that as of Feb. 5, there were 458 leaks in the Big Dig tunnels, but about 40,000 points in the tunnels still needed to be inspected.

"As a result, it is not known how many leaders there are, their severity, and the associated costs to repair them," Mead said.

The federal government has held up payments to the state before. After cost overruns in 2002, federal officials postponed sending funds to the project for several months until the Turnpike Authority showed it had a plan for covering $400 million in cost increases.

The Massachusetts Turnpike Authority has downplayed the financial costs of the leaks, saying that repairs will be done by contractors.

—Associated Press

Hunter S. Thompson commits suicide

By Catherine Tsai
Associated Press

DENVER — Hunter S. Thompson, the acerbic counterculture writer who popularized a new form of fictional journalism in books like "Fear and Loathing in Las Vegas," fatally shot himself Sunday night at his Aspen-area home, his son said. He was 67.

"Hunter prized his privacy and we ask that his friends and admirers respect that privacy as well as that of his family," Juan Thompson said in a statement released to the Aspen Daily News.

Pitkin County Sheriff officials confirmed to The Associated Press that Thompson had died of an apparent self-inflicted gunshot wound. Thompson's wife, Anita, was not home at the time.

Besides the 1972 drug-hazed classic about Thompson's visit to Las Vegas, he also wrote "Fear and Loathing: On the Campaign Trail '72." The central character in those wild, sprawling satires was "Dr. Thompson," a snarling, drug- and alcohol-crazed observer and participant.

Thompson is credited with pioneering New Journalism — or, as he dubbed it, "gonzo journalism" — in which the writer made himself an essential component of the story. Much of his earliest work appeared in Rolling Stone magazine.

"Fiction is based on reality unless you're a fairy-tale artist," Thompson told the AP in 2003. "You have to get your knowledge of life from somewhere. You have to know the material you're writing about before you alter it."

COURTESY AOL.COM

Hunter S. Thompson, center, stands with Benecio Del Toro, right and Johnny Depp, left at a1998 movie premiere.

An acute observer of the decadence and depravity in American life, Thompson also wrote such collections "Generation of Swine" and "Songs of the Doomed." His first ever novel, "The Rum Diary," written in 1959, was first published in 1998.

Thompson was a counterculture icon at the height of the Watergate era, and once said Richard Nixon represented "that dark, venal, and incurably violent side of the American character."

Thompson also was the model for Garry Trudeau's balding "Uncle Duke" in the comic strip "Doonesbury" and was portrayed on screen by Johnny Depp in a film adaptation of "Fear and Loathing in Las Vegas."

Other books include "The Great Shark Hunt," "Hell's Angels" and "The Proud Highway." His most recent effort was "Hey Rube: Blood Sport, the Bush Doctrine, and the Downward Spiral of Dumbness."

"He may have died relatively young but he made up for it in quality if not quantity of years," Paul Krassner, the veteran radical journalist and one of Thompson's former editors, told The Associated Press by phone from his Southern California home.

"It was hard to say sometimes whether he was being provocative for its own sake or if he was just being drunk and stoned and irresponsible," quipped Krassner, founder of the leftist publication The Realist and co-founder of the Youth International (YIPPIE) party.

"But every editor that I know, myself included, was willing to accept a certain prima donna journalism in the demands he would make to cover a particular story," he said. "They were willing to risk all of his irre-

ARTS & LIVING
DISCOVER YOUR LOVER
Cure what ales you.
Learn facts about an age old alcoholic beverage.
PAGE 5

EDITORIAL/OPINION
BACK IN THE GAME
What is Commonwealth College?
A closer look at the UMass honors college.
PAGE 4

WEATHER
TODAY Snow, 37°, 22°
WEDNESDAY Snow, 37°, 20°
THURSDAY Partly Cloudy, 35°, 17°

SPORTS
WINNING WAYS
UMass takes down LaSalle to clinch a winning season.
PAGE 10

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center
University of Massachusetts
Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor-in-Chief Peter Foundas
Managing Editor Mike Martiello
Business Manager Rich Pacheco
Operations Manager Cory Rosenberg
News Editor Meghan Heals
Associate News Editor Tiffany Stoglicki
Executive Editor Samantha M. Nielsen
Associate Editor Michael Busack
Associate Editor Alyson Zillmann
Executive Editor Yousef Munayyer
Executive Editor Allison Edles
Associate Editor Erika Lovley
Associate Editor Alex Demosthene
Associate Editor Bob McGovern
Associate Editor Kristen Weiss
Executive Editor Marrs Pappas
Operations Manager Josh Kiggins
Digital Manager Horab Shah
Accounts Manager Virginie Frecaut
Human Resources Manager Sandra Marquez
Accounts Payable Linda Wallach
Accounts Receivable Josh Greenberg
Associate Editor Nathan Chomsky
Associate Editor Thomas Hecht
Associate Editor Rachael Bruno
Associate Editor Charlie Higgins
Associate Editor Matthew O'Rourke
Associate Editor Chris Gazzara
Associate Editor Julie O'Donnell
Associate Editor Dan O'Brien
Associate Editor Megan Brenner
Associate Editor Jeff Howe

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian (USPS 325-340) is published Tuesday through Friday during the academic year, except during vacations and examination periods, by the Massachusetts Daily Collegian, Inc., a non-profit corporation. Periodicals postage paid at Boston, MA. Postmaster: Send address changes to the Massachusetts Daily Collegian, 113 Campus Center, University of Massachusetts, Amherst, MA 01003. Subscriptions are $120 per year. The Collegian is a member of the Associated Collegiate Press, the Columbia Scholastic Press Association, the New England College Newspaper Association, and the Associated Press. Copyright 2005 The Massachusetts Daily Collegian, Inc.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

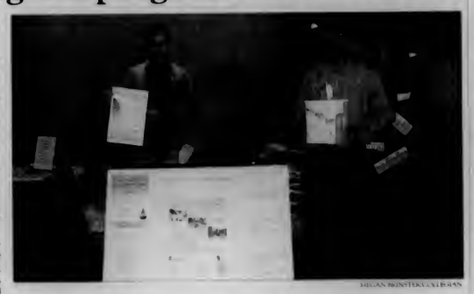
NIGHT EDITOR
Erika Lovley
PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Megan Brenner
COPY EDITOR
Meghan Heals
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Samantha Nielsen
PRODUCTION STAFF
Tom Heslin, Nick Belanger

Art of Living helping in relief efforts

TSUNAMI from page 1

ply, and health habits."

Many volunteers of the club were impressed by the amount of people who showed up at the event. The group had set up donation tables a week before in the Student Center and various Dining Commons over campus. Spots were set up in addition at the UMass Five-College Credit Union and restaurants like The Black Sheep.



"It was a success because the people are realizing the need of helping the tsunami victims and contributing for a just cause," commented Ashish Sahu, Environmental Engineering graduate student and volunteer for Art of Living.

Faculty members and some of their families members aided in the readying of the Indian cuisine the morning of the dinner, cooking such items as Samosa (potatoes and chick peas), Pakora (vegetables cooked in gravy) and many others.

"We hope this fundraiser will be a good contribution towards the children in need," said Doctor Atul Sheel, associate professor of finance in the Hospitality and Tourism program. "It's nice to see all of the students involved in this."

In addition to Sunday's dinner, Art of Living will be running a Yoga breathing course starting Mar. 2 in room 1634 in Lederle Graduate Research Tower. All funds generated by the class will be given towards the construction of the orphanage.

"This program will transform people into healthier, more calm people," said Georgiev. "Most people don't breathe correctly, using only 35 percent of their lung capacity. The fees collected from the course will be going to humanitarian aid for the tsunami victims."

MEGAN BRENNER/COLLEGIAN

Students in the Art of Living Club work a table at the Campus Center last Friday to raise funds for a group of 1,000 children who were orphaned in the tsunami disaster.

Director speaks to packed crowd

SPIKE LEE from page 1

Lee also emphasized that there is no such thing as an overnight success, as he talked about his early struggles after graduating from film school at New York University in 1982. After several failed works, Lee broke through with 1986's "She's Gotta Have It," which had a budget of merely $175,000.

He then went into discussion about the culture of today's African-Americans, claiming that today's African-Americans are ostracized if they are able to speak perfectly well.

"They call you a sellout when you're trying to enlarge your mind," Lee said.

Lee spoke out against gangsta rap music, though he made it aware he is fond of hip-hop. Among other things, he said that any parent who allows their children to watch the hip-hop videos on television today should be criminalized. Lee also questioned the appeal of songs that refer to women as "bitches" or "ho's."

Lee then opened up the remaining half hour of his speech to a variety of questions from students and several adults, where among other things he said his works "Malcolm X" and "Do the Right Thing" were snubbed by the Academy, and announcing he is starting a school of sports journalism at his alma mater.

Professor speaks about public relations

SPEECH from page 1

that truly benefit us all.

Finally noted that spin will never go away, since all people are prone to it, so journalists must use a new, better kind of spin in their reporting.

Milestone spoke on an array of issues facing modern-day journalism.

One of these issues was the increasing concentration of ownership for newspapers across the country. Ownership issues greatly limit the free-flow of diverse discussion in newspapers, which is in stark contrast to a system that was originally built around freedom of the press.

While concentration of ownership is a pressing concern in the media world today, some papers are still independent. "The best papers in the country are still family owned," Milestone said.

News production was another issue Milestone touched upon.

"There is a clear tension between the editorial side of news and the production side of news, and the pendulum is on the side of production," Milestone said.

Inherent in the increase of production-based news is the deterioration of news values, a phenomenon Milestone referred to as "Tostification."

"News as entertainment is cheap, and people love to watch," said Milestone. Examples provided to support this idea were the increase in popularity for reality television, and the around-the-clock news coverage of "celebrity news," such as the coverage of the O.J. Simpson murder case or the Princess Diana tragedy. These cases are very light in terms of actual news content, and favor a more entertainment-oriented approach.

One of the primary reasons for this shift in news values in the new audience news outlets are trying to reach. Advertisers and PR representatives know that the old viewership and readership of the news is dying off, and a younger generation is now being targeted. This is evident by the new concept of news created for the younger audience. News must now be "usable," rather than be simply for the benefit of knowledge.

Shiites to choose party leader

By Maggie Michael
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Ahmad Chalabi, a secular Shiite once known for his ties to Washington, and Ibrahim al-Jaafari, the conservative interim vice president, will face off in a secret ballot Tuesday to determine who will be the Shiite majority's choice for Iraqi prime minister, officials said.

The decision to hold a secret ballot came after the clergy-backed United Iraqi Alliance, which has most of the seats in the 275-member National Assembly, was unable to decide on a nominee - despite days of negotiations.

Chalabi spokesman Haidar al-Moussawi said the most powerful man in predominantly Shiite Iraq, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, met with interim Finance Minister Adil Abdul-Mahdi in the southern city of Najaf and gave his backing for whatever decision the alliance makes.

"Al-Sistani assured that whoever the alliance will choose, he will agree on him," al-Moussawi said.

Although Chalabi and his supporters claim he had the support needed for the nomination, the vote between the two 58-year-old men was anything but a sure thing.

The Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, the main group making up the alliance, had tried to persuade Chalabi to quit the race, some of its senior officials said.

"We had hoped that we would agree on one person without the secret ballot, because we fear that such a vote will cause divisions inside the alliance," said Jawad Mohammed Taqi, a senior member of the group, known as SCIRI.

He added that "Chalabi seems very confident and he believes that when we hold a secret ballot he will get the majority. I believe this is an exaggeration."

Whoever wins the ballot, he will face interim Prime Minister Ayad Allawi, 59, whose party came in third after a Kurdish coalition and received 40 seats.

"My list nominated me for the prime ministership," Allawi, a secular Shiite, said Monday.

Al-Jaafari, the president of the Islamic Dawa Party, is also Western-oriented but is considered by many to be a cleric in a business suit.

Chalabi is a former exile leader who heavily promoted the idea that Saddam Hussein had weapons of mass destruction but later fell out with some key members of the Bush administration over allegations that he passed secrets to Iran.

Chalabi's candidacy could create problems for the alliance because of his vow to rid the government and administration of former members of Saddam's Baath party. Most Baathists are Sunni Arabs, who largely stayed away from the polls either as a boycott or out of fears of being attacked by militants.

Shiite politicians such as al-Jaafari have been quick to reassure Sunnis, who make up about 20 percent of the population but were favored under Saddam, that they will have a role in forming a government and drafting the country's first democratic constitution.

Med School to talk jobs with students

MED SCHOOL from page 1

Meharry Medical College, she was recruited by UMMS in 1989.

"It makes a major statement that this institution would choose some one like me to represent it in these circles," said Dr. Hines. "By teaching in this medical school I put to rest a lot of stereotypes."

One of the major projects at the medical school, which Dr. Hines works closely with, is the Worcester Pipeline Collaborative. Its goal is to promote the health care profession at every level of school, from elementary schools to college campuses. The Pipeline project encourages students to take harder and more challenging science and math class, while at the same time helps teachers present material in a more stimulating, hands-on approach.

A few years back Dr. Hines also helped in the development of the Deborah Harmon Hines Scholarship. The fund is just under $50,000 right now and its goal is $50,000. In addition to donations from others, Dr. Hines often donates some of her own money and honorariums that she receives to the fund. It will be used to help disadvantaged students attend UMMS.

Hines is concerned about the state of our country's health care system. She said that often "your zip code is as important as your genetic code" in health outcomes.

UMMS's mission is "to serve the people of the Commonwealth," she said, and is doing a great deal to help the healthcare situation in Worcester and Central Massachusetts.

She is an active member in the Episcopal Church.

"My paid employment is a way of living out my mission in life, and my mission is to get more people educated," said Hines, "I teach everywhere I go and in everything I do."

Hines also represents the Episcopal Church on the board of the Balm of Gilead, an organization to support HIV/AID awareness and education to the African Diaspora across the country.

Hines plans of informing students on "how they can go about getting hooked up" at UMMS. "I enjoy my visits to the campus," she said, "I always enjoy meeting with the students."

Hines will be visiting UMass on February 23. She will speak to minority students at 2:30 in 319 Morrill and to the general public at 4:30 in 203 Morrill.

Israel releases prisoners

JERUSALEM (AP) — Palestinians gave a jubilant welcome to 500 prisoners freed Monday by Israel as part of a truce, but many complained that uprising leaders were not among those released. Hamas militants appeared unmasked in a West Bank city, their leader shouting that there can be no peace "as long as there is a single prisoner in Israeli jails."

Suhail Abu Madala, 35, spent four years in prison and had three more years to serve when he was set free Monday.

"I cannot believe that I'm smelling the air of freedom, that I will see my family," he said, choking back tears after being reunited with brothers and sisters and his 12-year-old son, Mohammed, in the West Bank city of Nablus. "Nothing can describe my joy and my feelings."

The decision to release the prisoners led to criticism by some Israelis that the move could re-ignite the bloodshed that has beset the region for more than four years.

—Associated Press

Attention: Artists!

Arts Extension Service presents

Making Art • Making a Living

Four workshops that address the business of being an artist:

• MONEY for Artists	(ART 41)	March 1
• MARKETING for Artists	(ART 42)	March 8
• JOBS for Artists	(ART 44)	March 22
• LEGAL STUFF for Artists	(ART 40)	March 29

Information: www.UMassULearn.net
Register: 413-545-3653

Workshops are scheduled for Tuesdays in March (except the week of Spring break, March 15) in the Campus Center, at the University of Massachusetts from 4:30 - 6:30 p.m. Preregistration is required. For more information, please visit www.UMassULearn.net and look under Noncredit Art courses or call 413-545-2360. Arts Extension Service sponsors the series through support from the UMass Arts Council.

UMassAmherst Continuing Education
You Choose Your Future Your Way

COMPARE AND SAVE
ROUND 1
StudentUniverse.com
-VS-
Student Travel in Amherst
StudentUniverse.com: 24 HRS (when YOU want)
Those Other Companies: 9-5 (when THEY want)
Round Trip to Athens: $500
COMPARE AND SAVE
Round Trip to Athens: $811
StudentUniverse.com

GREAT Reasons to use UHS Eye Care Services
1 Savings on eyeglasses from the on-site Optical Services at UHS
2 A great place to get contact lenses
3 Convenient hours and location
4 FREE eyeglass adjustments and one year warranty on frames
5 Savings on routine eye exams for students at UMass
SPECIAL OFFER: 10 PERCENT STUDENT DISCOUNT ON ALL FRAMES AND EYEGLASS LENSES!*
"I invite you to use the Eye Care Services"
Frederick H. Bloom, O.D., Director, UHS Eye Care Services
* Cannot be combined with other insurance discounts.
For appointments or questions, call 577-5383
UHS EYE CARE SERVICES

STUDENT LEGAL SERVICES OFFICE UMASS, AMHERST
HELPING STUDENTS PROTECT THEIR RIGHTS FOR 30 YEARS
Free Legal Advice, Referrals, Representation and Counseling for UMASS Students
Student & Workers Rights, Family & Criminal Law, Landlord Tenant & Consumer Disputes
CALL 545-1995 or stop in at 922 Campus Center

California suffers from mud slides

By Daisy Nguyen
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Mudslides trapped people in their homes Monday and forced others to flee as Southern California was soaked by yet another of the powerful storms that have pounded the region this winter.

At least three deaths were blamed on the weather and part of the area's commuter rail service was halted.

Rescuers pulled three people from about 10 feet of mud that flowed into a town house in Hacienda Heights, a suburb east of Los Angeles. One woman was flown to a hospital while the other two escaped with only minor injuries, said Los Angeles County Fire Capt. Mark Savage.

That same mudslide had forced the evacuation of 30 people from five units at the complex, Savage said.

The latest batch of rain, snow and hail started battering the region Sunday, part of a series of storms that arrived Friday and was expected to continue into Tuesday.

Since Thursday, downtown Los Angeles had gotten more than 6.5 inches of rain. The city's total since July 1, the start of the region's "water year," has reached 31.40 inches, making it already the fifth wettest on record, said weather service forecaster Bruce Rockwell. The record, 38.18 inches, was set in 1883-1884.

In addition to the mudslide victims in Hacienda Heights, mudslides and flooding chased about 30 people from 11 homes in Glendale, north of downtown Los Angeles, officials said. Three homes on an unstable hill were evacuated in nearby Pasadena and up to 10 homes were flooded in Fullerton.

Early Monday, a mudslide killed one man in a house in the city's Woodland Hills area in the San Fernando Valley, coroner's office officials said. In Orange County, a 16-year-old girl was killed by boulders that crashed into her family's apartment in a rural area east of Irvine, said Joseph Luckey, supervising deputy coroner.

In Los Angeles' Sun Valley area, a repair worker was died late Sunday when he fell into a 50-foot-deep sinkhole created by the storm, said Fire Department spokesman Melissa Kelley.

In the coastal community of La Conchita, where a landslide killed 10 people last month, six of the 39 people still living there elected to leave during the night because of the heavy rain and a steady flow of mud on the bluffs behind the town, said Ventura County Sheriff's Capt. Bill Hannigan. Warnings had been issued earlier and the community about 70 miles north of Los Angeles was described as a ghost town Saturday after other residents moved out.

COURTESY BEN TOGNO

Happy New Year!

Uyen Nguyen feeds lettuce to a lion while celebrating the Chinese New Year at the Worcester Dining Common on Thursday evening.

Presidents survey relief efforts

MALE, Maldives (AP) — Wrapping up a tour of tsunami-ravaged nations, former Presidents Bill Clinton and George H.W. Bush sat with child survivors at a temporary shelter in southern Sri Lanka on Monday, and mingled with European tourists at a luxury beach resort in the Maldives.

The children danced, sang and drew pictures of their experiences.

"Some of them are still drawing about the tsunami, and some of them are drawing life as they remember it, and as they want it to be again," Clinton said in the fishing town of Weligama on Sri Lanka's battered southern coast. "There was a lot of emotional damage here that's not visible to the eye. We don't want them to be suffering from this five or 10 years from now."

The U.S.-funded temporary houses, built of cinderblocks and iron sheeting, were replacements for homes washed away in the tsunami, which killed more than 170,000 across the region.

The purpose of the three-day tour, which included stops in Thailand and the devastated Indonesian province of Aceh, was to encourage more donations for a reconstruction process across the Indian Ocean region that is expected to take years.

"We're going to have to stay at this for some time," Clinton said.

President Bush asked his father and Clinton, former political adversaries, to lead the American effort to raise private funds for tsunami relief. The former presidents said they planned to deliver a report to the younger Bush on March 8.

—Associated Press

Author commits suicide at age 67

THOMPSON from page 1

sponsible behavior in order to share his talent with their readers."

The writer's compound in Woody Creek, not far from Aspen, was almost as legendary as Thompson. He prized peacocks and weapons; in 2000, he accidentally shot and slightly wounded his assistant, Deborah Fuller, trying to chase a bear off his property.

Born July 18, 1937, in Kentucky, Hunter Stocton Thompson served two years in the Air Force, where he was a newspaper sports editor. He later became a proud member of the National Rifle Association and almost was elected sheriff in Aspen in 1970 under the Freak Power Party banner.

Thompson's heyday came in the 1970s, when his larger-than-life persona was gobbled up by magazines. His pieces were of legendary length and so was his appetite for adventure and trouble; his purported fights with Rolling Stone editor Jann Wenner were rumored in many cases to hinge on expense accounts for stories that didn't materialize.

It was the content that raised eyebrows and tempers. His book on the 1972 presidential campaign involving, among others, Edmund Muskie, Hubert Humphrey and Nixon was famous for its scathing opinion.

Working for Muskie, Thompson wrote, "was something like being locked in a rolling box car with a vicious 200-pound water rat." Nixon and his "Barbie doll" family were "America's answer to the monstrous Mr. Hyde. He speaks for the werewolf in us."

Humphrey? Of him, Thompson wrote: "There is no way to grasp what a shallow, contemptible and hopelessly dishonest old hack Hubert Humphrey is until you've followed him around for a while."

The approach won him praise among the masses as well as critical acclaim. Writing in The New York Times in 1973, Christopher Lehmann-Haupt worried Thompson might somedas "lapse into good taste."

"That would be a shame, for while he doesn't see America as Grandma Moses depicted it, or the way they painted it for us in civics class, he does in his own mad way betray a profound democratic concern for the polity," he wrote. "And in its own mad way, it's damned refreshing."

Nightclub fire victims remembered two years later

PROVIDENCE, R.I. (AP) — Nathan Mattera's summers now include bereavement camp, and his after-school activities have been pared to counseling and playing near home. The 11-year-old stays close to his grandmother, now his legal guardian, and he still occasionally sleeps at the foot of his Grammie's bed rather than curl up in his own.

The young boy's new habits were borne by a fierce fire in West Warwick that ripped through a nightclub, taking the life of his 29-year-old mother and tearing apart his family. He's one of nearly 70 children who lost a parent in the Feb. 20, 2003, Station blaze, which claimed 100 lives. One boy lost both parents in the fire, according to Family Services of Rhode Island.

On the second anniversary of the fire, many of the children left behind still struggle to understand their parents' death and cope with their new realities. About a dozen have moved since the fire. Still others are unsure who a judge will decide they should live with permanently.

The fire, sparked by the pyrotechnics of 1980s rock band Great White, also injured more than 200 people.

"These kids lost so much, too much," says Nathan's grandmother, Diane Mattera. "There's nothing you can do to make them feel better. You try, but they lost everything."

—Associated Press

CORRECTION

On Thursday, Feb. 17, the Daily Collegian incorrectly said in a headline former Student Government Association Speaker Patrick Higgins was charged with "Driving Under the Influence" (DUI) by police, when in fact, he was actually charged with "Operating Under the Influence" (OUI.) We apologize for this error.

Have you been to the Bluewall and the Hatch lately?

FAMIGLIA PIZZERIA
LEMONGRASS
CRUSTANO'S SANDWICH CRAFTERS
SUNSET STRIPS
ODYSSEY CAFE
Noodles
Smoothie Company

THE BLUEWALL and HATCH - Try it today!
Try it out for yourself
$1 OFF
Your Next Purchase with a minimum of a $6 purchase
VALID UNTIL MARCH 31, 2005
DINING SERVICES UMassAmherst

To the World's best customers:

With the new extended hours of operation, you can dine late, even on weekends!

HOURS OF OPERATION
Worcester Dining Commons
Monday to Thursday 7:00 am to 10:00 pm
Friday 7:00 am to 9:00 pm
Saturday & Sunday 8:00 am to 9:00 pm
Franklin Dining Commons
Monday to Friday 7:00 am to 8:00 pm
Saturday & Sunday 8:00 am to 8:00 pm
Hampshire Dining Commons
Monday to Friday 7:00 am to 8:00 pm
Saturday & Sunday 8:00 am to 8:00 pm
Berkshire Dining Commons
Monday to Thursday 7:00 am to 10:00 pm
Friday 7:00 am to 8:00 pm
Saturday 8:00 am to 8:00 pm
Sunday 8:00 am to 9:00 pm

UMASS AMHERST
DINING SERVICES UMassAmherst
RESIDENTIAL DINING
YCMP
www.umass.edu/diningservices

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 2005

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

What is Commonwealth College?

Kelly McGuire

The Honors College, or the Commonwealth College at the University of Massachusetts, is known by many students as the unreachable goal that we all strive for, yet think we cannot achieve.

However, when it is all said and done, Commonwealth College is nothing more than a step in the right direction to gaining academic excellence and knowledge to further your experience at the University.

After speaking to those involved with the Honors College, it seems that anyone offered a spot on the mantle of opportunity to be a part of this community should consider it every chance they get.

With only needing a university cumulative grade point average of a 3.2, the Commonwealth College sets very realistic goals within its standards of good academics. Students can join the Commonwealth College any year they choose because the doors are always open.

Any student interested in joining the College can simply come in and sit down with an advisor, review their grades, and discuss how to take advantage of all the benefits they are opening their selves to.

There are multiple benefits of being part of the Commonwealth College. After speaking to Meredith Lind, the Director of Communication and Program Development for Commonwealth College, I was informed on many levels about all the benefits students receive. Lind works with all the different departments in lining up honors courses for all of their students. The Honors College passes a portion of their funding to all the different academic departments throughout the University. This is done so that the teachers of the different departments can have enough funds to teach smaller, more individualized courses for the Honors students. This arrangement is ideal for students who need more one on one time with their teachers and more individual concentration in their areas of interest.

The only way to graduate from the University with magna and/or summa cum laude is to graduate with in the Commonwealth College and with all the finished courses required. So, if that is a student's goal for graduation and they are not in the Commonwealth College, they should get a move on it.

As there are many courses and projects required in order to complete the full everything needed for the College, one of the most important and essential tasks to fulfill is "Culminating Experience," approved by the faculty senate in 1998. This consists of working closing with specific faculty members, usually producing an honors thesis or a project.

Done usually over two semesters, this Culminating Experience provides a student six credits, and gives them experience with the type of work that will be expected of them in graduate school. If any student wants to take all six credits in one semester, they have to work hard and spend a great deal of time every day on their paper or project. Such classes like the one taught by John Levine, which is a film making class, incorporates all different aspects of film making into one very in dept class in one semester, for six credits.

Another option is for some professors to offer joining classes for students who want to get their Culminating Experience done in one semester. Professors work together with students to incorporate different classes, yet produce one result honors thesis or project. What is so great about all these different approaches to the Culminating Experience is that it gives people of all different academic standings their own special way to approach it.

Commonwealth College accepts incoming freshman as well as any upperclassmen. As far as the incoming freshman go, the Commonwealth College accepts up to 500 students. This is based on the learning community and what is offered at orientation. It has to be limited for freshman only because the College finds it very difficult to be able to handle more than 500 students at a time. However, after the first semester, the Honors College is able to handle a larger number of members because of more flexibility.

What happens if you are in Commonwealth and don't keep your grades up to a 3.2? After being advised by Meredith Lind, Director of Communication and Program Development, she told me that advisors and faculty try to keep up with students. Many times, If a student seems to be falling a bit behind, a letter is sent to the student asking them why their grades aren't up to par.

Lind informed me that the faculty and staff realize that there are many reasons why a student's grades could drop; family problems, life experiences, and changes can all be reasons that people might not have school as their first priority. So, they ask these students to come in and discuss their possible reasons for their academic standing. Whether they need some support from campus or a different work schedule to modify their other life surroundings, the Commonwealth College does not expect unrealistic goals from their students.

Support has been said to be the most important factor that the Commonwealth College will give to their students. Improvements can be made, just one step at a time. Any student who wants to can choose to leave Commonwealth and come back again, but the faculty and staff tries to make sure students make informed decisions so that they aren't closing their doors of opportunity forever.

Although Commonwealth College does require a lot of hard work, time, and dedication, what you get out of it seems to be much more rewarding. Students form good relationships with faculty that better prepares them for graduate school. Faculty members enjoy writing recommendations for Honors students who make an effort to form relationships with them throughout their time at the University. When asked what most people get out of It, Meredith Lind stated, "Growth for yourself and the ability to develop relationships that can help you later in life."

Kelly McGuire is a Collegian staff writer

Pin the tail on the Syrians?

Stacy Kasdin

The explosion was not meant simply to kill him; it was meant to make a statement. The blast that was felt throughout the city of Beirut was not meant to do the job of an assassin's bullet. It was intended to get attention, and it has succeeded; the entire world was drawn to the slaying of Rafik Hariri.

Hariri recently stepped down from his position as Prime Minister, but that was not his only service to Lebanon. Through his investment Lebanon was aided in its recovery from a civil war which tore the nation apart for fifteen years, though he has also been criticized for the growing debt in the country. Once he left the government, which Is influenced by the Syrians, he grew more anti-Syrian in his politics and began working with the largest opposition group in the nation.

Now, with his death coming in such a dramatic fashion, fears of instability have grown in the region and memories of the civil war, which had been repressed in this period of recovery, are lurking back to the surface. Some in Lebanon have reacted to Hariri's death by calling for the immediate withdrawal of Syrian troops which have been in the country since the onset of the civil war.

Though the troops only number 15,000 and are not carrying out a horrific occupation like the Israelis, their presence is nonetheless detested by many. The government in Lebanon is weak and influenced by Damascus, and some Lebanese think that the first step in changing that is getting Syrian troops out. Though U.N. resolutions have called for the end of the occupation, the Syrian-influenced Lebanese government has never demanded this openly to the behest of Lebanese nationalists like Hariri.

A video claiming responsibility surfaced after the assassination. The man in the video, reportedly a Saudi-born Palestinian, claims responsibly as part of a previously unheard of group called "Victory and Struggle for Greater Syria." The reason, it was stated, was Hariri's growing ties with Saudi Arabia.

Any one who has studied the history and politics of the region would be able to see that this is not your typical Middle Eastern assassination. Some-thing just does not add up. Political assassination is not foreign to the region at all. In fact, the word assassination comes from "Hashashin," a hashish-smoking group of swords for hire dating back to the Umayyad dynasty. The Ottomans frequently strangled heirs to the thrown and the Israelis drop large bombs on unsuspecting cars to kill Palestinian leaders. The later is an upgrade from the exploding cell phone.

We will probably never know who is responsible for the assassination of Rafik Hariri, but I can assure you that every actor inside and outside of the region will use the event to their advantage.

The assassination of Rafik Hariri does not make simple sense. In fact, it is hard to find a logical answer to this without venturing into blatant conspiracy theory. Many people seem to agree that they do not believe in the authenticity of the group which claimed responsibility. Some are saying it is just a cover for the Syrian government. I choose not to be so naive.

The name of the group is particularly telling. "Greater Syria" implies a type of politics which has long lost strength in the region. It was not since the days of Antun Sa'ade had such fervor been placed behind the idea.

The group that claimed responsibility is certainly a front, but not for the Syrian government. It simply does not make sense. The very name of the group implicates Syria's involvement. Why would Syria try to hide behind a name that would give it away?

Syria is currently governed by the Ba'ath party, secular Arab socialism, was still shared.

Considering this, and considering the rhetoric coming from the White House towards Syria, the media circus made out of an arms deal with the Russians (because who does not buy weapons from the Russians?) and considering that the Syrian government fears the consequences of its actions, what rational reason is there for them to be behind the assassination of Rafik Hariri? Are they willing to invite a war upon themselves because a Lebanese politician is calling for the withdrawal of 15,000 Syrian troops? It just does not add up.

We will probably never know who is responsible for the assassination of Rafik Hariri, but I can assure you that every actor inside and outside of the region will use the event to their advantage.

The greatest fear is the escalation to war. During the civil war in Lebanon regional actors were involved, including warring factions in Lebanon, Syria, and Israel who occupied southern Lebanon, where thousands of Palestinian refugees were massacred at the Sabra and Shatila refugee camps. If war is to start again the only result will be devastation.

At this point one cannot seriously rule out the possibility of American, Syrian, or Israeli intervention in another Lebanese conflict. Every actor claims to have their interests.

In the end Rafik Hariri's brutal death is a great loss for Lebanon, but that will be amplified if regional actors will use his death for their own political gains and spread armed conflict throughout the region yet again. If you look close you can see it happening already.

Yousef Munayyer is a Collegian columnist.

Exploring the Pioneer Valley

Stacy Kasdin

For the past three and a half years I have been in Amherst, spending my weekends hanging out at friend's dorm rooms or apartments, going to activities on campus or sometimes going to dinner or the movies.

I've been to the center of town plenty of times, and to Northampton quite often as well. However, it seems that only now, with less than a semester left of college, I am realizing how much of the Pioneer Valley I have yet to see. Thus, my goal has become to see it all, or as much as possible, before it's too late and I have to move to the first city that offers me a decent job.

My quest began this past weekend. I organized a Sunday afternoon outing with a few friends to the Book Mill in Montague. It's only about 20 minutes away, but it's out in the woods, so I imagine most people discover it by recommendation as I did.

Their slogan is, "Books you don't need in a place you can't find," which is just about as perfect as could be for this mill turned used bookstore on the Sawmill River. It has the feel and smell of a library, and the books are highly discounted.

I saw a first-edition signed copy of a book that was originally $50, not including any added cost for the autograph, being sold for $15.

Complete with comfy couches and armchairs and a cafe serving tea, coffee, beer, wine, snacks and more, I think its a great place to spend the afternoon, whether you feel like coming to do some work or just to poke around.

There are some many ways to spend a weekend than seeing another movie or going to another Frat party... All I have to say to those who have enough time is to spend it wisely.

I imagine the Book Mill Is a popular warm weather destination as well. I think I just might have to go back in the spring and read a book outside overlooking the river, if I'm not too busy visiting the other wonders of the Pioneer Valley.

Quite a few of my visits are going to have to wait until the weather is a little warmer, such as hiking Mt. Tom in Holyoke. I visited the mountain last fall, but I drove to the top. This spring I'm hoping to talk some people into hiking up there, maybe even for a picnic. For anyone especially motivated they also have canoeing, fishing and a great view of the valley. This time of year they have skiing as well, if you trust yourself on skis (unlike myself).

This area is also home to a number of other great hiking destinations. There are more than a dozen state parks in Western Massachusetts alone.

Another outdoor destination I've been trying to get to for years now is Puffer's Pond. I hear it is a short drive away and a great local swimming hole during the warmer seasons.

As a child who grew up swimming in chlorine I am always excited to find some freshwater to swim in. As soon as it's warm enough, that's where I'll be headed.

Then it's off on a trip to a discovery I'm so thankful I learned about my first year here and have been able to take advantage of for so long: Herrell's. Herrell's is an ice cream shop in Northampton that has ice cream in a wide variety of flavors, including Twinkie, and it's all homemade, right down to the whipped cream and chocolate sauce. I can never get enough.

I have begun making a list of all the places in the Valley, and even spreading out to other parts of New England, that I want to visit before my time at UMass is over. At nearly four pages long it's getting a little out of hand.

I suppose what I'm basically trying to say is that there is so much to explore here.

They are so many ways to spend a weekend besides seeing another movie or going to another Frat party. I'm doing my best to cram everything into one semester, but all I can say to those who have enough time is to spend it wisely.

This is a rich area in so many ways: culturally, historically, naturally, etc. We need to take advantage of all it has to offer while we still have so much free time on our hands and so much energy and curiosity to keep our drive strong. Memories are made here.

Go out and make yours.

Stacy Kasdin is a Collegian columnist.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

I am disappointed that there has not been any coverage about the recent nomination of John Negroponte for the new post of national intelligence chief. If confirmed by the Senate, the current ambassador to Iraq will oversee 15 intelligence agencies including the CIA. As Ambassador to Honduras from 1981-85, Negroponte was one of the key architects of Reagan's murderous Central American foreign policy that left hundreds of thousands dead in it's wake. During Negroponte's stay, Honduras became the home base for United States operations against the newly formed Sandinista government in Nicaragua.

As U.S. tax-payer dollars were funneled into Honduras, John Negroponte and the CIA were given access and freereign over the Honduran-Nicaraguan border to conduct their affairs. Negroponte was key in sponsoring terrorist mercenary armies, the contras. Ambassador Negroponte oversaw the construction of the El Aguacate air base in Honduras as a training facility for contra soldiers. It was also a torture and detention center where excavators found 185 discarded corpses in 2001. In 1986, the U.S. was convicted by the World Court of war crimes against Nicaragua and was ordered to stop and pay reparations. The U.S. ignored the ruling outright and escalated the war.

As part of the United States' Honduras-based war against Nicaragua, the CIA distributed a manual entitled Psychological Operations in Guerrilla Warfare that instructed the Contras in techniques of political assassination, kidnapping, blowing up public buildings, and violence against civilians. Despite Negroponte's efforts to conceal information about Contra abuses, public outcry raised in the U.S. once information about the pampnlet leaked out led Congressional intelligence committees to hold hearings. Witnesses testified to Congress that the Contras had "raped, tortured and killed unarmed civilians, including children ... groups of civilians, including women and children, were burned, dismembered, blinded and beheaded" (New York Times, 27 December 1984).

John Negroponte is a war criminal. If the Senate is genuinely concerned with human rights abuses and torture more obscene than the Abu-Ghraib variety, they will question Negroponte's bloody past before handing him one of the most powerful positions in the world.

Lauren Brannon
UMass student

Interested in becoming an assistant ed/op editor for the Collegian? Contact Allison or Matt in the newsroom, or send us an email.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 2005

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Been around for ages, beer is here to stay

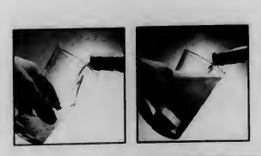
1. Who invented beer and when?
Historians are not entirely sure when, but it is presumed that beer was created accidentally by early nomadic tribes roughly 10,000 years ago.

2. What is beer made of?
The four primary ingredients are malt, hops, yeast and water.
Malt, which gives beer a sweet taste, is made from barley soaked in water until its husks open and sprout. The sprouts are then dried and ground.
The small flowers of the hops vine are added partly because they taste bitter, helping balance the sweetness of the malt. Hops also serve as a natural preservative, inhibiting the growth of bacteria that can spoil beer.
Yeast is responsible for fermentation, which creates the alcohol and carbonation. Many varieties of yeast are used, each with its own aroma and flavor. Beer makers sometimes use adjuncts, which are additives or substitutes for malt or hops. Adjuncts such as corn or rice can make a beer lighter-bodied or cheaper to produce. Fruit extracts give a beer a fruity taste.

JAMES P. O'DOHERTY
Malted barley, roasted to varying degrees, adds flavor and color to beer.

3. How much beer is produced in the United States annually?
Nearly 200 million barrels are brewed in the United States each year.

4. What is the most popular beer, and who makes it?
Budweiser, made by Anheuser-Busch, Is the best-selling beer in the world. It is distributed in more than 65 countries. No. 2 is Bud Light, also made by Anheuser-Busch.



5. Which country drinks the most beer?
The Czech Republic consumes 156 liters of beer per capita, more than any other country, followed by Ireland and Germany.

6. What are some of the different types of beer?
Beer comes in many varieties and flavors based on its ingredients and how it is brewed. Here are a few of the most common beer categories.

7. How much alcohol does beer contain?
Beers range from 2 percent to 6 percent alcohol. Other beverages are more alcoholic. Wine, for example, contains 8 percent to 20 percent alcohol.

8. How do you pour a beer correctly?
1. Always pour beer into a clean glass to preserve flavor and create a proper head.
2. Begin pouring slowly. As the glass begins to fill, keep it tilted to prevent beer from splashing in the bottom.
3. As the glass becomes full, straighten the glass to prevent spilling and give a minimal creamy head.

9. What are the dangers of drinking beer?
Like all alcoholic beverages, beer can impair motor skills and the ability to think clearly. Excessive drinking can also lead to liver damage, high blood pressure, stomach ulcers and other health problems. Women should avoid drinking during pregnancy to avoid harming the fetus.

10. Does beer offer health benefits?
Not only does beer contain a moderate number of vitamins and minerals necessary for health, but it may also help prevent some problems when consumed in moderation. Studies have shown that small amounts of alcohol can reduce the risk of heart disease. Beer also contains selenium, a mineral that promotes bone growth and helps reduce the risk of osteoporosis.

11. Can beer give you a beer belly?
Genes determine how fat is deposited, and no food or drink can create fat deposits in specific areas of the body. As with all foods, the more calories you consume, the more likely they are to be stored as fat and cause weight gain. Beer contains no fat and averages 150 calories per serving.

12. What are common beer myths?
■ Drinking light beer won't result in a beer belly. Light beer is only a little less caloric than regular beer. Taking in more calories than your body needs can cause weight gain.
■ The darker the color, the stronger the beer. Color is never a good indication of alcoholic content. For example, a Guinness ale is dark and contains less alcohol than most of the lighter lagers on the market.
■ A cloudy beer is a bad beer. Not all beers are the same, and some are naturally cloudy. Some wheat beers are naturally cloudy.

13. Can I make beer at home?
Many home-brewing kits are available. Home brewing is legal as long as the beer is for your own consumption and is not sold and you do not produce more beer than you are legally allowed.

14. Is root beer really a beer?
Although root beer contains no alcohol, most common definitions of beer include nonalcoholic beverages containing flavors derived from root extracts. The flavor of root beer is derived from sassafras roots or the sarsaparilla vine.
Other root-flavored beers include birch beer and ginger beer.

15. Does the taste of beer improve with age like that of some wines?
Beer is a food product that will eventually become stale. The amount of time that takes depends on its strength. Beer should be stored in a cool, dark location before consumption.

16. Does beer from a bottle taste better than beer from a can?
Most beer drinkers cannot tell the difference. But the color of a bottle can influence the flavor. Brown bottles block out light that reacts with the hops, which could damage the flavor. Green or clear bottles provide little or no protection from light damage.
Draft beer generally offers the best taste. Beer in kegs does not require pasteurization because of its short shelf life. The result is a fresher-tasting beer.

17. What is a widget?
It's a small plastic ball placed in some draft beer cans or bottles to aid in the release of carbon dioxide when the container is opened and to help create a fuller, creamier head when the beer is poured.

18. What are microbreweries?
They are smaller breweries that produce specialty beers in a limited capacity. Popular throughout the world, they offer the appeal of "homemade beer" with distinctive flavors.

19. Where can I find recipes for cooking with beer?
The unique flavors of beer make it a popular ingredient. It can be used in baking or as a marinade on meats. The Beer Institute offers many recipes on its Web site, www.beerinstitute.org/recipes.htm.

20. What are some of the strangest beer flavors?
There are many unusual beer flavors on the market, and many of them are only seasonal. Some of the more unusual beer flavors include chili pepper, banana, turkey, pumpkin, chocolate and candy cane.

Daniel Cooper Fort Worth Star-Telegram

SOURCES: MICHAEL JACKSON'S BEER COMPANION; THE NONSSUCH'S GUIDE TO THE WORLD OF BEER; BEER STORE.CA; HOMESTUFFWORKS.COM; KNOW-HOW TO HOME BREW; BEERBEER.COM; BEERHUNTER.COM; BEERADVOCATE.COM; TASTINGS.COM; REUTERS; ANHEUSER-BUSCH; BEER.COM; FORT WORTH STAR-TELEGRAM

FACTS AND TRIVIA ABOUT BEER, THE POPULAR MALT BEVERAGE.

More than a beverage, beer can used as an ingredient in dishes such as chili and hamburgers.

Ale
Full-body beer that's often darker with fruity or spiced flavors.

Ice
Beer with a high alcohol content due to the filtering of ice crystals after brewing.

Light
Highly carbonated beer that is light in color and body. Contains fewer calories and lower alcohol content.

Stout
Dark beer with strong malt and caramel flavor. Taste varies depending on variety.

Dry
Crisp, clean beer with a medium-gold color. Leaves little aftertaste.

Lager
Pale golden beer that is made from bottom fermenting yeast. Lagers are carbonated with smooth flavor.

Draft
Fresh-tasting beer that is normally not pasteurized. Some breweries sell bottled draft beer. Lightly carbonated.

Film gives viewers good 'Education'

By Joe Pietrafitt
Collegian Staff

With the current and ongoing scandal in the Catholic Church and the recent conviction of pedophile priest Paul Shanley, there is no doubt a feeling of uneasiness and vulnerability when it comes to the Church. Chalk up Pedro Almodovar's latest foray as another blow for the Church in his unflinching new film "Bad Education."

Set in post-Franco era Spain, "Bad Education" deals with the alleged abuse in the Spanish Catholic church and the fallout that ensues. Almodovar is known for his frank and no holds barred story telling, and "Education" is no exception. His scathing commentary on the Spanish Catholic schools in the 1960's is hard hitting and eye-opening.

Told through a series of flashback and voice-overs, "Bad Education" opens in 1980's Madrid in the offices of a young filmmaker (not unlike Almodovar himself) and his production manager trying to find a suitable film to take on as a new project. Just when it seems like the young film maker (Martinez) is unable to find suitable material, in walks a visitor claiming to be from the directors past (Bernal), with a brilliant idea for a story. Complexity, sex, comedy and deception ensue, making for one exciting ride that can only come from the twisted mind of Almodovar. All the rules of storytelling are broken, nothing is ever as it seems. Ever.

Bernal is at the top of his game in this performance, and he plays a bevy of characters, from the drag queen Zahara to the manipulative Angel. He gives a heart breaking performance as Zahara and is equally as wonderful as Angel. Fele Martinez, an established star in his native Spain, makes quite the debut for American audiences as the unsuspecting and conflicted Enrique. The two men have an unexplainable chemistry on screen that makes for one of the best duo performances in recent memory.

'La Mala Education'
Directed by Pedro Almodovar
Starring
Gael Garcia Bernal
Fele Martinez
Sony Pictures Classics
NC-17
109 mins.
Grade
A

There is also an outstanding supporting cast. Daniel Gimenez Cacho plays the priest, Padre Manolo. He turns an outstanding performance as a priest in love with his students. Javier Camara, a familiar face to Almodovar audiences, who last appeared in 2003's "Talk to Her", has a wonderful supporting turn as Zahara's accomplice drag queen friend. The prison-like settings of the school only add to the despair and heartbreak of the performances.

The real genius however, belongs to none other than the films maverick director, Pedro Almodovar. Considered to be one of the best directors in international cinema, his film delivers on every level imaginable. He coaxes stunning performances from his extremely talented group of actors and has fashioned a script that will keep the audience constantly guessing in the dark until the final moments of the film. He has developed a style for the odd and often outrageous, in such films as is 1999 Oscar winning "All About My Mother" and 2003's award winning "Talk to Her", and there is no lack of audactiy in "Education." Almodovar gets his thrills from shocking the audience, and in "Education", he gets his gasps not by showing the actual abuse, but by implying what happened to the poor students under the tyrannical supervision of the priests. In one particularly moving scene, we see Padre Manolo playing guitar while a young Bernal sings an oddly fitting version of "Moon River". As the camera pans away from them, we hear Bernal yell "No" and run away, only to trip and hit his head on a rock, blemishing his angelic forehead with a stream of dark blood.

Almodovar is nothing short of astonishing with "Education", which is probably his most personal film to date. Why this cinematic gem was not Spain's submission for Best Foreign Language film at this years Academy Awards (they instead chose the Javier Bardem vehicle "The Sea Inside") one will never know. Everything about this film is flawless, and it will no doubt grow even better with repeat viewings.

The motion picture industry needs to take a couple of notes from Almodovar's latest masterpiece. Number one: don't be afraid to push the envelope and give the audience something new and exciting. Make them think, engage them, and you will be rewarded. All too often Hollywood is filled with the bloated action movie or the ridiculous trashy comedy, solely in order to produce a profit for the major studios. Almodovar comes as a welcome breath of fresh air during this bleak winter season.

Academy Award-winning director Almodovar treats viewers to a new and fresh film about the scandals of the Catholic Church in post-Franco Spain.

Think darts, pool and bowling are bar sports? Try ping-pong

By Angela Valdez
Knight Ridder Newspapers

PHILADELPHIA — Around 11 p.m. one recent Sunday, a steady trickle of late-night revelers approached the door of the Russian United Beneficial Association club in Northern Liberties, Pa. Presenting their membership cards, they went inside to join the games.

Not darts, or pool, or bowling, but Ping-Pong.

No longer confined to basements or rec rooms, the game boasts devotees across the city, with long waits for tables and a cast of regular players.

The RUBA, a private club founded in 1913 by Russian immigrants, is the most exclusive of a handful of venues attracting Philadelphia's devoted Ping-Pong underground.

A membership at the RUBA can be purchased on the cheap if club officials like you, but coming with a current member is much easier. For nearly 10 years, a devoted crew of players have come here, many with fast games that scare novices away.

Intimidated visitors, he said, just need to relax and take a minute to appreciate the club's natural rhythm.

"You got to talk to people to play," McGuire said. "You have regulars and you have that kind of culture. (Newcomers) don't realize how things work here."

With a buzz cut and severe features, John Schenk, 52, looks like a pool hustler. More than a regular, he is something of a star on the local Ping-Pong scene. He likes the RUBA because of its exclusivity.

But Schenk can't really play his best game here. Back up too far in one direction, you run into aged Russians at the bar. Go the other way, and you're liable to get skewered with a pool cue.

Schenk said he remembered one time when a man showed up with a fancy $100 paddle. The stranger beat every contender.

"That paddle was like having a pistol in your hand," Schenk said.

Playing with his own paddle an old one with peeling rubber "At a certain point, you have to let your control with your mind go," he said. "If you think too much about it, you have a lousy game."

At Bob & Barbara's Cocktail Lounge in Philadelphia, newcomers receive a slightly warmer welcome than at the RUBA.

Bartender Steve Ferrell brought in an old Ping-Pong table about a year-and-a-half ago. He got Leonard "Butchy" Dwight, a regular, to help run the game. Soon, so many people came that Dwight didn't have time to play.

"It started to become such a real busy thing that it turned into a job," he said.

Now Dwight gets paid to manage two tables every Tuesday from 7 p.m. until 2 a.m. To keep the games sporting, he directs the best players to one table and those less seasoned to another. By midnight, the list for the tables covers a full page, and eager players are clamoring for their turns. If Dwight ever comes late, chaos ensues.

Among the steady customers a group that includes book editors and unemployed cleaning women is Andreas Portocarrero. A retired accountant, Portocarrero stopped playing Ping-Pong 20 years ago, but picked up a paddle again when he went back to school at the Community College of Philadelphia.

Early one evening, Portocarrero played Joanne Gilmore, one of the few female regulars. Portocarrero, who wouldn't give his real age, won out over the 43-year-old.

At the next table, Eric "Boogie" Horner, 25, tried to keep pace with his friend Jason Weinberg, 24. Weinberg, who coaches Ping-Pong for the Maccabi Games, wraps his $130 paddle in cellophane before zipping it inside a protective case. He spritzes the "bat," as he calls it, with cleanser before starting a game with $9 balls.

"If you don't equip yourself well," he said, "you won't be able to compete against advanced players."

Ping-Pong doesn't stop at Bob & Barbara's until the lights flash on and the bartenders herd drinkers out.

While players are committed to the game, there are precious few venues. The Philadelphia Table Tennis Center, which featured athletic play by Asian immigrants and assorted urbanites (and the game was always called "table tennis"), closed earlier this year. And the RUBA is for sale, with no promises that prospective buyers plan to keep the Ping-Pong table.

Nonetheless, the sport's adherents go to great lengths to find new places to play. Several Bob & Barbara's regulars are planning a trek to the Klein Branch of the Jewish Community Center. The branch offers organized games for non-members for $8 from 6:30 to 9:30 p.m. on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Thursdays, and 1 to 5 p.m. Sundays. Lessons are available for an additional fee.

Back at the RUBA, where the tables are open Sundays from 3 p.m. until 3:30 a.m., many customers don't like to call it quits. Mike Shiroky, a former RUBA president who spends most Sunday evenings on a barstool at the club, loves the players and their devotion to the game.

Shiroky was the one who started the Ping-Pong games at the club years ago. Now patrons treat him like a grandpa, kissing him on the cheek and chatting with him between matches.

"It's the hardest part of the night, to get them out of here," Shiroky said.

Ping-pong is a fast paced paddle game. Competitive pong is becoming an popular activity.

MAXIMUM Capacity SPORTS BAR
TONIGHT!
BLACKLIGHT PARTY!
Come and get painted with us!
ONLY 20 minutes from campus!
No Cover open till 2 am
DRINK SPECIALS
$1.00 DRAFTS
$2.50 BACARDI DRINKS
$3.50 1 LT FROSTED BEER MUGS
www.maximumsportsbar.com
1970 Memorial Drive Chicopee, MA

Need a big idea?
Daily Collegian
Call 545-3500 and speak with a representative today!

Peace Corps - WEDNESDAY!
Information Session:
UMass Campus Center,
Room 803
Wednesday, Feb. 23rd
5:00pm to 7:00pm
Apply by March 10th for programs departing summer/fall 2005. Peace Corps Volunteers serve in 70 countries on five continents in projects related to education, agriculture, business, IT, environment, fisheries and youth development.
Life is calling. How far will you go?
www.peacecorps.gov

LOOKING FOR AN EXCITING JOB? GOOD. BECAUSE RED BULL IS LOOKING FOR A STUDENT BRAND MANAGER.

Red Bull is on the lookout for a Student Brand Manager. An SBM is a reliable and motivated student whose responsibilities include relationship building, brand development on campus, and having a great time. (OK, that last one may not technically be a "responsibility" but we're going to hold you to it anyway.)
Our expectations from you are the following:
• You're going into your second year or higher at this school.
• You have a good knowledge of when/where things are happening.
• You're interested in marketing and have good communication skills.
• You're outgoing and have an entrepreneurial spirit.
• You can connect with different kinds of people.
• You have a flexible schedule.
Does this sound like you? If so, then please go to: www.redbullu.com.

Scott putts to victory

GOLF from page 8

He smoked his drive down the middle of the fairway in the playoff, leaving him a 3-wood. Protecting from the perilous left side of the green, Campbell flared his approach to the right. He had to take relief from a muddy puddle, chipped 5 feet past the hole and caught the left edge of the cup with a tricky par putt.

"You never want to get beat in a playoff," he said. "That's never a good feeling."

Scott pulled his tee shot into the rough, then pounded a 3-wood as close to the green as possible. He came up about 80 feet short, and chipped about 4 feet by the hole.

"A win is a win," Scott said with a shrug. "I will be called the champion, but you don't get the benefits of it. That's OK. That's just the way it is."

A dozen other players never got the chance to keep playing.

Darren Clarke and Brian Davis were one shot behind going into the third round, which was supposed to resume at 7:30 a.m. PST. They cleaned out their lockers and left town.

Colin Montgomerie, who has never won on the PGA Tour, was two shots behind and had to settle for a tie for fifth.

The rain also ended any chance for Tiger Woods to return to No. 1 in the world this week. He needed to finish fourth to replace Vijay Singh, and wound up four shots out of the lead in a tie for 13th. Woods likely will have to win the Match Play Championship this week for the third straight year to reclaim No. 1.

Scott moved up to No. 7 in the world. He was awarded 75 percent of the world ranking points at Riviera.

"I can take some confidence out of this week," Scott said. "I think if I won over 72 holes, I would be taking a lot more. I never really played under any pressure this week, apart from that one playoff hole. That's not coming down the stretch, testing every element of your game."

The last 36-hole winner on the PGA Tour was Michael Bradley in the 1996 Buick Challenge at Callaway Gardens, a tournament that no longer exists. He won in a five-way playoff.

Other players to have won after only two rounds on the PGA Tour were Brian Henninger at the 1994 Southern Farm Bureau Classic, and Neal Lancaster at the 1994 Byron Nelson Championship, a victory that was known as the half-Nelson. Those counted in the record books, but the PGA Tour later changed its policy.

Caddies and players huddled from the rain early Monday until the third round was called off. Scott ran into Robert Allenby, a fellow Aussie, in the locker room and jokingly asked for a few tips.

Allenby won the Nissan Open four years ago in a six-man playoff by hitting a 3-wood into 5 feet on the 18th hole under similar conditions - cold, rain, a slight breeze.

"I said, 'Driver, 3-wood and a putt?'" Scott said. "His was about 6 feet, mine was about 86 feet."

Ultimately, he got the trophy — just not a victory in the record books.

Adam Scott took home $864,000 after winning the Nissan Open. Scott won the 36 hole event with a four foot put in a playoff.

A young cast of All-Stars

By Steve Wilstein
Associated Press

DENVER — The NBA found itself caught between hypocrisy and hype at the All-Star game.

As commissioner David Stern pushed his idea of a 20-year-old age minimum for players in the draft, fully one-third of the 24 All-Stars showcased Sunday night were teenagers when they joined the league.

LeBron James, Jermaine O'Neal and Gilbert Arenas on the Eastern Conference team, Kobe Bryant, Kevin Garnett, Rashard Lewis, Tracy McGrady and Amare Stoudemire on the Western Conference team all entered the league before their 20th birthday.

They are the vanguard of the NBA's evolving image and swelling merchandise sales, and they are the strongest argument the players' association could offer in opposing Stern's plan in the new collective bargaining agreement under negotiation.

There was James, Rookie of the Year last year and an MVP candidate this season, looking as comfortable on the court as any of his seniors, scoring 13 points and handing out six assists in the East's 125-115 victory. He teamed with game MVP Allen Iverson on one of the most fan-pleasing plays, a dunk off an alley-oop pass from Iverson in the first quarter.

There was Garnett, the NBA's MVP last season and a teen when he entered the league out of high school a decade ago, looking no worse at 28 for turning pro so young.

Stern is claiming the moral high ground on the age issue, saying he is looking out for the best interests of the game and the many kids whose NBA dreams never materialize. But when push comes to shove in the contract talks, Stern is not likely to win on this one — even if the players themselves are divided on the merits of an age minimum.

"There are so many guys coming in under 20 who have done so well out of high school," said Stoudemire, a first-time All-Star who was drafted at 19. "If that's making the NBA better, why would you cut them off because of their age?

"For guys who come in under 20 or straight out of high school, I think it's cool, as long as they come in mature and eager to learn the game of basketball."

Ray Allen, who stayed in school, playing at Connecticut, took a different view.

"A lot of people look at it as punishment for younger players, but you have to think about the players who fall through the cracks, who aren't as successful and end up not getting a college education or being able to see what that whole experience is like," Allen said. "I don't look at (an age minimum) as a bad thing. I think we're helping out younger guys, not hurting them."

Just as Allen said he would vote for the 20-year-old rule if the union took a poll, so did another college grad, Duke's Grant Hill, a seven-time All-Star now with Orlando.

Hill acknowledged the hypocrisy of the NBA promoting the young players at the same time the league is trying to ban more.

"If you have that kind of special talent and gift then, of course, the league will have to market you," Hill said. "But not everybody is a LeBron, a Dwight Howard.

"There are some guys in this locker room who aren't even 20 who are great players. But I always thought the purpose of a union was to protect its members, not its potential members."

Hill recalled Korleone Young, who came out of high school, played with him in Detroit, then drifted quickly out of the NBA.

"He would have benefited by going to school and developing," Hill said. "I think more of guys like him than I think of a LeBron."

Though it may seem obvious that most players would benefit by staying in school longer, college is not for everyone. Some players have neither the aptitude nor interest in going to class. What would forcing them to stay in school accomplish, other than taking away a scholarship from players who really want an education? Then, too, some players who grow up in poverty and happen to mature faster than others may have no desire to postpone the wealth they can make in the NBA.

Eleven of the All-Stars, including several from overseas, never went to college. Yet they are successful, seemingly satisfied and without regrets.

"Who knows if there's another LeBron James out there?" said Houston's Tracy McGrady, who joined the NBA out of high school in 1997 and was now on his fifth All-Star team. "I would be against the age limit. I think what would be a great idea is the way they do baseball players. If the guy is not ready, the teams ought to be able to sign them, have the rights to them but let them play in a minor league. Send that guy down a level until he's ready to play at this level.

Stern wants to do something exactly like that with an expanding NBA Development League.

That's fine for players who are drafted but not quite up for the NBA. It doesn't solve the problem of what to do with teens who are ready in every way to play among men.

Cleveland's LeBron James is one of a group of All-Stars that entered the league before turning 20

Discover Your LOVER
The Collegian Dating Game
CHECK OUT YOUR MATCHMAKING SKILLS!
We rounded up 3 Men and 3 Women
You paired them up!
We are sending them on their dates and taking down every detail.
Look to see results of the dates and if they went smoothly, or if they went horribly wrong on:
Wednesday, February, 23rd
WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Minutemen top Explorers

MEN'S HOOPS from page 10

tant for these kids to know what we want to do here, and that's all it was. It wasn't a big deal."

Senior captain Anthony Anderson did not make the trip with the team, and remains out indefinitely with a back injury.

Stephane Lasme sparked the Minutemen defensively with 13 rebounds and four blocks, while holding LaSalle star Steven Smith, the A-10's leading scorer, to 12 points on 2-of-11 shooting.

"What [Lasme] did defensively in that game was a significant part of the difference," Lappas said. "The job Lasme did on a great player was an incredible defensive job."

Guards Jermaine Thomas and Darnell Harris led all scorers with 18 points apiece for the Explorers.

UMass and LaSalle (8-16 4-9 A-10) battled evenly over the first four minutes of overtime. After UMass grabbed a slim four-point edge, the game then turned into a battle of free throw shooting, and no one stepped up bigger for UMass than left Viggiano.

Making three consecutive trips to the foul line with his team up by two over the final 32 seconds, the Suffield, Conn. native buried 5-of-6 from the foul line to keep the Minutemen out in front and secure the win in the end.

"I started getting in a rhythm towards the end of the game at the line," Viggiano said. "I just wanted to be the guy taking [the foul shots] and I was able to make them."

COURTESY KAREN KINGER

Senior guard Chris Chadwick drives past a Florida State defender on Feb. 15. Chadwick and the Minutemen defeated LaSalle on Saturday.

The Minutemen got six points from Freeman and a trey from Maxwell as part of a 9-0 run late in the second half and took the lead at 38-53 with 1:45 left.

Thomas tied the game on the next LaSalle possession with a three of his own, and each team had a shot to take the lead or win in the waning moment but could not convert.

"Our last three home losses have just been like this - heart-breaking," Explorers coach John Giannini said. "We played very poorly in the first half, and our guys played extremely hard in the second half and overtime."

After UMass took a 32-24 lead into halftime, LaSalle came out firing to begin the second half. The Explorers put together an 18-5 run to take a 42-37 lead with just under 15 minutes left in regulation.

Remembering a writer

THOMPSON from page 10

could hardly afford rent. I barged into their reality for a moment, then was sent off to the next house.

All the while I thought of what I was reading. I began to ponder the great ideal of the American Dream, a topic that was the underlying theme in most of Thompson's work. It was a glimpse of shattered dreams blended with the strong ideals of blue-collar Americans, those constantly in search of a foothole to get to the next level.

I couldn't take it, the whole situation made me feel cheap. After a few weeks I had to leave for awhile, so I headed south ... straight to the heart of Las Vegas. The stories of that trip are better left to the depths of my memory, but it was during the drive that I began to realize which way my life's compass was truly facing.

My friend and I drove in his four-cylinder jeep, up and down the mountains of Colorado and Utah, sharing stories while staring blankly at the heartstrings of America. I began to get lost in the yellow lines of the freeway, as I wrote, read and began to look at myself in a far different light.

Thompson didn't find stories, he made them. In each of our lives there are thousands of extras, generic faces and voices that get lost in the static of the here and now. Thompson brought them all into focus and participated in their lives, garnering the stories and experiences that follow all of us.

He became one with the Hell's Angels during a time when seeing one was intimidating in its own right. They beat him up and spit him out, but he had his story and nothing physical could erase that.

I began to realize that there is something more to this journalism thing than simply transcribing statistics into easily digestible paragraphs. I had started to grow apathetic with my major and my life's course, then Thompson showed me that there is always an "Edge," to be looked over and sometimes jump off under the right circumstances.

I changed a lot over that summer and learned that the laudatory approach I was giving college wasn't enough and I needed to do more, to be more.

I began working at the Collegian more than I could

COURTESY HUNTER S. THOMPSON ARCHIVES

Hunter S. Thompson, the father of Gonzo journalism killed himself this weekend, he was 67.

have ever anticipated and I watched as I made my way from assistant sports editor to editor of the section. My writing changed, my approach to stories altered, and all the while I had my small brown book nestled close to my side.

When I woke up yesterday morning there was a message from a friend telling me that Thompson had taken his life. I sat and looked towards my bookcase, which is now laden with Thompson's work, and wondered why.

Maybe there was no reason, as reason was something that Thompson never injected into his personal "Gonzo" journalism. So once again, I read, wrote, but this time thought of where my life has gone since I introduced myself to Mr. Thompson's work.

At this point I can only say thank you to a man that lived outside the confines of reality and hope that my words reach him wherever his essence may be.

Maybe these words will float off the page and get lost somewhere around Barstow, on the edge of the desert.

I'm sure that's where they'll find him.

Bob McGovern is a Collegian Columnist.

Minutewomen bit by Spiders

WOMEN'S HOOPS from page 10

UMass picked up its play in the second half, but the first half hole was too deep to dig out of. Richmond extended its lead to as many as 17, but the Minutewomen would not go away without a fight.

UMass cut the lead to 11 numerous times, but was Minutewomen were not able to sustain any offense during the game, as they twice went scoreless for over five minutes.

"It was a tough loss," Tatham said. "We had 13 turnovers in the first half. In the second half we played better and we limited out turnovers, but it just wasn't enough."

UMass shot 43 percent from the field and had only four turnovers after the break.

One of the few bright spots for the Minutewomen was the job they did defensively on All-American candidate Kate Flavin. The senior forward came into the game averaging 17.8 points and 9.2 rebounds. The post players for UMass combined to hold Flavin to 12 points on 4-13 shooting and six rebounds.

While UMass was able to contain Flavin, the same could not be said of Saona Chapman. The junior guard led all scorers with 15 points on an efficient 6-9 shooting performance.

For UMass, freshman Kate Mills chipped in 10 points and senior Brooke Campbell added seven points, five rebounds never able to get within single digits. The , four assists, and four steals.

BU sweeps aside UMass

HOCKEY from page 10

he had done something wrong, and I said, 'Hey Pete, when it goes south, it goes south.' So we can't even call a timeout at the right time."

UMass has three games left on the season slate, as they will travel to Niagara on Saturday before wrapping up its conference schedule with a home-and-home with Northeastern on March 4-5.

Minuteman goalie Gabe Winer made his return to the ice Friday night after missing the UNH series with a leg injury he suffered against Merrimack on Feb. 5, but it didn't take the Terriers long to beat him.

Just 76 seconds into the game, Brian McConnell received a pass from Chris Bourque and blasted a slap shot past Winer from just inside the blue line to put BU ahead 1-0.

The Terriers earned a two-goal advantage with under six minutes to play in the second period with the Minutemen on the power play. Bryan Miller grabbed hold of the puck in the BU zone and fed it to McConnell, who took it down the ice before crossing a crisp pass in front of Winer that hit Bourque, who finished the two-on-one by finding the back of the net.

Bourque put the final touches on the scoring in the third period when he took the puck down the left side of the ice and then crossed in front of Winer before backhanding his shot by the UMass goalie.

It marked the third consecutive game that Bourque, son of Bruins legend Ray Bourque, had scored a goal, including the game-winner in overtime to bring the Beanpot championship back to Boston University for the 26th time in the tournament's 53 year history.

BU goalie John Curry, who played in his second game since returning from a shoulder injury, made 29 saves to record his first shutout.

"I felt good," Curry said. "I was a little worried this morning. My shoulder was a little stiff, but the same thing happened in the Northeastern game where I tweaked it in the first period, and it just went numb after that. Once I got that out of my mind, I felt pretty good out there."

"They had some real good chances, and if it wasn't for John Curry, that's a 2-2 or 3-2 UMass lead going into the third period," BU coach Jack Parker said.

After nearly 15 minutes of up-and-down action on Saturday night, UMass forward Obi Aduba made a lazy pass across the UMass zone that was intercepted by Dan Spang, who fired a shot through Winer's 5-hole from the left point to give BU a 1-0 lead.

The Minutemen tied the score just over four minutes later, however, when Kevin Jarman found a way to beat John Curry with a mess of players going after the puck in front of the net.

It marked the first goal for UMass in 125:58 of action that dated back to P.J. Fenton's first period goal against UNH on Feb. 12.

The Terriers quickly took the lead back just 1:46 into the second period when Eric Thomassian passed the puck from behind the net to an open Ken Roche, who one-timed a rocket of a slap shot past Winer from about 20 feet out in the slot to give BU the 2-1 lead that held up until the final buzzer.

"We came out in the second and had our minds set on keeping the puck down low and luckily we had the momentum going, and both the line mates played great and kept it down low," Roche said. "It was just working out of the corner, and Eric [Thomassian] found me in the slot, and I got a good piece of wood on the shot."

But for the Minutemen, it was just another night capped off with frustration.

"I don't have the words that I can put together to explain what my reactions after the game were because I was again pleased with their effort but not pleased with the outcome, and it gets to be a broken record when you tell these guys that they're working hard and too keep pushing and things will get better," Cahoon said. "Although I think we all know that to keep playing hard then things will get better, there is no fun in losing. Losing is a tough thing to deal with, and we've been losing games."

Scott takes home Nissan crown

By Doug Ferguson
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Adam Scott has his name on the Nissan Open trophy.

He earned $864,000, which counts just the same if he had played 72 holes, instead of only two rounds followed by a sudden-death playoff Monday morning in the rain against Chad Campbell.

He even was nervous standing over his tee shot in the playoff on the famous 18th hole at Riviera Country Club.

But there was no denying the strange sensation Scott felt after winning the first 36-hole event on the PGA Tour in nine years, a victory that comes with a trophy, a check and an asterisk.

Scott, who made a 20-foot birdie putt a day earlier to finish his second round tied with Campbell at 9-under 133, made short work of the long week by getting up-and-down for par on the first extra hole to win the Nissan Open.

After rolling in the 4-footer, Scott had to remind himself what winners do.

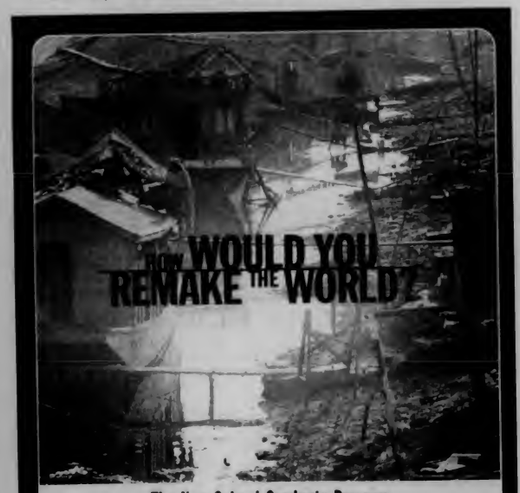
First came an awkward smile, then he gently raised his hand to acknowledge the 200 people watching the bizarre conclusion under gray skies and a colorful array of umbrellas.

"It doesn't feel like we played much golf this week," Scott said. "I don't feel tired and drained like you normally do when it's finally over, and you've been battling with some guy for the last 36 holes. It's been an odd week."

It was weird even after the Nissan Open finally got a winner.

The tournament was cut short to 36 holes because of heavy rain overnight that turned Riviera into the prettiest swamp on Sunset Boulevard.

PGA Tour events have to be at least 54 holes to be considered official. That means Scott still has only three PGA Tour victories. He does not earn a trip to the winners-only Mercedes Championships next year at Kapalua, or any of the other perks that come with winning.



Scott agrees with the policy, but he found plenty of positives.

"I wanted to win just as bad as any other playoff," he said. "But it was a different feeling, for sure."

Campbell also felt the sting of losing.

He was at a slight disadvantage, having not hit a shot since he tapped in for par to complete his second round Friday with a 6-under 65. The range was closed on Saturday. When he arrived at Riviera on Sunday afternoon to start the third round, the siren sounded to halt play.

See GOLF on page 8

The New School Graduate Program in International Affairs

A unique Master's degree program that combines interdisciplinary learning with practical problem solving. Students work directly with international practitioners worldwide. With over 250 students from 55 countries, this program focuses on the changing global economy, poverty, international institutions, NGOs, organizations, media and culture, with emphasis on problems facing developing countries.

INFORMATION SESSION:
THURSDAY, MARCH 3, 4 P.M.

CALL TO RSVP OR REQUEST A CATALOG:
800-862-5039

WWW.NSU.NEWSCHOOL.EDU/INTERNATIONALAFFAIRS

Application deadline: March 15

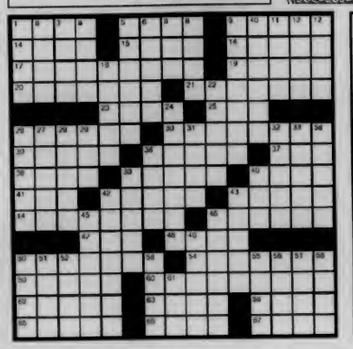
New School University
The New School
66 West 12th Street New York NY 10011

THE NEW SCHOOL

THE ATLANTIC 10 SHOOTOUT
WIN $10,000
QUALIFYING EVENT THURSDAY, MAR. 3 6:00 PM CURRY HICKS CAGE
CO-ED CHAMPIONSHIP SATURDAY, MAR. 5 2:00 PM MULLINS CENTER
FREE to STUDENTS
Free: Food, Drinks, T-shirts and more...
Win Airline Ticket!
Firestone GMAC Pontiac XBOX
WWW.ATLANTIC10.ORG/SHOOTOUT
or visit the Intramural office for more details
COLLEGIAN SPALDING PUZZ

Quote of the Day

"When the going gets weird, the weird turn pro."



—Hunter S. Thompson

ACROSS
1 Knocks one's socks off
5 Tardy
9 Range
14 False god
15 Zounds!
16 Filmed Olympic athlete Jesse
17 Monarch
19 Greek letter
20 Before sunrise
21 Account examiner
23 Changes course sharply
25 Slid
26 Position, as troops
30 Off-white color
35 Mistake
36 Strong winds
37 Seinfeld's uncle
38 Forehead
39 Sat for a portrait
40 Sharp, localized pain
41 Ticket info
42 Rustic retreat
43 Elk relative
44 Strongly averse (to)
46 Film festival site
47 Born in Paris
48 Celtic attire
50 Chronological record
54 Part of NRC
59 Up to the time of
60 School visiting day
62 Frighten
63 Employment
64 Perched
65 Helen or Gabby
66 Rents
67 Velvety fears

DOWN
1 Tendril
2 Scent
3 Worked at a loom
4 Child's coaster
5 Wiggle room
6 Getting along in years
7 Label
8 Author Ferber
9 Female deity
10 "Anchors ___"
11 Thaw
12 Biblical preposition
13 Russian emperor
18 Tonsorial tool
22 Recommended emphatically
24 Nautically nauseous
26 Actress Paget
27 Flynn of films
28 Roam stealthily
29 Blue
31 Narrow valley
32 Singing John
33 Tenants agreement
34 Places for earrings
36 Asian desert
39 Beeper
40 Male offspring
42 Some Louisianans
43 Fire starter
45 Complete
46 Makes a dull, heavy sound
49 Motionless
50 Tranquil silence
51 Early Peruvian
52 Remain behind
53 Mournful wail
55 Rich soil
56 French cash
57 In the present condition
58 Beatty film
61 "The Bells" poet

Find today's answers online
www.dailycollegian.com

THE HARP
NEW!! Wireless Internet
OCMP & All Credit Cards accepted
Irish Pub
February Special!
$1.50 PBR Bottles; Honey Brown, Molson
$2.00 A pint / $6.50 a pitcher
WED. ·Busted Vacuum
THU. ·Apollo Sunshine
FRI. ·Irish Seisiun
SAT. ·5th Pocket
"Come Party Like You're Irish!"
413-548-6900 www.theharp.net
163 Sunderland Rd. - N. Amherst
Just north of the apartments

AMHERST HAIRSTYLISTS
Caren's Place
Stop putting your hair's at off
Mon-Fri 10-6
Sat 10-4
253-1200
40 Main St.
Downtown Amherst
We thankfully accept debit cards
$2 OFF VALUECUT
10% OFF REGULARLY PRICED ITEMS OR MORE
With the COUPON only
www.carensplace.com

H·O·R·O·S·C·O·P·E·S

aquarius • Jan. 20-Feb. 18
Yah, nobody really wants to look at pictures from your trip.

pisces • Feb. 19-Mar. 20
You have beautiful feet. Don't let anyone tell you otherwise.

aries • Mar. 21-Apr. 19
You need to get more milk in your diet. Ice cream counts too.

taurus • Apr. 20-May 20
No, you should not make-out with your neighbor.

gemini • May 21-Jun. 21
Today someone you don't know will call you on your phone.

cancer • Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Don't you wish someone would give you a bouquet of pencils?

leo • Jul. 23-Aug. 22
Perhaps a reunion with some Bart's ice cream will do the trick.

virgo • Aug. 23-Sept. 22
You can take a nice, luxurious shower today.

libra • Sept. 23-Oct. 22
You should learn how to read your own handwriting.

scorpio • Oct. 23-Nov. 21
You are not the most subtle person, but this has its rewards.

sagittarius • Nov. 22-Dec. 21
You really need to have that talk you've been meaning to have.

capricorn • Dec. 22-Jan. 19
Today you will have a very entertaining dinner conversation.

YOGA CLASSES IN BOYDEN 10
MONDAY/WEDNESDAY
12:30 – 1:45 pm Power Yoga (1-3)
2:00 – 3:15 pm Restorative (1-2)
TUESDAY/THURSDAY
1:00 – 2:15 pm Yoga Basics (1-2)
2:30 – 3:45 pm Intermediate (2-3)
4:00 – 5:15 pm Yoga Basics (1-2)
DROP IN
FOR ONLY $10
and apply this fee towards a semester class package:
1X/WEEK $75
2X/WEEK $145
TO REGISTER
Campus Recreation, Boyden 215
413-545-0022
www.umass.edu/umim

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

Activities

Foam party
Montreal weekends
$89 Montreal
Express.Net
1(781)979-9001

Announcements

$600 Group Fundraiser
Scheduling Bonus 4 hours of your group's time PLUS our free (yes, free) fundraising solutions EQUALS $1,000-$2,000 in earnings for your group. Call TODAY for a $450 bonus when you schedule your non-sales fundraiser with CampusFundraiser. Contact Campus Fundraiser (888)923-3238, or visit www.campusfundraiser.com

Apartment for Rent

1 Bedroom Available North Amherst $425 includes heat & electric bright clean washer/dryer in condo On bus route 1 mile to UMass female preferred Call Liz 508-367-8893

Hobart Condos 3 bedroom, hardwood floors, study area in basement. Cable, telephone (internet access) in all bedrooms and study. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

Apartment for Rent

Brandywine Apts. Now Leasing, 1&2 bedroom apts. Leases begin Jun, July, Aug or Sep. First come, first serve. Get them while they last. www.brandywine-apts.com stop by or call 549-0600

Center of town, 1, 2, 3 bedrooms; hardwood floors. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

[redacted]

Pontiac Sunbird 93 automatic 4 cyl excellent turquoise ABS Asking $1350 or BO Call 253-0279

Employment

Top Boys Sports Camp in Maine! Play & Coach Sports * Have Fun * Make $$$ Camp Counselors Positions Available Summer 2005 Apply Online www.campcobbossee.com or call 1-800-473-6104

Make money taking online surveys earn $10 to $125 for surveys. Earn $25 to $250 for focus groups www.cash-forstudents.com/umass

Employment

Nanny position for 2 boys ages 6 & 9. Perfect schedule for student. Part time Spring. Full time Summer. Prior experience necessary. 413-625-2288

Earn lots of $$ and have fun on the water this Spring & Summer. Raft guides needed at Crab Apple Whitewater in Charlemont, MA. Fun Summer job, no experience necessary. We will train. 413-625-2288.

[redacted]

350 per month 413-335-5226

Services

Have you been ripped off by a retailer? Contact the Student Legal Services Office regarding your rights as a consumer. 922 Campus Center, 545-1995.

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth-control, and Emergency Contraception Affordable and confidential. STI Screening and Treatment. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992.

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance 549-1906

Travel

One Bed and Studio (Four Queen Beds) at Peerpark one mile from Loon Mountain Available 3/11-3/18 Ken 335-9775

XXX Night Montreal Weekends $89 Montreal Express.net 1(781)979-9001

Bahamas Spring Cruise 5 Days $299! Includes Meals, Celebrity Parties! Panama City, Daytona $159! Cancun, Jamaica, Acapulco, Nassau $499! Award Winning Company! SpringBreakTravel.com 1-800-678-6386

Travel

Spring Break 2005 Only 6 weeks left... Lowest Prices Biggest Parties Earn 2 Free Trips Exclusive with Sun Splash Tours www.sunsplash-tours.com 1800-426-7710

#1 Spring Break Vacations! Cancun, Jamaica, Acapulco, Bahamas, & Florida! Best Parties, Best Hotels, Best Prices! Limited Space! 1-800-234-7007 www.endlesssummertours.com

Place a Classified

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS TUESDAY

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 2005

SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

UMass survives LaSalle

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

PHILADELPHIA – The Massachusetts men's basketball program has not had a winning season in five years and have not been five games over .500 in eight years. But now, as the culmination of an up-and-down, emotional season grows closer, that has all changed.

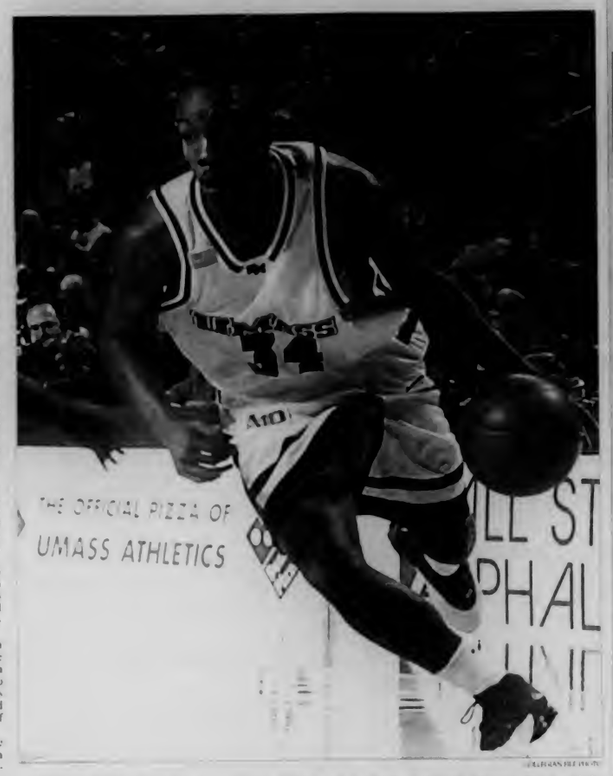
UMass	69
LaSalle	66

Head coach Steve Lappas' Minutemen are officially winners in 2005.

The Maroon and White downed LaSalle 69-66 in overtime before 2,315 at the Tom Gola Arena on Saturday, and the victory guarantees that UMass (14-9 7-5 Atlantic 10) will finish 2004-05 with a winning record for the first time since the 1999-00 campaign.

The Minutemen are now officially qualified for the National Invitation Tournament, and move to five games above .500 for the first time since 1997-98.

UMass returns to action on Wednesday night when Rhode Island will visit the Mullins Center for a 7 p.m. tip-off. The World Series trophy will be on hand as part of Red Sox Fan Appreciation Night.



"The biggest thing for me is, I'm happy for these guys," Lappas said. "We talked when we recruited these kids about what we're going to do, and I think they see it coming. It's certainly not there yet, but they see something starting."

Maurice Maxwell, who is from Philadelphia and attended high school near LaSalle, paced UMass with 17 points in another solid effort for the sophomore swingman.

Leading scorer Rashaun Freeman did not start for the Minutemen after being late for a team meeting, but still managed to post 16 points and seven rebounds in 29 minutes. Jeff Salovski earned his first career start in place of Freeman.

"Ray didn't start because he was a couple minutes late for a meeting," Lappas said. "It's impor-

See MEN'S HOOPS on page 8

Sophomore shooting guard Artie Bowers scored 10 points against LaSalle on Saturday afternoon. Bowers and the Minutemen have officially clinched a winning season with Saturday's victory and are currently in third place in the A-10 East.

Saying goodbye to a journalist

"... too crazy to live, too rare to die"
- Hunter S. Thompson

Bob McGovern

After my sophomore year, I needed some time to evaluate myself.

The plan was set in stone; I was driving from Massachusetts to Florida, then out to Colorado where I would spend my summer in Boulder. I knew the trip would be long and hard, but I desperately needed it to figure out exactly who I was and maybe even bring up the question of where I intended to go.

Before I left I walked around a big generic book store in my town and looked for something to pass the time during those summer hours when life seems to stand still. I came across the psycology section and figured I would challenge myself to a good introspective read.

I saw a small brown binding that appeared to stick out from the rest. It turned out that it belonged to the book Fear and Loathing in Las Vegas, a familiar title since it's fame on the silver screen. It was written by a man named Hunter S. Thompson, a name I had only heard in my journalism classes. It was a clear choice so I grabbed it, got in my car, and headed west to a place where I was all but alone.

I have never been the same since.

The people I lived with in Boulder already had their room situation figured out, so I was left with a small baby-blue corner room in the basement. I sat in my room on my first night, cracked the binding, and immediately got lost in Thompson's writing.

I bought into his prose and found myself laughing at his drug-induced lens of reality. Every once in awhile I would look up to the stagnant shadows on my walls and let my mind wander, before jumping back into a world that few people know and even less can illustrate.

The book was no challenge as I went cover-to-cover in only two sittings. There was something different about this man, something far removed from the Associated Press, inverted pyramid, objective reality that is contemporary journalism. He took these ideals and strangled them with his scathing ingenuity, with a confidence I can only pray to attain.

For me, it was like a breath of fresh air. He took me away from the emotionless writing that saturates the media and illustrated that there is always something floating just above the black and white pages that give us the news.

One book wasn't enough for me, so I read five. Everyday I would hunker down in the basement and soak Thompson in.

During the day I was selling windows in the worst neighborhoods of greater Denver, just another pawn on the dirty chess board of American business. I would go from house to house, reading my memorized jargon and pushing windows upon people that

See THOMPSON on page 8

BU takes apart UMass

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

One goal, one lucky deflection, a helpful bounce, just something.

BU	3
UMass	0
BU	2
UMass	1

The Massachusetts hockey team (11-20-2, 5-15-2 Hockey East) has been trying to catch a break, any break, since the turn of the new year, but once again suffered a pair of losses over the course of the weekend, 3-0 on Friday in Amherst and 2-1 on Saturday in Boston, both at the hands of the Boston University Terriers (20-10-2, 14-4-2 HEA).

Things have gone so badly for the Minutemen, who are 1-10-1 in their last 12 games, that they even called a timeout at the wrong time on Friday night.

"It got so bad that we told Peter Trovato we wanted a timeout there, and we didn't know the TV timeout was going to occur," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "And Peter Trovato did was we asked him to do: skate over to the referee, never thought to look to the penalty box [to the TV timeout light], and he asked the referee for the timeout, and the [TV timeout] red light turned on. So we took our timeout when the TV timeout occurred. Peter came back and he was all flustered like

See HOCKEY on page 8

UMass forward P.J. Fenton takes a sprawling shot on Boston University goalkeeper John Curry this past weekend. Curry made the save and allowed the Minutemen to score a mere one goal on the weekend.

Richmond pounds UMass

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's basketball team dropped its third consecutive game on Sunday. The Minutewomen lost at home to Richmond 55-43 and are in the midst of a season-long losing streak.

The schedule provides no breaks for the Minutewomen as they host No. 17 Temple on Thursday night and travel to Kingston, Rhode Island for the season finale where they will look to avenge their one-point home loss to the Rams last Thursday.

Richmond	55
UMass	43

Despite its recent slide UMass still holds the No. 2 spot in the Atlantic 10 East division. In order to clinch the spot and get a first round bye in the conference tournament, the Minutewomen will need to find a way to pick up a win in the final two games, as their once secure lead is now down to one game.

After Sunday's game UMass coach Marnie Dacko wasn't thinking about post season play. Instead, Dacko was simply looking for answers about why her team has struggled lately.

"I don't feel like my kids came out of the gates giving everything they had today and that's for me to figure out," Dacko said.

The problem in searching for answers is that there are many problems that must be solved to stop this skid. Obviously offense was an issue on Sunday, but Dacko also feels her team needs to "toughen up" and that the young squad still lacks some maturity. UMass also continues to get minimal production from its bench, as the reserves contributed only three points against Richmond.

One thing is clear though, the Minutewomen are not giving up on this year.

"The coaching staff is not letting up on this team and we're not giving up on this team," Dacko said. "We're not looking to next year. We've got to work things out today."

Sophomore Tamara Tatham, who led UMass with 11 points, echoed her coach's thoughts. "We're not going to give up. We still believe we can beat Temple. We're still going to give all we've got."

UMass (13-12, 6-8 A-10) began Sunday's game by immediately turning the ball over after controlling the opening tip. The early turnover was a sign of things to come as the Maroon and White turned the ball over 13 times in the first half.

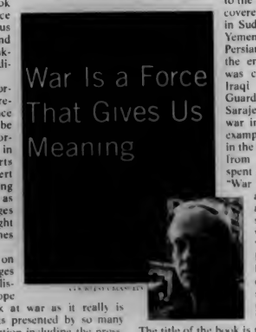
The turnovers combined with a poor shooting effort were too much to overcome against a quality opponent like Richmond. The Spiders (20-5, 11-3 A-10) kept a healthy cushion for most of the first half and took a 29-15 lead into the locker room.

"We have to be able to score," Dacko said. "Fifteen points in a half is not going to cut it. We have scorers, but we need to score with consistency. We missed shots, period. And we can't afford to miss open shots."

See WOMEN'S HOOPS on page 8

Minutewomen forward Brooke Campbell drives to the basket against Richmond on Sunday. UMass lost to the Spiders 55-43.

New England's Largest College Daily • Est. 1890



The Daily Collegian

Wednesday, February 23, 2005 www.dailycollegian.com Volume CXIV Issue 85

Dean's Book author set to speak to UMass students

By Dan Terk
Collegian Staff

Author of this semester's Dean's Book, Chris Hedges, will visit University of Massachusetts to deliver a lecture about his book "War is a Force that Gives us Meaning," and spend time speaking to some individual classes.

Hedges, a foreign war correspondent since 1989, will be speaking tomorrow at 8 p.m. in the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall. Describing the lecture as "thick," Hedges tries to highlight the main themes of the book.

"I do that on purpose," Hedges said. "I push listeners to cope with war. Look at war as it really is rather then it is presented by so many powerful institution including the press, entertainment industry, and government."

Writing the book was Hedges way of sharing his experiences, yet like anyone who has experienced combat it can be difficult at times. "I always dread [the lecture]," Hedges said, "afterwards I am quite depressed." Hedges spoke about a feeling of distance and alienation from others, family and friends included, because they do not truly understand what you have seen and been through.

Hedges has been in many war-zones through out his career, starting out in El Salvador and Nicaragua, then moving on to the Middle East. He covered the civil wars in Sudan, Algeria and Yemen as well as the Persian Gulf War, at the end of which he was captured by the Iraqi Republican Guard. He was later in Sarajevo during the war in Kosovo; many examples of war used in the book were taken from Hedges time spent there.

"War has marked my almost 15 years abroad," Hedges said in an interview with PBS's "Religion and Ethics." "I've been in ambushes. I've been strafed by MIGs, pounded by very heavy artillery."

The title of the book is the manifestation of one of the major themes. "What I wanted to do was talk about how people find meaning through war, then ultimately they are betrayed by war," Hedges said.

Yet he knows that war cannot give anyone, including himself, meaning. It is

See HEDGES on page 3

Hockey Club finishes second place

By Jonathan Vega
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's ice hockey club, which placed second in the Northeast and ninth in the nation, has exploded onto the scene in its first three years as part of the American Collegiate Hockey Association. The hockey club is also affiliated with the Eastern Collegiate Women's Hockey League. The women's hockey club also finished second this past weekend in the ECWHL season championship tournament; their record is now 16-10.

Bill Finn coaches the women's hockey team, with assistance from Phil Bateman.

UMass hosted the ECWHL tournament in the Mullins Center practice rink, which matched the top women's hockey clubs in New England against each other in an exciting series of games that came down to a UMass 5-4 overtime loss to the University of Rhode Island women's ice hockey club that took first place in the tourney. The Bates College Women's Ice Hockey Club took third place with a 4-3 win over Penn State.

"Our recent success is a true accomplishment for a completely student run organization like ourselves," says Samantha Louras, a player and President of the UMass women's ice hockey club. "Becoming a varsity sport on campus is definitely one of our goals."

Louras points out that budget cuts have drastically impacted existing varsity teams leaving some disbanded. "UMass varsity tennis and men's gymnastics have been cut," says Louras, "These teams would have priority when university funding increases, so unfortunately, we don't really have a lot of control over [becoming a varsity team]."

"If we could become a varsity women's team we would attract more of a fan base and players," Louras said. "the university provides us with $10,000 a year but our ice time at the Mullins Center is $18,000 dollars." In the end the players bear the burden of funding their sport through player dues and contributions.

Varsity or not, players are migrating to the club more and more every year, explains Louras. In fact the program has grown so much over the past years that the club has two teams. The B Team has been practicing once a week and has games almost every weekend. "We are trying to attract attention to let people know that UMass can be a great source for women's hockey," Louras said.

According to the club's website, www.people.umass.edu/womhockc, the team is part of a competitive league at a national level, and is starting to look for players who have experience and feel they can contribute in making UMass women's ice hockey one of the best teams in the ACHA.

The UMass women's ice hockey club finished second this weekend in the ECWHL season championship tournament.

Presently there are 32 players in the UMass women's league and according to Louras there is room for more. She adds that the team has a wide variety of ability levels and some players have been playing for years on men's high school teams while, others may have played recreationally; nevertheless, many players on the team have begun their organized hockey career with the club.

The ACHA National Tournament begins March 10 and expects to draw twelve teams from all over the country. "The ACHA tournament is the biggest non-varsity sporting event in the country," Louras said, "[It] is working to create varsity caliber players and tournaments."

Students can support the UMass women's ice hockey club by attending games and spreading the word about the upcoming ACHA National Tournament in March at the Pepsi Center in Buffalo, N.Y. More information about the team is available at their website.

Next step: convincing Follet

A UMass student holds a sign that indicates that he spent over $500 on textbooks this past fall.

Students wait in lengthy lines to purchase high-priced textbooks. The rental system proposed will try to lighten the load.

Administration backs plan for rental system

By Jonathan Vega
Collegian Staff

The Student Government Association has responded to student outcry over exorbitant textbook costs by proposing a pilot textbook rental program. Under the leadership of SGA President Eduardo Bustamante, an ad-Hoc Faculty Senate/Student Government committee has been created to address textbook affordability; the council was borne after a unanimous vote of The Undergraduate Education Council.

According to Textbook Rental Pilot Proposal, unveiled last Wednesday by the committee on textbook affordability, "the average student will spend nearly $900 for textbooks this year." Likewise, student support for the proposed program has soared; "of 2,500 students that voted on a recent campus-wide referendum, 85 percent voted that the school should implement a campus-wide textbook rental program."

"We won by the largest margin in campus history," Bustamante said, "one of the main reason our campaign was so successful was that we ran on a platform for textbook reforms."

The committee on textbook affordability has requested that the administration of the University of Massachusetts seeks a pilot textbook rental program as a condition of upcoming contract renewal talks with Follett Higher Education, the company that presently manages the Textbook Annex here on campus. The upcoming contract negotiations represent the textbook marketing future that UMass and Follett will present students with for the next five years.

"One of the main reasons for this change is that we are dependant on the school for books and we are being exploited," says Bustamante, "it is something that should matter to all of us."

According to the committee's report a textbook rental program could provide three potential advantages to students. First, "Students will be enabled to obtain textbooks with a smaller initial investment." Secondly, "we anticipate that a far grater percentage of students in each class will obtain the textbook." finally, "the university will acquire more leverage over the tim-

See TEXTBOOKS on page 3

NSF awards faculty member with large grant

By Allison Edles
Collegian Staff

The National Science Foundation Faculty Early Career Development Program recently awarded a $400,000 grant to Tilman Wolf, assistant professor of electrical and computer engineering at the University of Massachusetts Amherst. The grant will be used to help fund Wolf's research on network processing and will be distributed over five years.

The purpose of Wolf's research, a professor at UMass Amherst for the past two and a half years, is to improve the way many networks and routers function today. "Computer networks have traditionally been very simple," said Wolfe. "Networks don't do very much other than forwarding the data." The goal of Wolf's research will be finding a way to allow the networks to, not only forward the data, but process it as well.

"By allowing networks to process the data," Wolf said "network services can provide additional services to their customers." The research Wolf will be conducting, for example, will make it possible for companies to develop applications to access a webpage on a cell phone. "Currently, web pages are not scalable on cell phones because of the limitations of the networks; having them only forward the data. It makes sense to [process] things like that in the network itself, rather than through the server," Wolf said.

The purpose of Wolf's research is not, to create the applications, but rather, the infrastructure for which future applications can be based off of. "There are many problems that arise from the way the network currently operates. Routers can be programmed to do a range of things, like blocking virus propagation, for example. However, such application development is not part of our research," said Wolf.

See GRANT on page 2

UMass in desperate need of faculty members

By Nina Lowy
Collegian Staff

Last Wednesday, Feb. 16, the Massachusetts Society of Professors representatives from Amherst, students, and faculty held a press conference at the State House in Boston to examine the decline of full-time faculty at the University of Massachusetts Amherst.

In 1990 the faculty consisted of 1,133 members and today there are only 865- a 24 percent decline, according to a Feb.14 press release. This greatly affects UMass's rank as a top research university. In order to be competitive again UMass needs 200 to 300 more full-time faculty members. The shortage has hurt students who are shut out of courses and need more time to graduate.

Tenured professors are vital to the university's teaching and research.

In November 2004 Chancellor John V. Lombardi stated that UMass Amherst cannot become a top-ranked research university without a research faculty of at least 1,100- for a faculty-student ratio of approximately 1:20, according to the press release.

Town representative Ellen Story (D-Amherst) spoke highly of the students present at the press conference. "Students were extremely eloquent," she said during a telephone interview. "When students need a reference, [from a professor], they don't have one." Story said the reason for shortage of faculty at UMass is in part due to lack of support from the state. She explained that there are separate budgets for operating the university and for maintenance.

Since several of the buildings are old, they need constant upkeep and money goes toward that. Story mentioned how out of state students consider UMass a great school, and that students are drawn to it because of Massachusetts' top schools like Harvard and MIT. Graduate students or adjunct professors instead of tenured professors teach many classes. "I just hope the state will realize the value in an excellent public university." Story commented on her future outlook for UMass and its faculty.

Sociology professor and president of the Massachusetts Society of Professors Dan Clawson expressed similar views. He said the Massachusetts legislature must provide additional resources in order to restore its number in faculty.

It is competitive to apply for a professor position at UMass with two hundred applications for one

See FACULTY on page 2

Professor Tilman Wolf, a professor was awarded a $400,00 grant from the National Science Foundation.

ARTS & LIVING
RACE TO THE OSCARS UNDERWAY
This year's Oscar predictions inside.
PAGE 6

EDITORIAL/OPINION
TEXTBOOK RENTAL SYSTEM
UMass administration takes a step in the right direction with rental program.
PAGE 4

WEATHER
TODAY Snow, H35°, L11°
TOMORROW Mostly sunny, H29°, L11°
FRIDAY Partly cloudy, H32, L13

SPORTS
LIKE FATHER
Chris Bourque is emerging from his father's shadow.
PAGE 10

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center
University of Massachusetts
Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief Peter Foundas
Managing Editor Mike Marzelli
Business Manager Rich Pacheco
Production Manager Cory Rosenberg
News Supervisor Meghan Healy
Academic Manager Tiffany Sagalski
Editorial Production Samantha M. Nielsen
Arts & Living Editor Michael Basack
Features Editor Alyson Zilmann
Editorial Editor Yousef Munayyer
Editorial Editor Allison Edles
Sports Editor Erika Lovley
Photo Editor Alex Demosthene
Sports Editor Bob McGovern
Circulation Manager Kristen Weiss
Classified Advertising Marty Pappas
Distribution Manager Josh Kiggans
Finance Manager Heidi Shah
Advertising Coordinator Virginie Frecaut
Human Resources Sandra Marquez
Assistant Coordinator Linda Wallish
Assistant Advertising Josh Greenberg
Assistant Business Nathan Chomsky
Assistant Finance Thomas Hecht
Advertising Production Rachael Bruno
Graphic Artist Charlie Higgins
Assistant Arts & Living Matthew O'Rourke
Assistant Arts & Living Chris Guttuso
Assistant News Julie O'Donnell
Assistant News Dan O'Brien
Assistant Photo Megan Brimster
Assistant Sports Jeff Howe

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts academic year. The Collegian is printed daily on Saturday, Sunday, and holidays that fall before academic classes begin. The Collegian is published by the Massachusetts Daily Collegian Corporation in 1974 and the Editorial Corporation in 1976. Periodicals postage paid at Amherst, MA 01002. The Collegian also publishes a weekly magazine, Bluestocking, and a yearbook, Index. For information call 545-3500 or visit www.dailycollegian.com.

Production Crew
On staff today

Night Editor
Meghan Healy

Photo Technician
Andrew Tanakanas

Copy Editor
Matthew Reed

Production Supervisor
Cory Rosenberg

Production Staff
Nate Freedman, Josh Wessner

Correction

In yesterday's Hunter Thompson article we incorrectly identified Johnny Depp as Benecio Del Toro and vice versa.

Also, the Spike Lee speech was put on by Student Activities, not the Student Government.

Massive quake kills hundreds

By Nasser Karimi
Associated Press

A massive earthquake leaves rubble and severe damage to Iranian villages. The quake is to blame for more than 400 deaths.

SARBAGH, Iran — Under a cold, driving rain, survivors wailed over the bodies of the dead and dug through the ruins of mud-brick houses searching for their loved ones after a powerful earthquake flattened villages in central Iran on Tuesday, killing at least 420 people.

The toll was expected to rise, because rescue teams did not have a final count from the three most isolated villages in the mountainous region. About 30,000 people were affected, many left homeless when some villages were reduced to piles of dirt and stone by the magnitude-6.4 earthquake. The number of injured was estimated at 900.

"Where have you gone? I had a lot of plans for you," Hossein Golestani sang softly as he held the lifeless form of his 7-year-old daughter, Fatima. The body of his 8-year-old daughter, Mariam, lay beside him in the devastated village of Hotkan.

Golestani and his wife were out tending their herd of goats when the quake struck at 5:55 a.m., wrecking their home.

Other survivors slapped their faces in grief as they sat next to the dead, who were wrapped in blankets in hospital morgues or on roadsides.

Some 40 villages were damaged in the quake, which struck a region 150 miles from Bam, site of a devastating earthquake in December 2003 that killed 26,000 people and leveled the historic city.

At dusk, temperatures fell and rain turned to snow in parts of the mountains, and survivors huddled around fires to keep warm, covering themselves in blankets and sipping hot soup. Some 1,500 workers from the Iranian Red Crescent fanned out in teams, bringing tents and tarps.

Heavy rain and bad visibility hampered relief efforts. But Mohammad Javad Fadaei, deputy governor of Kerman province, said the search would continue through the night in Hotkan and two other villages, Sarbagh and Dahoueieh, which emergency crews had had the most difficulty reaching. Rescue efforts were finished in other villages, he told The Associated Press.

The quake was centered on the outskirts of Zarand, a town of 15,000 people in Kerman province about 600 miles southeast of Tehran, Iran's geological authority said.

Though comparable in strength to the 6.6-magnitude Bam quake, Tuesday's temblor hit a more sparsely populated area and was centered far deeper — some 25 miles, compared with six miles for Bam — limiting the damage.

Still, the tiny villages that dot the central mountains — most of them made in fragile mud brick — were hit hard. In Douheieh, every building except a mosque with a golden dome had collapsed. At least 80 percent of the buildings in Sarbagh were leveled.

Fadaei said the death toll stood at 420, with some 900 injured.

Residents of Khanouk village carried bodies to the morgue for washing before burial. Others crowded around lists of the dead posted on the morgue's wall, breaking into cries if they found a relative's name.

"I lost everything. All my life is gone," sobbed Asghar Owkli, 60, his face bandaged. His wife and two children were killed.

Residents dug with bare hands and shovels in the hope of a finding family members alive. Bulldozers moved in later, along with rescue teams and helicopters, but most of those uncovered were already dead.

Iran's elite Revolutionary Guards and Red Crescent teams provided the survivors with bottled water, bread and canned food.

The Iranian Red Crescent told international relief officials it did not need outside aid, said Roy Probert, a spokesman for the Geneva-based International Federation of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies.

Fadaei said Iran will not issue a plea for aid, but "if foreign countries volunteer their help, we'll take tents, blankets, cash and earth-moving machinery."

Iranian relief officials said they were benefiting from their experience in the Bam quake, which prompted one of the biggest international relief efforts ever.

"The earthquake in 2003 gave us a very good experience of how to deal with such a natural disaster. Despite the rain, relief operations are going smoothly. Relief teams have reached the villages and are helping the survivors," said Mostafa Soltani, a spokesman for the Kerman government.

Iran is located on seismic fault lines and is prone to earthquakes. It experiences at least one slight earthquake every day on average.

Professor awarded $400,000 grant

GRANT from page 1

Wolf's research will additionally entail "managing to figure out how to build a run-time environment for network processing," said Wolf. Such an operating system will make it possible for future technologies and applications to be created and utilized.

The grant that Wolf received was given through the CAREER program. The program recognizes and supports the early career development activities of teacher-scholars who are most likely to become the academic leaders of the 21st century, according to NSF.

"This is a very important grant for Professor Wolf to receive," said Professor Seshu Desu, Head of the Electrical and Computer Engineering Department. "The [CAREER] grant is only given to people early in their career, and only one out of about 30 people gets it. It is great because he can push the boundaries of his research," Desu continued.

Through Wolf's research and the grant he received, Desu went on to mention that the "level of prestige increases for the department as well as for his career. His research will help solve the problem of network congestion, which is something students can all relate to."

The level of student interest in the department and the fields it covers will increase as a result of Wolf's research. "Professor Wolf's research will also explore how to improve services within the network. Students will see an improvement as a result of [his] research," said Desu.

During the five years Wolf will be conducting his research, he will have a number of students working with him. "I will be the sole professor, with two PhD students and maybe one part time student," said Wolf. "The amount of time we will be working on our research allows time for the students to develop their own research as well."

According to a press release, as more and more services are added to the Internet, the kind of research Wolf is conducting represents a necessary step in making the Internet work properly while handling mushrooming applications effectively, accurately and securely.

UMass professors declining in number position. "People we hire usually have four or five other job offers," Clawson said. Students have to take larger classes and cannot take requirements. When full-time faculty members are replaced with part-time, students cannot get recommendations. "People come to the university because they want not only great teachers but excellent scholars," said Clawson. He articulated an immediate need for first-rate professors.

FACULTY from page 1

"If people sit back and just hope we will see a decline," Clawson said on the outlook for UMass. "Parents, faculty, alumni, and board of trustees must be involved. The legislature is not the only factor, but still important." Since 1984 there have been only five separate years in which the number of faculty has risen, according to Clawson.

According to the press release, Provost Charlena Seymour says 40 percent of teachers are not permanent faculty. Twenty years ago full-time faculty taught the majority of students. Even though the number of part-time teachers has increased by 68 percent since 1994, tenured faculty has dramatically decreased.

Bush disputed lifting of arms in China

By Terence Hunt
Associated Press

BRUSSELS, Belgium — President Bush and European leaders settled simmering differences about Iraq but plunged into a troublesome new dispute Tuesday over the lifting of an arms embargo against China. Bush warned Congress might retaliate if Europe revokes the 15-year ban.

Bush said lifting the embargo, imposed after the bloody 1989 Tiananmen Square crackdown on pro-democracy activists, "would change the balance of relations between China and Taiwan and that's of concern." But French President Jacques Chirac and German Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder said the ban should go. "It will happen," Schroeder said.

The China quarrel was a jarring note on an otherwise upbeat day of reconciliation, handshakes and hopes for better relations.

"First time I've been called charming in a while," Bush said after a NATO summit. He also met with leaders of the 25-nation European Union. "Europe and America have reconnected." EU Commission President Jose Manuel Barroso said afterward, Bush at his side, at a news conference.

In a show of unity after bitter disputes, all 26 countries in NATO pledged money, equipment or personnel to train Iraqi security forces, though many of the pledges were modest.

Estonia said it would send one staff officer to Iraq, and $65,000. France offered one officer to help mission coordination at NATO headquarters, said it would train 1,500 Iraqi military police in Qatar outside NATO's mission.

"The NATO training mission is an important mission, because after all, the success of Iraq depends upon the capacity and the willingness of the Iraqis to defend their own selves against terrorists," Bush said. "Every contribution matters."

The European Union and the United States, meanwhile, agreed to jointly host a conference to rally and coordinate international aid to Iraq.

Consulting with his harshest critics on Iraq, Bush met with Chirac over dinner Monday night, will travel to Germany on Wednesday to visit with Schroeder and meets Russian President Vladimir Putin on Thursday in Slovakia. Chirac said America's attitude is becoming "more realistic ... It is progress."

President Bush disputes with European leaders about lifting arms in China.

Bush's broad unpopularity in Europe because of the U.S.-led invasion was evident in the protests on the streets of Brussels. Police targeted demonstrators with water cannons Tuesday, after protesters, which numbered in the hundreds, threw a fire bomb and glass bottles at them near the European Union headquarters.

UMass faculty backs textbook rentals

TEXTBOOKS from page 1

ing of publishers decisions to declare editions 'outdated' and issue new editions."

The proposed textbook rental program would be attempted in four to six representative classes that the committee believes could produce successes. The proposed pilot system would require professors and Follett to collaborate in order to gauge the viability of the rental program on a campus-wide scale. The committee on textbook affordability would provide oversight and receive reports to determine the pilot program's potential for success.

"Last fall we went to the Faculty Senate and asked for their support and said that no matter how they are going to provide savings for students regarding textbooks; one of the fundamental things needed is a two or three year commitment to use the same books," Bustamante said.

In order to sway uncertain faculty members and students, the committee has realized that a six-semester trial of the system is necessary. The Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy has been commissioned by the committee on textbook affordability "to synthesize survey data from professors and students each semester and compare it with data collected by the administration with regard to Follett's current pricing policies."

Recently, Joyce M. Hatch, the vice chancellor for administration and finance here at UMass, received a report from Campus Bookstore Consulting that runs contrary to the opinions of SGA officials and students. According to the CBC report, "Follett Higher Education offers students prices that are more favorable compared to many university bookstores nationally."

Interestingly enough, the CBC report also mentions the textbook rebate program that is presently implemented by Follett. A five percent rebate is available for students at the end of each semester. However, in fiscal year 2004 students rebate totals were roughly $320,561; amazingly, only $14,536, roughly 5 percent, was ever returned to students last year.

"I've never heard anything about a rebate program," says David Brown, a senior communications major at UMass. Although the rebate program that is in place appears to ease costs; Follett needs to be more proactive in advertising potential savings to the students who would benefit from them.

Additionally the CBC report claims that, "the majority of colleges and universities do not offer," textbook rental programs, "current conditions in the textbook market make it difficult" to impose student participation, in a book rental system that requires unanimous support.

However, Bustamante feels that the CBC report fails to recognize that other universities are experiencing the same exorbitant textbooks costs as the University of Massachusetts, "We are responding because of an indifference to rising textbook costs by the university," Bustamante said.

Hedges, a Dean's Book author, will speak to students

HEDGES from page 1

"like a drug, a very dangerous addiction ... my ultimate meaning does not come with that."

Hedges wrote an article entitled, "On War" for The New York Times Review of Books, discussing two books about the war in Iraqi. He wrote that they "resist the narcissism that often infects such accounts of war." When asked if his book also avoided this pitfall he noted that "journalists will dine out on the myth of war and the myth about themselves as war correspondents." Hedges considers his book to be more of an anti-memoir, "if I bring my self into that book," he said, "it is to illustrate a fault, a personal failing."

Hedges has been criticized for painting Israel in a negative light in the book. He responded to this with a bit of indignation. Many of these claims spawn from a section of the book in which Hedges wrote about Israeli snipers baiting and then murdering Palestinian children. This was one of the more disgusting things that Hedges said he saw; "I think that criticism is unfair" Hedges said, claiming that he was reporting facts; facts that he can prove and facts that he himself was a witness to.

Allusions are prevalent throughout the book, including authors such as Shakespeare, Virgil, Cicero, Homer and Catullus. Hedges used these references flawlessly to illustrate his points and show other examples though history. Homer's "The Iliad," the story about the ten-year-long siege of Troy, could have been written about the war in Bosnia, according to Hedges.

His knowledge about the classics stems from his schooling; Hedges studied Greek while receiving his Master of Divinity from Harvard University.

He immersed himself in Latin texts after the Persian Gulf War before he went to Sarajevo. The ancient writings have helped him cope — in the last pages of the book Hedges wrote that the "words give me a balm to my grief, a momentary solace, a little understanding." in reference to a poem by Catullus.

Hedges lecture is designed for an adult audience, not necessarily students. He does however admonish college students to pay close attention to the war in Iraq because he said that our government is looking to regain control of the areas lost to the rebels.

According to Hedges, the only way to do this is to significantly increase the size of the combat force, and since recruitment is down he does not see any way of accomplishing this without initiating the draft.

Cigarette companies cut youth smoking

By Hilary Rose
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A nationwide ad campaign funded largely by the tobacco industry has helped cut youth smoking rates, a study by a health journal estimates. But anti-smoking advocates say money for such campaigns is drying up.

The American Legacy Foundation's "truth" campaign prevented about 300,000 youths from becoming smokers between 2000 and 2002, according to a study to be released Wednesday in the March edition of the American Journal of Public Health.

That's about 22 percent of the total decline in youth smoking over the period, the study found.

But the foundation, which operates an independent nationwide campaign against youth smoking, is running low on money at the same time state legislatures cut into the amount they spend on anti-smoking campaigns.

Tobacco companies agreed to pay into a fund that contributes to the "truth" campaign as part of the $206 billion settlement reached with 46 states in 1998. But the agreement allowed companies to stop paying after five years if their market share was below 99 percent.

With small manufacturers gaining a foothold in the market, tobacco giants have likely already made their last payment, said foundation president Cheryl Healton.

The public health journal study looked at surveys of 8th, 10th and 12th graders conducted annually between 1997 and 2002, measured their exposure to the campaign and accounted for factors like race, gender and income to determe the effect of the ads, which often feature teens publicly questioning tobacco companies.

The surveys showed 28 percent of teens smoked in 1997, and just 18 percent did in 2002, and the study credits the campaign with 22 percent of that drop. Researchers found the prevalence of teen smoking was falling before the campaign began, but the rate at which it fell increased dramatically after "truth" ads began.

"Those truth campaign ads are the MTV of the public health world. They really get to these kids," said Joseph A. Califano Jr., President Carter's health secretary and chairman of Citizens' Commission to Protect the Truth, a group of former high-level health officials that advocates for programs designed to end youth smoking.

The foundation was not the only group trying to stop kids from lighting up. Some states launched efforts to curb youth smoking in the early 1990s, and others followed suit with their portions of the 1998 settlement.

Certain tobacco companies have made efforts to cut youth smoking.

However, state lawmakers are increasingly cutting into the money available for anti-smoking programs. Programs in Florida and Massachusetts that were once held up as national models saw their budgets slashed in recent years, and Mississippi's governor wants to use $20 million earmarked for an anti-tobacco group on the state Medicaid program.

Youth smoking is at a 28-year low, but campaign organizers said it might not stay that way without countering tobacco companies' consistent messages. In 2002, tobacco companies spent $12.5 billion to promote their products in the United States alone, Healton said.

By contrast, the foundation spent $58.9 million on the "truth" campaign last year, and gave another $37.8 million in grants.

"It's a David versus Goliath alchemy," Healton said. "In view of that, it's amazing we've had any impact."

UMassAmherst Student Activities Center
UP TO THE MINUTE

February 23
International Movie Series
Unknown Pleasures directed by Jia Zhang-Ke
Two unemployed slackers try to make sense of their aimless, uncertain futures.
Campus Center 163C 8pm FREE

February 24
Dance Expose
Performance by student dance teams: Cayena, Stage Crew Dance Team, Dynamic Motion, Flava Unit, Umass Dance Team, Hip Hop Culture Organization, Alliance Garotas do Samba, and the award winning Ballroom Dance Team.
Bowker Auditorium 7pm FREE

February 25
Something Every Friday
Ladder 49 with John Travolta
Campus Center 163C 9pm FREE

February 27
Sunday Night Movie
Ladder 49 with John Travolta
Campus Center Room 163C 8pm FREE

March 1
Gender Theory/ Queer Theory
A talk by Kirstin Effland, on how to translate theory into activism.
Bring your lunch- drinks and desserts free.
Stonewall Center 12pm

Senior Photo Sessions for the 2005 yearbook, The Best of U, begin March 1. Log onto WWW.OURYEAR.COM (school acess code #147) or call 1-800-OUR-YEAR (687-9327). Sittings are only $5.00.

UMass Amherst Calendar of Events: www.umass.edu/studentsfirst

LIGHT presents
Rascal Flatts
HERE'S TO YOU TOUR 2005
This Saturday!
with special guest Blake Shelton
"FEELS LIKE TODAY" » IN STORES NOW
Great Seats Still Available!
Saturday, February 26 at 8 PM
ticketmaster (413) 733-2500
MULLINS CENTER
UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS AMHERST
Joe Fletcher Presents
Tickets are available at the Mullins Center Box Office

COURTESY STUDENT GOVERNMENT ASSOCIATION
Students pose last fall after leaving the textbook annex.

No Cals Last Call No Carbs
with hangover & nutritional drink
No Hangover
All-Natural Anti-Hangover & Nutritional Drink
Last Call is available now at
Liquors 44, Four Season's Liquors, Stoney's Pub, Holyoke Liquor Mart, Pop's Liquors, R&P Liquors and Niedbala's.
Ask for it at your favorite bar and restaurant
Campus Rep Opportunities Available, Call for more information
Distributed By Baystate Beverage Distributors Westfield MA 413-642-0150
Please Drink Responsibly

COMPARE AND SAVE
ROUND 2
StudentUniverse.com
-vs-
Student Travel in Amherst
StudentUniverse.com book flights online any time
DING!
Those Other Companies wait in book in line every time
Round Trip to London: $391
COMPARE AND SAVE
Round Trip to London: $423
StudentUniverse.com

Want to be a writer?
Want to write for news?
Do it, c'mon, Do IT!
news@dailycollegian.com

STSTRAVEL.COM
Join America's #1 Student Travel Operator
CANCUN ACAPULCO JAMAICA BAHAMAS FLORIDA
SPRING BREAK 2005
Sell Trips, Earn Cash & Travel Free
1-800-648-4849 www.ststravel.com

STUDENT TRAVEL
MAKE YOUR BREAK
Spring Break '05
Beach
»Cancun $709 Air + 1 week at Club Verano Beat, located on the beach
»Jamaica $719 Air + 1 week at the Fun Holiday Beach Resort, located on the beach
Europe
»Amsterdam $432 Air + 6 nights at the Bulldog Hostel near central station
»Paris $515 Air + 6 nights at the Aloha Hostel
Alternative
»Costa Rica $688 Air + 6 nights at San Jose / Manuel Antonio
»Montreal $511 Air + 1 week at HI Montreal
Packages include roundtrip airfare from Boston and/or New York and accommodations. Subject to change and availability. Taxes and other applicable fees not included
STA TRAVEL
(413) 256.1261
www.statravel.com

WIN $10,000
QUALIFYING EVENT
THURSDAY, MAR 3
6:00 PM
CURRY HICKS CAGE
CO-ED CHAMPIONSHIP
SATURDAY, MAR 5
2:00 PM
MULLINS CENTER
FREE to STUDENTS
Free: Food, Drinks, t-shirts and more...
3 Divisions Male, Female & Co-Ed
Win Airline Tickets!
Firestone GMAC Pontiac US AIRWAYS XBOX
WWW.ATLANTIC10.ORG/SHOOTOUT
or visit the Intramural office for more details
COLLEGIAN FUZE SPALDING

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 2005

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." -Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Administration's supporting textbook solution welcome

Having recently received support from the University of Massachusetts administration, the textbook rental system proposed by the Student Government Association is now one step closer to becoming a reality. Finally, after many months of quibbling over textbook prices, a realistic solution is being presented to the student body, one that will hopefully alleviate the burden of heavy textbook prices.

This has been an issue that has been plaguing the student body, as well as been weighing over the heads of the administration, for a very long time. Additionally, the issue has been tossed around incessantly, but never coming to a viable conclusion that solves the problem. Now, only waiting on eFollet for approval and support, students can look forward to having some peace of mind.

Currently, students have very few options when it comes to purchasing textbooks. Many professors have tried to alleviate the cost somewhat by using smaller, independent book stores to order books through. In doing so, this manages to save the students a few dollars, but not nearly enough.

Many student organizations have tried to do their part to alleviate the pressures of textbook costs on the students or, at least, have attempted to increase awareness of the problem. And because it is such a student-centered issue, it only makes sense for groups such as MassPIRG and the SGA to take such a strong stance behind it. Given the administration's tendency to walk all over the student body, it is very comforting to see that students are finally coming first.

The fact that this is currently being resolved and has not come to a solution meeting all parties' standards earlier is unacceptable. Students have a reputation of being considered on a pretty low rung on the social ladder at UMass. Taking a step back, we have had to pay more money each semester to attend this university.

And, with regards to UMass professors, students have been having less access to a wide range of experienced teachers and mentors as many have been retiring. Consequently, more and more students find themselves being taught by graduate students in classes where a full degree-bearing professor should be lecturing. Also, due to recent budget cuts, some departments, such as the Journalism department, have been forced to merge with others, such as the Communications department, in order to stay afloat. These mergers, also, have no doubt, contributed to the change in available professors. Because of such alterations, many classes, which were once small, intimate discussion classes, have now become huge lectures where the student becomes a number once again.

In light of all these hardships the students have to endure, this is one small, well-earned victory in a sea of disputes with the administration. It is certainly a refreshing sight to see that, for once, students' rights are being placed at the center of the issue, rather than the money we're worth.

Unsigned editorials represent the majority opinion of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian Editorial Board.

Putting the 'miss' in missile

Andrew Freeman

What costs billions of dollars, sometimes flies and can't hit a thing?

National Missile Defense, the most ludicrous Pentagon idea since the bedbug detector (a long pole with bedbugs in it, deployed in Vietnam to try to detect enemy soldiers). To give an example of how impossible the concept is, consider the following example.

You are in a baseball stadium, standing in the center of the field, with a ball in your hand. A ball is hurled from one side to the other, and in the middle of its arc through the air you throw your ball at it, attempting to hit it. It would be almost impossible. Now substitute these balls for space-bound missiles and the stadium for the planet and you've got a glimpse of our proposed-missile defense shield.

National Missile Defense, or NMD, evolved from the infamous Reagan administration Strategic Defense Initiative, which sought to protect the U.S. by arming satellites with lasers to shoot down nuclear missiles. Apropos, the concept was referred to as "Star Wars," and it went nowhere because the technology was not available to pursue it. After Soviet Russia collapsed and its threat abated, research continued in missile defense, now with the goal of derailing a rogue state's nuclear weapon, or a missile that was accidentally launched, rather than stopping hundreds of them.

The nuclear threat that NMD attempts to handle is the intercontinental

Ballistic Missile, or ICBM, which can carry multiple nuclear warheads and moves at over 10,000 mph. A single ICBM can instantly destroy many targets in nearly any part of the world, reaching its target in tens of minutes. The concern is in particular that North Korea, which declared on Feb. 10 that it possessed nuclear weapons, would fire an ICBM at the United States.

The North Koreans have Taep'o-dong 2 missiles that are already capable of reaching Alaska and Hawaii, not to mention the East Asian capitials of Beijing, Tokyo and Seoul, and they are developing ICBMs with a longer range as well. Estimates among U.S. intelligence agencies on the number of nuclear bombs in North Korea range from three to 15, but whatever the number, they pose a clear threat to the region and world.

While American soldiers are dying in Iraq because the Pentagon failed to purchase enough armor for their vehicles, in fiscal year 2005 $9 billion was appropriated to the National Missile Defense program.

The National Missile Defense program seeks to address this threat by developing interceptor missiles that will hit an ICBM directly and destroy it in the upper atmosphere.

Unfortunately, the system will not work. There have been 10 tests so far, with the most recent test in February failing when the interceptor failed to launch; the five successes are not reliable because of major flaws in the testing program.

The website of the nonprofit Union of Concerned Scientists lists ten problems in the tests' methodology. These include advance knowledge provided to the defending team of every aspect of the test, from the attacking missile's trajectory to the intercept location; and a radar beacon placed on the target that allows it to be easily tracked, among others. Moreover, there are no provisions in the system for dealing with countermeasures North Korea might easily put on ICBMs, such as balloon decoys that accompany the warhead and look the same in space, attracting interceptors while the real warhead is hidden.

Nevertheless, the NMD system is being deployed, months behind schedule, and at the cost of billions of dollars. While American soldiers are dying in Iraq because the Pentagon failed to purchase enough armor for their vehicles, in fiscal year 2005 $9 billion was appropriated to the NMD program, according to the Missile Defense Agency.

While decades from now a NMD system might be able to handle incoming ICBMs, at present it cannot; moreover, North Korea's nuclear arsenal poses other threats. Other rogue nations such as Syria and Iran could purchase North Korean nukes, not to mention terrorist groups like Al Qaeda. A far simpler and sneakier way of attacking the US would be to put a nuclear bomb on a boat and detonate it in any major American port. NMD would have no chance of stopping such an attack, or any terrorist attack.

In the end, North Korea's nuclear threat must be dealt with either through negotiations or armed conflict — it is not possible to neutralize it.

Negotiations are a poor option, having failed repeatedly in the past, but war is far worse — North Korea has an army of over one million men, in addition to its nuclear weaponry, guaranteeing heavy casualties if we attack.

Whatever course we choose to take, NMD will not be able to protect us.

Andrew Freeman is a Collegian columnist.

No yellow ribbons here

Thomas Naughton

Guilt can only weigh on a person's mind for so long before they crave the act of purgation; to get the weighty feelings of shame and responsibility out of the mind — or at least the guilty parties attempt to find some kind of peace if they cannot rid themselves of a screaming conscience that implicates and indicts its possessor.

That said, perhaps some readers will understand why my friends and I rip yellow ribbon "support the troops" magnets off of cars or wherever people have affixed them. By ripping off these ribbons, we find a way to deal with our guilt, as though with each ribbon swiped we take back a life that was taken by this senseless war started by our senseless president and those who support him.

I will never say, "support the troops." I don't believe in the validity of that statement. People say, "I don't support the war, I support the troops" as though you can actually separate the two. You cannot; the troops are a part of the war, they have become the war and there is no valid dissection of the two. Other people shout with glaring eyes that we should give up our politics, give up our political affiliations in favor of "just supporting the troops." I wish everything were that easy.

What they really mean is that we should just give up our will, give up our identities, give up our voices to those in power. Perhaps that's just the way people aligned with the right wing choose to get rid of their guilt: blindness and ignorance.

I listen to talk radio very often. It's important to know who your enemies are. The pundits on the radio are the pinnacles of guiltless, shameless wonders, and I am jealous. It must feel good to believe without question, to benefit from the blind belief of young men and women who chose to join the armed forces, to sit in a radio studio in New York and admonish the public to give in like the troops, to just follow orders, to live as just a number that will soon be etched into a gravestone that no one will ever see.

I look into the cars of people with "support the troops" ribbons as I speed past, trying to find some trace of recognition on their face, recognition of their guilt and the fact that they have given up. I usually see nothing; just a mouth moving robotically, singing the pop hits of today or the contemporary country wine of fake cowboys who share a lot with George Bush: no shame.

We say, 'support the troops' so that we won't feel guilty about saying 'no' to war. We reason that if we say that we support the troops, somehow we aren't monsters for not saying a word when the death tolls of U.S. soldiers climbed above 1,000.

We say, "support the troops" so that we won't feel guilty about saying "no" to war. We reason that if we say that we support the troops, somehow we aren't monsters for not saying a word when the death tolls of U.S. soldiers climbed above 1,000. Those ribbons are yellow for a reason, they are not the mark of armed forces support, they are the mark of cowards.

Pundits on the radio advise their cowardly listeners to approach men and women in army uniforms and say "thank you." I cannot do that. Every time I pass a person in uniform I look long and hard at them and all I can think inside to say is "I'm so sorry." I want to apologize to them, to their families and to their friends. I feel sorry that we, the people, couldn't control our own government at the outset of this conflict when most of us knew deep inside that it was a mistake.

Where are we now? Are we in a better place? Is the world safer for democracy? No, it is not safer and we are not in a better place. In this war that we are fighting to somehow avenge the deaths of the Sept. 11 tragedy, we have amassed a field of body bags, the number of which almost matches the number killed in the terrorist attacks four years ago. Now, we stare at yet another request for barrels of money for this war by President Bush, while people in our own country search fruitlessly for jobs to feed their starving families, while every public school gets left behind, while our elderly are ensured an uncertain future of unpaid medical bills.

I guess we shouldn't think about those things though, right? We should just buy a yellow magnet and slap it on the butt of our car so we can sleep at night and just let our government do whatever they want. That's supporting the troops, right?

Two years ago my friend Eric called me out of the blue after almost five years of silence between us. We were in a band together when we were teenagers and he had joined the army around the time I was graduating from high school. He had to join the army; he had a son to provide for in the grand tradition of many young members of the armed forces. He called me to tell me that he was going back to Iraq, against his will. He was so sad and angry and scared. He didn't say it but I know he was calling to tell me that he might die. I didn't say it to him then, but I felt such overwhelming guilt that I couldn't do anything to keep him from going back.

I haven't heard from him since. I don't know if he's dead, and my guilt is alive and well. I hope that all of our family members in harm's way return alive. Until then, I can really honor their sacrifice by demanding that it finally comes to an end.

Thomas Naughton is a Collegian columnist.

Library etiquette encouraged

S.J. Port

In any hour of any given day of the academic year students flow in and out of the library. It is where we as students find answers, more questions, space from our roommates, silence from our parents and books by our professors.

A good library is the base of a student's academic career, especially at large universities such as the University of Massachusetts. Your classes may be in different buildings each semester, your residence in a different dormitory hall or a frat house, but the resources we seek generally lie in one fixed area: the library.

At each point of entrance the library posts a general sign stating basic rules of etiquette: turn off cell phones and refrain from eating and drinking. Other rules, however, are implied: keep all noise and conversation to a minimum, do not write in, damage or alter materials in any way shape or form and use computers to write papers — not to communicate via instant message programs.

The library is not a playground, a fashion show or social hour. Take your cell phone conversations out of the building. Take your conversations of any kind, especially the non-academic kind, out of the library.

One student who'd been working quietly disturbed an entire floor of peers when she answered her loudly ringing cell phone and proceeded to walk through the floor to the stairwell area while conversing with the caller at a normal decibel level. After spreading the noise across the floor she continued her conversation in a stairwell ... that echoes. Turn your cell phone on silent, or a single beep. If you must take a call then walk outside of the library or to a bathroom area and call the person back. It is rude to disrupt everyone else's studies by sacrificing the library's silent atmosphere for the sake of your supposedly vital socializing.

The library should be a place free from the obnoxious jingle of cellular phones.

Another group of students would take frequent breaks to show one another pictures in their textbooks and giggle about the image's content. The group would then often break into conversation about this or that ... distracting everyone near them. If you want to discuss a group project, the cute girl you hooked up with last Saturday, or how much the fungus in your textbook looks like the one growing between your roommate's toes, find a floor where you won't disturb others or sign into a private study room — ask your local librarian, she'll know what I'm talking about.

The library is not a playground, a fashion show or social hour. Take your cell phone conversations out of the building. Take your conversations of any kind, especially the non-academic kind, out of the library.

Many students with attention issues find their solace in the library stacks. Hidden away these easily distracted, or privacy-seeking, folks find a place in which to do the primary work of a student: study. Let these fine people do their work. If you see them silently working and know that you will make even the smallest amount of noise: whether it be with your cell-phone, your friends or your crinkling food wrappers and crunching crackers — find another space in which to make your noisy home.

Last spring, upon trekking to the reserve section and renting the necessary tome for the afternoon, I was shocked to recognize a friend and classmate's incorrect penciled-in editorial notations in the article recommended by our professor. Everyone in the class must have gotten a good laugh out of his lame attempt to correct the Nobel Prize winning author's syntax. However, the same fellow's margin comments did help me quickly jump through the dense article to the juicier sections.

Moral of the story: do not write in library books. The chances are your elementary grammatical corrections are incorrect and your comments (obscene or otherwise) are unwanted. Commenting in the margins often distracts future users or, worse, enables people to use your hard work to find the most important sections more quickly.

Finally: take your sexual activity out of the library. We all know some of the literature is either so tedious it inspires chiro-gratification or so inspiring it prompts tawdry interludes, but really, take it outside. If your books make you randy: go home.

A good library brings joy to many students, while to many others it signifies the academic realm they've been suckered into for four years and are struggling to survive in. Either way, it is a holy place of necessity and opportunity. Please, I beg you, whether it be at UMass, Amherst College, Smith, Mount Holyoke or your local library: respect the silence.

S.J. Port is a Collegian columnist.

Write for EdOp.

Send submissions to editorial@dailycollegian.com

Eroding rights of Americans

Aaron R.S. Lorenz

We live in what I have termed a "judging culture." Society is eager to act as judge when given the opportunity. Turn on the television tonight and you will see "American Idol" or "The Apprentice." Sometimes the American people act as a judge after listening to "qualified judges" comment on the singing ability of contestants. Other times a "business mogul" decides what it takes to be a success in the corporate world as the television audience judges the shrewdness of that decision.

We all want to judge. So, when we see an actual judge — a real life judge who hears the everyday cases — we usually take note of their words. To take it even further, when a sitting judge makes public comments on the very issues that he hears on a daily basis, we are even more intrigued by his words.

On Feb. 16, Judge James Gray of the Superior Court of California, Orange County spoke to my Legal Studies class, Law and Personal Freedom. Judge Gray's topic: the drug laws in the United States. Judge Gray is the author of the 2001 book, "Why Our Drug Laws Have Failed and What We Can Do About It: A Judicial Indictment of the War on Drugs." The book is an impeccably researched piece, which outlines the history of drug laws in the U.S., the impact of such laws on our civil rights and liberties and solutions to the current drug policy.

The current drug laws do not work and Judge Gray explains that in detail ... It is a bold pronouncement by a man who has studied the issues for decades on the fate of those that come before his bench.

Judge Gray's words are bold in print and in person, but as he notes, "not controversial." He speaks to audiences throughout the country when he can get away from the bench and describes both liberal and conservative audiences coming to him with the same issue: why have our drug laws failed?

This is not a political issue, nor should it be. This is a rather simple issue. The evidence is there. The current drug laws do not work and Judge Gray explains that in detail. To hear a sitting judge describe that the very circle that he works within is ineffective and failing, and even further that his colleagues at the state and federal level throughout the country agree, is a refreshing sight. It is a bold pronouncement by a man who has studied the issues for decades and decided on the fate of those that come before his bench.

Judge Gray asks his audience to ponder important questions: How do you categorize drugs? Aren't all drugs — including alcohol, caffeine and cigarettes — mind-altering, addictive and sometimes dangerous? Why do we think we will be in better shape in the future with the current drug policy when the past has shown an increase in drug use/abuse/misuse/addiction?

Why does the U.S. think it can be the first country in the history of civilization without some form of mind-altering or addictive drugs? How can we expect the drug laws to be working when we cannot keep drugs out of prisons? He asks us: where is today's Paul Revere?

Legal Studies students recall the case of State v. Mann (1829) in North Carolina. In it, Judge Ruffin of the State Supreme Court decides a case involving a slave who is loaned to a neighbor to perform work.

The neighbor then physically harms that slave and the local prosecutor charges the neighbor with battery. Judge Ruffin's opinion describes the immorality of slavery and the need for its eradication but finds that since the slave is property and not a person, battery cannot be the charge.

He argues that the judge must recognize the power of the slave master over the slave and defers to the Legislature to make those changes within the confines of the law. Those changes came from changing social mores, the Civil War and subsequent fights for civil rights. They came with little help from the legislature but great effort by the people. Judge Gray has delivered his opinion for us in his 288-page book and continued speaking engagements. He is our Paul Revere. We must not disregard his brazen words.

For all of us so intrigued by this "judging culture" we should listen to this sitting judge tell us who the winners are in the current policy. The big time drug dealers win within the current policy. Tearing down Colombian cartels only means than new ones will germinate within hours. The current policy continues to give politicians political capital. Tough talk does not equal smart talk.

Today, a victory in the war on drugs is defined as slowing the pace of defeat. The result is an acceptance of decreased civil liberties in return of ridding of that marijuana dealer. It means more search warrants are approved and more warrants are executed in the name of the war on drugs. It means we ignore 8,000 aspirin overdoses per year or 70,000 alcohol (non-drunk driving) related deaths per year. Yet, that mother of two who transports a package of drugs for her drug dealer boyfriend is given five years in prison and loses custody of her children – ruining three lives.

Rights are being eroded on a daily basis in this country. If Madison, Jefferson, Franklin and Hamilton were alive today, they would take up arms against their government, as outlined in the Declaration of Independence. I do not call for that, nor does Judge Gray. Instead, he argues that education is the solution since education can bring about a change in social mores.

He notes the words of Abraham Lincoln, "prohibition goes beyond the bounds of reason in that it attempts to control a man's appetite by legislation and makes crimes out of the things that are not crimes. A prohibition law strikes a blow at the very principles upon which our government was founded." We should heed both Lincoln and Gray's warning before these liberties are irretrievable.

Aaron R.S. Lorenz is a professor at UMass.

Women's perpetual struggle

Samantha Sharac

Can Virginia Woolf's proclamation, "as a woman I have no country" apply in our contemporary American society? As much as women have gained from the suffrage movement and women's liberation movement, I do believe that women are still considered to be the "other." Women continue to be denied full human rights in the United States and this trend originates from the very beginning of this nation. The Republic of the United States. The denial of women's rights has originated in large part from the Declaration of Independence and biological determinism.

Historically, the ideal American citizen has been of European-American descent, and an upper class male who is also heterosexual, Christian, able-bodied capitalist who will serve and protect the interests of similar citizens. It has taken almost a century from the birth of this nation for black men to be allowed to vote. Women had to wait 144 years since the nation's establishment to be granted the right to vote. But with a right to vote, have women's struggles finally ended?

'Life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness' among women are impossible in the United States. The Declaration of Independence forbids it as well as many advocates who rely on biological determinism as the correct guide path of women and men.

The Constitution was ratified with the nineteenth Amendment, yet the Declaration of Independence remains the same. Women now have the legal right to vote but they are not entitled to "certain unalienable rights ... among these are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness." The Declaration of Independence provide these three rights to "all men," with no mention of women. Now, one may argue that women are legally given these rights as citizens of the United States.

If women were granted these three rights, I doubt that there would be a gender gap in wage earnings, violence against women, unsafe abortions and substantially more women than men in poverty; these ugly realities severely undercut women's right of life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness.

The "rationale" of biological determinism is also responsible for the historic subordination of women. "Life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness" among women are impossible in the United States. The Declaration of Independence forbids it as well as many advocates who rely on biological determinism as the correct guide path of women and men. Because of women reproductive roles, there is still the belief that women's careers should be limited to the home.

Following this logic, why aren't there more public outcries for men to work primarily as fathers? If men are biologically equipped to help create a life, then why are the majority of men working outside of the home?

Why is there a steady increase in deadbeat fathers? Apparently, some fathers are not living up to their biological determinism. If women are biologically inclined to only give birth and raise a family, then why is there a more lenient social opinion in the United States that allows men to be absent and unsupportive of their offspring? Men can fail as fathers but if women consider careers not tied to motherhood, then the biological rhetoric is again postulated.

The common view that women are more emotional and men are more rational has not been substantiated. Society's gender roles encourage females to be more emotional while men are discouraged from any emotional display. Gender role socialization, not biology, plays a part in how we learn to be "masculine" or "feminine." This explanation also applies to men as being more rational.

Traditionally, men have performed well in science and mathematics not because they are biologically endowed to do better in these fields, but rather because they have been encouraged since childhood to be explorers and inventors. For instance, toys such as legos teach the beginning skills of mathematics and science. Women, on the other hand, are traditionally given dolls and dollhouses, which do not introduce skills linked to mathematics and science but promote familiarity with domesticity.

I want to make clear that there is nothing wrong with being domestic. The problem lies when domesticity is socially and culturally enforced to be the only role in the lives of women. There should be a right to choose a career for both men and women.

The absence of women in the Declaration of Independence and the psychological ideology of Freud's "Anatomy is destiny" argue for the concept of biological determinism and create "the natural complementary theory of the sexes." A recent example are the comments made by Harvard University's president Lawrence H. Summers about the innate gender differences between men and women as the major factor that prohibits women from becoming math and science faculty.

The thinking by many people that women are finding it difficult to both care for her family and pursue a career is stereotypical and does not take into account the social, cultural and political gendered differences that still operate. We should better investigate why and to which women we refer.

Samantha Sharac is a Collegian columnist.

SUBMIT A LETTER OR OPINION

editorial@dailycollegian.com | 413-545-3699 | Letters to the Editor 113 Campus Center Amherst, MA 01003

TASERs and police brutality

Todd Hanaburgh

The latest in hotly debated topics here at the University of Massachusetts is the UMPD's decision to buy three TASERs for use by police officers. There are many concerns surrounding this issue, by students and faculty alike. Nation-wide, there have been reports of TASERs linked to as many as 70 deaths. Last week in Chicago, a 14 year-old boy suffered a cardiac arrest, as did a man from Indiana, following TASER stuns in separate incidents — both involving the Chicago Police Department. Ronald Hasse of Cedar Lake, Ind. died following his cardiac arrest on Friday.

Law enforcement officers insist they are indispensable in dealing with individuals who are psychotic or under the influence of illicit drugs that inhibit pain sensation. But are TASERs actually safe? Are they necessary?

In answering this question, I conducted a routine Internet search, employing my favorite search engine. It is interesting to note that most results listed informed me of the class-action lawsuit against TASER International for security fraud against its shareholders. But that is neither here nor there.

Independent report links are available at TASER International's very own website, www.taser.com, and have been submitted by various law enforcement agencies, universities and the U.S. Department of Defense. Most supported the company's claim that the electrical impulse emitted by the device did, in fact do as described — no more, no less — in healthy subjects.

One report, submitted by the British Columbia Office of the Police Complaint Commissioner (OPCC file#2474, Sept. 2004), concluded: "The advanced TASER appears from the manufacturer's data file to be a relatively safe device for immobilizing non-violent offenders. However, these subjects are exposed to a number of immediate risks/potentially fatal dangers operating either just before or just after being apprehended with the aid of the TASER. It would be prudent to routinely observe all 'TASERed' offenders for four-six hours in a suitably equipped hospital emergency department."

What are the "... immediate risks/potentially fatal dangers operating ... just after being apprehended ..." by the TASER?

Immediate dangers can be related to the sudden loss of muscle control produced. Subjects who may be running or even standing still fall helplessly to the ground, unable to shield themselves from injury. The potentially fatal factors can also include the behavior of and or restraint procedures employed by the police officer.

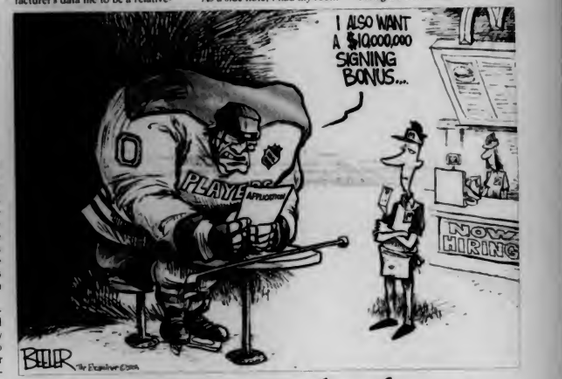
The report refers to a "maximal restraint position" otherwise known as "hog-tying," hands and feet bound together behind the back, with the subject on his/her stomach (the "prone position"). This method of restraint is particularly dangerous when compounded by excited delirium, characterized by extreme exertion, rapid breathing and often hyperthermia (excessively high body temperature).

Those who are apprehended after running from or resisting arrest, individuals suffering a psychotic episode, under the influence of stimulants or other drugs may be particularly vulnerable to these conditions. Gunshot wounds and suicides aside, in many cases of in-custody deaths, excited delirium in combination with the maximal restraint position attributed to the cause of death, according to this same report.

As a side note, I had my roommate hog-tie me in preparation for writing this article, and even at rest the position itself causes difficulty breathing. A police officer is likely to apply his or her own body weight on the subject during the binding procedure, making it even more difficult to breathe.

Disturbingly, out of 3,107 reported uses, 1,844 shocks were sustained for five-second intervals or more. Also, out of the same 3,107 uses, officers administered multiple doses on individual subjects a reported 1,007 times.

According to a Nov. 30, 2004 web-article on the Seattle Post-Intelligencer's Web site, several complaints have been filed against the Seattle Police Dept. for allegedly using TASERs on teens, people who have already been handcuffed, pregnant women and the elderly. According to the Post, one out of three suspects stunned by TASERs were jolted two or more times, and three out of four suspects stunned were unarmed.



Amnesty International reports that police officers are abusing the use of TASERs nationwide, stunning people repeatedly or unnecessarily. Increasingly, it seems to be the case that the TASERs themselves are not inherently dangerous or life threatening, but the persons operating them.

So when will the UMPD use these non-lethal weapons? Will officers whip out the stun guns at the next Southwest riot? Against partygoers at the Hobart Hoe-Down? Will they be used to subdue a student in the midst of an acid-induced psychosis? Will they know when to stop?

The active question in the debate should be, "Do we trust the UMPD to use TASERs properly, and only when necessary?"

My answer is, "No."

Todd Hanaburgh is a Collegian columnist.

Cavemen are the future

Kenny Mulligan

Whitney Houston once said "I believe the children are the future." But George Carlin once said, "f the children." And I make it an point every day to say, "f Whitney Houston." With all this to consider, I find myself carrying the following mentality: The children are not our future; rather it is the cavemen to whom we must look for much needed guidance.

For a while, it was pirates who were the subjects of the public's ever-obtrusive eye. Ninjas then grappling-hooked their way to the top of the latter. I still feel they were a bit overrated.

But, a couple of months ago, my friend suggested that cavemen might be "the next hip thing." I said, "Well, one can only pray, I suppose." And sure enough, we looked at the television and it was playing a Geico commercial. I'm sure you know the one of which I speak, as it featured cavemen. But these weren't the cavemen to which the general masses are accustomed. These cavemen were fed up with the constant propagation of the myth of the simple-minded caveman.

... The main reason why cavemen are the future is simple. Cavemen will outlast all. They can survive anything. When the bombs drop and the new Ice Age commences, it will be the cavemen who are frozen into blocks of ice, only to be unfrozen 3,000 years later.

Hollywood has seen many successful cavemen, and I'm not talking about the Flintstones, nor am I talking about Ringo Starr or Brendan Fraser. They only imitated bigoted stereotypes of cavemen. They were the Amos and Andy of cavemen. I'm talking about the Ultimate Warriors, the Nick Noltes, and the Hillary Swanks. Oh, and there was the deformed guy from that movie, Mask. I think his name was Cher.

But these newer cavemen are different. They fight to usher in a new age of cave thought and cave reasoning. And we must help them. We must cast aside these retrogressive stereotypes and open our arms to our caveman brothers and sisters.

People typically look down on cavemen for their shabby cavemen garbs. But we've got it all wrong. That was thousands of years ago. If you took a modern cavemen to an exhibit at a museum that showed what they wore back then, he would slap himself. He would have the same reaction that people have to pictures of themselves wearing parachute pants. "Oh man, what was Ugg thinking. Ugg was such a tool. Ugg embarrassed." "Don't worry, man," I would say to Ugg. "I once had those shoes with those useless little red lights in the heals." And then Ugg would be all, "Wow! Ugg think you are sad like Wooly Mammoth who fall into tar pit."

This brings up another point. Cavemen are badass. If we get hungry, we eat food that was purchased at a store. Or we go somewhere where it is prepared for us. And, more often than not, we'll even pick up a phone and sit on our butts while the food comes to us. Did cavemen do that? No freaking way was it that easy. They'd all be sitting around their cave after an exhausting and vigorous day of inventing wheels and discovering fire, and one caveman would be all like, "Hey, are you guys hungry?" Obviously, the others would reply positively. "Alright. Let's go kill a mammoth." A freaking mammoth! Can you believe that?! That is insane!

But in the end, the main reason why cavemen are the future is simple. Cavemen will outlast all. They can survive anything. When the bombs drop and the new Ice Age commences, it will be the cavemen who are frozen into blocks of ice, only to be unfrozen 3,000 years later.

They will be like prophets who teach the cyborg-laser-people of man's past mistakes. As a result, they will be hoisted into clergy positions of high spiritual power. All future-cyborg-laser-people will look to them for their wisdom and guidance.

In 3,000 years, the Earth will finally find peace, only following total destruction. The new civilization will be the hyper-neuron-future-cyborg-laser-people. And their leaders will be the cavemen. The cavemen are our future.

Yet, unfortunately, I find my own argument to be slightly imperfect. That imperfection is that cavemen don't exist anymore. However, if they did, many would agree that to be the most awesome thing ever.

Kenny Mulligan is a UMass student.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 2005 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

STARS RACE FOR OSCAR

Brilliance

By Joe Piedrafite
Collegian Staff

Will "The Aviator" soar or will "Million Dollar Baby" be a knock-out? Less than a week to go before Hollywood's big night, and the crystal ball is cloudier than years past. Why? There are a plethora of answers, but the most logical answer is that there is no epic this year, a la "Lord of the Rings," "Gladiator" or "Titanic."

It's mostly smaller films that have made the cut this year, and the bigger budget epics have failed to find an audience in Hollywood. That's not to say that the nominated films are sub-par; very much the contrary. The years Oscar race boasts some of the most praised performances in recent memory, making picking a winner all the harder.

Martin Scorsese's "The Aviator" picked up field best 11 nominations, including Best Picture, Actor, Supporting Actress and Director. The boxing drama "Million Dollar Baby" took home seven nominations, including Best Picture, Director and acting nods for its three leads. The fantasy "Finding Neverland" also picked up seven nominations, including Best Picture and a second consecutive nod for Johnny Depp, for his portrayal of J.M. Barrie. The smash bio-pic "Ray" landed six nominations, including Best Picture and one for Jamie Foxx, in the years most talked-about performance. And rounding out the top is the quirky "Sideways," which took home five nominations, including Best Picture, Supporting Actor, Supporting Actress, Director and Adapted Screenplay.

The critics and precursor awards have been all over the place, making a frontrunner for the categories extremely difficult, never mind trying to pick a winner, but here goes:

Best Picture comes down to a three-horse race, "The Aviator," "Million Dollar Baby" and "Sideways." Early in December, the critics nearly fell over themselves for "Sideways," giving it awards left and right. Scorsese's "The Aviator" opened on Christmas, and then it seemed like it was the one to beat. In January "The Aviator" and "Sideways" took the top prizes at the Golden Globes and "The Aviator" was named Best Picture by the PGA. Then Warner Bros. quietly released "Million Dollar Baby" in a few theaters in the last weeks of 2004, and eventually rolled it out across the country in the coming weeks. Clint Eastwood won the DGA for his direction of "Baby ," and it seems to be a film that is resonating not only with critics but also with audiences. "Baby" peaked at just the right time, and now seems unstoppable on its quest for Oscar glory. PREDICTION: "Million Dollar Baby"

Best Actor category is the closest thing to a lock as there is this year. One name has been on Hollywood's lips since last October, and that's Jamie Foxx. While the other nominees give extremely moving performances (Cheadle's and Eastwood especially), they'll unfortunately have to sit this one out. The only actor who could possibly dethrone Foxx (and that's a small possibly) is Eastwood. Eastwood has earned a lot of respect in the Academy and his performance of grizzled boxing trainer Frankie is nothing short of a revelation. Think Adrien Brody's upset in 2002 for "The Pianist" big if this upset happens. But Mr. Foxx, you better get some new material ready for that acceptance speech. If anyone other than Foxx wins, I'll be floored. PREDICTION: Jamie Foxx — "Ray"

The Best Actress is a repeat of 5 years ago, when Swank and Bening battled it out, Swank for her breakout role in "Boys Don't Cry" and Bening for her sadistic housewife in "American Beauty." Swank emerged victorious in that battle, and is poised to do it again for her phenomenal portrayal of Maggie in "Million Dollar Baby." If she does win, she'll join a select few to win double Best Actress statuettes. Bening and Staunton are the only real challengers that could knock her out of the ring. All the actresses in this category are deserving, but Swank edges out the competition, but just barely. PREDICTION: Hilary Swank — "Million Dollar Baby"

Another category where it's down to three men is Best Supporting Actor. Alda and Foxx are out, Alda's performance is a little too small and Foxx's part was a little too big for supporting. That leaves Church, Freeman and Owen. Freeman won the SAG and Owen won the Golden Globe, so it appears to be neck and neck between them, a showdown of old versus new. Clive Owen outshined his bigger stars in "Closer" (Julia Roberts and Jude Law) and that's pretty damn impressive. Often Oscars award acting categories for bodies of work, and if that's the case this year, then the fourth nominee might be the charm for Freeman. PREDICTION: Morgan Freeman — "Million Dollar Baby"

Best Supporting Actress is another tight race and this is a category that often is full of surprises, and likes to reward younger actresses. (Marcia Gay-Harden for "Pollock," anyone? How about Angelina Jolie for "Girl, Interrupted?" Or the biggest shock, Marissa Tomei for "My Cousin Vinny.") Any of the five nominated actresses could conceivably win, but the best guess is that it's down to two, Blanchett and Portman. Linney and Madsen's buzz peaked too early and Okonedo would be an upset if she won. Portman had two exceptional films this year showing her range, "Garden State" and "Closer." But Hollywood loves to reward someone when they're playing one of their own, and Blanchett's performance of the legendary Katharine Hepburn was uncanny. PREDICTION: Cate Blanchett — "The Aviator"

Best Director should be called "The Battle of the War-Horses," as it's down to two, and what a duzy the two are. Eastwood and Scorsese. Both of those names embody Hollywood and the American cinematic landscape, and both of them are justly nominated for their phenomenal work on their respective pictures this year. Scorsese has yet to win an Oscar (shocking, I know) and Eastwood has already won an Oscar for "Unforgiven" in 1992. Sentiment would seem to favor Scorsese, but Eastwood has already picked up the DGA and the Golden Globe for his work on "Baby." And being a 3-time nominee in one year doesn't hurt him either. Unfortunately, Scorsese will probably have to sit this one out again. Sorry Marty, there's always next time...PREDICTION: Clint Eastwood — "Million Dollar Baby"

For Best Original Screenplay, the nominees are "The Aviator ," "Eternal Sunshine of the Spotless Mind ," "Hotel Rwanda ," "The Incredibles" and "Vera Drake." Charlie Kaufman should easily take this for his delightful and extremely original "Eternal Sunshine." Best Adapted Screenplay nominees include "Before Sunset," "Finding Neverland," "Million Dollar Baby," "The Motorcycle Diaries" and "Sideway." This should be the one bone the Academy throws to "Sideways," but in a "Million Dollar Baby" sweep, this award could get caught up in the title wave.

Watch the 77th Annual Academy Awards, Sunday Feb. 27 at 8 p.m. on ABC.

COURTESY MIRAMAX FILMS

COURTESY ABC/TVLAND

Feeling 'Blue'

'NYPD Blue' ends after 12 years of arresting drama

By Lynn Elber
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Sure, the nudity was startling. But the proof that "NYPD Blue" would be a bold and unsettling new force on TV was police Detective Andy Sipowicz's snarled insult.

"Ipso this, you pissy little —," he told an attorney spouting legalisms at him in the 1993 debut episode, emphasizing the b-word with a crotch-grabbing gesture.

"NYPD Blue" which ends its 12-year run at 10 p.m. on March 1, had no intention of being polite. Building on creator Steven Bochco's "Hill Street Blues," it was an in-your-face saga of cops whose lives were as troubled as the streets they protected.

The new drama went a step, a leap, beyond with frank sexuality that included bare skin and an emotionally raw, adult approach to life's complexities: Alcoholism, racism and more were part of the caseload along with crime.

As the show nears its end, it's clear "NYPD Blue" was able to shift boundary lines but not obliterate them. Another flash of skin, from Miss Super Bowl, Janet Jackson, has networks cowering under threat of federal indecency fines.

"We all thought television would stay shook up" after the success of "NYPD Blue," Bochco said. But in readying the new series "Blind Justice," which debuts March 8, he's become acutely aware it hasn't.

"Same time slot, same genre, same attention to grittiness and detail, and yet the battles I'm fighting with broadcast standards are totally retro, if you will," Bochco told The Associated Press.

While the social impact of "NYPD Blue" may be in question, its legacy as one of TV's outstanding dramas is secure.

With intense co-creator David Milch ("Deadwood") crafting scripts, "NYPD Blue" bored into the men and women of New York's 15th Precinct, especially Sipowicz. He was etched with brutish grace by Dennis Franz as the detective evolved from tortured soul to self-acceptance and became, as Bochco says, the heart of the series.

The flesh and blue language initially frightened off major advertisers and some ABC affiliates, who refused to air it. But viewers decided surprise, surprise, that dramatic excellence counted for something and helped "NYPD Blue" trump timidity.

Landing in Nielsen's top 20 at the end of its first year, the program earned a best-actor Emmy for Franz for the first season and won a best drama series Emmy for the second.

Bochco wanted "to tell adult stories to adults in an adult manner," said Franz. "He wanted more tools to tell them with and asked for those liberties to be given him by ABC. They took a chance on us and it paid off."

With the initial shock worn off, the show settled comfortably into its long run. (Milch left after seven seasons.) For

See NYPD BLUE on page 7

COURTESY ABC/TVLAND

ABC's highest rated criminal drama "NYPD Blue" redefined the cop show genre for network television.

Five things to ditch and five things to snag

A student's guide to women's spring fashion trends

By Molly Jane Quinn
Collegian Staff

Ditch: Jelly Totes
Snag: Retro Beach Bags

Ah, the 80s revival, back to haunt me once again. Not content with the successful resurgence of jelly bracelets and sandals, retail designers launched the jelly tote as the perfect solution for the girl who can never get enough of rubberized plastic accessories. Unfortunately, while see-through purses may have practical uses (airport security comes to mind) they don't have any fashionable use. Take a cue from Hilary Duff's latest (albeit photo-shopped) scandal — see through purses, condoms and underage stars make for fantastic tabloid fodder — nothing good will come from a jelly tote.

So this spring, get back to basics with a retro style beach bag. Straw and canvas totes with funky patterns from traditional Hawaiian hibiscus prints to vintage Caribbean maps add an element of whimsy to any outfit. Whether you chose a more conservative purse with leather trim to balance out a wild pattern, a traditional straw cutout handbag, or opt for a daring palm tree print with sequined accents, these bags will carry you from nights out at the bar to lingering days spent at the beach.

Ditch: Rhinestone Aviators
Snag: Lucite Jackie-O's

So what if J-Lo makes it look good? After the collapse of Bennifer, the utter failure of "Gigli", and her creepy reunion with Marc Anthony (am I missing anything?) Jennifer Lopez is a poor excuse for a fashion guru. So it's time to toss your beloved pair of scratched aviators — you know, the ones adorned with those adorable Swarovski crystal hearts? Pitch 'em. Because the truth is, you only succeeded in looking like a sad Charlie's Angels impersonator (I'm talking post-Farrah.)

But it's not too late. Take a cue from an always-reliable fashion icon: Jacquelyn Kennedy Onassis. Score an oversized pair of Lucite frames in bright white, olive green, or classic tortoiseshell to block those UV rays and cover up your bloodshot baby blues on Sunday morning. With gradated lenses, these specs give you shade while allowing friends and foes to see your eyes, avoiding those uncomfortable polarized sunglasses conversations (were you talking to me? I can't tell who you're looking at ...) The best part is, unlike metal frames, it's hard to tell designer plastic frames from the ones you can buy from a street vender, making them a true steal.

Ditch: Ruffled Jersey Minis
Snag: Long Boho Skirts

The tiny, tiny, tiny ruffled skirts that were all the rage last spring/summer illicit a visceral response from even the most jaded fashion mavens: "Burn that rag!" Just FYI ladies, as a general rule: if the total fabric content of a garment cannot adequately cover one of your calves, it's too small for you. Not only is it too small, it isn't actually a garment; it is a rag. And we don't wear rags, now do we?

While there seem to be advantages to the ruffled mini (it feels like a tank top for your bum?) they are greatly outweighed by the negatives. Firstly, when you walk in one of these skirts, the whole world can see all your goodies, as the said ruffles bounce off your rear end while you strut to class. Secondly, I won't go into this too much, but I am deeply concerned for hygienic reasons about the cleanliness of chairs, benches, seats on the PVTA ... it's just not a good scene.

Thank God this season sees the revival of long, loose, ethnic inspired skirts that flatter all figures. With drawstring waists, often accented with tassels, these tie-dye and Indian print skirts look fab with silver leather sandals and a shimmery tank for the evening or paired with simple flip flops and a tee for daytime. Raid your mom's closet for the real deal, or hunt down vintage finds at thrift stores and consignment shops.

This season Hawaiian straw bags are all the rage in ladies' fashion.

Ditch: Kitten Heeled Thongs
Snag: Cork Wedges and Espadrilles

It was an ingenious move when Sigerson Morrison came out with his take on traditional plastic thong sandals three years ago. What could be better than the comfort of your favorite flip flops combined with the flattering angle of a kitten heel? But it's been years since Morrison launched this sandal, and it's time to say sayonara to kitten heeled thongs and let them go roam in that great kitty litter box in the sky.

Instead, try and get a pair of wedge-soled sandals this season. Wedge sandals put less strain on your joints with a gentler angle, making them more feasible for long-term wear. The added height complements the season's long bohemian skirts, incorporating sex appeal into an otherwise earthy look. Espadrilles with ballerina-style ribbon ties lace up to be tied in a demure bow at the calf, juxtaposing with a tempting denim mini.

Bonus points: pair a sassy wedge with winter's higher waist trousers and tuck in a sporty polo top to transition from winter to spring.

Ditch: Terrycloth and Velour Hoodies
Snag: Embellished Cotton Tunics

Snuggly, soft, comfortable and worn-in— these adjectives all work for terrycloth and velour when you're talking about a towel or your grandfather's tracksuit. But when you are swaddling yourself in it head to toe, it's time for an intervention. If you're not careful, you too could find yourself at a quickie wedding thinking it perfectly rational and classy to dress your bridal party in velour sweat suits, a la Britney Spears ("Pimps and Maids" embroidery optional.)

Let's not let it come to that. So do something useful with those old velour hoodies and terrycloth pants: rip them up and use for buffing your car or dusting your nasty dorm floor. And when you're done, trs an embellished cotton tunic for your coverall of choice this spring. These long-sleeved thin cotton tops flatter any body type and, with the deep slit down the front, carry far more sex appeal than a ratty brown velour sweatshirt. Whether you go for a colorful batik or a subdued beaded pattern, these tops will look great with jeans and heels or paired with cropped pants and sandals.

'NYPD Blue' ending after 12 years on top

See NYPD BLUE on page 6

its final season, it's ranked 49th in the ratings and is averaging 9.7 million viewers weekly about half of its peak audience.

The buzz it generated through the years (besides conjecture on the rush-of-the-week) involved cast changes: David Caruso bolting to seek elusive movie stardom (and ending up back in another crime drama, "CSI: Miami") and the ensuing parade of partners for Sipowicz.

Jimmy Smits was on board from 1994 to '98, then received a protracted, 24-hanky send-off when his character became fatally ill. (Smits made a recent ghostly comeback to help a troubled Sipowicz).

Two one-time kid actors joined the squad, with Rick Schroder ("Silver Spoons") followed by Mark-Paul Gosselaar ("Saved by the Bell"). "NYPD Blue" was so sturdy it absorbed the oddball casting and gave the newcomers a chance to shine.

Besides Franz, Gordon Clapp was the only other featured cast member on hand from the beginning, providing a welcome sense of continuity as schlubby Detective Greg Medavoy.

Compelling in their blemished individuality, the detectives stood for something larger.

"What I thought we always focused on was fleshing out the men and women who do police work for a living as having vulnerabilities, having flaws, having home lives, having losses, tragedies," Franz said. "I also think we paid respects to the difficulty of police work and the effects the job can have on individuals," he said.

In the season so far, Sipowicz has assessed his life at midpoint and reluctantly made the jump up to sergeant and a desk job.

Is that where his journey, and the show, ends?

Bochco said "NYPD Blue" will conclude without a bang, and he means that literally: A contrived and melodramatic finale was quickly ruled out.

"You don't want a bomb to go off in the building," he said. "What we finally settled on was to try to end this show in a way that implies that the life of the precinct doesn't end. It's just that you don't get to visit it every week."

Franz, 60, is ready to try something new, maybe even a movie comedy. "I spent all my 50s here. I'm the most appreciative guy on earth for this opportunity. It was wonderful, but it's time to move on now."

As for the series' ultimate impact, Bochco suggests it may have helped fuel the backlash against changing cultural standards. The reaction was building, he said, with the 2004 Super Bowl just the tipping point.

"That said, in the long view, you just can't put the genie back in the bottle," he said. "It's not going to happen, notwithstanding the fact that broadcast television in these days has become an extremely conservative and frightened medium."

Discover Your LOVER
The Collegian Dating Game
Look for the results of the
Discover Your Lover
starting
MARCH 1ST
VIDEO COVERAGE COMING SOON
WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Regency Hair Stylists
Full Highlights~
$20 Off
253.9526
Marna
Megan
April

The Attorney takes on renter's insurance

Ask the Attorney
Michele L. Leaf

Q: I rent a four-bedroom house with three other students. Our lease makes us responsible for paying for the oil heat and keeping the heat at a minimum temperature of 55 degrees in the winter. We ran out of oil and then the pipes froze and burst. The landlord claims there has been about $20,000 in damages caused by water leaks. Are we responsible to pay this?

A. The landlord will likely make a claim on his homeowner's insurance policy for the damage. These policies contain a clause stating that whenever an insurance company pays a loss, the company may bring an action on behalf of the insured against any parties believed to be responsible for the loss. Legally this is known as the right to subrogation. The insurance company therefore has the right to seek payment from you and your roommates and can sue you for negligence and breach of the lease, even if the landlord does not wish to pursue a claim against you. Since your lease requires at least minimal heat during the winter, you have breached your lease in letting the oil run out and allowing the temperature fall below the minimum required by the lease, negligent. If a court finds that your failure to purchase oil was the cause of the burst pipe then you could be found negligent and held responsible to pay the damages. Often, the insurance company may threaten legal action in an effort to get you to pay, but will not follow through with a lawsuit. This is especially true when the negligent parties have no assets. You have no obligation to make payment until a court order is issued, finding you negligent.

The best course of action for tenants responsible for heating the house is to make sure that there is always an adequate supply of oil and to keep the thermostat above the minimum temperature specified in the lease. In addition, you should enter into an agreement with an oil company for automatic delivery throughout the winter. The oil company then has the responsibility to insure that delivery is frequent enough to keep the oil from running out. If the oil company does not make delivery in accordance with the schedule, or if the oil runs out despite adherence with the schedule, then the oil company is the potential negligent party rather than the tenants.

The information contained in this article refers to Massachusetts law and does not constitute legal advice. If you need legal advice, seek out an attorney who can give you advice based upon your circumstances and applicable law. Fee paying UMass Amherst students with questions may call the Student Legal Services Office at 545-1995 to arrange and appointment, or come to 922 Campus Center to pick up more information.

WRITE FOR ARTS
545-1361

This Week in UMass Athletics...
UMASS BASKETBALL Vs.
Tonight @ 7pm
RED SOX APPRECIATION DAY!
Wear your Red Sox Gear and have a chance to get your picture taken with the World Series Trophy!!
World Series Trophy will be presented at half-time of the men's basketball game
MASSACHUSETTS WOMEN'S BASKETBALL Vs.
Thursday @ 7pm
It's Senior Day!!
STUDENT TICKETS FREE!!

Bourque beginning to open eyes around the hockey world and I'm like, 'What are you guys, six years old? What are you laughing about?' And they say 'I couldn't believe how bad of a play that was.' They're laughing about how bad the plays they make."

BOURQUE from page 10

Parker enjoys picking on his freshman star; playfully, though.

Chris was asked how similar he and his father's personalities were, and before he could respond, Parker chimed in joking, "I bet his father doesn't act like he's 12."

"I meant that in a very positive way with Chris because he's so upbeat, and he's having a ball here," Parker said. "There's a couple of freshmen he hangs around with; they're like bosom buddies."

Ray sees the similarities, not in terms of how he plays the game because they play two different positions, but more in the mental aspect.

"He has a passion for the game," Ray said. "His approach is the same way in terms of loving the game and going after it."

And just like everyone else, the elder Bourque couldn't stop talking about that Beanpot goal.

"I was very happy," Ray said. "It just brought memories back. He scored in the same spot on the same kind of goal I scored in '96 in the All Star Game. I was just happy that BU won, and obviously he scored the goal so it was a very big thrill for everybody sitting in our box at that time. It was a great moment, one that probably will last a lot longer as a parent than as a player."

Many ask, and rightfully so, why Chris plays forward and not defense, his father's position. The answer is simple: he didn't like playing defense, he is a scorer.

Through 26 games this year, he has scored nine goals and dished out 11 assists. Five of those goals came on the power play.

He keeps developing, too. He is playing better defense, although according to him, any defense is better than the defense he played in high school.

And he plays smart hockey, which is the biggest reason why freshmen are able to succeed in their transition to the college game.

He is the son of a legend, has the utmost respect from his Hall-of-Fame coach and the Washington Capitols are waiting for him when he leaves Boston University.

Yeah, things are going pretty well for Chris Bourque right now.

URI completes back-to-back

WOMEN'S TRACK from page 10

beating the best of New England, the team will be moving on to the looming outdoor season.

"We're going to use this indoor season as a springboard into outdoor. The people that are not competing this weekend are training but are on a different training," LaFreniere explained. "It's the end of the indoor season, but I feel like for a lot of people on our team needed a longer indoor season, but that doesn't exist for now so we are focusing now on outdoor. Hopefully they're going to get stronger and faster."

The team's lack of depth and versatility is not a lost cause, though, as LaFreniere is confident that the rebuilding process is heading in the right direction and has the right starting point.

"Like I said before, we're rebuilding the program; we don't really have enough people that can score in all the events," LaFreniere said, "The people who did score points had very good performances. I think it's a good start, but it's not where we want to be. We don't have enough depth now, but we are trying to lay the foundation for that."

The foundation LaFreniere has laid down this year has given the program good reason to be optimistic with freshmen like Bakanowski and Derosa exceeding expectations in their first year.

Damon takes shot at A-Rod

(AP) — Johnny Damon and David Ortiz reported to the Boston Red Sox's training camp and took a more lighthearted approach to bashing Alex Rodriguez.

Damon had dubbed his own teammates a bunch of "idiots" last season and, on Monday in Fort Myers, Fla., rattled off one-liners. One was about Rodriguez's early morning training regimen.

"Waking up 6 in the morning?" Damon said after his late-afternoon arrival. "There's been many a nights where I haven't been to bed at 6 in the morning."

Ortiz, another Red Sox clubhouse clown, was too busy to pay attention to all the negative comments made about the New York Yankees' third baseman.

"I only have one tape at home, the Red Sox one," Ortiz said about Boston's championship season video. "I watch it over and over and over and over and I don't even know what's going on here."

Even Trot Nixon, who criticized the Rodriguez for boasting about his workouts, said he was "being stupid and flying off at the mouth" when he made them Feb. 15. Still, he stood by his criticism.

At Tampa, Fla., Jason Giambi made his first appearance at the Yankees' complex and expressed empathy for A-Rod.

"He's definitely got it rough," Giambi said. "I'm definitely here for him as a teammate. I know what it's like to be on the rough side."

Giambi has his own critics to appease after a season wrecked by injury and an offseason filled with steroid allegations, and he wasted no time getting started.

A little more than two hours after arriving at spring training in Tampa, Fla., on Monday, he walked to the outfield end of the New York dugout, stepped onto the field and was greeted with cheers and outstretched pens.

"It's pretty humbling, pretty incredible, to have the support from the fans," Giambi said." It's pretty awesome."

When he returned to the clubhouse, Giambi went down a row of pitchers' lockers and shook hands with Randy Johnson. Giambi decided not to give a group apology.

"What I've started doing is going up to the guys face to face," he said. "To me, that meant more than doing a team meeting or addressing the team."

Yankees bashing spilled over into the Philadelphia Phillies' training camp in Clearwater, Fla., when outfielder Kenny Lofton reported and wasted no time in taking a shot at Joe Torre, his manager last season.

"He didn't want me to play. If he wanted me to play, I would have played," Lofton said. "I liked the situation over there, but I wasn't wanted by the manager. Certain managers you respect. Now, I'm in a more relaxed situation."

A six-time All-Star center fielder, Lofton is coming off his most frustrating season. He hit .275 with seven stolen bases in just 83 games in his only year with the Yankees.

At Peoria, Ariz., Seattle third-baseman Adrian Beltre took his physical and joined his new teammates for a round of batting practice.

Beltre, who signed a $64 million, five-year contract with the Mariners in December, knows the game will be different for him after spending the first seven years of his major league career with the Los Angeles Dodgers.

"It's not going to be easy," he said of facing AL pitching for the first time. "It's going to take time to adjust to it. I hope my new teammates are going to help me."

At Surprise, Ariz., second baseman Alfonso Soriano was given permission to increase his running program as he prepared for his second season with the Texas Rangers.

"Everything looks great with Sori," trainer Jamie Reed said. Soriano tore his left hamstring and missed the final two weeks of last season. He did most of his rehab work on a stationary bike after deciding not to have surgery.

"I just started running about two weeks ago," Soriano said. "It's going to take a while to get in shape, but I feel good so far."

At Port St. Lucie, Fla., on the day center fielder Carlos Beltran reported to his first spring with the New York Mets, general manager Omar Minaya met Mike Cameron, who is shifting from center.

"I'm not even thinking about trading Mike Cameron," Minaya said. "Mike Cameron's going to be our right fielder."

Cameron's name has surfaced in trade rumors since the Mets signed Beltran. Cameron reported to camp Monday and said he never indicated he wanted a trade.

—Associated Press

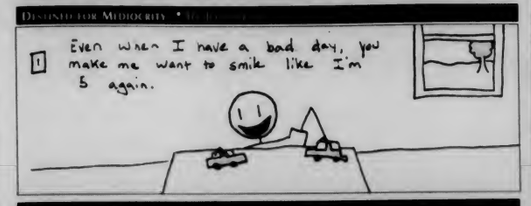
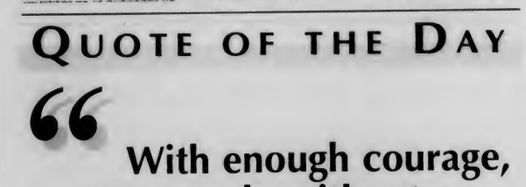
Thirsty for knowledge?
Say when.

FORTUNE 100 BEST COMPANIES TO WORK FOR 2004



At Ernst & Young, the opportunity for growth is enormous. We offer over 7,000 professional development programs — some of the best formal learning programs in the country — because our philosophy is People First. We recognize that our employees are essential to the firm's growth and success. And in order to attract the best talent, we've built an environment that Fortune® magazine has consistently recognized as one of the "100 Best Companies To Work For." So whether you're looking for a place to grow or a great place to work, look for our recruiters on campus. ey.com/us/careers

Audit • Tax • Transaction Advisory Services



ERNST & YOUNG
Quality In Everything We Do

Quote of the Day

"With enough courage, you can do without a reputation."

—Rhett Butler, Gone With the Wind

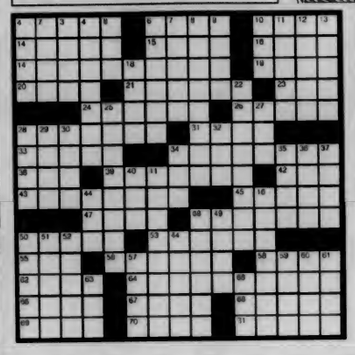
ACROSS
1 Republican Roosevelt
6 Wild guess
10 Atlas pages
14 Revere
15 Fable
16 Minuscule particle
17 Without substance
19 Medley
20 Highlands miss
21 Steve and Woody
23 Diligent insect
24 Penn's partner
26 Waste maker?
28 Characterizes
31 Pierce with a horn
33 Put up
34 Took charge of
38 Small portion
39 Lessened
42 Fruity drink
43 Vacillated
45 Funeral composition
47 Pasela's place
48 Perfumed
50 Kind of cocktail
53 Asserts innocence, officially
55 Not of Cambodia
56 Pipe fitting
58 Musical syllables
62 Has a bite
64 Original creations
66 Nepal's place
67 Forest denizen
68 Divvy up
69 Part of a dance
70 Pindar products
71 Secluded valleys



DOWN
1 Kite end
2 Milday of poetry
3 Polka followers
4 Extreme
5 Craving
6 Photographs
7 Postpone for later action
8 Hypersensitive
9 ___ there, done that
10 Chairman of China
11 Old-time strongman
12 Tapered end
13 Dispatched biblical-style
18 Nor'easter
22 Cut into irregular strips
25 Contestants
27 NRC forerunner
28 Collision
25 Contestants
27 NRC forerunner
28 Collision newbies
29 Part of HOMES
30 Gala
32 Mine find
34 Failure
35 Sharp to the taste
36 Perimeter
37 Landowner's paper
40 Cote denizen
41 Intensified
44 Sitcom
46 Implant
48 Cuts off
49 French city
50 Dog's bane
51 Prepare nuts
52 Free
54 Embankment
57 Italian beach
59 Starlet's quest
60 In a short while
61 Former fast fliers
63 Pine juice
65 Merchandise label

Find today's answers online

www.dailycollegian.com

THE HARP
NEW!! Wireless Internet
OCMP & All Credit Cards accepted
Irish Pub
February Special!
$1.50 PBR Bottles; Honey Brown, Molson
$2.00 A pint / $6.50 a pitcher
WED. ·Busted Vacuum
THU. ·Apollo Sunshine
FRI. ·Irish Seisiun
SAT. ·5th Pocket
"Come Party Like You're Irish!"
413-548-6900 www.theharp.net
163 Sunderland Rd. · N. Amherst
Just north of the apartments

Amherst Hairstylists
Caren's Place
Stop putting your haircut off
Come in and get the attention you want!
• Students always $17 shampoo & cut
• We specialize in Multi-Color Highlight using three to four complementing and blending colors
• Free Haircolor consultation
• Facial and Body waxing available
• Walk-Ins Welcome
Mon-Fri 10-6 Sat 10-4
253-1200
40 Main St.
Downtown Amherst
No checks we accept debit cards
$2 OFF SELECTION OF HAIRCOLORS (SPECIAL OR REGULAR)
10% OFF HAIRCOLORS (SPECIAL OR REGULAR)
With this COUPON only
www.carensplace.com

H·O·R·O·S·C·O·P·E·S

aquarius • Jan. 20-Feb. 18
Today you will acquire a new nickname that you will not be proud of.

pisces • Feb. 19-Mar. 20
You forgot to put on deodorant today, and it shows.

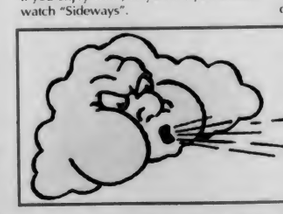
aries • Mar. 21-April 19
You had really good dreams last night, but sadly you don't remember them.

taurus • April 20-May 20
You always have the most amazing shoes.

gemini • May 21-June 21
Don't try to be classy. There's no way you can pull it off.

cancer • June 22-July 22
If you enjoy wine, as you do, you should watch "Sideways".

leo • July 23-Aug. 22
Today you've got to stay awake through that boring class.



virgo • Aug. 23-Sept. 22
You're more flexible than you think you are sometimes.

libra • Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Maybe it's time to call that ex you haven't talked to since high school.

scorpio • Oct. 23-Nov. 21
You should have a back-up plan, just in case you don't make the bus.

sagittarius • Nov. 22-Dec. 21
You can't say anything with a straight face.

capricorn • Dec. 22-Jan. 19
There's a lot about you that people just don't know.

Blow away your competitors, advertise with The Collegian
Call 545-3500

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

Activities

Foam party Montreal weekends $89 Montreal Express.Net 1(781)979-9001

Announcements

$600 Group Fundraiser
Scheduling Bonus 4 hours of your group's time PLUS our free (yes, free) fundraising solutions EQUALS $1,000-$2,000 in earnings for your group. Call TODAY for a $450 bonus when you schedule your non-sales fundraiser with CampusFundraiser. Contact CampusFundraiser, (888)923-3238, or visit www.campusfundraiser.com

Apartment for Rent

1 Bedroom Available North Amherst $425 includes heat & electric bright clean washer/dryer in condo On bus route 1 mile to UMass female preferred Call Liz 508-367-8893

Brandywine Apts. Now Leasing, 1&2 bedroom apts. Leases begin Jun, July, Aug or Sep. First come, first serve. Get them while they last. www.brandywine-apts.com stop by or call 549-0600

Center of town, 1, 2, 3 bedrooms; hardwood floors. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amberstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

Apartment for Rent

Hobart Condos 3 bedroom, hardwood floors, study area in basement. Cable, telephone (internet access) in all bedrooms and study. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

Auto for Sale

Pontiac Sunbird 93 automatic 4 cyl excellent turquoise ABS Bluebook Value $1400- $600 OBO Takes it. Call 253-0279

Employment

Earn some money! Rent us your ears! Listening experiments $8/hr 413-545-6837

Employment

phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu

Autism position in Belchertown. Language based home program using principles of ABA for 10 yr old boy with autism. Flexible shifts; mornings/days/evenings. Training provided. Requires commitment of 6 months or more. Car necessary. Call Heather at 413-323-5904 or e-mail hskawinski@charter.net EOE/AA

Make money taking online surveys earn $10 to $125 for surveys. Earn $25 to $250 for focus groups www.cashforstudents.com/umass

Employment

Nanny position for 2 boys ages 6 & 9. Perfect schedule for student. Part time Spring, Full time Summer. Prior experience necessary. 413-625-2288

Earn lots of $$ and have fun on the water this Spring & Summer. Raft guides needed at Crab Apple Whitewater in Charlemont, MA. Fun Summer job, no experience necessary. We will train. 413-625-2288.

Room for Rent

350 per month 413-335-5226

Services

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth-control, and Emergency Contraception. Affordable and confidential. STI Screening and Treatment. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992.

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance 549-1906

Travel

One Bed and Studio (Four Queen Beds) at Deerpark one mile from Loon Mountain Available 3/11-3/18 Ken 335-9775

Travel

XXX Night Montreal Weekends $89 Montreal Express.net 1(781)979-9001

Spring Break 2005 Only 6 weeks left… Lowest Prices Biggest Parties Earn 2 Free Trips Exclusive with Sun Splash Tours www.sunsplashtours.com 1800-426-7710

Bahamas Spring Cruise 5 Days $299! Includes Meals, Celebrity Parties! Panama City, Daytona $159! Cancun, Jamaica, Acapulco, Nassau $499! Award Winning Company! SpringBreakTravel.com 1-800-678-6386

Travel

#1 Spring Break Vacations! Cancun, Jamaica, Acapulco, Bahamas, & Florida! Best Parties, Best Hotels, Best Prices! Limited Space! 1-800-234-7007 www.endlesssummertours.com

Wanted

Egg Donors Needed. Help make a couple's dream of becoming parents come true by becoming an egg donor. Very generous compensation and expenses paid. Ages 21-32. Non-smokers only. For more information please visit our website at www.robertnicholsesq.com or contact Christine or Liz at 781-769-6900.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS WEDNESDAY

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 2005 — SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Minutemen welcome Rams on Red Sox Appreciation Day

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

After defeating La Salle on Saturday, the Massachusetts men's basketball team (14-9, 7-5 Atlantic-10) clinched its first winning season since the 1999-2000 season and a possible spot in the National Invitational Tournament (NIT).

However, since the selection process is not based on the same system used by the NCAA, every one of the Minutemen's four remaining games carries a slightly heavier weight.

Tonight at 7 p.m. the Minutemen will face the Rams of the University of Rhode Island (4-19, 2-10 A-10) at the Mullins Center. UMass defeated URI in their last meeting in a sloppy 49-44 defensive showdown at the Ryan Center in Kingston, R.I. on Feb. 9.

Adding to the emotion of the game will be the inevitable increase in attendance due to the 2004 World Series trophy, which will be shown at half-time. UMass coach Steve Lappas was excited about the energy that the trophy will add to the game.

"I'm fired up, I hope it gets more kids in here," Lappas said.

For the second game in a row, the Minutemen will be without the services of senior captain Anthony Anderson who is suffering from a nagging back injury. However, in the absence of Anderson, the Maroon and White have gone 5-0, including one road win against La Salle.

Lappas is pleased with the way his team has responded to the vacancy left by its captain.

"These guys have shown that they can go out there and without him keep it together and play in a tough situation, play in a close game and get it done," Lappas said. "I think all that can do is help when he does come back."

Lappas mentioned that Anderson is improving and may be available to play in Saturday's game at Temple, but he is wary to use the sharp-shooting guard this close to the tournament.

"We don't want him to play until he's 100 percent because our big concern is what's gong to happen in the conference tournament, where we're hopefully going to play two, three or four days in a row," Lappas said. "If we were playing the league championship tonight, would he play? Probably."

The last time these teams met, the Rams' premiere player, Scott Hazelton, who averages 15.6 points per game and seven rebounds, was taken out of his game early after picking up two quick fouls.

Maurice Maxwell, named UMass co-athlete of the week, will take to the court tonight against URI.

The loss of Hazelton caused the Rams to turn to a guard combination that kept the teams offensive balance off-kilter for most of the evening.

"Obviously it helped," Lappas said. "It helped that he got two fouls and couldn't play most of the first half. That's usually a big factor and, that's something that you can't control."

One concern for the Minutemen has been the ankle of junior forward Jeff Viggiano. In his last game against the Rams, Viggiano scored four points, but played an important role in guarding Hazelton when he was on the court.

"He's not really 100 percent. Everyday he says he feels like an old man because it takes him like a half an hour to get his leg going," Lappas said. "He's definitely not 100 percent, but he's closer."

NOTES: Dante Milligan, a transfer from the University of Pittsburgh, was in practice gear for UMass yesterday. Milligan is not practicing with the team because he is injured with a strained ligament in his thumb. He is, however, able to do one-on-one training and may be able to practice with the team in two weeks.

Chris Bourque steps out of father's shadow

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

Right now, it's good to be Chris Bourque.

The Boston University freshman and the son of NHL Hall of Famer and Boston Bruins legend Ray Bourque is starting to make a name for himself, while standing in the shadows of his father.

And he found the perfect way to do just that.

At the biggest hockey stage in New England, during the most prolific in-season hockey tournament in the country, Bourque scored the game-winning goal in overtime to beat Northeastern and clinch Boston University's 26th Beanpot championship in the tournament's 53-year history, being named the tournament's most valuable player in the process.

The goal was also very similar to his father's game-winner in the All Star Game at the Fleet Center just a few years ago.

Then, as if he really needed to, the younger Bourque notched a pair of goals and tallied an assist in BU's 3-0 win over the UMass on Friday night, marking the third consecutive game in which he scored a goal.

And he found the perfect way to do just that.

He was just named Superskills Rookie of the Week by Hockey East and was also tabbed as the USCHO/ITECH National Offensive Player of the Week, the latter solely because of that one goal in the Beanpot that everyone keeps talking about.

And this kid can play.

He does things on the ice that freshmen shouldn't be doing. Whether he is quarterbacking the power play for Jack Parker's offense or deking defenders out with indescribable toe drags, Bourque has a nose for the net.

Just ask his Terrier teammates, or Cushing Academy, where he scored 91 points last year as a senior, or the U.S. World Junior Team, or the Washington Capitals, who selected him with the 33rd pick in the 2004 NHL Draft before he even played a collegiate game.

His hockey resume is solid for someone who celebrated his 19th birthday less than a month ago, and the name on that resume reads "Chris," not "Ray Bourque's kid," or "Ray Jr.," or any of that.

He knows he isn't his father, and he is trying to prove to the hockey world that he really can be his own person. Maybe someday, kids will think of him for what he has done rather than for what his father has accomplished.

"I'm not really trying to live up to my dad; not too many people can do that," Bourque said. "I'm just trying to make a name for myself. That's what I'm trying to do right now, and hopefully it's working out for me."

How could things not be working out when his legendary coach trusts him enough to run the power play through him, NHL players practice with him and his teammates like him enough to laugh with him after his line makes a poor play that results in a goal?

"They turn the puck over, and there's a goal scored," Parker said. "They come off the ice giggling.

BU freshman Chris Bourque collides with Kevin Jarman along the boards on Saturday night during the Terriers' 2-1 win over UMass.

See BOURQUE on page 8

UMass men's swim team puts final touches on 'drive for five'

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

As the word "dynasty" is readily becoming a frequent part of every Bostonian's vocabulary, the Massachusetts men's swimming and diving team is working on its own record. On Saturday, the Maroon and White capped off an undefeated season by winning its fifth straight Atlantic 10 Championship.

Accumulating 804 total points, the Minutemen outlasted all seven teams within their conference, with St Bonaventure coming in a distant second place (652.5 points).

The team managed to sustain the lead throughout the entire three-and-a-half-day meet, and UMass coach Russ Yarworth was named Coach of the Year for the seventh time in his career.

"I think [the championship] has been self-perpetuating. We have a group of kids involved in this program, and when the seniors graduate, they pass on that championship attitude," Yarworth said. "They know that we're the champs and have to maintain it."

On route to fulfilling the "drive for five," UMass utilized each and every swimmer, making the win truly a team effort. The meet began on the night of Feb. 16, when St. Bonaventure was favored to win the first two relays. Coming from behind, UMass, anchored by seniors, won the first two medley relays. Two sophomores and two seniors made up the 200-yard team of Evan Swisher, Mike Cordes, Dylan Smith and Justin Zeimetz, who beat St. Bonaventure by six points.

The 800-yard freestyle included Greg Chartier, Derek Castellana and senior captains Owen Scollan and Smith. Swimming in his last A-10 championship, Scollan recorded his lifetime best in this event and helped the relay team come from behind again to beat St. Bonaventure.

"That first night was key," Yarworth said. "It really set the tone for the entire meet and we just started rolling from there. It was great to see everyone getting involved."

Other contributors included freshman diver Rueben Rappe, who placed first in the one-meter dive and second in the three-meter dive. Freshman A.J. Vozella placed first overall in the 100-yard freestyle, and sophomore Mike Herald placed sixth in the 50-yard freestyle. Fresh from their winning relays, Zeimetz, Swisher and Chartier all accumulated points in their individual events with Zeimetz placing first in the 50-yard freestyle.

UMass swimmer Justin Zeimetz was part of the 200-yard relay team that took first place at the Atlantic 10 Championship.

Yarworth attributes the win to the entire team, as every swimmer or diver scored points. In fact, the entire men's swimming and diving team was named the UMass Athletes of the Week. While he will miss the graduating class of Smith, Scollan, Zeimetz, Ryan Matthews, Jed Vonderheid, Matt Woodward and Brian Doane, Yarworth is looking forward to the underclassmen who will keep the streak alive. And since the "drive for five" is completed, the team has a new phrase that they will be following.

"This next season, our slogan is 'who owns it?'" Yarworth said. "Right now, we're getting ready for number six."

On the women's side, both veteran leadership and underclassman poise earned the Minutewomen 365 points and a fourth place finish, which was one place higher than the 2004 A-10 championship. Richmond won the event, accumulating 912 total points.

"I was really impressed with the attitude that these girls had," UMass coach Bob Newcomb said. "We had some first-day jitters but went out the second day and really kicked in."

While the team depended on its swimmers, it was divers Mary Jenkins and Melissa Pond who put forth strong performances, which helped the team cap off a respectable season. Jenkins, a sophomore, placed second in the one-meter and three-meter dive, and Pond, a freshman, placed fifth in the one-meter and fourth in the three meter.

"Mary Jenkins and Melissa Pond were incredible all weekend and deserve kudos for just a great job," Newcomb said. "They were really a solid base for us."

Despite a slow start, the team clicked during the final three days. Competing in her very first A-10 championship meet, freshman Samantha Demty proved that she will be a force in years to come. Demty placed fifth overall in the 200-yard butterfly with a time of 2:08.96 and seventh in the one-yard butterfly with a time of 59.03.

Demty was also a part of the 400-yard medley relay, which placed fifth overall. On the opposite side of the spectrum, senior captains Jay Yankowski, Colleen Wasson and Lynette Sweeney all competed in their final A-10 meet and were valuable players in the fourth-place finish.

UM falls just short

By Daniel Hillman
Collegian Staff

One point was the difference on Saturday in Kingston, R.I., as the Massachusetts men's track team finished fifth in the Atlantic 10 Championships. The fifth place finish was one point shy of creating a three-way tie for third place with Fordham and Saint Joseph's. Third place was a goal the Minutemen hoped to achieve but just fell short of.

The favorites and host of Saturday's tournament, Rhode Island, continued to be impressive as they finished in first place with 200 points. LaSalle finished in second, as they were expected to, with 143 points. The rest of the field was fighting for third place.

"Obviously we don't feel good missing third place by one point," UMass men's track coach Ken O'Brien said. "But it's impossible to feel real bad about it when you're competing for 770-some odd points, and you're one point shy of your goal."

One of the more powerful individual performances of the day belonged to UMass' John Iacobson, a fifth-year senior who landed in first place in the 800-meters with a time of 1:56.11. His performance on Saturday was a personal best.

Iacobson has battled with several injuries over the past few seasons, and to win the 800-meter on Saturday was an achievement that left his coach and teammates very moved and inspired.

Also landing in first place for the Minutemen was the 4x800 meter relay team. The group of Iacobson, sophomore Zack Przysiecki, freshman Kevin Murphy and senior Jon Korhonen continued to perform on an elite level, as they took home first place with a time of 7:53.57. Finishing right behind them was St. Joe's relay team with a time of 7:53.61. Korhonen, who O'Brien considered not running in the relay earlier in the week due to a flu and calf problem, was a last-minute addition to the relay. His presence paid off as he anchored the team from 20 meters behind to a first-place finish.

In another close race, LaSalle's James Jefferson narrowly defeated UMass senior co-captain Joe McCormick in the 55-meter dash. McCormick finished just .01 seconds behind Iefferson, who clocked in at 6.43. The strong finish gained McCormick Second Team All-Conference honors. In addition to that, McCormick's strong performance earned him an invitation to the IC4A Championship meet in two weeks.

Similar to McCormick, Korhonen finished in second place in the mile and earned himself Second Team All-Conference. Korhonen clocked in at 4:14.5 and was beaten out by St. Joe's Mike DiDio (4:13.24).

Another impressive performance belong to freshman standout Sean Calicchio, who finished in second place in the shotput competition, an impressive performance for an athlete who had his first performance of the season just two weeks prior.

Calicchio's throw of 51 feet, 6 1/2 inches was only outdone by last week's ECAC and URI Performer of the Week André' Reid, who just a week ago broke his own school record in the shotput by two feet. Calicchio's will also be heading to the IC4A Championship meet in two weeks.

Despite the small disappointment on Saturday, O'Brien seemed optimistic about the way the team performed.

"The team is beginning to dig down and find another gear," O'Brien said, "To come away with that is a positive."

Next on tap for the Minutemen is the New England Championship on Friday and Saturday in Boston.

URI wins second straight title

By Ian Kilpatrick
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts women's track team finished in sixth place in Saturday's Atlantic 10 Championship held in Kingston, R.I.

Rhode Island took the title once again with a score of 132.83. The championship was the second in a row and fifth out of the last six years for the Lady Rams.

The Minutewomen continued their indoor season's trend of inconsistency with one of their lowest scores, 58.5 points. The lack of depth cost UMass a chance at the title, as only a select few were able to earn the team any points, even though those who did scored highly.

Once again the Minutewomen were led by senior sprinter Christina Huff, who earned eight points and freshman pole vaulter/sprinter Kristen Bakanowski, who collected a team high 10 points.

Huff, who specializes in the 55-meter dash, made the most of her last A-10 Championship by running a season's fastest 7.19 (55m), which earned her third place behind Melissa Mastrangelo from La Salle (7.07) and Ashley Bell from Richmond (7.13). Huff also contributed points by placing seventh in the 500 meters and helping the 4X400 team finish fifth.

Bakanowski went into the competition feeling confident and once again came out as the winner of the pole vault event with a height of 11 feet 3.75 inches and a reward of 10 points for the team. Although she didn't achieve her goal of beating her personal- and school-record of 12 feet, her jump was enough to outlast some very tough competition by almost a full inch.

Bakanowski's roommate, Sophie Brown, finished seventh but cleared one of her highest heights since coming to UMass. Elisabeth Budd was another one of the few point winning performers, as she was runner-up in the 500 meters.

Coach Julie LaFreniere knew her team's weaknesses going into the meet, and wasn't expecting a championship, but she wasn't completely thrilled with the results either.

"I think it's a mixed bag, we're happy with some of the performances, and you know there were other event areas that we did not do very well in," LaFreniere said, "so it was both, certainly room for improvement in some areas, but very good performances."

While this was the last indoor meet for many, at least five standouts have qualified for the New England meets that take place in Boston this upcoming weekend.

UMass will send Christina Huff (55m, 200m), junior Elisabeth Budd (500), Kristen Bakanowski (pole vault), senior Amanda Dahlberg (5000m) and freshman Christina Derusa (5000).

While the five top performers will be focusing on

See WOMEN'S TRACK on page 8

New England's Largest College Daily • Est. 1890

The Daily Collegian

Thursday, February 24, 2005 — www.dailycollegian.com — Volume CXIV Issue 86

Investigation into fetal remains found in Springfield on-going

By Adam Gorlick
Associated Press

SPRINGFIELD — The human fetal remains investigators found last week buried in jars behind a housing complex were less than 20 weeks developed and preserved in formaldehyde, according to a state medical examiner.

Hampden District Attorney William Bennett told The Associated Press on Wednesday that the preliminary examination done by Dr. Joan Richmond indicated the jars contained "two or three human fetal remains."

Other jars that were dug up behind the Riverview Apartment complex contained a cat brain preserved as an anatomical specimen and turtle remains, Bennett said. The DA said the animal remains also were in formaldehyde.

"It's unclear at this point what purpose these things were used for," Bennett said.

He said Richmond's report d id not determine how long ago the fetuses were formed. Bennett said more testing will be done on the fetuses which may be able to answer that question.

"Because they're in formaldehyde, they could be many, many years old," Bennett said.

Bennett said he won't determine whether to pursue a criminal investigation until he gets more information from additional testing.

"We'll wait and see what action, if any, is appropriate to take from our point of view once further examinations are made," Bennett said.

The remains were discovered last Thursday by federal investigators who were following a tip that came from an ongoing federal public corruption probe involving the Springfield Housing Authority, which owns and operates the apartment complex.

The investigation has yielded indictments with more than 100 charges against Raymond Asselin Sr., who headed the housing authority for 34 years, eight of his family members and four business associates.

Asselin and Arthur Sotirion — who oversaw maintenance for the housing authority and is one of those indicted in the probe — have refused to comment on the discovery of the remains.

Both Asselin and Sotirion have pleaded innocent to charges in connection with the public corruption investigation.

FBI supervisory agent Michael O'Reilly declined to comment Wednesday on the medical examiner's report.

Bliss and Goldschmidt state plans to run for SGA President and Trustee

By Julie O'Donnell
Collegian Staff

Although the official start to the Student Government Association elections does not begin until today, Senator Sean Bliss and Attorney General Craig Goldschmidt announced their candidacy last night for President and Trustee respectively.

During the announcements portion of the meeting, Goldschmidt and Bliss told the Senators that they are looking for student support to run a smooth election.

"I'd like to take this opportunity to announce that I intend to run for Student Trustee," Goldschmidt said. "we are looking forward to a positive campaign and we want to have the opportunity to meet with students."

Last year's elections were held twice because the first election had been deemed unconstitutional and hence repeated. Neither Bliss nor Goldschmidt is anticipating a repeat.

"We hope to have a lot of your support," Bliss said. "We are at a point in the Senate, where we can get things done right."

According to the SGA constitution and bylaws, elections must be held five to eight days after spring break, so Senators are foreseeing elections to be slated for the Thursday and Friday after break. Campaigning will begin two days prior to break.

Current SGA President Eduardo Bustamante has declined to comment on his decision to run for reelection. In a previous interview with the Massachusetts Daily Collegian, Bustamante said that there was a "fifty-fifty percent" chance that he would run again, adding that he was "looking out for the best interests of the SGA."

After SGA Speaker Mark Morrison called an emergency on Monday night, the SGA now has enough elected elections commissioners to run the process. The commissioners are needed to man the polling stations as well as count the ballots and to maintain a smooth electoral process.

The commissioners who will be aiding this process are as follows: Adam Kishpaugh, Aaron Hafey, Marcus Deforest, Maria Fanelli, Ama Beadu and Chaylen Seale.

During his officer report and presentation, Goldschmidt

Senator Sean Bliss, left, and Attorney General Craig Goldschmidt announced their intentions to run for next year's Student Government Association President and Trustee respectively last night.

See SGA on page 3

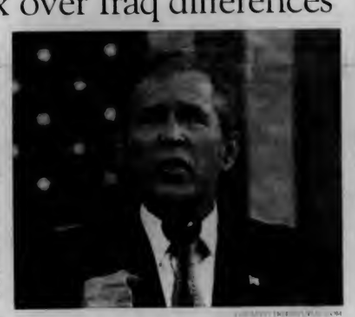
Bush, Schroeder relax over Iraq differences

By Terence Hunt
Associated Press

MAINZ, Germany — President Bush and German Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder agreed Wednesday to turn down the volume on arguments about Iraq and Iran, demanding in unison that Tehran abandon its nuclear ambitions and exploring whether allies should use rewards or punishment to achieve that goal.

Nearing the end of a five-day reconciliation visit to Europe, Bush also prepared for a showdown Thursday with Russia's Vladimir Putin in Bratislava, the snow-covered capital of Slovakia.

Bush said he was concerned about Putin's restrictions on press freedom and other steps amounting to a retreat from democracy. Still, Bush emphasized he did not want to harm "a close relationship with Vladimir."



Bush raced through a nine-hour stop in Germany after harmonious discussions with European allies in Brussels, Belgium. Iran was a prominent subject in his talks all along the way.

Stephen Hadley, the president's national security adviser, said at issue was "should there be a mix of carrots and sticks and who should the carrots come from and what should they be."

Bush expressed general support for negotiations by Germany, Britain and France that offer Iran incentives to permanently abandon the uranium enrichment that is at the heart of its suspected nuclear weapons ambitions. "We will work with them to convince the mullahs that they need to give up their nuclear ambitions," he said.

But the United States has resisted taking part in the European diplomacy and has insisted so far that Tehran should not be rewarded. Germany has offered to sell Iran an Airbus aircraft and other nonmilitary items to encourage Tehran to keep negotiating and drop its nuclear program.

Bush has suggested that the best strategy might be to ask the United Nations Security Council to impose sanctions. "They were caught enriching uranium after they had signed a treaty saying they wouldn't enrich uranium," Bush said.

President George W. Bush, along with Gerhard Schroeder, demanded that Tehran discontinue its plans for nuclear weapons.

Bright ideas

Members of MASSPIRG from UMass and Amherst College rally support for the passage of the Energy Efficency Standards Bill at the intersection of North Pleasant Street yesterday. The sign reads "The Energy Efficeny bill will save enough energy to power the entire [city of] Boston."

Brain damage case sparks family debate

By Mitch Stacy
Associated Press

CLEARWATER, Fla. — A judge Wednesday extended a stay keeping brain-damaged Terri Schiavo's feeding tube in place, saying he needed time to decide whether her husband, who wants to let her die, is fit to be her guardian.

Pinellas Circuit Court Judge George Greer extended until Friday an emergency stay that was to expire Wednesday afternoon. He said he also needs more time to determine whether Terri Schiavo needs more medical tests to determine if she has greater mental capabilities than previously thought.

Terri Schiavo's parents have been in a long, bitter struggle with her husband, Michael Schiavo, to keep her alive. She collapsed 15 years ago Friday, when a chemical imbalance possibly triggered by an eating disorder caused her heart to stop beating and cut off oxygen to her brain.

The Florida Department of Children & Families moved to intervene in the case Wednesday, hours after Gov. Jeb Bush told reporters he was seeking a way to keep Terri Schiavo alive.

Details of the agency's involvement in the case were not immediately available. Greer denied a DCF attorney an opportunity to speak at the afternoon hearing.

George Felos, who represents Michael Schiavo, criticized the DCF move, saying it "reeks of the intervention of politics into the case and is an affront to the court."

David Gibbs, the attorney for Schiavo's parents, Robert and Mary Schindler, countered that there are serious allegations of abuse in the case. The Schindlers have accused their son-in-law of mistreating his wife; he has emphatically denied the accusations.

Some doctors have testified that Terri Schiavo is in a persistent vegetative state with no hope for recovery, but the Schindlers have countered with other medical opinions that she might improve with rehabilitation. The 41-year-old woman appears to cry, laugh and react to her family.

Bush said Wednesday he is exploring options to block the removal of the tube but added that there was only so much he could do.

"I can assure you, I will do whatever I can within the means, within the laws, of our state to protect this woman's life," Bush said, adding that he has received thousands of e-mails and telephone calls from the Schindlers' supporters.

"People with deep faith and big hearts are concerned, as I am about the circumstance that Ms. Schiavo is in," the governor said. "I want them to know I will do what I can, but there are limits to what any particular person — irrespective of the title they currently hold — can do."

Recovering Pope still appears frail

By Victor L. Simpson
Associated Press

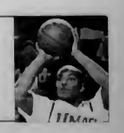
VATICAN CITY — Pope John Paul II made his longest public appearance Wednesday since leaving the hospital after treatment for breathing problems, greeting pilgrims by video hookup after the Vatican canceled his address from his apartment window when rain and winds lashed Rome.

The frail pontiff, convalescing from a recent illness, appeared somewhat gaunt and wheezed as he spoke. But he read the greetings in six languages, sitting in his studio flanked by two aides.

"I greet with affection all of you gathered for the usual Wednesday meeting," he said.

The audience lasted 30 minutes — the longest time the pope has appeared in public since returning to the Vatican on Feb. 10 after spending 10 days in a Rome hospi-

See POPE on page 3



ARTS & LIVING
COUNTRY COMES TO TOWN
Rascal Flatts comes to the Mullins Center.
PAGE 5

EDITORIAL/OPINION
MORE CAMPUS ACTIVISM NEEDED
A growing sense of apathy has effected local political culture.
PAGE 4

WEATHER
TODAY Sunny, H50°, L12°
TOMORROW Partly Cloudy, H35°, L15°
SATURDAY Partly Cloudy, H32°, L10°

SPORTS
WORKING OVERTIME
Minutemen outlast URI in overtime win.
PAGE 10

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
113 Campus Center
University of Massachusetts
Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief Peter Fourdas
Managing Editor Mike Martelli
Business Manager Rich Pacheco
Production Manager Cory Rosenberg
News Supervisor Meghan Healy
Assistant Manager Tiffany Sugalski
Editorial Production Samantha M. Nielsen
Arts Editor Michael Busack
Local Editor Alyson Zillmann
Editorial Editor Yousef Munayyer
Editorial Editor Allison Edles
Arts Editor Erika Lovley
Photo Editor Alex Demosthene
Sports Editor Bob McGovern
Production Manager Kristen Weiss
Advertising Manager Marty Pappas
Production Manager Josh Kuggens
Online Manager Hitak Shah
Advertising Coordinator Virginie Froussart
Human Resources Sandra Marquez
Circulation Manager Linda Wallack
Assistant Advertising Manager Josh Greenberg
Business Manager Nathan Chomsky
Creative Director Thomas Hecht
Production Manager Rachael Bruno
Account Executive Charlie Higgins
Art & Layout Matthew O'Rourke
Art & Layout Chris Gattara
Assistant News Editor Julie O'Donnell
Assistant News Editor Dan O'Brien
Assistant Photo Editor Megan Brimster
Assistant Sports Editor Jeff Howe

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the academic year, except during vacations and examination periods, by the Massachusetts Daily Collegian Publishing Association, Inc., a non-profit organization. Offices are located in the Student Union Building at the University of Massachusetts, Amherst, MA 01003. Subscriptions are available for $150 per semester. Postage paid at Amherst, MA 01004. Publication number 656 520. The Collegian has been awarded the Pacemaker Award by the Associated Collegiate Press for excellence in 1974 and 1987. The Weekly Collegian, 1986. Published daily since 1890. The Collegian has been awarded 10 Pacemaker Awards since 1974. For subscription information, call 545-3500.

Production Crew
On staff today

Night Editor
Meghan Healy

Photo Technician
Megan Brimster

Copy Editor
Alyson Zillmann

Production Supervisor
Molly Eggleston

Production Staff
Lauren Egavian, Melody Natal

policelog

Two men arrested in JQA dorm on drug charges; $500 banner stolen from Mullins Center during game

Wednesday February 16

12:36 p.m. A wallet containing $60 in cash, a driver's license, a UMass ID, and an ATM card was reported stolen from the Boyden Gymnasium.

Thursday February 17

6:30 a.m. After executing a search warrant in John Quincy Adams Hall, Police Officers arrested two subjects for drug charges. Peter Tramontozzi, 18, of Roxbury, and Thomas McDevitt, 19, of South Boston, were arrested for possession of a class D substance with intent to distribute.
12:46 p.m. Following a traffic stop on Massachusetts Avenue, Regine Cyprien, 19, of Hyde Park, was arrested for operating a motor vehicle with a suspended license.
1:33 p.m. A coat containing car keys was reported stolen from the Student Union.
9:53 p.m. A person was reported to be sleeping in a UMass pickup truck parked in front of the Tillson Farm Buildings. A Police Officer investigated, but the person was not found.

Friday February 18

12:33 a.m. Following a traffic stop on Massachusetts Avenue, William Brooks, 20, of Quincy, was arrested for possession of a class D substance with intent to distribute. Brooks was transported to the house of corrections.
9:08 a.m. A complaint was made that someone had been accessing the South College building after the staff had left for the evening. The complaint also stated that for the past three weeks the door to South College had been left open or unlocked, and equipment had been unplugged or moved.
10:05 a.m. Following a traffic stop on Massachusetts Avenue, Michael Duhl, 21, of South Deerfield, was arrested for operating a motor vehicle with a suspended license.
8:11 p.m. Following a request for a date of birth confirmation in the parking lot across the street from Southwest, Gregory Panza, 19, of Branford, CT, was arrested for being a minor in possession of alcohol and possession of a false identification.
9:39 p.m. A banner was stolen from the Mullins Center during the intermission of a hockey game. The banner is valued at over $500.00.
11:03 p.m. A person stated that a vehicle went over a curb and hit Kennedy Hall.

Saturday February 19

12:11 a.m. Joshua Basl, 19, of Everett, was arrested for disorderly conduct after he reportedly ran over the top of a vehicle parked in the Southwest Circle.
12:46 a.m. Following a traffic stop and a field sobriety test on Commonwealth Avenue, Ross Clay, 22, of N. Andover, was arrested for operating a motor vehicle under the influence of alcohol, possession of an open container of alcohol in a motor vehicle, and failure to wear a seatbelt.
9:42 p.m. Following a traffic stop and a K-9 unit request on University Drive, Andrew Jacobs, 22, of Andover, was arrested for possession of a class D substance.
9:49 p.m. Following a request for a date of birth confirmation in the parking lot across the street from Southwest, Jonathan Ackerman, 18, of Bridgeport, CT, was arrested for being a minor in possession of alcohol and possession of a class D substance.
11:35 p.m. After a reported detection of marijuana odor in John Adams Hall, Matthew Fourgere, 19, of Duxbury, was arrested for being a minor in possession of alcohol and possession of a class D substance.
11:41 p.m. A subject was reported running around different floors of Washington Hall, slamming doors of various rooms and being very loud. The subject could not be found.

Sunday February 20

1:11 a.m. Following a traffic stop and a field sobriety test in the parking lot across the street from Southwest, Richard Herman, 27, of Chelsea, was arrested for operating a motor vehicle under the influence of alcohol and possession of an open container of alcohol in a motor vehicle.
11:04 p.m. A 32-inch television, DVD and a couch were reported stolen from Coolidge Hall. The value of the items was estimated to be $500.00.

Monday February 21

10:11 p.m. A person stated their vehicle was hit while parked in the parking lot behind Sylvan. Damage was reported to the rear bumper and the panel. The estimated damage was between $1,500 and $2,000.

Tuesday February 22

8:48 a.m. A person stated that there was a scorch mark on the inside wall of an elevator in Cashin Hall.

—Compiled by Brendan Heck

Harvard President hopes to repair faculty relations

By Justin Pope
Associated Press

CAMBRIDGE — After meeting again with faculty, Harvard President Lawrence H. Summers said he hoped he was on the road to repairing relations with students and professors disenchanted with his leadership.

Summers spent two hours hearing out critics and supporters Tuesday in a standing-room-only gathering of about 300 in a university lecture hall.

Summers has been criticized for his recent remarks suggesting intrinsic differences may partly explain why fewer women ascend to top academic jobs in science. The controversy sparked opposition at a faculty meeting last week that Summers described as "searing."

This time, he got an earful about his famously blunt management style but the focus was on building better relations for the future.

"People were very polite, very civilized and I really felt the president understood what was going on," said Miri Kubovy, professor of Near Eastern languages and civilizations.

Attendees said there was little if any talk of a no-confidence vote some faculty had indicated they would pursue, though one faculty member said he would put the matter on the agenda for the next faculty meeting March 15.

Faculty rejected a proposal that a three-person committee of administrators and faculty mediate between Summers and university professors, according to attendees and an account by the Harvard Crimson, the student newspaper and the only media outlet allowed inside the meeting.

Afterward, Summers issued a statement calling the discussions "candid and thoughtful" and said he hoped they "will help all of us move forward together in the most collegial ways possible."

Summers maintains the support of the Harvard Corporation, the university's governing body. Any no-confidence vote by faculty would be largely symbolic, and the Faculty of Arts and Sciences is just one of 12 divisions of the university.

The latest controversy over Summers' leadership style dates to his Jan. 14 remarks at a National Bureau of Economic Research conference — remarks he believed were off the record.

Courtesy Harvard Univ.

Harvard President Lawrence H. Summers has been criticized for remarks he made about women in top academic jobs.

Medical examiner done with efforts to identify 9/11 victims

By Sara Kugler
Associated Press

NEW YORK — The city medical examiner's office says it has exhausted all efforts to identify the remains of those killed at the World Trade Center, confirming the heartbreaking truth for the many Sept. 11 families who wanted something, anything, to bury.

In the 3 1/2 years since the attack, forensic scientists have identified the remains of nearly 1,600 of the dead. But the families are now being told that the limits of DNA technology have been reached, leaving more than 1,100 of the victims unidentified.

For many of the families, any hope that their loved ones' remains might be found had all but slipped away long ago.

They buried caskets with photographs and mementos instead of bodies. On holidays, they visit gravestones that mark nothing but a spot in the earth. For many, the trade center site in lower Manhattan, instead of a cemetery, is where they feel a connection to their loved ones.

A year after the attack, Ronald Fazio's family held a wake with a coffin full of keepsakes, knowing his remains might never be found but needing the ritual to move on. Photos of the family dog, sand from the Jersey shore and Fazio's favorite treat, Reese's Peanut Butter Cups, were buried in a cemetery near their New Jersey home.

"It might seem like an artificial type of wake, but people there were connected to what was in that coffin as if it was my father," Robert Fazio said.

A mangled credit card was the only trace of Ronald Fazio recovered in the more than 1.5 million tons of trade center rubble that rescue workers excavated for more than nine months. Out of nearly 2,800 victims, fewer than 300 whole bodies were recovered.

Forensic teams worked around the clock after the disaster to identify the dead via DNA from toothbrushes and combs supplied by the victims' families. During the monumental effort, the remains were kept in refrigerated trucks outside the coroner's office.

Nearly 20,000 pieces of bodies were found in the ruins — more than 6,000 small enough to fit in five-inch test tubes. The most matched to one person exceeded 200. More than 800 victims were identified by DNA alone.

Nearly 10,000 unidentified parts have been freeze-dried and vacuum-sealed for preservation in case advances in forensic technology someday enable scientists to identify the remains.

Most nurses spend their entire careers in the same hospital. In the United States Air Force, it's unlikely you'll even spend it in the same state or country. You'll have the opportunity to practice nursing in as many as 20 different fields in a variety of nursing environments. And you'll feel a greater sense of shared responsibility when you have the opportunity to actually lead your team. Sound like the kind of career you'd like to have? Then call 1-800-588-5260.
AIRFORCE.COM/healthcare • 1-800-588-5260

Panda East
Fine Chinese & Japanese Cuisine
Enjoy our fine Chinese and Japanese cuisine while helping aid the Tsunami fund
Thank you for dining at Panda East
With this coupon, $1 of your bill will be donated to the Tsunami fund.
Thank you for your support.
www.pandaeastamherst.com
103 No. Pleasant St., Amherst
256-8923 • 256 8924
Delivery Hotline 549-0077

Women's clothing, shoes and accessories.
downtown Amherst

Man accused of plotting to kill the President appears for hearing

By Mark Sherman
Associated Press

Courtesy Harvard Univ.

The man accused of plotting to kill the President appeared in court on Tuesday.

WASHINGTON — A Virginia man accused of plotting with al-Qaida to kill President Bush should be held indefinitely, federal prosecutors said Wednesday in court filings that also rejected his contention that he was tortured while held in Saudi Arabia.

At a court hearing a day earlier in Alexandria, Va., 23-year-old Ahmed Abu Ali offered to display scars on his back as proof that he was tortured by Saudi authorities. In their filing Wednesday, prosecutors said, "There is no credible evidence to support those claims."

Abu Ali never complained about his treatment during several meetings with an American diplomat in Saudi Arabia, according to the filing. Moreover, an American doctor examined him Monday and found "no evidence of physical mistreatment on the defendant's back or any other part of his body."

Edward MacMahon, one of Abu Ali's lawyers, said Wednesday he had not seen the government's motion and declined to comment. But on Tuesday, both MacMahon and defense lawyer Ashraf Nubani said they had seen the scars on his back. Nubani said they looked like whip marks.

Abu Ali would pose "an exceptionally grave danger to the community" if released before his trial, prosecutors said in Wednesday's filing in U.S. District Court in Alexandria. Abu Ali also would be unlikely to show up for his trial, they said.

Until now, the government has had little to say about the arrest and detention of Abu Ali in Saudi Arabia, where he was held for 20 months before being suddenly flown to America on Tuesday.

His lawyers and family allege the Saudis held him at the U.S. government's request and tortured him with the knowledge of American officials. Prior to Abu Ali's return, a lawsuit filed on his family's behalf in U.S. District Court in Washington sought information about his capture and treatment.

The government sought to have the case dismissed, but U.S. District Judge John Bates has declined, saying the family has presented circumstantial evidence to support their claims of torture.

Abu Ali was born in Houston and moved to Falls Church, Va., a Washington suburb. He was valedictorian of the Islamic Saudi Academy in Alexandria, then went to Saudi Arabia to study. He was arrested there in June 2003 but never charged.

Two different federal courts will consider Abu Ali's case Thursday. In Alexandria, he is due for a hearing on whether he should remain in custody until his trial. In Washington, Bates has scheduled a hearing in the civil lawsuit.

Bates wrote in December that there was "at least some circumstantial evidence that Abu Ali has been tortured during interrogations with the knowledge of the United States."

In addition, Abu Ali's family said a U.S. diplomat reported to them that Abu Ali said FBI agents who questioned him threatened to send him to the detention facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, Bates wrote.

He noted at the time that the government had not attempted to rebut the family's claims. Since then, however, the Justice Department has filed a classified document seeking to justify its call for the civil case to be dismissed.

Morton Sklar, Abu Ali's lawyer in the civil case, said his client's return to the United States should not end the lawsuit. "Our main concern is that the United States government seems to have done a very effective job of diverting attention from its own responsibility for illegal conduct by focusing attention on the criminal charges," Sklar said.

A Justice Department spokesman said he would have no comment before the hearing in the civil case.

To make its criminal case against Abu Ali, the government could have to disclose details about his detention that it has sought to keep secret made aware to the Senators of a newly discussed policy that could be implemented regarding bag searches in the dormitories. Goldschmidt and several other student representatives are on a subcommittee in which this topic was discussed, all of whom were vehemently opposed for multiple reasons.

Bag check issue raised

SGA from page 1

"A year and half ago, an alcohol task force wanted Student Affairs Judicial Issues Committee to look into alcohol and bag searches [on UMass campuses]," Goldschmidt said, "then [the task force] realized what a huge cost this would be."

Goldschmidt noted that this idea came directly from the office of Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Michael Gargano, a member of the administration who the SGA has refused to work with in the past.

Associated Press

President Bustamante will not confirm or deny if he will seek reelection.

Gargano said that he has not received any report or opinion from SAJC or any of the subcommittees and that this idea is "it its preliminary discussion stages."

"There is no official report," Gargano said, "we just wanted to see it [bag searches] were even a possibility."

Both Gargano and Goldschmidt agreed that there are some serious legal issues with implementing such a policy.

"We have to show if it even makes sense," Gargano said, "who we should consider [to enforce the policy] and under what pretenses because there are some serious legal issues involved."

Goldschmidt told the Senate what exact laws and issues he believes are being violated. He said that the dormitories are the homes of students here, and to search their private and personal belongings is unconstitutional and a violation of an amendment. Even though he said that he is opposed to underage drinking, he maintained that there are alternatives to bag searching.

"[UMPD] is watching distribution in the parking lots," he said, "they are trying to see what is going in and out of the dorms."

Goldschmidt reiterated that he feels the needs to protect the students and that these are not just student rights, but rights of every citizen in the United States.

Gargano also reiterated that this plan is "simply a discussion" and that "we need to consult legal representation before we even consider anything."

Former truck driver expected to plead guilty to beheading

By Michael Kunzelman
Associated Press

BOSTON — Police found the prostitute's dismembered body dumped behind a home for disabled soldiers. Her head and hands turned up three years later on a beach north of the city.

Authorities say they know how the woman's life ended, but her identity remains a mystery more than four years after the grisly slaying.

Former truck driver Eugene McCollom, 40, who has already admitted to killing and beheading a Boston man, is expected to plead guilty Thursday to second-degree murder in Essex Superior Court in the death of the unnamed prostitute. He faces a possible life sentence, but would be eligible for parole after 15 years, said Steve O'Connell, a spokesman for Essex District Attorney Jonathan Blodgett.

In a deal with prosecutors, McCollom pleaded guilty to manslaughter on Feb. 9 in the 2001 decapitation of John "Jackie" Leyden. He's serving a 10- to 12-year sentence for that crime.

After his arrest in August 2001, McCollom gave investigators a chilling account of the night he crossed paths with the prostitute.

He said he picked her up in Boston's Combat Zone section on Nov. 11, 2000, then drove her to his room at the YMCA in Lynn, where they argued over money. He allegedly told police that he strangled her to death and beheaded the corpse, but couldn't explain why he mutilated her body.

"I really have no idea," he said in a written statement to police. "I was just experimenting with the knife."

Two days later, the woman's headless remains were found on the grounds of the Soldiers' Home in Chelsea. A surveillance camera there captured footage of McCollom dumping the body.

Authorities cobbled together a sketchy description of the victim: She was a light-skinned African-American or Hispanic woman between the ages of 16 and 25, with reddish hair and purple toenails. Her height ranged from 5 feet to 5-foot-6, and she weighed between 100 and 130 pounds.

In January 2004, police found the woman's head and hands buried in a container on a beach in the North Shore town of Nahant.

O'Connell said investigators checked out numerous missing persons reports and circulated a drawing of what they believed she looked like.

But none of it yielded any answers about the woman's identity.

"We have done everything we could to try to make an identification," O'Connell said.

Olinka Briceno, an outreach worker who counsels teen prostitutes in Boston, said she isn't surprised police haven't come up with a name or located friends and relatives.

"The population we're working with are very disconnected from family, from their communities," said Briceno, who runs A Way Back, which tracks runaway girls with a history or high risk of prostitution.

Many are plucked from their hometowns and forced to travel from city to city, she said.

McCollom met his other known victim, Leyden, at an Alcoholics Anonymous meeting. On the night of the murder, McCollom brought a metal pipe and knife to Leyden's East Boston apartment and, after they drank a few beers together, bludgeoned him with the pipe and cut off his head. McCollom took the head to Fort Lauderdale, Fla., and buried it in a park.

Leyden's brother, William, discovered the body two weeks later and was charged with the murder, but he was cleared when McCollom emerged as a suspect.

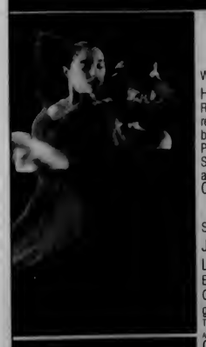
Pope makes longest apperance since recent health troubles

POPE from page 1

tal. Fully alert, he waved and gave his blessing at the end.

Several thousand pilgrims were brought into a Vatican auditorium, where the pope's weekly public audience is held. The crowd applauded when he spoke.

Originally, the pontiff was scheduled to address and bless them from his apartment window overlooking St. Peter's Square.



The 84-year-old pope was rushed to the hospital with breathing difficulties Feb 1 after suffering a bout of the flu. Since his return to the Vatican, he has been slowly resuming his activities.

John Paul has a busy schedule ahead of him, but the Vatican was holding off immediate confirmation of the pope's participation, deciding a day at a time.

His planned events include audiences with Israeli and Palestinian tourism ministers Friday and the president of Azerbaijan on Saturday.

On Thursday, he is scheduled to participate in a Vatican meeting to approve candidates for sainthood. John Paul has proclaimed more saints in his 26 years as pope than all his predecessors in the past 500 years combined.

Spring Performances 2005
Experience it all
from the edge of your seat!

Wednesday, March 2
Hubbard Street Dance Chicago
Recognized worldwide for it's exuberant, athletic, and eclectic repertory, Hubbard Street incoporates diverse influences from ballet to American musical theatre to cutting-edge choreography. Program includes "Rooster" in homage to the rolling stones. Sponsered by Florence Savings Bank, Valley Kids, The River 93.9 and WFCR 88.5
Concert Hall at 7:30pm

Saturday, April 9
Jazz at Lincoln Center's Afro-Latin Jazz Orchestra
Led by Arturo O'Farrill
Experiance how the music of Machito, Maria Bauza, Chico O'Farril, Rene Hernandez, Antonio Carlos Jobim, and other Latin greats ignited the dance floor and revolutionized Jazz.
THIS PERFORMANCE IS PART OF A DAY-LONG HIGH SCHOOL JAZZ FESTIVAL SPONSERED BY THE FINE ARTS CENTER AND THE UMASS DEPARTMENT OF MUSIC AND DANCE
Concert Hall at 8:00pm

The Fine Arts Center
University of Massachusetts Amherst
For Tickets: 545-2511 or 1-800-999-UMAS
WWW.FINEARTSCENTER.COM

enter to win DVD's
Seafood
N.Y. Strip Loin Steak
Stuffed Breast of Chicken with Broccoli & Cheese
Tofu Kebabs
African Vegetable Stew
Barley Tomato Risotto
Roasted Red Potatoes
Green Bean Almondine
Fresh Cauliflower
Harvest Spice Cake
Warm French Baguette
Warm Ciabatta Bread
ONE STARRY NIGHT
FEB 27th
5 to 8 PM in all DCs
Dining Services

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 2005

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." -Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

A lack of campus activism

Aaron Wodin-Schwartz

A campus is one of the most politically active arenas that most college graduates ever experience. Universities are bastions of young radical thought, illusions of intellectual grandeur, and more political discourse and activism than Pennsylvania Avenue. As such, they are an exciting place to be, and often catch the attention of national and international political networks.

The political culture at state universities is distinct from that of small, private campuses because of the complicated politics of large schools and the public bureaucracy that runs them. A diversified student body also assures far more special interest groups than elsewhere and a continuous flurry of political activity on every level.

The history of activism here on the Amherst campus shows that effective student mobilization for a cause is generally able to make positive gains for the students.

The University of Massachusetts is one of the few places I've been where the population has such direct access to policy makers. The history of activism here on the Amherst campus shows that effective student mobilization for a cause is generally able to make positive gains for the students. Building takeovers, Beacon Hill lobbies, and teach-ins have all graced the rich history of UMass political activity.

There is also a growing sense of apathy within the student body. Whereas a couple of years ago editorials and uninterested students stepped out of line by criticizing the outbreaks of activism in response to an Iraq war, public education cuts, and a heated reproductive rights debate, most new students will now finish their UMass careers without hardly noticing the presence of activist RSOs. Of course, this trend is compounded by Mike Gargano's increasingly fascist policies as Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs, which seem to view any attempt at student organization or assembly as childish insubordination and a threat to his "zero tolerance" reign.

We the students beg to differ, Mr. Gargano, and if these policies are left unchecked they will permanently damage the ability of RSOs to work for their causes and will scare away new members and future student leaders. The specifics of this damage, and its undoing, are a discussion for another time and a task that should be left for the SGA and the student body and its organizations to handle.

Yet if we are to strengthen activism, be it conservative or progressive, student organizations need strong leadership and better membership incentives. Two of the main reasons that many students choose not to get involved in political activism around campus is that they either feel little passion for the cause or see little future in dedicating their energies to such an end. Those groups that are the most successful and command the greatest university presence are not the ones with the greatest funding, but the ones with strong leadership that set concrete group goals and have an activist network beyond the campus. For example, the Republican Club receives ten times more funding from the SGA Ways and Means Committee than the UDEMS, which has a greater budget than Democracy Matters or the International Socialist Organization.

Political Research Advocates, a non-partisan political research institute in Somerville, recently commissioned a study of student activism on campuses around the country and came up with some interesting results and recommendations for students hoping to organize and groups seeking to improve their current networks and resources. The author of the study, Pam Chamberlain, will be speaking on her findings from 7-9 p.m. in room 803 of the Campus Center tonight.

Chamberlain's talk, and similar talks that follow, are important in understanding both the evolving political culture of the University and its place within political movements in the country at large, as well as organizational differences between conservative and progressive movements. This is a valuable resource for anyone engaged in campus organizing and political activism.

Aaron Wodin-Schwartz is a Collegian columnist

The decline of UMass

Mathew M. Burke

UMass has been good to a lot of us. Most of us have made friends here that will be with us until the end. Some people even find their future husbands and wives at a basketball game or at the Spring Concert. A lot of the students do not decide on a career until they are here at the University. For the seniors, we've grown with the University, and it is a special place.

I grow silent when I enter the Curry Hicks Cage where Dr. J dunked before the rest of the country learned of his amazing talents and gravity defying gifts. I'll never forget the real Hobart Hoedown (three years ago) before the bungling Amherst police department ruined that with their overanxious "shoot-'em-up-mentality."

I remember the concerts, the parties, the classes, the sporting events, the comedy shows, the bars, the homework, the 20 page papers, before the cops became party vigilantes, and last but not least, the greediness. Some things about UMass and higher education I'll never forget, like the fact that fee and tuition hikes, slashing of pell grants and other aid and the costs of books are slamming the doors of the university to those who need it the most.

I'll never forget the day I realized I wanted to be a journalist. It's an important job in my eyes. We expose injustice, right? This column may be about straight up robbery, or maybe I'm wrong and it is an indictment of our society in general. You decide if this is a problem that can be fixed or not.

The University of Massachusetts used to be a beacon of hope in a cruel world. If you were poor and from Springfield or the other struggling surrounding areas you might have been able to get the financial aid needed to enroll. If you were from Dorchester or Cape Cod, New Bedford or Lynn, UMass was the escape that could save your life. You'd probably owe what would seem like an insurmountable amount of money upon your exit, but it was possible. You could have dreams of a better life, and maybe even reach them. Perhaps your children would be able to enjoy things you never had. Perhaps you wouldn't have to work yourself to death in a factory or on graveyard shifts like your parents did. A college degree in a lot of ways guaranteed a better life. The system was never perfect, but it functioned.

However, I am ashamed that the Board of Trustees, the Chancellor, the Governor and even our state representatives have turned a blind eye to the growing inaccessibility of this university to the poorer classes of potential students in the state.

Most of these people are rich and need a quick dose of reality. Nowadays, if you come from what you would call a middle-class family and you have one parent that works, you may not get enough financial aid to survive. That is the truth. I actually have gone two out of the four years that I've been here without buying books. Somehow, I managed to survive and get decent grades, but I figured food and rent were better than books. This being my second to last semester, I went all out. I spent the $400 on textbooks, new editions of course. If I were poorer, I may have already given up before I got here. I may have ended up another drug dealer.

... I am ashamed that the Board of Trustees, the Chancellor, the Governor, and even our state representatives have turned a blind eye to the growing inaccessibility of this university...

I've heard that this will add to the prestige of the University. I know, we'll get rid of the riff-raff and all will be well, right? We'll confine them — those struggling people — to their towns, their ghettos, their streets, denying them the chance to get educated. They can kill themselves off, right? Or they can build our houses, right?

Isn't this an old medieval era practice by the noble establishment? Only now there are poor whites, there are poor Hispanics and blacks, poor Asians, and there are poor Middle Easterners, looking for a better life. Without these people at the University, UMass will be on the same scale as Harvard or the other snobby schools. It'll be great. The blood will wash off your hands Lombardi, Romney, and Board of Trustees. I promise.

This is not UMass. This is not what UMass is or what UMass stands for. It's tainted and tarnished by a few clowns in government here and at the State House that don't care. Their kids will get the best education money can buy. It probably won't even be here. Where is the sense of urgency to fix this problem as fees increase?

Pell grants that have been canceled need to be reinstated and even given more money. The bureaucracy surrounding their distribution needs to be cleaned up as well. The fees need to go down for those in need. I would even ask all the politicians to make sure that more financial aid is given to those in inner cities and troubled areas because I'll bet there isn't enough.

Romney, write a bill, how about some more money for financial aid in general, it's more important than mulling over whether you should run for President in '08. Crime will drop if we get kids in school.

Maybe we could even establish new scholarship funds. Instead of calling alumni and begging for money to make sure the shrubs outside of Whitmore are pruned weekly, we could ask for contributions to aid. Perhaps if we were Division I-A football we could make money like UConn, and could give aid and scholarships from revenue that comes in from that.

These suggestions might not work, but it's a start. Why would we try and fix the system though? We'll just shut people out to improve our image, and like the nerd that tries to be a cool kid, we'll never truly be accepted. We'll just hurt a lot of good people along the way.

One of you will write in saying that I'm wrong and that the system works. Well then, why is it so hard? Why are people struggling and nothing productive is ever done? Answer that.

Matthew M. Burke is a Collegian columnist.

Inebriated Neanderthals

Wesley La Rochelle

We were sitting there on the couch, enjoying our drinks and our cushy seclusion from the otherwise packed house. At least 50 people crammed into the living room, hallway, kitchen and line to the bathroom. It was just another party with my best friend, and we joked and laughed like any other night out.

Then, as usual, just another little tidbit was added to make the night slightly more eventful.

My friend, daringly, and playfully, bumped her boot to the butt of the kid standing in front of us. She giggled and I covered my mouth with excited anticipation for his reaction. He turned, hovering high over our positions on the couch. He looked so dark and menacing as he leered at me from under a brimmed cap.

"You kick me?" he said. "No," I exclaimed in an "obviously-not" sort of way. "I did," my friend, in turn, replied.

He turned away. She bumped him again and as she did, I merrily pushed her leg away while the drunken man above turned back toward us. The two of us, dwarfed by this tree, laughed hysterically like two tickled school kids.

"You do it?" he said to me again.

"I did," said my friend, once again bravely taking the blame. But he still looked at me.

"Faggot!" he said.

My friend is the kind of smart, down-to-earth girl any guy would like to have by his side. She's lighthearted, and simply put, a great companion to this gay boy. I, being gay, try to always keep a light attitude and good persona as well. I tell myself I could make friends with anyone, not being one to judge, so long as they like me in return. I love going to parties with my friends and meeting new people, and I never think bad about anyone without reason. But this guy took it upon himself to disregard my friend's mischievous tease and still loomed foreboddingly closer to me.

I laughed at his comment, looked at my friend and yelled as loud as I could, "He called me a faggot!"

"No personality," my friend said forthrightly. I couldn't have cared less that he said that to me. To me, it just demeaned his intelligence and I was not going to let someone with such a character take away my good night.

He turned to his friends. I could see them exchanging a few words, at which time a couple turned look at me. A few seconds later, a second kid stepped closer and looking down at me said, "Faggot. Pussy!" His words were barely audible in the mixture of blasting music and conversations.

Mingling and dancing with friends was all I needed to remind myself that, regardless of how the aggressors acted, they definitely weren't having as great a time as I was. It just reminds me that sometimes the best defense is no defense.

I yelled to my friend and mockingly repeated his words.

"Nobody has personality at this party!" she yelled. "What the hell?"

I smiled and laughed; she couldn't be more right. These guys didn't have any personality, and it was becoming apparent that their idea of a good night out was taking out their aggression on anyone they wished to fight. This wasn't the first time I was the target, so I brushed it aside.

However, these inebriated Neanderthals, as I like to call them, that attend these parties now officially frustrate me. When will they remember that a party is a place to go to have fun and meet people? Why do these ignorant drunkards insist on ruining other people's night time after time, and ruin their own party excursion as well? This example is just a small insight into the world of those that look for trouble and those that have been forced to become the target of it.

Granted, I worried a little that the situation might escalate, but my friend assured me that the many male friends she had at the party would see to it that nothing happened. I went on with the night and honestly, couldn't have had more fun. Mingling and dancing with friends was all I needed to remind myself that, regardless of how the aggressors acted, they definitely weren't having as great a time as I was.

It just reminds me that sometimes the best defense is no defense.

Next time you go out, have a lighthearted attitude. Go with the anticipation of having fun, and keep in mind that others want to do the same. There's no need for name-calling and demeaning another person. It is uncalled for, particularly at college. This isn't middle school anymore. If you see two people laughing it up and perhaps teasing you at the same time, remember, it's all on good terms. Think to yourself, "that's nice that they're having fun."

Then assume that they just want you to be, too.

Wesley LaRochelle is a UMass student.

A world of second guessers

Nicolle Rosario

It often seems that we spend most of our lives second-guessing ourselves. "Should I do this or that?" Well actually, we wonder what other people will think if we do "this" or "that."

When exactly did rejection become the plague that people are willing to do just about anything to avoid? What about regret? When did regret take a back seat to rejection? In other words, we should be more fearful of regretting not following our hearts, than following our hearts and getting rejected.

Yet this doesn't seem to be the case at all. It seems to me that people, myself included, would rather ensure a "non-rejected" lifestyle, than do anything outside of their bubble. This can be applied to something as simple as dating or something as big as pursuing a career.

Because people fear the rejection of potentially being alone, they are willing to settle for John Doe — a safe haven — rather than pursue John Dreams. Similarly, because pursuing one's dream may seem too risky, people are willing to pursue the safe career choice, even if they're not completely happy with that choice.

Yet, what about lying on your deathbed wishing you had done things differently? Granted, pursuing a job as an actress may leave you poor and never successful, but to me that is far better than spending your entire life in a 9-to-5 job that you hate.

Is it possible that if we stopped playing the game of life and started participating in the rollercoaster reality of it, we'd be better off, less obsessed with image and more focused on what really matters?

Is it possible that if we stopped playing the game of life and started participating in the rollercoaster reality of it, we'd be better off, less obsessed with image and more focused on what really matters? If you're asking "what really matters?", I'd have to say, and forgive me for the over-used yet under-practiced cliche, what really matters is being true to yourself and not to the person others think you should be.

I spent an entire day once wondering if a guy was going to think I was crazy for getting him a small, stupid gift. Would he think I was coming on too strong; would he tell all his friends I was obsessed? In reality, I should have been thinking that if he thinks giving him a gift is crazy, then he thinks I'm crazy, because it was something I wanted to do. It was something uniquely me, and if he didn't like something that made me me, then what's the point?

I wrote this in response to the overwhelming sense of second-guessing that goes on today. It's quite simple and obvious, yet so many people seem to forget that we only live once. Is it really going to matter ten years from now if Bobby what's-his-name thought you were un-cool?

Go out there and get rejected. You'll get over it, but what you won't get over is fifty years from now when you look back and realize you've lost your opportunity to throw caution to the wind. Chances are you'll regret it, and to me regret is far worse than rejection.

Nicolle Rosario is a UMass student.

Interested in journalism?

The Daily Collegian is currently accepting applications for assistant Ed/Op editor.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 2005

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

MULLINS GOES COUNTRY

Rascal Flatts come to the Zoo

By Erica Lovley
Collegian Staff

The music industry is more than fast cars and fame. And their road to [illegible] been anything but [illegible]

The heartfelt, soul-searching country twang of Rascal Flatts falls sweet on the ears of country music lovers. However, the attention of contemporary fans has also been captured by the trio's unbeatable harmony, upbeat live performances, and real-life lyrics.

With their rustic cowboy good looks and stirring harmony, the country music group will continue their second headlining tour, "Here's to You," by stopping at the Mullins Center Saturday night. The Coors Light-sponsored tour includes stops at 23 cities, and will end in March.

The trio, which formed five years ago, includes Jay DeMarcus, Gary Levox and Joe Don Rooney. Between their first two albums, Rascal Flatts has sold approximately four million discs and are currently topping charts with the release of their third album "Feels Like Today."

Half of Rascal Flatts' winning demeanor is due to their knack for singing straight to cherished memories and raw human emotion.

With vocals that have been compared to the renowned group Alabama, Rascal Flatts continues to perform sell-out shows to thousands of adoring fans across the country. Their most recent album, "Feels like Today," touches on the losses and gains, love and sorrow, death and rebirth of a lifetime. The album sold 200,000 copies the first week it was released.

"We've been living with that song ('Feels Like Today') for over two years," says Rooney in an interview with Kelly Fabian of About.com. "It's got a different feel and a different message, a way of presenting today as the day to get over that struggle in your life."

Over the course of approximately three years, the trio has gone from the list of "New Faces" at the Country Radio Seminar in Nashville to the top of the "Super Faces" list, which showcases the top musicians in the industry.

The group has basked in the glory of hot hits such as "I Melt," "Mayberry," their biggest single so far, and "I'm Movin' On," which earned them the ACM's "Song of the Year" award. The group was also named "Vocal Group of the Year" by the ACM, ASCAP, and CMA. Their most recent single, "Bless the Broken Road," reached the number one spot on the hot singles chart.

The music video for "I Melt" caused a heated fervor with adoring female fans when Joe Don Rooney's naked bottom appeared during what could arguably be one country music's steamiest videos of the past few years.

"We're beyond blessed," said DeMarcus in an interview on the Rascal Flatts Web site, www.rascalflatts.com. "It keeps getting better and better. It's meant bigger crowds and more people knowing our music."

The band has had four top-10 singles since their premier CD, "Rascal Flatts," went platinum, making the group one of only three debut records to go platinum in the last five years.

Second cousins and close friends, DeMarcus and Levox were raised in Columbus, Ohio, where music and family was a way of life. DeMarcus left first for Nashville in 1992, with his first record deal with East to West, a Christian group. Levox eventually gave up his job in the Ohio Department of Mental Retardation in 1997 to join his friend.

"We started writing together," said DeMarcus. "We'd stay up endless nights writing music and playing together."

Rooney, a native of Picher, Ohio, appeared on the scene when he and DeMarcus both played in Chely Wright's band.

"Definitely going platinum was our biggest goal," said Rooney.

"Now, we want to expand on the foundation we started to build with that first album, and with 'Melt,' I think we've accomplished that."

Aside from the bright lights and a heavy tour schedule, Rascal Flatts are national spokesman for the American Red Cross, and have played for the President and First Lady.

Information from the Rascal Flatts Web site www.rascalflatts.com, as well as About.com was used in this article.

Rascal Flatts
Saturday
Mullins Center
UMass
$36 and $46

Unschooled surfers start fashion line

By Katherine Nguyen
The Orange County Register

NEW YORK — The invitation said 5 p.m.

But curious press, buyers and a jet-set crowd of style mongers began gathering an hour before in the foyer of a rustic, 160-year-old mansion, the dramatic backdrop for four Orange County, Calif., surfers to debut their clothing line at New York Fashion Week.

Camera crews lined up for interviews. After a week of dealing with the fashion press, the guys already knew what to say:

"We're four surfers from Newport Beach with no fashion background, but started making clothes out of our dorm room in college."

John Whitledge, Jeff Halmos, Sam Shipley and Josia Lamberto-Egan formed a design collective called Trovata. They just wanted to make clothes that reflected their lifestyle. They chose to live in Orange County to stay away from the trendy influences of New York and Los Angeles, and to be close to the surf in Newport Beach.

Yes, they're surfers, but as they politely clarified, the clothes aren't surfer-ish. Think more along the lines of preppy with a vintage flair. And yes, it's true, none of them went to design or fashion school.

That was the spiel the four found themselves repeating during Fashion Week after nabbing a fashion award that most aspiring designers can only dream about. Their Cinderella story had fashion editors buzzing.

Vogue magazine called them "Four surfers hanging 10 in the fashion waters." GQ magazine hailed them as one of the best up-and-coming designers.

"The media wants to know that we're these happy-go-lucky surfers who unwittingly stumbled into fashion genius," said Lamberto-Egan, Trovata's bearded production director. "They want us to be these surfer guys, but the truth is, yes, we like to surf, but we haven't been because we're really busy working."

However much they may protest the assigned schtick, surfers with zero fashion credentials, they can't deny that it scored the necessary appeal for Trovata. The carefree and winsome line of polos, blazers and T-shirts proved that designer clothes don't have to be a glamorous, glossy production to get noticed in New York, the epicenter of fashion.

For guys who prefer comfy old T-shirts and sneakers to big-name designer clothes, Fashion Week was a strange reality.

Strange for example, to have more than 100 ridiculously good-looking models stroll through their showroom in New York, hoping to be cast in the Trovata show.

Shipley, the 25-year-old art director, was busy putting together the right ensembles for the show but couldn't help getting distracted every time a stunning model nonchalantly stripped down to her skivvies in the showroom to try on a different outfit.

Whitledge got hands-on with the models, tugging on their pants to make sure they sat just right on the hips and tousling hair for the "just-in-bed" effect. He delighted in picking up a pair of polka-dotted socks or strand of pearls to accessorize the outfits and got exeited when he realized the Moroccan-looking shoes he picked up at a flea market in Paris completed the look perfectly.

"Awesome!"

This from a guy who never combs his shaggy, sun-kissed hair and is happiest in a T-shirt, jeans and his worn-in New Balance running shoes.

The guys are quick to say that their clothes are not genius.

"We're not re-inventing the wheel at all," said Lamberto-Egan. "This isn't really fashion. But the details we've all put into the line is what we're really stoked about."

Details such as creating an engaging storyline behind every collection: The guys brainstorm every season to create a fictional character and base the clothes around what they believe would be in the character's wardrobe.

Their most recent collection for example, revolves around the story of the Fitzgilberts, three generations of an old-money family from New England who've watched their fortunes decline and are now gathering at a reunion to restore the family's power and wealth. The theme for their runway presentation: "Pompous and Penniless."

The invitation to their show consisted of a handwritten letter (Lamberto-Egan's scruffy cursive penmanship), and Shipley designed the program with hand sketches of the family members above a box that reads, "In our proud veins run nobility, prosperity and a healthy dose of cognac."

With the help of their savvy team of publicists, the guys selected the historical National Arts Club, located in the 160-year-old Tilden Mansion, as the perfect setting for the Fitzgilberts' story to be introduced.

See TROVATA on page 6

The four men of Trovata came together at college over their disdain for surfer fashion. Above, is a still frame from this seasons line.

Eve: is intimacy a basic human need?

Original Sin

Eve

I have noticed most recently that sex causes three predominant difficulties in men and women. Sex may complicate relationships, lessen complications in relationships or make life more complicated for those lacking these intimacies.

Let me explain.

I conducted a secret case study on my girlfriend in order to prove a theory. Can sex disrupt a romantic tie and lead to fighting and higher expectations of each other? I believe it is safe to say yes to this question.

My girlfriend is from Boston, and we grew up together in a similar environment, similar culture, and similar interests. However, when it came to sex, we lay on extremely opposite poles of the spectrum. She was a virgin throughout three serious relationships, and had no intentions of losing her innocence until last summer. She then unexpectedly met someone who she considered perfectly fit for a commitment. She was absolutely correct with her judgment. I have never witnessed such a beautiful connection.

They never fought, they never complained, they never had typical relationship issues, and they never had any expectations. They were content, happy, and caused almost everyone to feel envious of their bond. But, of course, they never had sex.

Then they did. I quietly awaited the repercussions.

"I don't get it," she said. "Why is he suddenly making a big deal out of everything? I feel like every day is a new ridiculous argument. Why is our relationship becoming so complicated?"

I shook my head in annoyance that my theory might make sense.

"Sex is a physical intimacy that leads to expectations, but even if you start fighting, at least you can look forward to make-up sex," I said.

She smiled, but that was all I could say. I then started to notice that sex can cause the exact opposite of what my girlfriend had experienced.

I remember being casually involved with a guy for a full year. We only had sex. We saw other people, we had no expectations, and we denied emotion toward each other. We were equally satisfied with our casual encounters, and used this intimacy to smooth over potential complications. I found our relationship remarkable on many levels.

Somehow we were able to sustain our feelings and remain stable as if our continuing encounters were like our first. We made a no-strings-attached rule from the beginning, and left on the same note. No one got hurt, and no one fought. When I reminisce, I have no idea how that worked. But it did.

My last question, I feel, has a more obvious answer: Do those who lack intimacy for long periods of time change in personality? My best guy friend has lacked emotional comfort and sex for over a year now. He is shy, quiet, and completely inexperienced in the dating world. I have seen a steady decline in his friendliness toward others, and no one has understood why this might be happening. His reactions are aggressive; his intent is uncaring, and he seems extremely frustrated with everything. If I attempt to hug him, he pushes me away. If I am in a good mood, he is quick to put me down.

Instead of getting angry about his behavior, I excuse it with the notion that he is lacking one of his basic human necessities. It is important that men and women remain consistently intimate, and I have seen that those who are involved tend to be happier. The moment sex becomes a major part of intimacy complications seem to arise. So is it better to have sex without intimacy? Or have intimacy without sex? I don't know, but both of these variables together or lack of these variables altogether can only be variably complicated.

New clothing line isn't just for surfers

TROVATA from page 5

They hired sullen-looking models to play the part of spoiled aristocrats dressed in Trovata. Instead of sending the models down the usual runway for a quick, 10-minute show, models played a mock round of croquet in an elaborate garden-like setting and lounged in the dimly lit parlor.

The idea was to allow people to get close to the clothes instead of watching a blur of fashions flit by. Buyers and members of the press walked up to the models to touch the clothing.

"That way, everyone can really see all the details we put in the clothes," said Lamberto-Egan.

The clothes are simple. Classic and preppy with a scruffy, laid-back feel. A way-cooler version of Abercrombie&Fitch, but way more relaxed than Ralph Lauren's Polo collection.

Shirt and jacket buttons are glassy, whimsical. Corduroy pants have a slouchy, comfortable fit with contrasting stitch detail.

Patches telling the season's story are sewn into coat and shirt linings. Funky graphic prints are subtly screened onto button-down shirts.

T-shirts, which sell for about $50, carry fun messages such as "Champagne Taste on a Beer Budget."

In between setting up the presentation, the men stopped to be interviewed by fashion writers.

"I saw their first line at Barney's, bought a jacket and have been a fan since," said Matthew Schneier, a writer for Paper magazine. "It's rare to find menswear that's so wearable."

Whitledge brought the guys all together. When he was 16, he decided he wanted to travel, surf and be creative. After working in a surf and skate shop, he figured it made sense to start his own clothing line and started doing research.

Originally from Florida, Whitledge looks like the typical California surfer boy: shaggy hair, piercing blue eyes and a sunny smile. He met the full-bearded Lamberto-Egan, 27, at Pomona College.

Lamberto-Egan had become somewhat of the dorm tailor, using an old Singer sewing machine passed on to him by his grandmother. He played around with the Singer after splitting his pants one day and taught himself how to hem vintage suits he bought.

Halmos, who went to high school with Whitledge, is the tallest of the bunch and has a head full of white and black peppered hair. Halmos met Shipley while attending the University of Colorado.

It didn't take long for the whole group to meet. They all shared a common interest in clothes, especially vintage and thrift-store digs.

They had also attended prep schools and most had worked in surf and skate shops. Shipley even created his own line of T-shirts in high school.

After Whitledge got everyone on board, they decided to name their clothing line Trovata, which means "to be found" in Italian.

"We didn't really like the stuff at the surf and skate shops and figured we should make clothes that we would wear," said Shipley, who does all the art and graphic work for the line.

They had to learn everything on the go. What's a rivet? Shank? Grommet? What's a showroom?

They scoured countless thrift stores and army-surplus shops to find cool pieces for inspiration. When they didn't know something, they would ship a pair of pants off to a manufacturer to ask, "What's this?"

They shipped their first test collection in 2002, a measly four pieces of simple polo shirts and board shorts with a cowboy theme from their dorm room after wrangling a meeting with buyers from Barney's, who became their first client. Deals with American Rag and Fred Segal would soon follow.

"We figured if we started out at the best stores, we can pretty much go anywhere from there," said Whitledge.

They didn't know at the time that the right way to do it was to have a showroom to invite buyers to check out their line. They just decided to go straight to the buyer.

"We just called them up, told them a little about ourselves and got them to meet with us," said Whitledge. "Our motto became, 'It's always worth a try.'"

After college, they moved to Orange County in 2003.

"We liked that it wasn't L.A. and (was) away from all the trendy hype but close enough to the beach for us to surf," said Whitledge.

They rented a two-bedroom townhome in Huntington Beach. Their kitchen and living room doubled as their office. Their garage served as the DC, or distribution center.

"We would have these huge trucks park on the street to unload all of our shipments all the time," said Whitledge. "Who knows what the landlord thought we were doing?"

They had to be clever when dealing with clients who wanted to meet them at their office.

"We would tell them, 'Um, why don't we take you out for lunch somewhere instead?'" said Whitledge, laughing. "We would eventually realize that we needed things like a laser printer, fax and a phone system, too."

Their first collection sold out at Barney's in two weeks. They finally set up a real office in Newport Beach, in a converted boathouse. Business meetings are conducted across the street at Alta Coffeehouse, over sandwiches and salads at their usual patio table.

Actor Luke Wilson was one of the first celebrities to contact them. Actually, Wilson's people called the Trovata office to request a corduroy blazer. (Wilson didn't pay, of course.)

Actors Orlando Bloom and Jake Gyllenhaal are reported to be fans. Soccer star David Beckham special-ordered a shirt.

They now have showrooms in Europe, Japan and Australia.

But while in New York for Fashion Week, Lamberto-Egan shared a bed with Shipley in a hotel room. The clothing line has certainly turned a decent profit, but still, they insist on staying within budget.

"Just being able to get hotel rooms and putting meals on the company tab feels like we've made it," said Lamberto-Egan.

COURTESY TROVATA

The surfers that created Trovata, a new fashion line, set up shop in Newport Beach, Calif. in order to escape the vices of Hollywood. Even still, celebrities and fashionistas alike have clamored for the clothes.

Citizen Cope shows potential

By Nathan Rothstein
Collegian Correspondent

Hailing from the land of Elvis, Citizen Greenwood is Citizen Cope. On his sophomore effort, the Memphis-born singer, DJ and producer makes an album with a very recycled sound.

But it never hurts to recycle. He is on to something special, but never does quite reach his musical peak. Even though some bits were likely found in the recycle bins of Jack Johnson and Ben Harper, Citizen Cope may have something different to offer. It may not be as evident now, but there is hope for the future.

His album, released in 2004, starts off with a soulful, playful number that can only excite smart music listeners. His voice is raw and sharp, and the sound is fresh. This is expected whenever an artist collaborates with James Poyser.

Poyser, who orchestrated the Neo-Soul movement, has created appealing sounds for Erykah Badu, Talib Kweli, The Roots and many more. Fortunately for the southern singer, Poyser gives Greenwood something dazzling to work with. Greenwood deserves some credit for finding the right musicians, but it would be nice if the rest of the album could match the energy of the songs readily available by the already established artists.

On "Son's Gonna Rise," Greenwood exhibits his strengths while supported by the guitar riffs of Carlos Santana. Between his first song and this track, his voice softens up and the sound dries up. It is easy listening, but it's not something that sticks. Music is supposed to get in the veins and release a feeling, rather than invoke the desire to change tracks.

There is a certain point when his vocals can no longer carry the album, and the upbeat flavor loses its fluff with redundant, overused instrumentals. Those who enjoy Jack Johnson, albeit with a different face, will enjoy a majority of the album. He does a very good job of doing what already has been done, and he can take some well-deserved credit for that achievement.

Greenwood shines when he steps beyond the norm, and delves into a fusion of hip hop/R&B/rock/ and folk. On his single, "Bullet and a Target," Greenwood gets everything right. His style is cool. The sound is harsh, but melodic, and the lyrics are meaningful. To top it off, he has an addictive break down, completed with a rhythm and blues Church-like clap.

Greenwood may have not been able to put everything together smoothly, but he is worth taking the time to know.

COURTESY IN A RECORD

Infused with influences like Jack Johnson, Carlos Santana, Ben Harper and The Roots, Citizen Cope has potential to shine.

ALL FIRED UP! creative FOOD & BEVERAGE
FEATURING MONGOLIAN BARBEQUE ALL YOU CAN EAT BUFFETS
GRAND OPENING
ALL YOU CAN EAT BUFFET
WITH COUNTLESS COMBINATIONS OF VEGETABLES, POULTRY, FISH, AND MEAT.
CHOOSE FROM 12 SPECIALLY CREATED SAUCES!!!
OPEN 7 DAYS A WEEK FOR LUNCH AND DINNER
Sunday Breakfast
Design your own omelets, pancakes, and french toast 10-4pm
A FANTASTIC FULL BAR MENU
CREATE YOUR OWN MEAL
11:30AM - 9 PM
48 RUSSELL STREET, ROUTE 9, HADLEY
413-584-5155
WWW.ALLFIREDUPHADLEY.COM

At Quinnipiac University School of Law, you'll find all the tools you need, in a setting you can appreciate. From rigorous academics to live-client clinics to real-world externships. From accessible and distinguished faculty to the most advanced technology. Everything you need to succeed. For more information, visit http://law.quinnipiac.edu or call 1.800.462.1944.
QUINNIPIAC UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF LAW
Application for Admission
Office of Admissions
275 Mount Carmel Avenue • Hamden, CT 06518-1948
E-mail: ladm@quinnipiac.edu
CRIMINAL | DISPUTE RESOLUTION | FAMILY | HEALTH | INTELLECTUAL PROPERTY | TAX
Seeking Admission to:
SOLVE PROBLEMS FOR A LIVING.

Sandy's Barber Shop
$12 HAIR CUTS
Walk Ins Only
No appointments
HOURS
MONDAY - FRIDAY: 8 -5
SATURDAYS: 8 - 3
253-3666
96 NORTH PLEASANT STREET (REAR)
AMHERST, MA 01002
NEXT TO D.P. DOUGH

Minutewomen have a tough task in welcoming the Owls mistakes and doesn't work hard that Dacko, like all coaches, has trouble dealing with.

WOMEN'S HOOPS from page 10

Dacko still believes in her young team and thinks the Minutewomen will come out and play Temple tough.

"The team's morale is high," Dacko said. "They're still very young and inexperienced, and sometimes when you look out on the court you realize they haven't played together for very long."

Dacko feels that the team is still working hard, and tonight's game could be the one that snaps them out of this recent funk.

"The kids have been practicing hard," Dacko said. "We need to take care of the ball, and if we do that we'll be fine.

"We look at this game as a great opportunity for us. The bull's-eye on Temple's back keeps getting bigger so hopefully they'll be ripe for the picking."

The Minutewomen would like nothing more than to give their three senior teammates a win in the last home game of their careers. Brooke Campbell, Edris Bailey, and Monique Govan will be honored before the game as part of the Senior Night ceremony.

The key for UMass will be to try to contain Candice Dupree. This task is easier said than done as Dupree is an A-10 Player of the Year candidate.

The junior center is fourth in the league in scoring (16.4) and leads the league in rebounding (9.4) and blocked shots (2.16).

UMass will try to counter with their leading scorer, Pam Rosanio, who has averaged 10.7 points per game.

UMass will also have to try to slow down Dupree's supporting cast. Guard Cynthia Johnson is scoring 13.1 point per game and forward Kamesha Hairston is close behind, averaging 12.8 a game.

"It's going to be a defensive battle," Dacko said.

"We're going to need to box out, take care of the ball, and make open shots."

COURTESY UMASS SIDELINE REPORTER

Freshman Pam Rosanio has scored a team-leading 10.7 points per game this season along with three rebounds and two assists per game.

A-Rod act growing old and killing trees

A-ROD from page 10

Bambino is finito. They won't have to find that piano in the Charles River. Curt Schilling gave all the blood they needed. The new season, the first glorious box score, is less than six weeks away, but the Red Sox can't help themselves. They have darts to throw and A-Rod is in the bull's-eye. They can't stop spouting off about poor A-Rod. (Okay, "poor" might not be the best word.) They can't help themselves. They're just providing material for sports writers like me — not actually me, because I'm up here shoveling snow and they're in Florida shoveling, as my daughter says, shitake mushrooms.

Here's the way it works: Until A-Rod is replaced by a real story, something with a score, for instance, the reporters will keep finding Red Sox and asking them what they think of A-Rod. The Red Sox, who aren't dummies, and not nearly as lovable, will continue to dump all over the well-paid third baseman, who did nothing to them but slap the ball out of a pitcher's glove and didn't get away with it. (Frankly, I was impressed. There aren't many players who can run to first base and think at the same time.)

If this sounds like I'm rooting for A-Rod, maybe I am. When he first joined the Yankees, when he had a million questions thrown at him, he had a million answers. The writers, who needed those answers, were impressed. Yeah, we all know he's slick, but when did slick become a felony? After a game, he's usually the first Yankee in the clubhouse available for conversation. The writers directly in front of him ask their questions first, and they're replaced by the guys too far back to hear the answers. So they ask the same questions, and A-Rod comes through for them. It's rarely startling, or a knee-slapper, or anything you'll find on the back page. But in that clubhouse, where the players come close to making sure every night is silent night, A-Rod's sentences are much appreciated.

On the field, he's nothing short of great. He wasn't the reason the Yankees lost Games 4, 5, 6 and 7. Like the man said, they don't get that close without him. So let me feel sorry for him, and for all this wasted newsprint.

Vic Ziegel is a Knight Rudder columnist.

White working toward NFL Draft

By Brian Davis
Knight Ridder

DALLAS — Preparing for the NFL draft creates some interesting partnerships.

Former Oklahoma quarterback Jason White spends his days throwing to former Southern California receiver Mike Williams as the two train at a facility called Competitive Edge Sports in Duluth, Ga., which is north of Atlanta.

A Sooner throwing to a Trojan?

"That was kind of ironic to me," said CES founder and president Chip Smith.

White probably will throw compliments in USC's direction at Monday night's Davey O'Brien Awards Dinner at the Fort Worth Club. But the humble 24-year-old is actually the main attraction. White will be honored for winning a second straight Davey O'Brien Award for being the nation's best quarterback during the 2004 season.

Archie Manning also will be honored as this year's Legends Award recipient.

White made it abundantly clear last season that he was not chasing individual acclaim. He wanted to help the Sooners win a national championship. Unfortunately, that did not happen as USC defeated OU in the FedEx Orange Bowl, 55-19.

White, who was 27-4 as an OU starter, is now focused on improving all his physical skills for the upcoming NFL scouting combine in Indianapolis. That's why he spends his days at the CES training center with dozens of other athletes, including former OU linebacker Lance Mitchell and receiver Will Peoples, hoping to sign a NFL contract.

White works on three-, five- and seven-step drops with resistance, Smith said, and practices reading defenses. Smith also prepares his clients for the written tests they will take at Indianapolis and sharpens their interviewing skills.

The NFL scouting combine is the job interview White has dreamed about.

"I would love to get an opportunity," White said in December. "There's no risk in those teams letting me try. But if not, I'm not going to be mad, because I've done all I can do. I can look back and honestly say that I worked as hard as I can work to get to this point.

"There's nothing I can go back and do better."

White's biggest problem: He must overcome the stigma of having two reconstructed knees. White must convince NFL scouts that he's 100 percent healthy, that his body won't break down and that he can make all the required throws.

White suffered torn anterior cruciate ligament injuries during the 2001 and 2002 seasons. He bounced back in 2003 to win the Heisman Trophy and the O'Brien Award while leading OU to a 12-2 record and a berth in the Sokia Sugar Bowl.

"You don't win the Heisman Trophy by being a terrible quarterback," Smith said.

Oklahoma quarterback Jason White wowed a lot of people with his numbers in college, but that hasn't stopped the NFL scouts from worrying about his knees.

Moss to be traded to Oakland

By Jon Krawczynski
Associated Press

MINNEAPOLIS — Randy Moss' electrifying talent was no longer enough for the Minnesota Vikings to put up with his distracting antics.

Dante DiTrapano, Moss' agent, told The Associated Press on Wednesday that the Vikings and the Oakland Raiders had "come to an agreement on Randy playing for Oakland next year."

Neither the Vikings nor the Raiders would confirm the deal, which was first reported by The St. Paul Pioneer Press.

"We have had discussions with the Oakland Raiders, but there's nothing to announce," Rob Brzezinski, Minnesota's vice president of football operations, told The Associated Press.

Raiders spokesman Mike Taylor declined comment on the trade reports.

DiTrapano said he didn't know the terms of the deal, but the Pioneer Press reported the Vikings would get linebacker Napoleon Harris, along with the seventh overall pick and a late-round pick in the upcoming draft.

The deal cannot become official until March 2, the start of the NFL's fiscal year.

"It's just like any other contract. There's a meeting of the minds between the people who negotiate for the Vikings and the people who negotiate for the Raiders," DiTrapano said. "It just hasn't been reduced to writing and it won't be until March 2."

Moss is due to make $7.25 million next year. Harris is due to make $5.41 million.

Oakland's renegade owner Al Davis has long embraced combustible players and the vertical passing game, so adding Moss seems to be a perfect fit.

The timing of the move comes as a bit of a surprise with the Vikings in the midst of an ownership change. Red McCombs has agreed to sell the team to Arizona businessman Reggie Fowler, a deal that still needs to be approved by the NFL.

A spokeswoman for Fowler said it would be "inappropriate for Reggie to be commenting at this point" because McCombs still owns the team and is making all the decisions.

Trade rumors have surrounded the flamboyant Moss all offseason. He struggled with a hamstring injury, but still finished with 13 touchdown catches last season. He was fined $10,000 for pretending to pull down his pants and moon the Green Bay crowd during Minnesota's playoff win. He also drew criticism for leaving the field with two seconds left in a regular-season loss against Washington.

Team leaders Matt Birk and Daunte Culpepper confronted Moss after he walked off at Washington, and the organization's patience with the receiver seemed to dwindle in the past year or so.

"He's my good friend, but you almost get to thinking that maybe enough is enough," Culpepper said earlier this month at the Pro Bowl. "And maybe the Vikings organization has had enough."

Last year's transgressions were the latest in a long line of headline-grabbing negative behavior for Moss that included bumping a traffic control officer with his car in 2002, verbally abusing corporate sponsors on a team bus in 2001 and squirting an official with a water bottle in 1999.

But when he was focused and healthy on the field, there was no denying his considerable ability.

His 9,142 career receiving yards are the most by any player over his first seven seasons. The Vikings' offensive identity was built around Moss' uncanny ability to leap over smaller defensive backs to catch deep passes.

Moss burst into the league in 1998 and has been a big reason why the Vikings have sold out every game, including preseason, since he arrived. "The Freak" caught 17 TD passes — many of them long, high-arching throws from Randall Cunningham — to help lead the Vikings to the NFC championship game in his rookie season.

Tired of the Dorms?
•IT'S NEVER TOO EARLY TO LOOK FOR AN APARTMENT WITH LINCOLN REAL ESTATE•
Lincoln Real Estate
25 N. Pleasant St.
253-7879
www.amherstlincolnrealty.com
Now accepting applications for June 2005

STUDENT LEGAL SERVICES OFFICE
UMASS, AMHERST
HELPING STUDENTS PROTECT THEIR RIGHTS FOR 30 YEARS
Free Legal Advice, Referrals, Representation and Counseling for UMASS students
Student & Worker Rights, Family & Personal Law, Landlord-Tenant & Consumer Disputes
CALL 545-1995
or stop in at 922 Campus Center

thinking about internships?
Come to a Field Experience Workshop to learn how to find an internship or co-op and the procedures for applying
TODAY!
Thursday, Feb 24
3 pm
508 Goodell
and Monday, Feb 28
3 pm
508 Goodell
and most Mondays and Thursdays
Also happening today...
How to Impress Interviewers
5:30 pm
508 Goodell
CareerServices
511 Goodell Building
413-545-2224
www.umass.edu/careers

UMass slips past the Rams

MEN'S HOOPS from page 10

Rhody defense en route to a game-high 24 points and 17 rebounds.

Sophomore guard Art Bowers also stepped up big for the Maroon and White, continuing his solid play of late with 18 points.

Senior captain Anthony Anderson returned to action for the first time in two games, entering the game at the 6:11 mark of the first half and playing six minutes.

Much-maligned senior forward Scott Hazelton was the leading scorer for URI (4-20, 2-11 A-10) with 22 points, while freshman forward John Lucky added 14 points.

"I told the guys, I'm 51 now and I want to make it to 52 in a few weeks," Lappas said. "But at the end of the year, no one is going to look back and see how the game was played, they're only going to notice whether you got the W or not."

COURTESY UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

Sam the Minuteman takes the time to pose with the Red Sox World Series trophy last night during halftime at the Mullins Center.

Senior point guard Chris Chadwick single-handedly put UMass out in front for good in overtime with a 3-pointer and a pair of free throws on consecutive possessions.

Momplasir and Hazleton added a basket apiece for Rhody over the rest of overtime, but Bowers and Freeman combined to shoot 4-of-5 from the foul line to deliver the victory.

"When it comes down to overtime, we just feel comfortable," Freeman said. "We know when it's on the line we can put it together and get it done, where other teams might not be able to do that. We have the confidence."

Getting consecutive 3-pointers from Tyrese Sullivan and Lucky, the Rams tied the game at 57 with 53 seconds left in the game.

Lasme responded on the ensuing possession when he converted an easy lay-up to put UMass out in front, but that only set the stage for a bizarre final possession in regulation.

Holding for the last shot in regulation and trailing by two, the Rams could not come up with anything and eventually lost the ball out of bounds in front of their own bench, sending head coach Jim Baron into a tirade that saw him pick up the game ball and throw it down the court.

However, UMass turned the ball right back over when Maxwell took the inbound pass in almost the exact same spot in front of the URI bench and could not keep his feet, falling out of bounds to give the Rams possession back with seven seconds to play.

Immediately inbounding the ball to Hazleton, the former Massachusetts High School Player of the Year came up empty on his first shot attempt, but corralled a loose ball off his miss and tossed in a hook shot off the glass with one second left on the clock to send the game to overtime tied at 59.

"I thought our guy got tripped on the first possession, and I just wanted to assert that with the refs," Baron said. "I was upset that we hadn't gotten the call in the first place, but Scott made a nice play and we're able to come back and get the basket we needed on the possession to tie the game."

Freeman sparked an 8-0 burst with six consecutive points, before a Maxwell lay-up gave the Minutemen their largest lead of the first half at 28-19. The teams headed into intermission with UMass leading 28-21.

URI cut its deficit to five early in the second half, but UMass responded with a 9-3 run to help establish an 11-point lead at 39-28 with 15 minutes to play.

Rhode Island did not go away quietly however, as the Rams got points from four different players on 9-3 surge of their own to get back within three at 45-42 with just under seven minutes to play.

The Minutemen extended their advantage back up to eight with two free throws apiece from Freeman and Chadwick and a Bowers 3-pointer, before the Rams cut it back down to four with four straight points from the foul line.

COURTESY UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

The Minutemen were able to slip past Rhode Island at the Mullins Center last night, holding on for a 70-64 win in overtime.

Match Play Championship to start today

By Doug Ferguson
Associated Press

CARLSBAD, Calif. — Hours after the announcement that the Match Play Championship would not begin until Thursday because of the saturated course at La Costa, one match already was in the books.

Padraig Harrington outlasted Darren Clarke on the practice range.

Leave it to a pair of Irishmen to ignore the cold rain that fell late Tuesday afternoon, after everyone else had left the course and creeks again spilled over the banks and across the fairways.

Clarke hit chips around the green as swing coach Butch Harmon watched from under an umbrella. The 2000 Match Play champion finally left, pausing only to light his cigar.

Harrington, who arrived Monday from playing in Malaysia, tossed a dozen balls in the muck of a bunker and began blasting out, spraying mud on his pants. Then he returned to the driving range, asked for his 5-iron and continued to beat balls in the gloaming. The third shot was as pure as it gets.

"I should play in the rain more often," Harrington said.

That can be arranged. Just move to California.

The final two legs of the West Coast Swing have turned into the "Wet" Coast Swing. First came the rain at Riviera, leading to the first 36-hole event on the PGA Tour in nine years when Adam Scott won the Nissan Open in a playoff Monday. One day later, Wednesday's start of the Accenture Match Play Championship was pushed back one day.

PGA Tour tournament director Mark Russell said La Costa would be available for practice rounds Wednesday, but the staff did not think the course was suitable for competition.

"It's totally saturated," Russell said. "But based on this weather forecast, it's going to get nothing but better. If we get a day of sunshine and breeze, it will get dramatically better, and we're going to present a better golf course for the players."

That means a full day of golf will be washed out for the second time in as many weeks on tour, and the second time in as many years at La Costa.

The second round was postponed last year, leading to two rounds Friday and Saturday, followed by the 36-hole final on Sunday. Tiger Woods won last year, defeating Davis Love III, for his second straight title at La Costa.

"If you get all the way to the finals, it's a physical grind," Woods said Tuesday morning, before the announcement that the first round had been delayed. "Match play is an emotional roller coaster, because of the momentum switches that can happen in one hole, two holes."

Unlike the NCAA basketball tournament, there is no such thing as an upset at La Costa.

Last year was the first time in the six-year history of this World Golf Championship event that two of the top-four seeds made it to the last match.

Jeff Maggert won the first year as the No. 24 seed, followed by Clarke (No. 19). Steve Stricker (No. 55) and Kevin Sutherland (No. 62). Woods won the last two years as the top seed, although he starts this time at No. 2.

Vijay Singh is the No. 1 seed and will play Shingo Katayama of Japan.

"He's a good player. I don't know how he's playing coming into this event, but I have to treat him very strong," Singh said. "I'm going to go out and see if I can play my game and play the best I can and see if I can finish it off."

Singh is coming off his first missed cut in a year, as defending champion at Pebble Beach. No one misses the cut from the 64-man field at La Costa, although this event has not been kind to the 41-year-old Fijian. He has never advanced out of the second round, even against a watered-down field in Australia four years ago.

So while most players like the idea of match play during a full schedule of stroke play, Singh was indifferent.

"I don't mind it," he said. "I think it depends on how you play. Last year, I didn't play very well. I'm driving the ball much better than I did last year, and I've fixed my irons."

Phil Mickelson lives about 20 miles away in Rancho Santa Fe, and because he didn't play last week in the Nissan Open, he played a couple of practice rounds at La Costa. The No. 3 seed, Lefty is coming off back-to-back wins on the PGA Tour by wide margins, although that won't do him any good this week.

He shot 73 in the first round at Phoenix, then rebounded with a career-low 60. Had that been match play, Mickelson probably wouldn't have advanced out of the first round. A week later, he opened with a course-record 62 at Spyglass, closed with a 73 and still won by four shots.

Right now, all they want to do is play.

JOHN GURZINSKI/AZCENTRAL.COM FREE PRESS

Tiger Woods celebrates after making an eagle during last year's Ryder Cup. He will attempt to defend his Match Play Championship this week.

Bonds asking the questions

BONDS from page 10

did? For what?

"What did I do?" he asked. "What did I do?"

What he hoped, of course, was that his counterattack, his red herrings, his obvious attempt at intimidation, would stop us in our tracks.

Not quite. We were still firing salvos back when it ended after 35 minutes, but I can't say for sure that Bonds had a scratch on him. It's hard to hit a moving target.

Part of that was the result of the ground rules laid out by the Giants' PR staff: No questions about the BALCO investigation. Pending legal issues, and all that, they explained.

That didn't keep "Denver Post" baseball writer Mike Klis from asking Bonds straight up: "Have you ever, inadvertently or otherwise, used steroids?"

"Why do you keep asking the same questions?" Bonds responded. "I'm not a child, OK? You repeat things to children."

Of course, the questions continue to be repeated because he doesn't answer them.

Bonds didn't really answer much of anything, though he had plenty to say; most of it venom aimed at the reporters who vex him so.

"You guys are like rerunning stories," Bonds said. "This is old stuff. It's like watching 'Sanford and Son'. It's almost comical, basically. ... Are you guys jealous, upset, disappointed, what?"

Probably all of the above, but that's beside the point, which is exactly the position Bonds wanted to take. We're upset, he said, because he hasn't let us into his private world. We're angry, he's told us, because he hasn't told us who he really is.

"I haven't given you guys what you want," he said.

And if it's not that, then it must be because, with 703 home runs, he's about to pass Babe Ruth's 714 on the all-time home run list.

"Because Babe Ruth is one of the greatest baseball players ever, and Babe Ruth ain't black, either," he said. "I'm black. Blacks, we go through a little more. ... I'm not a racist, though, but I live in the real world. I'm line with that."

And why all the fuss about steroids in the first place? Why aren't we worried about alcohol abuse? Or the environment? Or dogs and cats, living together?

"There are worse things going on in the world," he pointed out.

Sure there are, but baseball's biggest worry, especially with Jose Canseco's tell-all book receiving so much attention, is the steroids scandal. Bonds was lingered indirectly by Canseco as a steroids user.

"I don't know Canseco, besides hello and goodbye," Bonds said. "I don't put any weight into what he says.

"I was better than him then, and I've been better than him his whole career. If he wants to go make money, go ahead. ... For somebody who brags about what he did, I don't see any of your records."

Here's a stop-the-presses revelation: Bonds is all for looking ahead, not back.

"It's time to move on. Move forward and let it go," he urged. "Ya'll stop watching Redd Foxx and rerun shows."

Cheat? Who, him?

"I don't know what cheating is," he said. "I don't believe steroids can help your eye-hand coordination, technically hit a baseball. I just don't believe it. That's my opinion."

Technically, he's probably right. And his amazing gain in muscle mass and exploding home run production, much of it after the age of 35?

"Hard work," he shrugged. "That's about it."

Sure, and maybe a little "flaxseed oil" applied in the right places.

If there was a burgeoning use of steroids all around him in baseball during the '90s, why, he never noticed.

"I never paid any attention to it, nor do I really care," Bonds said. "I worry about me, that's it."

Finally, amidst all the flimflam and the diversionary tactics, one small kernel of truth.

write for sports
sports@daily-collegian.com

UMass & Northampton
PRESS to NYC
Start the weekend off... on the fast track!
FRIDAYS! FRIDAYS! FRIDAYS!
UMass 1:35pm Amherst(ctr) 1:45pm Nhampton 2:10pm
3:35pm 3:45pm 4:10pm
Peter Pan Bus Lines
800-343-9999 www.peterpanbus.com

FOUR Seasons
WINE • LIQUOR • CIGARS
333 Russell St., Rt. 9
Hadley, MA 01035
584-8174
Sale date 02/24 - 03/01
responsible for typographical errors.
Beer
Wine
Carlo Rossi all varieties 4.0 lt $8.99
Principato Pinot Grigio 1.5 lt $8.99
Robert Mondavi Private Selection Chard, Cabernet, Merlot 750 ml $8.99
Chandon Fresco Brut & Extra Dry 750 ml $8.99
Beaulieu Vineyards Coastal 750 ml Merlot, Chard, Cabernet $8.99
Monkey Bay Sauvignon Blanc 750 ml $7.00
Papoi Cabernet, Merlot 1.5lt $7.99
Barton & Guestier
Chard, Cabernet, Merlot 750 ml ..... 2 for $10.00
Liquor
Bailey's Irish Cream 1 lt $22.99
Crown Royal 750 ml $18.99
Romana Sambuca 750 ml $18.99
Jack Daniels Whiskey 750 ml $18.99
Jose Cuervo Tequila 750 ml $16.99
Yukon Jack 750 ml $14.99
Pinnacle Vodka 750 ml $11.99
Carolan's Irish Cream 750 ml $10.99
Seagram's Gin all flavors 750 ml $9.99
Hours: Monday - Saturday 9am - 11pm, Sunday 12pm - 11pm

Rent One of Ours
No additional fee for 21-25 year old drivers
• Cars
• Passenger Vans
• Trucks
• Direct Billing to Insurance Companies
• Free Local Pick Up
• Locally Owned and Operated
549-RENT (7368)
POTTERS Auto & Truck Rentals
at North Amherst Motors
Collision Repair Center
75 Sunderland Road North Amherst, MA 01059
www.northamherstmotors.com
On Bus Route • One Mile North of UMass

No Cals
Last Call
No Carbs
Anti-hangover & nutritional drink
No Hangover
All-Natural Anti-Hangover & Nutritional Drink
Last Call is available now at:
Liquors 44, Four Season's Liquors, Stoney's Pub, Holyoke Liquor Mart, Pop's Liquors, R&P Liquors and Niedbala's.
Ask for it at your favorite bar and restaurant
Campus Rep Opportunities Available, Call for more information
Distributed By Baystate Beverage Distributors, Westfield, MA 413-642-0180
Please Drink Responsibly

STSTRAVEL.COM
Join America's #1 Student Tour Operator
CANCUN
ACAPULCO
JAMAICA
BAHAMAS
FLORIDA
Sell Trips, Earn Cash & Travel Free
1 800-648-4849 www.ststravel.com

ACROSS
1 Health retreat
4 Window material
9 Fresh housing
14 Baby bear
15 Main artery
16 Ryan or Tatum
17 Sumatran ape
19 ___ blanche
20 Outdoor gala
21 Altar vow
23 Musical symbol
24 Mocker
28 Gold powder
29 Parking ticket enforcement gadget
31 "Annabel Lee" poet
34 Mix
35 Merge
38 Large vase
39 Call for help
40 Flying mammal
42 This moment
43 Serenity
45 Male progeny
46 Holy cow!
47 Measured against
51 Justice Bader Ginsburg
53 Places for papers
57 Top point
58 Endeavor
59 Resounding defeat
60 Movers and shakers
62 Cyclades setting
66 More central or new
67 Donahue and Aikman
68 & the rest
69 Host's lead-in
70 Admit, 1956 pate-mate
71 Salty sauce

DOWN
1 Treat with derision
2 More free from adulterants
3 Grow less
4 Comedic jest
5 Costello or Ferrigno
6 Gallery display
7 More sedate
8 Pointing machine
9 "What's up ___?"
10 Continuously
11 Altering course
12 Dillon and McCoy
13 Wintry precipitation
18 Prerequisite
22 Poetic eyeball
25 Diminish
26 Aware of
27 Rara ___
30 Beginning
31 Baby seal
32 Bauxite or pyrite
33 Performance
36 End of a sock
37 Lamb's mama
40 Honcho
41 Picnic pests
44 Sicker
45 Ruth and Diane
48 Blowup letters?
49 Gives a new score
50 Phooey!
51 Diameter halves
52 Sch. in Storrs
54 Snouts
55 Because of
56 Actor Kilmer
61 Theater sign letters
63 Acquired
64 Needle feature
65 Silly billy

Find today's answers online
www.dailycollegian.com

the moan and dove
Scratch this ad to reveal 2 boobs that will hypnotize you into believing the crappy, yellow beer in your hand has flavor.
themoananddove.com
460 West St. • Rte. 116
Amherst, MA • 256-1710
3pm 'til 1am every day

Want to Jumpstart your business?
Advertise with the Collegian

H·O·R·O·S·C·O·P·E·S

aquarius • Jan. 20-Feb. 18
Check your email, because you might find something exciting.

pisces • Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Spit out your gum if your jaw starts getting tired.

aries • Mar. 21-April 19
Be supportive of your friend who is tweaking out.

taurus • April 20-May 20
If only you could stay in bed and eat chicken noodle soup like when you were young.

gemini • May 21-June 21
If things don't work out in the future, you can always be a grape-picker.

cancer • June 22-July 22
Hanging out with your floormates is always a fun time.

leo • July 23-Aug. 22
Today is a good day for a waffle with ice cream.

virgo • Aug. 23-Sept. 22
The snow looks very pretty in the morning sunlight.

libra • Sept. 23-Oct. 22
You need a strong cup of coffee to get you going today.

scorpio • Oct. 23-Nov. 21
Try to keep the zoning out to a minimum today.

sagittarius • Nov. 22-Dec. 21
For once, you've managed to keep a plant alive for a decent amount of time.

capricorn • Dec. 22-Jan. 19
Don't get lost on your way to class today. It is hard sometimes.

UVC-TV 19--UMass' Only Student Run TV Station

Thursday - 2/24/05
7:00pm Umass News
8:00pm Sports Sunday
9:00pm Cold Duck Complex
9:45pm Umass Basketball vs URI 2/23
11:30pm Put Out the Word
12:30am Silly Spider Monkey Fiasco
1:00am Silly Spider Monkey Fiasco
2:30am Entropy ep III
3:00am The Jon Show ep 4
3:25am Umassholes
4:00am Dreamworlds 2

Fri & Sat - 2/25-2/26
5:00pm Umass Basketball vs URI 2/23
7:00pm Umass Basketball vs URI 2/23
9:00pm SGA Meeting 2/23
12:30am Umass Basketball vs URI 2/23
2:30am SGA Meeting 2/23

Sunday - 2/27/05
4:00pm Sports Sunday LIVE
5:00pm NASA Destination Tomorrow
6:00pm Dennis Haskins Speech
7:00pm Kwanzaa
8:00pm Cold Duck Complex
8:45pm Put Out The Word
10:00pm Silly Spider Monkey Fiasco
11:00pm Silly Spider Monkey Fiasco
11:00pm Entropy Episode III
12:30pm The Jon Show ep 4
1:25am Umassholes
2:30am Dreamworlds 2

Quote of the Day

"Kindness is a form of suicide in a world based on the law of competition."

—Mike Gold

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

Activities

Foam party Montreal weekends $89 Montreal Express.Net 1(781)979-9001

Announcements

$600 Group Fundraiser Scheduling Bonus 4 hours of your group's time PLUS our free (yes, free) fundraising solutions EQUALS $1,000-$2,000 in earnings for your group. Call TODAY for a $450 bonus when you schedule your non-sales fundraiser with Campus Fundraiser. Contact CampusFundraiser, (888)923-3238, or visit www.campusfundraiser.com

Apartment for Rent

2 Bedroom $1050 3 Bedroom $1350 4 Bedroom $2100 Now Accepting applications 253-7377 MillValleyEstates@wingnet.com

Apartment for Rent

Spacious 2 Bedroom Apt. Heat/Hwtr Basic and extended cable. High speed internet included. Washer/dryer avail. Great location on Bus Route Minimal move-in costs. 665-3856

1 Bedroom Available North Amherst $425 includes heat & electric bright clean washer/dryer in condo On bus route 1 mile to UMass female preferred Call Liz 508-367-8893

Hobart Condos 3 bedroom, hardwood floors, study area in basement. Cable, telephone (internet access) in all bedrooms and study. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

Apartment for Rent

Brandywine Apts. Now Leasing, 1&2 bedroom apts. Leases begin Jun, July, Aug or Sep. First come, first serve. Get them while they last. www.brandywine-apts.com stop by or call 549-0600

Center of town, 1, 2, 3 bedrooms, hardwood floors. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

Auto for Sale

Jeep '89 Rangler Good Condition $2250 582-9103 or 219-9011

Pontiac Sunbird 93 automatic 4 cyl excellent mpg use AFS Blackwk Value $1400- $600 OBO Takes it. Call 253-0279

Employment

Now Hiring On-Campus Representatives Campus-Fundraiser is hiring out-going students for on-campus spokesperson positions. $15 - $25 per hour plus bonuses. Modeling, acting or customer service experience helpful but not required. Visit http://www.campus-fundraiser.com/cr.asp to apply.

Top Boys Sports Camp in Maine! Play & Coach Sports * Have Fun * Make $$$ Camp Counselors Positions Available Summer 2005 Apply Online www.camptobosseo.com or call 1-800-473-6104

Make money taking online surveys earn $10 to $125 for surveys. Earn $25 to $250 for focus groups www.cashforstudents.com/umass

Employment

SUMMER ON CAPE COD! The Wychmere Harbor Beach Club is conducting interviews for summer employment on our Cape Cod property March 3,4,5 & March 24,25,26. Housing available. Check out our website at www.wychmere-harbor.com for available positions. Call Amy at (508)432-1000 x129 for details.

SUMMER JOBS! Help new students get off to a good start. Peer advisors needed for Summer Orientation. Competitive salary. 20 hrs/week. Mid-May to mid-July. Applications in Pre-Major Advising 615 Goodell. Deadline April 19

Earn some money! Rent us your ears! Listening experiments $8/hr 413-545-6837 phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu

Employment

Autism position in Belchertown. Language based home program using principles of ABA for 10 yr old boy with autism. Flexible shifts; mornings/days/evenings. Training provided. Requires commitment of 6 months or more. Car necessary. Call Heather at 413-323-5904 or e-mail hskawinske@charter.net EOE/AA

Nanny position for 2 boys ages 6 & 9. Perfect schedule for student. Part time Spring. Full time Summer. Prior experience necessary. 413-625-2288

Earn lots of $$ and have fun on the water this Spring & Summer. Raft guides needed at Crab Apple Whitewater in Charlemont, MA. Fun Summer job, no experience necessary. We will train. 413-625-2288.

Room for Rent

350 per month 413-335-5226

Services

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth control, and Emergency Contraception Affordable and confidential. STI Screening and Treatment. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992.

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance 549-1906

Travel

Spring Break 2005 Only 6 weeks left. : Lowest Prices Biggest Parties Earn 2 Free Trips Exclusive with Sun Splash Tours www.sunsplashtours.com 1800-426-7710

Travel

One Bed and Studio (Four Queen Beds) at Peerpark one mile from Loon Mountain Available 3/11-3/18 Ken 335-9775

XXX Night Montreal Weekends $89 Montreal Express.net 1(781)979-9001

Bahamas Spring Cruise 5 Days $299! Includes Meals, Celebrity Parties! Panama City, Daytona $159! Cancun, Jamaica, Acapulco, Nassau $499! Award Winning Company! SpringBreakTravel.com 1-800-678-6386

#1 Spring Break Vacations! Cancun, Jamaica, Acapulco, Bahamas, & Florida! Best Parties, Best Hotels, Best Prices! Limited Space! 1-800-234-7007 www.endlesssummertours.com

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS THURSDAY

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 2005 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

UM working overtime

Freeman's big night sparks Minutemen

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

Consider it symbolic that on a night when the University of Massachusetts welcomed the Boston

UMass	70	Red Sox'
Rhode Island	64	2004
		World

Series trophy inside the William Mullins Center, the Massachusetts men's basketball team responded with an overtime win that puts the Minutemen in position to make a late season run of their own.

Having to persevere through an extra frame after the Rams produced a furious rally to tie the game in the waning moments of regulation, UMass once again hung tough on both ends of the court and picked up a crucial 70-64 win before a crowd of 5,324 – a win that moves it within one game of Temple for second place in the Atlantic 10 East Division with three conference games remaining.

The Minutemen (15-9 8-5 A-10) will square off against the Owls on Saturday in Philadelphia, with tip-off set for 2 p.m. at the Liacouras Center. Hall-of-Fame coach John Chaney will not be on the bench for the Owls, as he has suspended himself for the game following an incident in a loss to Saint Joseph's on Tuesday.

Despite being outrebounded 21-10 on the offensive glass and giving up 70 URI attempts from the field to its 49, the Maroon and White improved to 5-0 in overtime games – one win shy of the NCAA record of six overtime victories.

"This is the biggest February game played here in quite awhile — maybe six years or seven years," UMass head coach Steve Lappas said. "We fought hard out there and did what we needed to do, and this was a huge win for us in what really matters."

UMass was again led by sophomore forward Rashaun Freeman, who worked aggressively in the lane against a physical

See MEN'S HOOPS on page 8

COURTESY UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

UMass sophomore Art Bowers scored 18 points, grabbed three rebounds and dished out two assists in the team's overtime win over URI.

UMass to face tall task with Temple

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

For the Massachusetts women's basketball team there is bad news and worse news.

The bad news for the Minutewomen is that they are mired in a season-long three-game losing streak. The worse news is that UMass will have to try to break out of its slump against No. 16 Temple.

The Owls will clash with the Minutewomen at the Mullins Center tonight at 7 p.m., and the timing of the visit couldn't be worse for UMass.

The Minutewomen are in need of a win badly, and Temple hasn't been too accommodating to opponents this year in that department.

Temple (22-3, 14-0 Atlantic 10) comes to Amherst riding a 19-game winning streak, including a 59-43 win over UMass on Jan. 4. The Owls haven't lost a game since Dec. 4 at Florida.

UMass, on the other hand, has found a variety of ways to lose games lately. The Minutewomen have had an up-and-down season and were playing good basketball right before the streak started.

The Minutewomen (13-12, 6-8 A-10) had won two games in a row when they arrived in Cincinnati two weeks ago to face Xavier. UMass was playing with a great deal of confidence and battled a tough Xavier team down to the wire, only to fall in the final minutes, 65-55.

UMass then returned to home, where they had played well all year, to face Rhode Island. The Rams came to Amherst losers of five straight and the Minutewomen seemed to be coasting to an easy victory when they opened up a 16-point lead in the first half.

But a funny thing happened on the way to the seventh home win of the season for UMass. URI began to apply more defensive pressure as the game went on and UMass was plagued once again by turnovers. In the end, URI escaped with a 60-59 win.

The most recent setback for UMass was a 55-43 loss on Sunday to Richmond at home. Sunday's loss was not as painful as the URI loss because UMass lost to a better, more experienced team.

That is the type of loss that UMass coach Marnie Dacko had an easier time accepting. It's when her team makes mental

See WOMEN'S HOOPS on page 7

Sox to get World Series rings in opener at Fenway

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

FORT MYERS, Fla. — The Boston Red Sox will get their championship rings at their home opener before a full house of 35,000 fans and their fiercest rivals — the New York Yankees.

The jewelry symbolizing the team's first World Series win in 86 years will be handed out in a pregame ceremony on April 11.

The Red Sox might have been disappointed onlookers had they not rallied from a 3-0 deficit to beat the Yankees in the AL championship series. New York opens the season at home on April 3 against Boston.

The Yankees had no complaints about being at Fenway Park for the ring ceremony and raising of the championship banner.

"The Red Sox won their rings. They earned them," Yankees owner George Steinbrenner said in a statement. "They have the right to pick the date at which they present them, and it's not a personal affront to our players."

To accommodate fans who didn't get tickets to opening day, the rings will be displayed at a welcome-home dinner attended by players that night and on display at Fenway Park along with the World Series trophy and the ball first baseman Doug Mientkiewicz caught for the last out of the four-game sweep of St. Louis.

Admission will be charged for the display, which probably will be held on April 12, an off day for Boston, and the dinner with proceeds going to the Red Sox Foundation charity.

"Even though the fans are not getting (a ring) they have to feel like they're receiving one because they all deserve it," David Ortiz said. "They supported us a lot through the years."

Charles Steinberg, Red Sox executive vice president for public affairs, referred to the dinner as a "charity ball." It would cost much less, perhaps $5, for the ring viewing at which "parents can bring children in a casual setting and actually see the rings up close. All you do is take a stroll in the park.

"It seems that everybody wins in that scenario."

The ring issue had simmered for several days and, at one point, principal owner John Henry said it wasn't necessary that the rings be presented on opening day. He wasn't even sure they'd be ready by then.

But Red Sox president Larry Lucchino said Wednesday he expected the final design of the ring to be revealed this week. Players began getting their fingers measured for the rings at spring training on Tuesday.

Damon already has one new ring. He was married late last year and made his wedding band flashier so it wouldn't get lost in the glare of the championship ring.

"The only reason why I put some bling on my wedding ring was because I knew I was going to have that nice ring" on his other hand, Damon said. "I was just going to go with a tattoo or even just a little band, but because we got this (championship ring), this one had to get better."

The decision for the ring celebrations was made late Tuesday afternoon at a meeting with Henry, Lucchino and minority owner Tom Werner.

"This is the kind of quality problem I hope we're going to be able to have with some frequency," Lucchino said, "sit around at spring training and decide just when, oh when, do we give out the World Series championship rings."

Every player who played for the Red Sox last year will get a ring. Lucchino estimated that several hundred would be awarded to managers, coaches, scouts and other employees in the organization.

"They won," Yankees pitcher Mike Mussina said from the team's spring training facility in Tampa. "They can do whatever they want. Hand out 5,000 rings if they want to."

Lucchino said he would like former players, including Pedro Martinez, Derek Lowe and Nomar Garciaparra, to receive their rings directly from a member of the organization rather than have them mailed.

Yankees shortstop Derek Jeter was asked if he had a preference for watching the ceremony or not.

"I'm sure I'm not going to help them hand them out," he said to laughter. "But they deserve it. I'm sure they've been looking forward to this for a long time. So let them do it."

New York manager Joe Torre said he's not bothered by seeing the Red Sox get their rings.

"We're not going to arrange, or rearrange, our routine to either be there or not be there," he said.

Ortiz said the Yankees, winners of 26 championships, might even enjoy the ceremony.

"They must feel good about it because they received a lot (of rings) before," he said. "They know how the feeling is."

PAUL J. SOUVENELLI/DAILY NEWS STAFF

The Yankees watched the Red Sox celebrate their 10-3 victory during Game 7 of the ALCS. Next, they will watch the Sox receive their World Series rings at Fenway.

Barry Bonds faces the media, but still doesn't say anything

By Jim Reeves
Knight Ridder

SCOTTSDALE, Ariz. — The truth, according to Barry Bonds, is that it's all my fault. Mine and all the other worthless, snooping reporters in the world who keep asking him about steroids.

Don't get cocky. The way Bonds keeps pointing fingers at everyone but himself, he might blame you next.

The way Bonds sees it, the media lies just for the fun of it. We make stuff up. We make a spectacle of the game.

We even — "gasp!" — have the temerity to venture into the sanctity of his "office" and ask him questions.

Would the president of the Bank of America put up with such nonsense? Of course not, so why should Bonds have to endure such torment?

Bonds obviously believes the best defense is a good offense. He arrived at the Giants' spring training headquarters Tuesday and immediately began pimp slapping — figuratively, of course — every sportswriter in sight.

There was no lack of targets, considering there must have been 75 to 100 of us crowded into the back of the press box converted into an interview room to hear Bonds divert every critical question regarding baseball's steroids scandal.

Give him credit for this, at least: Bonds grabbed a whip and a chair and walked into the lions' den without a whimper of fear, putting lie to the rumor that he would merely read a brief statement and decline to take questions.

He took them all right. And he fired them right back.

Apologize, like Jason Giambi

See BONDS on page 8

DOUG DUNCAN/CONTRA COSTA TIMES

Barry Bonds was full of jokes, sarcasm, and a whole lot of questions directed back at the media during his press conference on Tuesday, though he still hasn't answered the questions about his alleged use of steroids.

A-Rod act is tiresome

By Vic Ziegel
Knight Ridder

It's another day and I'm waiting for another five, six, seven, eight, nine stories about Alex Rodriguez, known as A-Rod, until he became A-Tilla the Hun. I've had it. Have you had it? Of course, you have. Everybody's had it but a bunch of guys with press cards sticking out of their hat bands. Do you know anybody who hasn't had it? Might it be the same guy who has a Stone Cold Steve Austin poster in every room of his house? I thought so. Lose his address.

The A-Rod-Red Sox glop has gone over the top. It's the Mount Everest of spring training stories, and somebody new makes the climb every day. The people happiest about it are the headline writers, who haven't dealt out this much pun and punishment since the Eagles were in full flight, soaring, coasting, fluttering, drifting, falling, crashing.

Trees are being cut down to provide the newsprint needed for this A-Rod silliness. Doesn't seem right, does it? The steroid stories are more important — they could lead to baseball's version of failed brakes, and cooked record books — but they're not nearly as much fun as A-Rod. Fun? The first day might have been close to fun. Now it's "Hollywood Squares" with dreadful answers.

PAUL J. SOUVENELLI/DAILY NEWS STAFF

Ever since Joe Torre (left) and Derek Jeter (right) introduced Alex Rodriguez to New York, A-Rod has seen what the rivalry is all about.

Are you old enough to remember Howdy Doody? Buffalo Bob? Chief Thunder-Thud? Phineas T. Bluster? Howdy and his Doodyville Players — I may have made that up; it was pretty long ago and completely black and white — had the most popular kids show on TV. Good old Howdy Doody, everybody loved him. And it didn't bother anybody that he was worth close to A-Rod money. He had somebody pulling his strings and somebody else speaking for him. He wore the same checkered shirt every day. Didn't make a cent and never asked for a vacation. They sold a ton of Howdy Doody products but he never saw a penny. That's right, he was a dummy. The Red Sox could learn a lot from old Howdy-Do.

Right, they won the World Series thing, the first time since 1918. So the curse is over. At last. No, make that at long last. The

See A-ROD on page 7

New England's Largest College Daily • Est. 1890

The Daily Collegian

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 2005 WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM VOLUME CXIV ISSUE 87

Doctor says Yoga is better than meds

By Ashish K. Sahu
Collegian Correspondent

"Stress is a worldwide epidemic and we all are affected by stress," said Dr. Richard Brown, MD, an associate clinical professor of psychiatry from Columbia University.

Brown spoke Wednesday evening at the Yoga breathing talk organized by the University of Massachusetts chapter of the Art of Living club.

"Knowing how to turn off stress is very important," he said. He mentioned how many Americans and people around the world suffer from insomnia, anxiety, and depression, which can often be caused by stress.

Brown, co-author of the book "Stop Depression Now" recommends Sudharshan Krita Yoga (SKY) breathing for the above problems to his patients, because he says it is better than medication. SKY slows medium rapid cycles of breath and can be practiced in about 20 minutes.

Brown, a practicing psychyopharmacologist and a member if the American Psychiatric Association, has authored over 70 articles and a book chapter related to pharmacological and clinical studies in psychiatric disorders.

MEGAN BRUNSTER/COLLEGIAN

Dr. Richard Brown of Columbia University talks about Yoga and meditation techniques as methods to dealing with stress at a speech at the UMass Campus Center on Wednesday evening.

SKY has four parts: Ujjai breathing, Bhastrika, or high frequency breathing, SK chanting and meditation. He spoke about the first two aspects in detail and how it affects the human brain.

There has been plenty of research conducted on this technique and it has proven effective on depressed patients, he said. One such study conducted in a hospital for depressed patients in India showed faster recovery among patients than with shock treatment or medication. He adds that SKY is not only for depressed patients but it has also helped a lot of college students.

Over 70 campuses all across United States have been taught the course on SKY and over 60 million people in over 146 countries have benefited from its use. Students have seen improvement in memory, sleeping better, less anxiety, improve self esteem and overcoming social phobia to name a few, Brown said.

See YOGA on page 3

Faculty Senate talks about fundraising

By Casey Novak
Collegian Staff

The Campaign for Amherst, a seven-year fund-raising effort to raise private funds for each department at the University of Massachusetts, was discussed in great detail at the 638th Regular Meeting of the Faculty Senate on Thursday.

According to The Campaign for Amherst's Web site, "The University of Massachusetts Amherst...must work constantly to maintain and enhance our internationally and nationally recognized programs. Securing the resources to do so is goal of The Campaign for Amherst."

"The Web site provides the priority structure, a plan for the campaign, each stage it will go through, what the structure of the priority list is and how it was made," Chancellor John V. Lombardi said.

Lombardi also pointed out the difference between a campaign priority and an academic priority.

"People imagine that a campaign priority is what we will actually get," he said. "But actually it is a wish list of all the things we hope to raise money for."

Lombardi said that each department sent a list of requests to the Provost, which accumulated to $1.7 billion.

"This highly exceeded what we anticipated," he said. "So we went through the list and adjusted the dollar targets for each college to a total of $350 million. That is our working total."

The total was arrived at by distributing priorities based on prior fundraising of each college, according to Lombardi.

"What people don't fully recognize is that campaign totals are targets meant to be exceeded. That is the key concept of a campaign," he said. "The goal is the bottom expectation of the achievement."

Joseph Bartolomeo, chair of the University Advancement Council, also addressed the Faculty Senate on Thursday.

"The priorities are preliminary priorities," said Bartolomeo. "Many of the actual initiatives will be in response to the wishes and desires of the donors."

He then raised the question of what would happen if a donor wanted to fund an initiative that is not a priority in the campaign.

"If the desire upon a donor is something the university can do and if it fits in with our mission then it can certainly be accepted," Bartolomeo said. "If it is on the condition of a racehorse or something like that I suspect we might have to think about that kind of request."

The campaign's Web site says that if a donor's interest is not one of the campaign's priorities, consideration will be given to whether the money would be beneficial to the campus mission.

"If so, we will be delighted to accept the gift. In some instances, despite donor's enthusiasm, this will not be the case and the campus will have to respectfully decline the opportunity," the web site said.

Specifically, Lombardi pointed out that sufficient funds are needed to put toward campus construction.

He said that UMass' Capital plan only accounts for about 40 percent of the essential capital needed for repair and renovations needed on campus.

"We've been able to find money for about 40 percent so any money we can raise for capital releases a dollar that can go to the next item on the priority list," he said.

There are also projects that are not on the funded capital list, including athletics, Lombardi added.

"For example, in case of athletics, we're not spending capital expenditures for athletics out of our borrowed fund or our general funds," he said. "But athletics has a lot of capital needs so if [campaign officials] can raise money [the athletic department] can do what they need to do."

Lombardi said that without a campaign about $25 million is given to their annual fund. The campaign hopes to almost double that amount over the next seven years.

For more information on The Campaign for Amherst, visit www.umass.edu/campaign.

Convicted murderer sentenced to life

By Michael Kunzelman
Associated Press

SALEM, Mass. — A confessed murderer said Thursday that he killed and beheaded a Boston man and an unidentified prostitute because he became a "ticking time bomb" when his brother's alleged murderer was acquitted.

Eugene McCollom, 40, was sentenced to life in prison after pleading guilty to second-degree murder in the death of the prostitute, whose headless body was discovered in November 2000 behind a home for disabled veterans. Her head and hands were found more than three years later on a nearby beach.

The life sentence will follow the 10- to 12-year sentence McCollom is already serving after pleading guilty on Feb. 9 to manslaughter in the 2001 decapitation killing of John "Jackie" Leyden.

McCollom will be eligible for parole in about 22 years.

At his sentencing in Essex Superior Court, McCollom told Judge Howard J. Whitehead that his homicidal urges grew from the outrage he felt toward the criminal justice system after his younger brother's alleged killer was acquitted. Patrick McCollom, 27, was stabbed to death at a Revere night club in 1998.

"They let a guilty man walk free," McCollom said, "and I became a ticking time bomb. I was engulfed in bitterness, hatred of our judicial system — I killed two people out of all that anger and bitterness."

Later, as he was being led out of court, he shouted, "No justice, no peace for Patrick McCollom."

"Mr. McCollom's life took a severe turn for the worse when his brother was murdered," said his lawyer, Lawrence McGuire. "He is regretful and remorseful for what he has done."

More than four years after her grisly slaying, the identity of the prostitute he killed remains a mystery. McCollom referred to her in court Thursday as "Lisa from Philadelphia."

He told investigators that he picked her up in Boston's Combat Zone area and drove her to his room at the YMCA in Lynn, where they argued over money. According to court records, he described strangling her and beheading the corpse.

When police asked how he could stand to cut up a body, he replied that "he had just become 'like a robot or a machine,'" according to an affidavit.

Two days later, the woman's headless remains were found wrapped in a blanket on the grounds of the Soldiers' Home in Chelsea. A surveillance camera captured footage of McCollom dumping the body.

Police linked him to the murder by lifting his DNA from a soda bottle he touched in front of a police officer and matching it to semen found on the victim, according to court records.

"After lengthy questioning he did admit to killing the victim," prosecutor Kathe

See SENTENCING on page 3

Jury selected in Michael Jackson trial

By Tim Molloy
Associated Press

SANTA MARIA, Calif. — A day after 12 jurors were selected in the Michael Jackson child molestation case, attorneys made progress Thursday toward seating eight alternates.

As potential alternate jurors were quizzed Thursday, defense attorneys rejected three of them and prosecutors dismissed one. Other alternate juror prospects were dismissed Wednesday.

The potential alternate jurors cut by the defense Thursday included a 36-year-old woman whose brother is a police officer and a 52-year-old mechanic who said the media does not know the facts in a court case as well as the people involved. Prosecutors dismissed a 44-year-old woman who sounded weary as she answered questions about her ability to serve.

The defense has now used four of eight challenges it can make without providing a reason during the selection of alternates, while prosecutors have used three. Others were sent away for hardship or other reasons.

Jackson, 46, is accused of molesting a 13-year-old boy, plying him with alcohol, and conspiring to hold him and his family captive.

The job of selecting alternates got under way Wednesday after the regular jurors were seated. The alternates will be called on to serve if there is a problem with any one of the 12 regular jurors.

Jury selection had been expected to last several weeks, but the seating of the main panel took only five court days, which were interrupted by a one-week break because of the death of an attorney's sister and another one-week break because Jackson was hospitalized with flu-like symptoms.

Drawn from Santa Barbara County where Jackson lives, the four men and eight women on the jury range in age from 20 to 79. They include several fans of his

See JACKSON on page 3

COURTESY MSNBC.COM

Michael Jackson arrives at the Santa Maria courthouse Thursday as jury selection wraps up in his trial on child molestation charges.

Bush talks with Russian president

By Terence Hunt
Associated Press

BRATISLAVA, Slovakia — Struggling to repair troubled relations, President Bush prodded Vladimir Putin on Thursday about Moscow's retreat from democracy but the Russian leader bluntly rejected the criticism and insisted there was no backsliding.

"Strong countries are built by developing strong democracies," Bush said he told Putin. "I think Vladimir heard me loud and clear."

"Russia has made its choice in favor of democracy," the Russian leader replied.

Confronting criticism that he is quashing dissent and consolidating power, Putin said Russia chose democracy 14 years ago and "there can be no return to what we used to have before."

Four years after Bush said he had gotten a sense of Putin's soul and found him trustworthy, the two leaders talked for 2 1/2 hours at a hilltop castle in hopes of easing mounting distrust between Moscow and Washington. Bush said he had not changed his opinion of Putin and wanted to remain friends.

"This is the kind of fellow who, when he says 'Yes,' he means yes, and when he says 'No,' he means no," Bush said.

Yet Bush challenged Putin about his government's behavior, saying that democracies reflect a country's customs and culture but must have "a rule of law and protection of minorities, a free

See RUSSIA on page 3

Pope John Paul II undergoes tracheotomy in the hospital

By Victor L. Simpson
Associated Press

VATICAN CITY — Pope John Paul II underwent a successful operation to insert a tube in his throat to relieve his breathing problems, hours after he was rushed back to the hospital Thursday for the second time in a month with flu-like symptoms of fever and congestion, the Vatican said.

Spokesman Joaquin Navarro-Valls said the tracheotomy lasted 30 minutes and the outcome was "positive." The pope had approved the procedure, which the Vatican characterized as elective.

The frail, 84-year-old pontiff, who was taken to the hospital shortly before 11 a.m. in an ambulance, will be spending the night in the hospital, Navarro-Valls said.

But the tracheotomy may require a longer hospital stay and have serious consequences for the pope's abilities to carry out his duties since he will not be able to speak while the breathing tube is in his throat.

Before the tracheotomy, outside medical experts had said John Paul may have pneumonia. But Navarro-Valls' statement made no reference to pneumonia, saying the pope suffered a narrowing of his larynx.

The pope's sudden turn for the worse alarmed the faithful from Nigeria to the Philippines to St. Peter's Square, and raised more doubts about his ability to carry on.

"We have prayed for the pope to live as long as possible so we can still share our joy with him," said Zofia Gebala, a 73-year-old retiree, as she left a church in Wadowice, the pope's birthplace in southern Poland. "We are praying for him every day, for his well-being. But it's all in God's hands now."

John Paul, who suffers from Parkinson's disease, had greeted pilgrims twice at the window of his studio at St. Peter's Square since his release from Gemelli Polyclinic Hospital on Feb. 10. On Wednesday, he made his longest public appearance - 30 minutes - since he fell ill more than three weeks ago.

With each successive appearance, he seemed a little stronger, a little more alert, and his voice rang out with greater clarity.

That made Thursday's reversal all the more shocking for the faithful.

"We are so scared because he has been sick in the past," said Vanessa Animo Bono, 32, a Roman Catholic being treated at Gemelli. "He is one of the few popes who is actually able to listen to people."

Earlier Thursday, Vatican officials said the pope was suffering breathing problems similar to those that sent him to Gemelli on Feb. 1, and Italian news reports said the latest respiratory crisis was more severe than the first.

ARTS & LIVING

KELLOGG TO PLAY IN NOHO
UMass grad Stephen Kellogg returns with major-label debut.

PAGE 5

EDITORIAL/OPINION

UPCOMING ELECTIONS
SGA is trying to get it right this year. Can the group keep it together?

PAGE 4

WEATHER

TODAY Snow, H31°, L11°
SATURDAY Partly Cloudy, H30°, L10°
SUNDAY Sunny, H31°, L15°

SPORTS

BUZZER BEATER
Minutewomen downed on final shot of the game.

PAGE 10

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center
University of Massachusetts
Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief Peter Foundas
Managing Editor Mike Martelli
Business Manager Rich Pacheco
Production Manager Cory Rosenberg
Night Supervisor Meghan Healy
Advertising Manager Tiffany Sugalski
Editorial Production Samantha M. Nielsen
Arts & Living Editor Michael Busack
Copy Editor Alyson Zillmann
Editorial Editor Yousef Munayyer
Editorial Editor Allison Edles
News Editor Erika Lovley
Photo Editor Alex Demosthene
Sports Editor Bob McGovern
Circulation Manager Kristen Weiss
Classified Advertising Marty Pappas
Distribution Manager Josh Kiggins
Finance Manager Hetnk Shah
Accounting Clerk Virginie Frecaut
Human Resource Sandra Marquez
Assistant Operations Linda Wallack
Assistant Advertising Josh Greenberg
Assistant Business Nathan Chomsky
Assistant Finance Thomas Hecht
Advertising Production Rachael Bruno
Graphics Adviser Charlie Higgins
Asst Arts & Living Matthew O'Rourke
Asst Arts & Living Chris Gaziano
Assistant News Julie O'Donnell
Assistant News Dan O'Brien
Assistant Photo Megan Brunner
Assistant Sports Jeff Howe

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts calendar semester. The Collegian is independently funded, operating on advertising revenue. Founded in 1890, the paper began as August Lee Weekly. The College Student and the Weekly Collegian in 1958. Published daily since 1967. The Collegian has been broadsheet since January 1993. For advertising rates and information, call 545-3500 between 8:30 a.m. and 5:30 p.m.

Campus Perspectives

By Jamie Lau

What do you think of the UMass Police Deptartment's plan to purchase Tasers?

senior
Animal Science major

"I'm not really sure if it's a good thing since this is a college campus, not a prison."
Keith Toffling

junior
Mechanical Engineering major

"To be honest, I'm pretty T.O'd right about now."
Justin Finn

sophomore
Music Education major

"I feel that UMass should be spending money on more important things like education."
Leola Carey

sophomore
Anthropology major

"I think it's silly. The problems contolling crowds on campus are never serious enough for Tasers."
Rachel Breton

sophomore
Hospitality and Tourism Mgmt. major

"I think it's stupid. It's like we're a bunch of animals or something."
Shari Warden

junior
Civil and Environmental Engineering major

"It probably stinks to get tased."
David Maynard

Production Crew
On staff today

Night Editor
Matt Elder
Photo Technician
Jamie Lau
Copy Editor
Monique Jemmott
Production Supervisor
Alyson Zillmann
Production Staff
Amanda Allen, Tiffany Van Lurgen

Write for news

Wal-Mart looking to open store in NYC

By Sam Dolnick
Associated Press

NEW YORK — A real estate developer scrapped plans to build the city's first Wal-Mart store amid intense pressure from residents and union leaders.

The decision, announced by city officials Wednesday, comes as a blow to the retail giant, which has sought for years to move into the lucrative New York City market.

The company had announced Dec. 6 that it would open a new store in the Rego Park neighborhood of Queens.

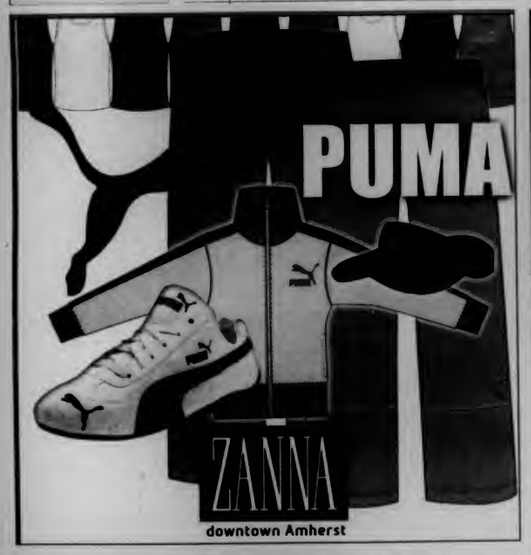
Wal-Mart Stores Inc. spokeswoman Mia Masten said Wednesday the company had never signed a deal with the developer, Vornado Realty Trust, for the 132,000-square-foot space. She said Wal-Mart was still interested in exploring other locations in the city.

Vornado spokeswoman Roann Kulakoss declined to comment Thursday.

Councilwoman Melinda Katz, head of the City Council Land Use Committee, said the deal may have fallen through because of Wal-Mart's track record on labor issues.

"Vornado may very well have a project that could be a good project in the area, and they wanted to go forward based on the substance as opposed to getting caught up in the issues that Wal-Mart seems to bring to the table," she said.

Opponents formed coalitions to block the store immediately after Wal-Mart, the world's largest retailer, announced plans to expand into New York.

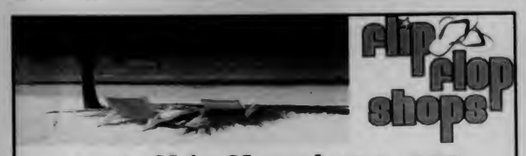


Small businesses feared Wal-Mart would drive many retailers out and residents near the site raised concerns about traffic and parking at the proposed site. Union leaders cited a list of labor offenses against the company, including a recent settlement of allegations that Wal-Mart violated child labor laws and the company's decision to close a Quebec store when workers moved to unionize.

In California, Wal-Mart Chief Executive H. Lee Scott Jr. said Wednesday that the company is renewing efforts to expand its Supercenter stores there. Public outcry had stalled the company's plans there last year.

Scott said that although Wal-Mart's $1 million campaign to gain voter approval for superstore projects in the Los Angeles and San Diego areas failed, it is moving ahead with plans to open 25 new stores in the state this year.

"We're not going to lay down," he said. "We've got nothing to apologize for."



Analysts have said that Bentonville, Ark.-based Wal-Mart needs to tap into the New York City and Southern California markets to make up for slow growth elsewhere in recent years.

downtown Amherst

BOSTON BARTENDERS SCHOOL of AMERICA
WANT A HOT JOB?
Learn to be a Professional Bartender!
Classes Starting Now!
Boston Bartenders School
218 Memorial Avenue • West Springfield
1-800-357-3210
www.bostonbartender.com

SUMMER OUTDOOR JOBS
Backpacking On Power Lines
Throughout New England applying herbicides (mostly Round-up) with a back pack sprayer to control small trees.
Drivers license, good physical condition and drug screen required upon job offer.
Also Mass herbicide applicator license required.
Send resume or request information/application to:
Vegetation Control Service, Inc.
2342 Main St., Athol, MA 01331
(800) 323-7706 or (978) 249-5348
Fax (978) 249-4784 email: vcsathol@aol.com
V.C.S. is an equal employment opportunity company

www.flipflopshops.com
Packing for Spring Break... Don't Forget your Flip Flops!!!
Reef
Havaianas
Skechers
Sanuk
And More!
15% OFF YOUR PURCHASE
ENTER COUPON CODE:
UMSB2005

RED-EYE SPECIAL
Whately Diner
FROM 10PM - 4AM
PIGGY-BACK BREAKFAST
2 eggs w/bacon, sausage or ham, toast & homefries
OR
BURGER & FRIES
$3.99
Exit 24 Off I-91
372 State Rd. (Routes 5 & 10)
Whately, MA
(413) 665-3696

Wanna write for news?
Call Erika, Julie or Dan at 545-1762

STSTRAVEL.COM
Join America's #1 Student Tour Operator
CANCUN
ACAPULCO
JAMAICA
BAHAMAS
FLORIDA
SPRING BREAK 2005
Sell Trips, Earn Cash & Travel Free
1-800-648-4849 www.ststravel.com

No African-Americans were selected in Jackson trial jury

JACKSON from page 1

music, four parents of young children, a woman whose grandson was convicted of a sexual offense, and a man who visited Jackson's Neverland ranch as a child.

The jury was primarily white and Hispanic and did not appear to include any of the half-dozen blacks who were in the pool of more than 240 prospects.

The court hasn't disclosed the races of jurors, and lawyers and jurors are under a gag order not to discuss the case. Race could be a factor because public opinion polls show blacks are less inclined to believe the charges against Jackson, who is black.

One black man remained in the pool from which the alternate panel was being selected.

Two black women who had been questioned as potential jurors were rejected by prosecutors. The defense objected, and Jackson appeared upset, on both occasions.

The second woman, dismissed Wednesday, said her husband had suffered discrimination while working for the Santa Barbara County Sheriff's Department and criticized the makeup of the jury pool.

30 killed in a bombing at a police station in Tikrit, Iraq

By Sameer N. Yacoub
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — A man wearing a police uniform drove a car bomb into police headquarters in Saddam Hussein's hometown of Tikrit in the largest of a series of attacks on Thursday in Iraq that left a total of 30 people dead, including two U.S. soldiers.

The violence came a day after interim Prime Minister Ayad Allawi announced he was forming a coalition to try to hold onto his post in the new government and block the candidate of the dominant Shiite political alliance. Kurdish parties also weighed in with demands for top posts, setting up a possible showdown over the role of religion in a new Iraq.

The U.S. command said two American soldiers were killed and two wounded in bomb attacks Thursday, one northeast of Baghdad in Qaryat, and a second near Samarra, west of Qaryat.

At least five other Iraqi police were killed in separate attacks across the insurgent-wracked country, including another suicide car bomb assault on a police convoy in Iskandariyah, 30 miles south of the capital.

Two roadside bombs in Qaim, near the Syrian border, also killed four Iraqi National Guardsmen, Iraqi Lt. Col. Abid Ajab Al-Salmani said.

In the capital, gunmen opened fire on bakery, killing two people and wounding a third, police said. Several blasts echoed through the city at midday, but their cause was not immediately known.

The blast in Saddam Hussein's hometown of Tikrit, 80 miles north of Baghdad, occurred at one of the station's busiest times, when dozens of policemen were arriving to relieve colleagues who'd been working all night, police Col. Saad Daham said. The attack killed 15 police and wounded nearly two dozen others.

"He waited until the shift change, then he exploded the car," Daham said of the attacker, adding the aim was "to kill as many as possible."

Daham said the bomber was able to slip into the station undetected because he was wearing a police lieutenant's uniform. He blamed guards at the station's gates for allowing the assailant to enter without checking his papers or searching his vehicle.

Twenty cars were set ablaze after the massive blast, sending clouds of smoke into the sky. An Associated Press photographer on the scene saw at least 10 charred bodies laying on the ground, which was splattered with pools of blood and bits of human flesh.

Several ambulances raced to the blast site, ferrying casualties to a local hospital. U.S. troops sealed off the area and set up checkpoints and searched vehicles across the city.

Insurgents ambushed a police patrol in the northern city of Kirkuk with a roadside bomb, killing two policemen and injuring three.

In Iskandariyah, a suicide bomber blew himself up in front of an office that serves as the local headquarters of the Shiite Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, killing five people, including three police officers and a child who was walking down the road at the time, the government said.

Police initially said the attack targeted the town's police chief, Col. Salman Ali, who escaped unharmed.

Allawi's call for an inclusive coalition that would attract minority Sunni Arabs who form the core of the insurgency came as support for Ibrahim al-Jaafari, the leading Shiite candidate, began slipping in his United Iraq Alliance.

On Wednesday, just a day after al-Jaafari, 58, was nominated for the post of prime minister by the clergy-backed alliance, a Shiite political group that supports his one-time challenger, Ahmad Chalabi, threatened to withdraw its support.

A policeman walks through the rubble Thursday after a man wearing a police uniform drove a car bomb into a Tikrit police station.

Murderer could get parole in 22 years

SENTENCING from page 1

Tuttman said. "He also admitted to dismembering and disposing of her body."

In an affidavit, McCollom said police told him he'd get a short prison sentence "because it was a crime of passion, that in jail I would get the help I needed, including medications."

Authorities cobbled together a sketchy description of the victim: She was a light-skinned African-American or Hispanic woman between the ages of 16 and 25, with reddish hair and purple toenails. Her height ranged from 5 feet to 5-foot-6, and she weighed between 100 and 150 pounds.

McCollom initially told investigators he'd left her head and hands in a trash bin behind the YMCA. But he later changed his story, saying he'd buried the head and hands on a beach in the North Shore town of Nahant, where police found them inside a container in January 2004.

They checked out numerous missing persons reports and circulated a drawing of what they believed she looked like, but never discovered the woman's identity.

Tuttman said Essex County prosecutors opted not to seek a first-degree murder conviction against McCollom because he had cooperated with investigators.

While he was awaiting trial for the woman's murder, McCollom surfaced as a suspect in the murder of Leyden whose decomposed decapitated corpse was discovered in 2001 in his apartment in the East Boston neighborhood.

Leyden's brother, who found the body, was initially charged with the murder, but the charges were dropped after McCollom confessed to bludgeoning Leyden with a pipe and cutting off his head. He took the head to Fort Lauderdale, Fla., and buried it in a park, where it was recovered by police.

McCollom has surfaced as a possible suspect in other gruesome killings, including those of Kelly Ford, whose decapitated remains were found on a Cape Cod beach in 2001, and Darlene Toler, a prostitute who was beheaded in Florida in 1995.

Doctor talks Yoga

YOGA from page 1

UMass Amherst also conducts such courses and many students from five colleges have taken advantage of them. More information about courses and information can be obtained on Brown's Web site.

While questions on side effects were raised during the talk he mentioned, "everything has its pros and cons."

"The biggest side effect on the SKY is, you will be happy and smiling," he said.

After the talk, Brown conducted a small session on Ujjai breathand meditation for about half an hour. At the end of the session Harshal Deshmukh, a public health student at UMass said, "I feel more relaxed and less stressed."

An arts psychotherapist Meghan Shiebl, felt relaxed in her chest felt her mind was less busy after the session. But Tahmina Kongtia-Kantar, a researcher from polymer science department said she did not feel anything different.

The SKY technique was originally founded by Sri Ravi Shankar is taught by the Art of Living organization is across the world, many small programs cater to teens, school children, prisoners, HIV positive patients, mentally ill and representatives.

Bush and Putin hold a talk

RUSSIA from page 1

press and a stable political opposition." He said he talked with Putin about his "concerns about Russia's commitment in fulfilling these universal principles" and about Putin's restrictions on the press.

"I'm not the minister of propaganda," Putin said, standing alongside Bush at a news conference.

They also confronted differences over Moscow's arms sales to Syria and Russia's help for Iran's nuclear program. While Bush tried to keep a smile on his face throughout the session with reporters, Putin seemed tense.

It was their first meeting since Bush opened his second term promising to spread democracy and freedom and asserting that relations with all leaders would be predicated on how they treat their people. Bush faced pressure from home from prominent Republicans and Democrats alike — to get tough with Putin, and their talks were seen by some as a test of whether the president would put his inaugural pledges into practice.

For over an hour of their meeting the leaders were alone with only translators, in a private session that was the longest they have had in over four years. The official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said the discussions were never heated.

In public, Putin compared his move to end direct popular election of regional governors to the American process of electing presidents through the Electoral College rather than by the results of the popular vote. "And it's not considered undemocratic to it?" Putin said.

He suggested that Russians who oppose his actions, such as a campaign against the Yukos oil company and his shutdown of independent media outlets, can sway public opinion because they "are richer than those who are in favor." "We often do not pay the attention to that," Putin said.

Bush was challenged as well by a Russian journalist who asked about "violations of the rights of journalists in the United States" without giving specifics.

Need a Ride to Church?
Just be at
UMASS Haigis Mall
at 10 AM
For the Free Sunday Shuttle
to Dwight Chapel
Only 15 minutes away!
FREE Bible with your first ride!
See you there!
885 Federal Street
Belchertown, MA 01007
413-256-8089
www.dwightchapel.org

ALL FIRED UP! creative FOOD & BEVERAGE
FEATURING MONGOLIAN BARBEQUE ALL YOU CAN EAT BUFFETS
GRAND OPENING
ALL YOU CAN EAT BUFFET
With Countless combinations of vegetables, poultry, fish, and meat.
Choose from 12 specially created sauces!!!
OPEN 7 DAYS A WEEK FOR LUNCH AND DINNER
Sunday Breakfast
Design your own omelets, pancakes, and french toast 10-4pm
A Fantastic Full Bar Menu
Create Your Own Meal
11:30am - 9 pm
48 Russell Street, Route 9, Hadley
413-584-5155
WWW.ALLFIREDUPHADLEY.COM

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 2005

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." -Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Huge onus on SGA to get elections right this year

With spring break only a few weeks away, another thought is looming over the heads of the UMass student body: Student Government Association elections. Given how the elections have been handled in the past, it is vitally important that the SGA has all of their bases covered in order to get it right this time.

Last year, the SGA elections were done twice, and the votes recounted because of the primary election being deemed unconstitutional. This year, in order to make sure such a thing does not happen twice, an emergency meeting was called to ensure there are enough election commissioners to man the polling stations. So far, it seems that the SGA is taking steps to adequately correct its past mistakes; a good move that reaffirms the integrity of the organization to the students.

As a result of the elections last year and the spectacle that was made of them, much of the student body may have lost faith in the SGA to represent it adequately. The disorganization of the elections may have represented the disorganization of the SGA, reaffirming the common stereotypes attributed to college students.

With regards to election officials, previous scandals that emerged last semester also make this election even that much more important. The SGA needs to once again prove to the student body and to the administration that they have merit, clout and the backing of the student population of UMass. The students, if given an appropriate leadership, will look to those officials with respect and admiration, if they truly feel that they can adequately represent them. These are the shoes that the current SGA candidates are going to have to fill.

Up for the new term next semester are Senator Sean Bliss and Attorney General Craig Goldschmidt, running for President and Trustee. Already they seem to have the students' interests in mind, which will be the only way to successfully get the student support behind the SGA. Picking fights with the administration is all well and good, but it evades the immediate issues at hand. Setting up an immediate agenda, one that lets the students know who it is that fighting for them and what the plan of attack is, is the essential element that will make or break the success of the upcoming election.

SGA elections will take place after classes reconvene from spring break. Given the timing of the elections, when students will be finding themselves just getting back into the swing of things and having to deal with midterm exams and papers, the SGA has a large task ahead of them.

So far, it seems the SGA got started off on the right foot. Now, the pressure is on them to make sure they keep it that way. Hopefully, this year they will be able to hold successful elections with candidates that adequately represent the student body's needs and wishes. There is an urgency to get things right this time, and all signs point toward huge improvements being seen in the SGA this semester in comparison to last year.

Unsigned editorials represent the majority opinion of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian Editorial Board.

In need of an explanation

Ben Duffy

Boxing legend Max Schmeling died at his home in Germany on Feb. 2, 2005. He was 99 years old.

Schmeling is perhaps best known for his two fights against "The Brown Bomber" Joe Louis. The first light, in 1936, ended when Schmeling upset Louis in the twelfth round. Schmeling immediately and inadvertently became Hitler's poster boy for the superiority of the Aryan race. Schmeling's victory over the black man was accepted as proof of eugenics, "the science of human improvement through better breeding." Eugenics was a process that brought about so-called "improvements" to the human race by rooting out "undesirable" genes. "Undesirable" genes included those of the handicapped, the feeble, paupers, the mentally ill, the criminal, and all races other than the Nordic.

In 1938, Louis and Schmeling fought again. This time, Schmeling was quickly defeated in the first round. When it became clear that Schmeling was going to lose the fight, Hitler ordered that the radio transmission be cut off in all German territories. His Aryan superman had been defeated, and the whole concept of eugenics had been dealt a deadly blow.

But Eugenics was not an entirely German science. Noted American eugenicists include Arthur Estabrook, Charles Davenport, and Margaret Sanger. Sanger is better known as the founder of Planned Parenthood, the world's largest provider of abortions and contraception.

Planned Parenthood denies any link between its founder and this creed of white supremacy. Her official Planned Parenthood biography points out that, "Eugenicists, like the Nazis, were opposed to the use of abortion and contraception by healthy and 'fit' women." Indeed, this was one issue where Sanger and the Nazis diverged. The Nazis believed that it was the duty of people possessing desirable genes to spread those genes far and wide. Sanger, on the other hand, believed that "human weeds" should be discouraged from reproducing, segregated, sterilized, and aborted, but did not encourage rampant procreation among "desirables."

Planned Parenthood makes its case for the defense of Sanger at www.plannedparenthood.org. The only concession that Planned Parenthood makes about its founder is that she supported the Supreme Court's 1927 Buck v. Bell decision. The decision permitted states to segregate "illiterates, paupers, unemployables, criminals, prostitutes, and dope-fiends on farms and open spaces as long as necessary for the strengthening and development of moral conduct," and adopting laws to keep diseased and "feeble-minded" immigrants out.

But Planned Parenthood has a lot of explaining to do about the writings and deeds of its founder. For example, they claim that Sanger never promoted abortion because it was illegal and dangerous in her time. Sanger died in 1966, seven years before Roe v. Wade made abortion legal. Sanger denounced abortion, calling the practice "vicious." But while she was denouncing the practice publicly, she was privately raising money for back-alley abortions and referring women to illegal abortionists.

Sadly, the remnants of eugenics didn't die with Max Schmeling. They live on to this day in the slogans and intentions of Planned Parenthood and their ilk.

Today, Planned Parenthood argues in favor of abortion under the specious logic that barring abortions would create a terrible industry of "back-alley abortions," which are so terrible that we must tolerate 35 million unborn children to be slaughtered to avoid such a situation. Unfortunately, their founder disagrees, and thought that back-alley abortions were a suitable alternative to the disgraceful state of motherhood.

They need to explain her remarks of 1937, when she advocated "good breeding" through sterilization. "It makes possible the creation of a new race," she said. "A new generation brought into this world consciously conceived. It makes possible the breeding out of human weeds... [and] the breeding in of clean, strong, and fit instruments to carry on the torch of human destiny." If that doesn't summarize eugenics, I don't know what does.

Planned Parenthood also claims that Sanger had no intentions of targeting specific ethnic groups. She favored birth control to benefit women, not to curb the population growth of any particular race. Oh, really? Well please explain her presence at a 1926 rally of the KKK. And what about the articles that she penned for her own publication "The Birth Control Review" entitled "The Eugenic Value of Birth Control" and "Birth Control and Racial Betterment?" Explain her remarks that Aboriginal Australians were "just a step higher than the chimpanzee in brain development," and complaints of Jews and Italians filling up insane asylums and feeble-minded institutions.

Planned Parenthood must also explain why she favored the sterilization laws that forcibly made 60,000 Americans incapable of reproduction in the earlier half of the 20th century. More than half of the states passed such laws, and in all cases, minorities were disproportionately represented among those sterilized. Among states with sterilization laws were five segregated southern states, with Virginia leading the nation.

Sadly, the remnants of eugenics didn't die with Max Schmeling. They live on to this day in the slogans and intentions of Planned Parenthood and their ilk. "Every child a wanted child," they say. Children shouldn't have to grow up poor, they argue. They contend that abortion is the logical decision when a child is to be born handicapped or deformed, and nearly half of all abortions are performed on black or Hispanic mothers. Hitler's dream lives on to this day.

Ben Duffy is a Collegian columnist.

A super-snobby sweet sixteen

Katelyn Harding

I can remember my 16th birthday party very well. It was a surprise, involving what I thought to be a routine trip to my best friend's house to hang out. When I arrived, all my friends were there to help me celebrate being old enough to drive a car with one of my parent's in the passenger seat. I might seem like I am downplaying the night, but the effort that went into it, and the people that were there were in their own ways, tremendous.

Since then, I have come to the realization that sweet sixteen birthday parties aren't so sweet anymore.

While watching TV the other day, flipping through channels aimlessly, I had the unfortunate luck to come across a new television show on MTV titled my "Super Sweet 16." The title of the show should be changed to "My Stuck-Up Spoiled 16." (By the way, I thought MTV stood for "Music Television," but that is another story.) The element that compelled me to not change the channel was the outright selfish, arrogant teenager it showcased. I fell victim, and endured this program for 30 shake-my-head-in-disgust minutes.

In the days leading up to her "Super Sweet" 16, the belle of the ball, Ava, suffered many terrible, frustrating events. While in Paris, buying two dresses for her party, she became agitated because some of the stores were not open. I personally get very upset when my mother takes me shopping in Paris and this happens. Oh wait, this has never happened to me before — Shopping in Paris, that is.

Another exasperating event happened on the day of her birthday. Her parents told her she is not going to get the present they promised her, which is a brand new car, because they haven't liked her attitude towards them lately. Maybe if they didn't treat her like a spoiled brat she wouldn't act like one. Naturally, the tears started to flow at the audacity of her parents preventing her from getting something she wants.

Not wanting to bore you with more offensive details about this young girl, I will get to my point. Has our society become so material-obsessed that we continually expect bigger and better? At certain points during this program, my jaw literally dropped open in reaction to how spoiled this girl was. People like Ava are adding to the decay of our society. It makes me nervous for future generations: kids are going to become greedier and their thirst for material belongings will be hard to satiate.

Has our society become so material-obsessed that we continually expect bigger and better?

There is a quote by The Who, which I think relates to over-privileged Ava: "I was born with a plastic spoon in my mouth." This is mocking the quote, "I was born with a silver spoon in my mouth," suggesting that people born with these "so-called" spoons are born into a life surrounded by material wealth. The Who are mocking this idea by saying that being born with plastic spoons, they actually had to work to get where they are. They were not born into greatness, they worked at succeeding.

Girls like Ava, who are born with the silver spoon, should take a step back and realize how lucky they are to be in their situation. Not having to worry about basically anything because Mommy and Daddy will be there, at least financially, to save them. Later on in the program, Ava's tears are dried when she finally got her brand new Range Rover, under the condition that she shows more respect for her parents. It's interesting how she needs to be told this, and that it is not a natural inclination that she feels.

After watching My Super Stuck-Up Spoiled 16, I was left with one last thought. If her parents were willing to lavish upon her such a presentation for turning 16, what is this egotistical girl going to expect for an occasion far more momentous, say, her wedding? I pray for her husband. God Bless him.

Thinking back to my 16th birthday party, it makes me remember with a smile how all my friends had gotten together because they cared about me. Not because I gave them a flashy invitation, promising them the best time of their lives if they came to my really cool party. It was a party that consisted of great friends resulting in great times. I am sad to say that probably most of the people attending Ava's party hardly even knew her; they liked having an excuse to go buy an expensive dress or suit, so that they could be considered cool. Her family, and I'm assuming good friends, were there, but her party lacked the backbone of something that should be essential to everyone: genuine love and affection for the people around you.

I feel bad for Ava, because through her fancy centerpieces and too expensive dresses is a girl that you can only take at face value. Underneath her posh exterior is emptiness, she lacks the capacity to realize how lucky she is.

Katelyn Harding is a Collegian columnist.

A few simple acts of kindness

Mike Anmuth

This time of year is cold, so we're all bundled up in our hats and scarves and heavy coats and other winter apparel. Since we are dressed this way, it's reasonable that we keep our eyes downcast when other people walk by on campus, to avoid freezing our faces. We can hardly see someone's expression when they are hidden by several layers of clothing. Still, this phenomenon only works for the winter, so why do we keep our eyes downcast and lack to acknowledge people even when it's warm outside?

Not just a Massachusetts thing and not just A UMass thing, people all over tend to ignore other people if they are not acquainted with them. I cannot tell you how many colleges that I have toured, located in this area and everywhere else, where people wouldn't give me the time of day. It's not a location thing, we aren't any better or worse than any other college campus in terms of acknowledgment of other people; it's a universal issue that should be addressed.

Mahatma Gandhi said, "Be the change you want to see in the world." It is this reasoning that we should all be more friendly to one-another, that by starting small, we can "be the change" that we want to see both in ourselves and in our environment. If we each are a little friendlier to our fellow person, then the world will inherently become a much friendlier place. By being "the change," we can simply keep our eyes up and bright instead of downcast and avoiding, and while it is a small step, it is certainly an essential one.

Obviously, this does not work for every situation. Clearly, there is no truth that I could issue about this subject that is universal. Sometimes we stare down because we are rushing to get somewhere or it is cold outside, or we are uncomfortable. It's the last issue which ties directly into acknowledgment of other people, and when we are comfortable, we are more likely to enjoy ourselves and be outwardly enjoyable to others who we may not know. After all, how many times have you seen someone who looked like they were enjoying themselves around campus, in any number of facilities? To make our campus a little bit warmer, acknowledgment of our peers is one way to accomplish the goal.

If we each are a little friendlier to our fellow person, then the world will inherently become a much friendlier place.

Though I feel like I'm writing an advice column for kindergarteners, it really is just as simple as a hello. It really can be accomplished by giving a nod or a smile to someone you don't know while wandering around this place. With some 18,000 undergrads, I imagine it might be difficult to know them all personally, so we come in contact with those people who might be potential friends each and every day. The simple act of kindness could be the bright spot in someone's day, or simply an idea that people aren't too focused on where they are going that they cannot stop. Put in the easiest terms, its quick, its easy and it can make an impact.

Obviously you're thinking that this column is very happy-go-lucky and my eternal optimism for greeting people is ignoring the fact that some people probably don't want to be greeted, some people probably don't want to be greeters, and some people really don't care about anyone else. I understand these things, and I can empathize with them at times, but this canipus has been so open to me that I think we are underestimating the student population if we think that we cannot be friendly and receive friendliness in return. Perhaps acknowledgment will not get you a million new friends, but it might, and even if it doesn't, it might make you feel better about yourself in the process.

I won't lie to you, not every day is sunshine and roses, nor should it be. Its winter, its cold, and people are dressed heavily, so even nodding might be difficult. However, the rest of the snow will be melting soon and the sun will be shining, and along with the change in weather should be a change in dealing with random people with whom you come into contact on this campus. Greet others, nod, acknowledge, and if you see me around, let me know how it's working for you — and tell me with a smile.

Mike Anmuth is a Collegian columnist.

Write for EdOp.

Email editorial@dailycollegian.com

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 2005

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Stephen Kellogg comes home

By Meghan Healy
Collegian Staff

If Stephen Kellogg seems at home tomorrow night when he takes the stage of the Iron Horse Music Hall in Northampton, it will be with good reason. The Northampton resident, and former UMass student, will make a stop at the cramped venue on his latest tour, supporting his first major label album, the self-titled "Stephen Kellogg and the Sixers."

'Stephen Kellogg and the Sixers'
Iron Horse
Northampton
Feb 26

It is not simply the fact that Kellogg calls the Pioneer Valley his home base that makes him seems at ease on the stage of the Iron Horse; Kellogg's showmanship and uninhibited talent guarantee the performer will appear at ease on pretty much any stage he and his band mates play.

*****

It's not a Cinderella story by any stretch of the imagination. This is not the tale of a triumphant underdog. It is not beyond reason, or really even surprising, that Kellogg and his band, keys player Keith Karlson and percussionist Brian Factor, are starting to garner national attention. Anyone familiar with Kellogg's sound knows the singer/songwriter is on to something special.

With the onslaught of homogenous rock bands and the rising population of acoustic guitar guys with cool hair invading the airwaves, Kellogg and the Sixers offer up something slightly different. In truth, trying to place The Sixers into any one genre proves to be no easy feat.

See KELLOGG on page 6

UMass grad rocks on major-label debut

By Meghan Healy
Collegian Staff

About a year and a half ago, Stephen Kellogg took to the studio with his longtime friends/ sometimes bandmates Brian Factor and Keith Karlson to record his fourth full-length album. For some years he had been playing music to modest but loyal audiences in Massachusetts and beyond, releasing his discs independently. Yet, by the time Kellogg finished recording the album that would become "Bulletproof Heart" he was anything but independent. Somewhere in the weeks of recording, somewhere amidst the album's rock inspired pop melodies, Stephen Kellogg the solo artist ceased to exist and Stephen Kellogg and the Sixers were born.

Under the name Stephen Kellogg and the Sixers, the trio released "Bulletproof Heart" in February of 2004. In the months that followed they toured the country, built a following even stronger than the only Kellogg had already earned himself and cemented their identity as a full-fledged band. The change in name was no slight alteration; in this time the three musicians truly became a band.

They headed back to the studio in the fall of 2004 with a new label (Foundations) and a musical chemistry in its prime. The resulting album, the self-titled "Stephen Kellogg and the Sixers," released Feb. 15, is the group's sophomore effort, but the sound is that of a band much older. With seven new tracks and four re-

See REVIEW on page 6

One-hit wonders that mattered

The Mix Tape
Matt O'Rourke

This mixtape features what I consider to be some of the most memorable one-hit wonders of the past 15 years. Hopefully you'll find yourself reminiscing about the tracks and where you were in your life.

"Breakfast at Tiffany's" – Deep Blue Something (4:16)

Deep Blue Something remind us all with "Breakfast at Tiffany's" that all a relationship needs is one good thing to get it started. The combination of electric guitar with acoustic isn't always smooth, yet the band manages to pull it off wonderfully. Harmony is a big part of why "Breakfast" was such a success, and an Irish accent never hurt anyone either.
(Interscope, 1995)

"Tubthumper" – Chumbawumba (3:23)

Regardless of whether this song made you want to get up on your feet and sing along, or get up and hit someone, you have to admire the brilliance of a simple message. There seems fantastic success in the music world with large groups of singing people, throughout all generations, and it worked here too. A true feel-good song, the tune may prove familiar to sports fans- this track has the same kind of reaching affect as the "Hey Song" does at hockey games.
(Universal, 1997)

"I'll Be" – Edwin McCain (4:25)

Considered by many fans of popular music to be the ideal prom song, "I'll Be" is the romantic blast from the past. This ballad is an almost sure way to swoon your loved one, and many couples share this track as "their song". The lyrics are catchy, and you may not need know all the lyrics to the separate verses, but "I'll be your crying shoulder...I'll be the greatest fan of your life" is sure to remain in your head.
(Atlantic, 1997)

"Flagpole Sitta" – Harvey Danger (3:38)

The ultimate antithesis to "I'll Be", or one of the best teenage-angst tracks, "Flagpole Sitta" is bright while remaining negative. One of the best new-punk songs to have come out, it's a guaranteed way to forget your worries. It might be ironic that the chorus is just as catchy as "I'll Be," as listeners will find themselves shouting along to "I'm not sick but I'm not well." A great track to be blasting when you're mad at life, your parents, or if you just feel like dancing around.
(Slash Records, 1998)

"Wherever You Will Go"- The Calling (3:28)

Although they may yet have another hit song, The Calling hit pop radio like a tidal wave four years ago, flooding the airwaves with "Wherever You Will Go." A song about unconditional love, the opening 30 seconds builds with acoustic plucking, and a growing wall of sound from the rest of the band. Simply crafted, with a common theme in music, "Wherever You Will Go" will bring most listeners back to their high school days.
(RCA, 2001)

"Save Tonight" – Eagle-Eye Cherry (3:56)

Eagle-Eye Cherry popped up on music charts without warning, and was suddenly on every music station imaginable. He managed to pack a lot of sound and musical elements into roughly four minutes of music. From the well-written pop lyrics, guitar solo, and slight drum feature, Eagle-Eye Cherry painted a scene in the listeners mind, while providing enough musical depth for the harshest of music critics.
(Sony, 1998)

"Closing Time" – Semisonic (4:33)

It may be cliché to say "save the best for last", however its true in the case of Semisonic. Dan Wilson, the lead singer, composed a song with powerful pop lyrics with layers of music. The song begins with a simple guitar and piano duo, and erupts into a ballad that even after listening to it, never quite gets old. Unfortunately, Semisonic wasn't recognized for the brilliance of the rest of "Feeling Strangely Fine", but that seems to be the case for so much wonderful music today. Well placed drum fills, a powerful-yet-not-overdone guitar solo, electronic orchestration, and a brilliant metaphor creates one of the best one-hit wonders of all time.
(MCA, 1998)

Total Running Time - 27:48

Philly artists leave their imprints on the textile world

By Ellis Lotozo
Knight Ridder Newspapers

PHILADELPHIA — In Galbraith & Paul's big window-lined studio in Manayunk, Pa., five artisans work their way along spans of fabric stretched onto tables eight yards long.

They dab textile paint onto carved blocks, carefully position the blocks on the cloth, and press down.

Dab. position. press. Dab, position, press. On they go methodically, until a swath of fabric with designer Liz Galbraith's whimsical "Donuts" or elegant "Ivy Paisley" pattern appears.

"It's like a gigantic rubber stamp," Galbraith says of her method of hand-block printing.

Galbraith, who carves her patterns into dense foam glued to Plexiglas instead of traditional wood blocks, is the only textile designer in the United States producing a large-scale commercial line of fabrics using the ancient technique of hand-blocking. And her efforts have won influential fans in the design world.

"Liz is a tremendous colorist, and the natural quality of the hand-printing just adds so much character to the fabric," says Erik Hughes, co-owner of De Sousa Hughes, a San Francisco showroom and interior-design firm that distributes Galbraith & Paul fabrics to the trade.

"We've got projects with them literally all over the world," Hughes says.

The company, which Galbraith runs with her husband, Ephraim Paul, has seen its custom-printed fabrics, in Galbraith's signature tones of grayed greens and blues, subtle burnt oranges, and muted berry shades, snapped up by interior designers and used for upholstery and drapery in luxury resorts in Costa Rica, the Caribbean and Mexico.

Lighting fixtures and shades produced from the fabric can be found in Starbucks stores, Wolfgang Puck's chain of California Pizza Kitchen restaurants, and in the high-end health-club chain Equinox.

"Pretty much every project I do features a little bit of Galbraith & Paul," says Jay Jeffers, an interior designer with studios in Los Angeles and San Francisco. An apartment makeover by Jeffers that used the textiles as a focal point earned a spread in House Beautiful last year.

"There is just nothing out there that is as transitional," he says. "I can use it in a traditional room or in a modern one."

That's because Galbraith's aesthetic is tough to pigeonhole, with designs ranging from the retro-looking fruit slices of her "Citrus" pattern to the elegantly modern etched lines of "Birch" to the demure sprigs of "Smokebush."

"I like things that kind of bridge the gap between different styles," she says.

Galbraith's work has been likened to the punchy designs of the Finnish company Marimekko, with touches of Arts and Crafts Movement visionary William Morris (famed for his nature-inspired wallpaper designs), and a dash of Fortuny, the legendary Spanish-born artist whose Venice atelier devised new ways of dycing and printing fabrics in the early 1900s.

She acknowledges those influences. "I like simple, bold patterns," she says. "And I love William Morris for the quality of the hand in his work. He prized the process. He was anti-industrial. And Fortuny was process-oriented, too."

A brand-new venture is a line of hand-tufted wool rugs that use Galbraith's patterns. Just introduced on the West Coast, the rug line, which is being produced in Asia, came about after the couple discovered that some of their designs were being knocked off by a rug manufacturer.

They sued for copyright infringement and won. "So we decided to invest the money in our own rug production," says Paul, 42, who handles the business end of Galbraith & Paul.

Galbraith, 43, started out as a painter. "But the painting never felt like the right fit," she says. It was too abstract, she says, for a girl whose mother taught her to sew, quilt and braid rugs.

See ART on page 6

Kellogg focused on live performances

KELLOGG from page 5

If you want an idea of what you're in for, just take a look at Kellogg's personal top five favorite albums: "Fleetwood Mac, 'Rumors'; Counting Crows, 'August and everything After'; Rolling Stones, 'Exile on Main Street'; Cat Stevens, 'Tea for the Tillerman' and Guns and Roses, "Appetite for Destruction"" he rattles off with no hesitation. It seems that elements of each of these artists make their way into the Sixers' sound.

Nowhere is this concoction of variant styles more evident than in the trio's self-titled major label debut, released just over a week ago. "Stephen Kellogg and the Sixers" is 11 tracks of pure musical contradiction — mellow and frenetic all at once.

"We started recording in mid-July," says Kellogg, via cell phone as he makes his way from the depth of Pennsylvania to DC. "All in all, it took about six weeks to finish up."

The disc marks the second album for Kellogg as a member of a band. The threesome had recorded "Bulletproof Heart" in the fall of 2003. This time around though, "the big difference is that the last album we made kind of bought us together as a band. ['Bulletproof Heart'] made us a band," says Kellogg. "This time it was a more unified vision."

The setting for recording also changed this time around. The Sixers left the serenity of the Commonwealth and headed to Manhattan to record with producer Andy Zulla.

"A lot of people go out to the country and rent a house to record ... For us, living in Western Massachusetts, we needed the opposite," says Kellogg. "We were looking for a different sort of stimulation. I think it added some intensity to the recordings."

The addition of Zulla, best known for his work with Jessica Simpson and Rod Stewart, to the Sixers team was also a welcomed change by Kellogg.

"My good friend Rich Price made a record with [Zulla] and I thought it was a great record," he says. Price introduced Kellogg to the producer at a show shortly before he was due to start recording. According to Kellogg, the partnership was an ideal match for both Zulla and the Sixers. Zulla, he says, was looking to diverge from his pop origins and work with some more rock oriented groups. Kellogg's melodi driven, lyrically powered rock sound seemed the perfect fit.

On the band's end, Zulla's vigor was exactly what they needed. "We were looking for a producer who was more sonic," said Kellogg. "I always thought our records were an accurate documentation of our songs but not their energy. We wanted a producer with a more sonic energy to bring some of that back."

The album Zulla and the Sixers created marks Kellogg's entrance into the mainstream music scene. For an independent artist who has spent the better part of his post-collegiate years stuffed in a van, driving around the country, trying to make a name for himself, a record deal with a major label is huge, right?

"I feel like a lot of stuff comes when you're least expecting it," says Kellogg with a perfect blend of sincerity and humbleness. "[After 'Bulletproof Heart'], we settled in and realized 'if we keep working very hard we could be a really good band.' Our manager kept saying certain [representatives from labels] were coming to the shows, but I kinda stopped caring about that."

Kellogg had, in the time following the Sixers' first release, shifted his focus slightly. "I was just trying to make the shows as good as possible," he says. "I won't say I'd given up because I wasn't sad about it. I just decided I didn't care about being famous or embraced by critics."

As luck would have it, this attitude, won over quite a few record labels and soon Kellogg found himself meeting with their representatives. Many of the execs that Kellogg met with didn't seem to share the same vision for the band as he did. It was a meeting with Universal Records that led the Sixers to sign with the company's grassroots off-shoot, Foundations Records.

For now, Stephen Kellogg seems unconcerned with his rapidly rising stardom. "I don't want to sound un-ambitious," Kellogg says, "but I think we are growing artistically... of course like any business you want to do better to pay your rent and make a living, so you want to grow as a business."

Yet beyond his desire to continue making a living off of his music, Kellogg doesn't worry much about traditional, mainstream success. "It's too overwhelming to think 'I am going to be disappointed if I haven't done this' in 'this' amount of time.' That doesn't seem healthy to me."

Kellogg instead is focusing on having fun playing with Karlson and Factor. "The band has been totally based upon friendships more than music," he says. "I was playing solo and realized that wasn't what I'd dreamt of doing as a little kid. I met Keith and we hit it off ... then I got an email from [Brian Factor] who I'd met at UMass ... Everything worked out in a random cool way."

"When you spend that much time with people you really want to like them," Kellogg says. As a band, and as friends, we make sure we're putting what's important first," says Kellogg.

"Hopefully, I'll have a long life ahead of me and I'm sure we'll all do different things," says Kellogg. "Right now, I am just thankful for each week we are together ... Being in a band with people you care about is really a cool thing."

*****

Stephen Kellogg and the Sixers will take the Iron Horse stage tomorrow night. Doors open at 5:30 p.m. and the Virginia Coalition will open the show at 7 p.m. Tickets are $15 in advance and $18 at the door. The Sixers will also appear at For the Record in Amherst tomorrow afternoon at 1:30 p.m.

New label for 'Sixers'

REVIEW from page 5

recorded tunes, "Stephen Kellogg..." is the perfect blend of Kellogg's sincere and stirring lyrics, Karlson's soulful keys and Factor's solid percussion.

The disc starts off with "Flower in Rain," a new track that does a good job of introducing the listener to what the Sixers are all about: strong vocals, sincere lyrics and melodies that fall somewhere in between pop and rock. Kellogg's voice blends effortlessly with Karlson's keys and yet his vocals somehow stand apart from the band backing them. The song, like the whole of "Stephen Kellogg," is not quite rock, not exactly pop, not really country. The Sixers seem to have mastered the art of borrowing from every genre.

An effortless transition leads into "You've Changed," more on the rock side of this super-sized niche Kellogg and Co. have carved out for themselves. "I walked into my honesty and I saw it to be false/ like an early indication of a failing protocol," laments the frontman over the backdrop a faded electric guitar and tinny drums.

By the time listener's reaches track four, "My Sweet Charade," the urge to compare Stephen Kellogg and the Sixers to anyone from Matchbox 20 to Willie Nelson will be prevalent, but hold off. "Charade" is one of the most simplistic tracks on the album, and thus the most compelling. "Maybe it's love," Kellogg sings of a one-night stand, "how would I know? Every time I get close to it, I let it go." A guy with a fear of commitment is nothing new, yet somehow Kellogg seems to state it with the simplicity and ironic sincerity that only he can pull off.

Tracks like "Blue Jean," "Anthem of Our Discovery," "Vegas" and "Start the Day Early" are the best places to hear the Sixers-sound in full force. Each edged with its own rock inspiration, these tracks reaffirm what Kellogg realized a year and a half ago; these guys have an undeniable chemistry. The tunes may have gone unnoticed had they appeared on a Kellogg solo album, but — given the Sixers treatment — these tracks make for some of the disc's more exciting moments.

If The Sixers' chemistry is best shown on their rock tracks, it is the slower tunes that showcase Kellogg's immense talent. On "Keep Me in You Thoughts" the songwriter's voice is lined with the perfect amount of pain and wistfulness to move any listener.

"Such a Way," a Kellogg classic, is reborn here as something more than just ballad. With Karlson's soulful piano singing melody and Factor's skillfully understated drumming, "Such a Way" is with out question the strongest track on the album. It is on this track that the "earnest, not-so-rock 'n roll rock star" image is realized.

Kellogg's vocals are at their best on this track, saying more with each line than the simplistic lyrics would seem to allow. "I met this girl named Liz in a bar just south of here/ She moved to New York City so that she could disappear," Kellogg recalls with the pained nostalgia of an artist 20 years his senior. "She moves in such a way that people fall in love with her, every single day."

The 11 tracks on the Sixers' self-titled album aren't easily confined to anyone description. A little bit country, a little bit rock 'n roll, a little bit hair metal, a little bit Joan Baez — Stephen Kellogg and the Sixers are a band with somewhat of an identity crisis ... and we wouldn't want them any other way.

Artist uses ancient technique

ART from page 5

"What I did all my life was make things," she says. "That's what I liked."

High school sweethearts back home in Winnetka, Ill., the couple decided to move to Philadelphia after college (Galbraith at Washington University, Paul at Yale). The choice Galbraith says, was arbitrary. They wanted to be on the East Coast and near New York, without New York's crowds and high cost of living. "And Ephraim's grandmother was living here at the time," she says.

She dabbled in painting and waited on tables; he was an aspiring writer who taught English and did graduate work. Then, in 1986, Galbraith rented a studio in Old City previously occupied by artist Isamu Noguchi, who had used the space while he worked on "A Bolt of Lightning," the sculpture that sits at the base of the Benjamin Franklin Bridge.

MAXIMUM Capacity SPORTS BAR
ONLY 20 minutes from campus!
Over 30 HOT BODY CONTEST
No Cover open till 2 am
$600 in Prizes!
$2.50 Patriot Drinks
$1.00 Shot Special
$1.50 Pints
www.maximumsportsbar.com
1970 Memorial Drive Chicopee, MA

Memorial Services for David Graham Du Bois will be held at 2:00 PM, Sunday, February 27, 2005 at the Campus Center Auditorium on the campus of the University of Massachusetts, Amherst.

David Graham Du Bois, a retired professor, journalist, and a writer who devoted much of his life to preserving the legacy of his stepfather---scholar and black liberationist W.E.B. Du Bois—died January 28 at a Northampton, Mass., hospital. He was 79 and had emphysema.

A longtime visiting professor of Afro-American studies and journalism at the University of Massachusetts in Amherst, Du Bois was instrumental in persuading the University to rename its main library for his stepfather, a Massachusetts native who died in his adopted country of Ghana in 1963 when he was 95.

The library is the largest repository of the papers and writings of the civil rights pioneer, who helped found the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People in 1909 and edited its journal, Crisis.

Du Bois also established the W.E.B. Du Bois Foundation and dedicated his later years to advancing his stepfathers's dream of an encyclopedia of African history written largely by African scholars. Three of the projected 20 volumes of the Encyclopedia Africana: Dictionary of African Biography had been published since 1977.

David Du Bois attended Oberlin Conservatory of Music in Ohio and served as an officer in the armed forces during World War II before earning a bachelor's degree in sociology from Hunter College in New York City in 1950. He earned a master's degree in history from New York University in 1956. He later studied Chinese for a year at Beijing University.

From China, he took a steamer to Egypt and spent the 1960's and early 1970's in Cairo working as a journalist. "I fell in love with Egypt," he once told the Boston Globe. "I got (there) and discovered that everybody looked like me, and I looked like everybody else.

I was accepted as a human being without any reference to the color of my skin. It was an overwhelming experience. I found myself invisible."

Covering such stories as the construction of the Aswan High Dam, he considered his Cairo period "the most fascinating" time of his life.

He was an editor and reporter for the Arab Observer, the Middle East News and Features Agency, and the Egyptian Gazette. He also was an announcer and writer for Radio Cairo and lectured on American literature at Cairo University.

In 1972, Du Bois returned to the United States and took a teaching position at UC Berkley. He also joined the Black Panther Party and for four years he was its official spokesman and editor of its weekly newspaper.

Critical of the militancy that marked the Panthers' early history, he was a witness to its later forays into mainstream politics, such as Bobby Seale's unsuccessful run for Oakland Mayor.

During this time, Du Bois wrote a novel about African American expatriates during the 1960s called "And Bid Him Sing," which was published in 1975 by Ramparts Press.

He became custodian of his stepfather's legacy after his mother's death in 1977. He was on the board of the Du Bois Memorial Center for Pan-African Culture in Accra, Ghana, which holds some of his stepfather' papers, and became a Ghanaian citizen.

He taught at the University of Massachusetts from 1983-2001, when he retired.

He spent his last years trying to build support for the encyclopedia project, which he believed would correct "the omissions, the distortions and lies that have appeared in most European-Centered scholarship on Africa."

Du Bois, who had long been divorced, had no children.

Minutewomen look strong for the 2005 softball season

SOFTBALL from page 10

votes in both the NFCA and the ESPN.Com/USA Softball Top 25 Polls.

Here is a positional breakdown of this year's team:

PITCHERS

"It starts with pitching and it ends with pitching," Sortino said. "We have a young pitching staff having lost Kelli Arnold, a third team All-America, who didn't come back as a senior. That readjusted our pitching staff. I think the pitching staff has really stepped it up."

Senior Barb LaFogg and junior Jenna Busa will be called upon to carry the load on the mound.

"I think Barb and Jenna have stepped up formidably to the challenge and they've really increased their repertoire of what they can bring to a batter," Sortino said.

Much will be expected from LaFogg, who went 1-1 with a 3.44 ERA last season in her first year at UMass after transferring from Seton Hall.

Busa was a major contributor to the pitching staff last year, posting a 13-8 record with a 2.34 ERA. Busa turned in seven shutouts last season and tossed her first career no-hitter on March 13 against Virginia Tech.

Rounding out the pitching staff is freshman Maggie Feix. Feix is coming off a dominant high school career at North Kingstown (R.I.) High School where she went 34-17 with a 0.51 ERA.

CATCHERS

Behind the plate for the Minutewomen this year will be a familiar face in a new spot. Junior KJ Kelly will make the move from third base, but Sortino expects the transition to be effortless.

"Moving KJ was a no-brainer," Sortino said. "She's a catcher. We put her at third, so she's already been out of position. Now she's coming back to home, no pun intended."

While Sortino believes Kelly will be strong defensively, it's her offense that draws most of the attention. Kelly set a single-season record with 13 home runs last year and is within five of the of the school record of 26.

Kelly has been an All-Conference selection in each of her first two years and will be a major contributor to what should be an excellent offense.

Kelly will be backed up by freshman Sarah Hurd, who may also see time in the infield.

INFIELD

Sortino said the team returns a pretty seasoned infield, but she doesn't have a set lineup yet. The only player who is assured a starting spot is senior shortstop Hilary Puglia. Puglia was named A-10 Player of the Year last season and is strong with the bat and in the field.

"There isn't a set lineup yet," Sortino said. "Obviously, Hilary has to be in the lineup. She never has a bad practice. Everyday is like the last day as far as the way she's playing. You love to see a senior play like that. She just does a great job.

"Other than that, there's a battle at first. There's a battle for the other middle infield position because depending on who and where we play, Hilary can play either second or short. And third is deep, too."

The battle at first is between sophomores Amanda Morin and Amanda Acampora. Morin was the starter last season, but Acampora is making a push to crack the lineup this year.

Junior Kristi Stefanoni returns at second base, but she will be challenged by a handful of teammates for playing time. In the mix in the middle infield will be Hurd, freshman Stacy Cullington and sophomores Candice Molinari and Jackie Teman. Molinari is making the switch to the infield after starting 45 games in the outfield last year.

There will be a number of players looking to move into Kelly's departed spot at the hot corner. Senior Pant Sulick has the inside track on the job as she is coming off a strong season in which she saw action in 59 games. Hurd and Acampora will also compete for time at third.

OUTFIELD

The outfield lost two starters to graduation and all of the spots are up for grabs. In the fold in the outfield are Molinari, senior Denise Denis, junior Lesley Ferrara, sophomore Michea Holness and freshmen Lauren Proctor, Angela Conforti and Feix.

"The outfield is deep," Sortino said. "We've got four or five players that can potentially play out there. It depends on who's swinging the bat. We're looking for who will bring us the greatest consistency."

Senior Jasmine Edwards will also look to contribute off the bench as a pinch-hitter for the Minutewomen.

Heading into a season with lofty expectations, Sortino feels her team will be aided by great depth and an outstanding offense.

"It's nice to have this kind of dilemma when I'm making out the lineup," Sortino said of her team's depth. "It's better to have it this way than to be wondering who will hit today.

"I know some people probably think I'm maniacal in saying that this is probably one of the best offensive teams we've ever put together. We got shutout in our first game, but I know the way our players can hit the ball and how they have hit the ball over previous years. This is a very potent offense and I think people will see that in due time."

A-10 West stays tight

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

If there were any previous doubts that the Atlantic 10 West crown would come down the final game of the year, there are certainly none now.

As of yesterday, the Xavier Musketeers, Richmond Spiders and George Washington Colonials were engaged in a three-way tie for first place in the talented A-10 West division (all three hold 11-3 in-conference records), making the last three games of the 2004-2005 season that much more critical.

While GW has wrapped up its season series with both the Spiders and Musketeers (beating Richmond twice and splitting two with Xavier), tonight's game between Xavier and Richmond will likely be the straw that breaks the camel's back for the West division.

Whoever wins tonight's match up — be it the revamped inside-out game of XU's Tara Boothe or UR's deadly duo of guard Saona Chapman and forward Kate Flavin — will put itself into a tie for first with GW (18-7). The Colonials' remaining two games of the season are against LaSalle and Duquesne, two teams they crushed in the first meetings of the year and are likely to repeat that feat.

Coming into tonight's match up, the Musketeers (17-8) and the Spiders (20-5) both boast a great presence at the post with All-America candidates in the forward spot. Xavier's Boothe leads the A-10 in scoring with 19.7 per game, while Richmond's Flavin ranks second with 17.5. However, Flavin holds the advantage on the boards, ranking second behind Temple's Candice Dupree with 9.1 per game, to Boothe's 7.8 (sixth).

The X-factor in all of this will be the play of Chapman, one of the premier point guards in the conference. If the junior out of Voluntown, Ct. has another superb game like the one she had last Sunday against Massachusetts (15 points, two assists, one steal), the Spiders just might come away with this game in their pocket.

FANS HEAD TO THE 'BOOTHE' ON PLAYER OF THE YEAR

Prior to the start of the season, the Xavier forward was chosen by Street and Smith's as an Honorable Mention All-America. As the season is winding down and gearing up for next week's A-10 Tournament, it's pretty clear that she's lived up to the hype.

On the A-10 Conference's website, a recent fan poll revealed that as of yesterday, 48 percent of the 2,222 fans believe that Boothe should be named the conference's Player of the Year. Boothe will be contending for Player of the Year honors alongside Dupree, Flavin and GWU's Anna Montanana, all of whom are averaging at least 16 points and seven rebounds per game.

BECK INKS SELF INTO RECORD BOOKS

It was going to happen sooner or later.

On Feb. 17, freshman Kimberly Beck officially put herself into the record books with a seven-assist effort in a win against St. Joseph's. The seven-assist night gives Beck the all-time school record for most assists in a season by a freshman, previously marked at 122. The A-10 assist leader now has 126 on the season with two games still to play.

The effort won her A-10 Rookie of the Week honors this week for the sixth time this year, more than any other rookie in the conference.

No Cals Last Call No Carbs
anti-hangover & nutritional drink
No Hangover
All-Natural Anti-Hangover & Nutritional Drink
Last Call is available now at:
Liquors 44, Four Season's Liquors, Stoney's Pub, Holyoke Liquor Mart, Pop's Liquors, R&P Liquors and Niedbala's.
Ask for it at your favorite bar and restaurant
Campus Rep Opportunities Available, Call for more information
Distributed By Baystate Beverage Distributors, Westfield, MA 413-562-0150
Please Drink Responsibly

COMPARE AND SAVE
ROUND 3
StudentUniverse.com
-VS-
Student Travel in Amherst
StudentUniverse.com $0 No Student ID Card
Round Trip to Paris $376
DING! DING!
COMPARE AND SAVE
Those Other Companies Must Purchase $22 Student ID Card
Round Trip to Paris $423
StudentUniverse.com

Warehouse SALE
...1ST QUALITY MERCHANDISE from mall stores you love!
UMASS
Student Union Ballroom
benefiting Lambda Phi Epsilon
VISA MasterCard
got clothes?
Pants $9.99
Jackets $15.00
Sleepwear $5.00
Tops $7.99
Feb. 28th - March 3rd
www.nobodysperfectinc.com
10% off
Cannot be combined with any other offer. Must present coupon prior to payment.

Minutemen renew old rivalry in important Atlantic 10 game

MEN'S HOOPS from page 10

Chaney issued an apology to St. Joe's and the A-10, and imposed a one-game suspension on himself, to be served Saturday. Assistant coach Dan Leibovitz, who in his ninth season at Chaney's side and is tied for the longest tenure among A-10 assistant coaches, will coach the team.

"It's definitely going to be strange to play against Temple and not see John Chaney over there," Lappas said. "I don't think they're going to change up what they do, though. They're still going to play Temple basketball and stick to what they've always done."

What they've done is consistently frustrated opponents nationwide with Chaney's patented matchup zone defense — one that packs the middle and forces teams to make shots from the perimeter. In a 61-49 loss to the Owls on Jan. 3, Lappas felt like his team got a number of good looks, but simply didn't make enough shots, something the Minutemen will need to do to be successful tomorrow.

Lappas also knows that it will be difficult to get leading scorer Rashaun Freeman involved in the game against the zone. The sophomore forward scored just eight points in the previous meeting, and was frequently frustrated with his play.

On the injury front, senior captain Anthony Anderson will play but not start after seeing 20 minutes of action against Rhode Island on Wednesday night. Junior forward Jeff Viggiano will also play despite an injured ankle, while freshman forward Lawrence Carrier will be a game-time decision after straining his hamstring and not dressing against the Rams.

NOTE: If the Minutemen win tomorrow, they will pull themselves into a tie with Temple for second place in the A-10 East with two games to play in conference. If the teams finish in a tie, the official tiebreakers are as follows: 1. Head-to-head competition 2. Division win-loss record 3. Best record against highest-seeded remaining teams in division 4. Best record against teams in opposite division (beginning with first seed and continuing, if necessary, to the sixth seed) 5. Coin flip.

Jeff Viggiano finds enough space to drive to the basket on Wednesday night against URI. UMass travels to Temple tomorrow.

UMass men's skiers look to Regionals

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts men's skiing team will race in the 2005 ECSC Regional Final this weekend in Water Valley.

Last year, the men's team finished first in this event in a performance that left the competition stunned. Then-freshman Rush Hawkins finished first of 70 competitors in the giant slalom with two-run time of 1:53.77, and finished second of 73 competitors in the slalom (1:27.89).

The men's team is looking sharp coming into this weekend's races, placing well in the Boston College Carnival on Feb. 12 and 13 and at Mt. Sunapee and Pats Peak the next weekend.

In the Boston College Carnival at Ascutney, Vt., Hawkins won the slalom event with a two-run time of 1:46.37. Freshman Jason Small followed Hawkins in ninth place (1:50.61) with senior Kevin Collins (2:00.65) and freshman James Green (2:01.81) placing 26th and 27th, respectively.

In the giant slalom event, Small and Hawkins tied for second with identical times of 1:33.84. Senior Marc Epstein finished 18th with a two-run time of 1:37.09 while Collins (1:58.70) placed 24th. The Minutemen finished in second overall in the event.

The next weekend on Feb. 18 at Mt. Sunapee, Hawkins placed first in the giant slalom again with a two-run time of 1:58.80. Small came next in 16th (2:03.38) with Epstein (2:05.58), Collins (2:07.83) and Green (2:08.88) all finishing in the top 30.

The next day in the slalom event at Pats Peak, Hawkins won again with a two-run time of 1:26.74, followed again by Small (1:28.03).

With such solid times from the skiers going into the pressure-packed regional final, and considering the team's experience and past success, there should be little concern. But like every athletic competition, there is always room for extra preparation.

"It is an intense pressure situation," assistant coach Dave Pomeroy said. "We train this week and we try to stick to our routine — waxing, prepping skis, working all week."

The men's team won last year's regional final by a slim margin, and with little time to spare, extensive preparations must be made. In an important race like the one at Water Valley this weekend, even the skiers equipment could become the team's achilles heel if overlooked.

"Last year we won Regionals by a tenth of a second. And with that amount of time, you have to ask, did you wax your skis better than the other guy?" Pomeroy added. "It's such a small amount of time, it is crazy to think of the 'ifs' and the 'could of's' .... We spend a lot of time prepping our skis to be the fastest they can be."

Pomeroy emphasized the importance of skiing equipment by citing the extent to which the professionals take care of their skis. He said that racers not only was their skis maniacally to ensure premium performance, but that they have their own technicians for the skis, and they have people who inspect the snow molecules to judge the firmness of the snow. Like any professional sport, professional skiers race at a level unknown to most high school and college teams.

"We try to do the best we can with our budget. Ken [Thoman, the head coach] has been great keeping the skis in shape all season," Pomeroy said.

In skiing, unlike most sports, the difference between first and last could be a few seconds. From the start of the race to the finish there is nothing but pressure. One bad turn could ruin a race, that is why the players need to be capable of handling the tense conditions.

"It's so mental," Pomeroy said, "you are training all season, you are doing all of this work, and you come to a race and in that race you have runs of 60 seconds each and you are not focused, and confident, and mentally prepared, you are not going to do well."

Late-season trip for UMass to Niagara

HOCKEY from page 10

Kevin Jarman scored the loan goal for UMass against BU last weekend. The Minutemen will try their luck against Niagara tomorrow.

sistent effort to his team this week.

"We're playing to win, and that's a big cry of mine, that we can't afford not to play to win," he said. "We don't need to spend another week feeling bad for ourselves. We need as much as we can get at the end of the year, a reward for our effort, so we need to work toward that."

The biggest fault line in the Minutemen's two-month slide has been the offense, which has averaged just 1.4 goals in the 12 games since the start of 2005, including a pair of shutouts and only two three-goal games. As a result, practices this week have focused on strengthening the attack before the conference schedule resumes next weekend with a season-ending home-and-home series against Northeastern.

"It goes beyond tactics," Cahoon said. "We've been working on skills, a lot of shooting drills, and getting people around the net, so they understand what they need to improve on. We've been on them about it. I keep a pretty even keel with these kids, but there's always emotion and there's always intensity in that area."

NOTE: Due to the UMass-Temple basketball game, which takes place at the same time tomorrow, the WRNX hockey broadcast will be played following the live basketball broadcast. Ted Baker will fill in for Donnie Moorhouse and Brock Hines behind the microphone.

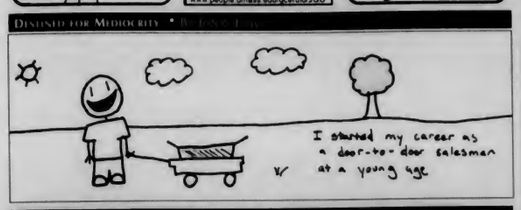
Over 50 shops, restaurants, and department stores!

Hampshire Mall
Route 9, Hadley
(413) 586-5700

NOW OPEN!
Dick's Sporting Goods • Best Buy
Target • JCPenney • Trader Joe's • CineMark Theatres
Ground Round • Bath & Body Works • Aeropostale
American Eagle Outfitters • Pacific Sunwear • Kay Jewelers

Open Mon-Sat 10am-9pm; Sun 11am-6pm • Online www.hampshiremall.com

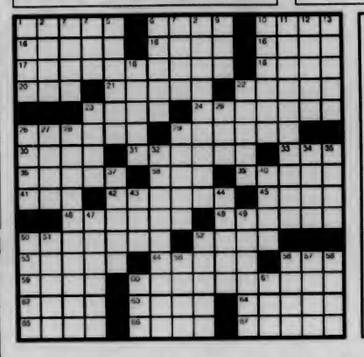
"HOT" Yoga
BIKRAM YOGA AMHERST
www.bikramyoga.com
665-yoga
The room is heated to open you...
The series is powerful to challenge you...
The yoga is BIKRAM to change you...
Designed for all levels, BIKRAM yoga will challenge you physically...focus you mentally..and allow you to relax on a very deep level.
TRY IT FOR 10 CONSECUTIVE DAYS FOR ONLY $20!!!
On Rt. 116 across from Cliffside Apts. Open 7 Days with generous student rates.



CINEMARK
CINEMARK AT HAMPSHIRE MALL
367 Russell St. 413-587-4233
Schedule for 2/25/05 - 3/3/05
Purchase Tickets Online @ cinemark.com
Focus & showtimes available at cinemark.com

WIN $10,000
QUALIFYING EVENT
THURSDAY, MAR. 3
6:00 PM
CURRY HICKS CAGE
FREE to STUDENTS
Free: Food, Drinks, t-shirts and more...

CO-ED CHAMPIONSHIP
SATURDAY, MAR. 5
2:00 PM
MULLINS CENTER
Win Airline Tickets!
Firestone GMAC Pontiac US Airways Caribbean XBOX
WWW.ATLANTIC10.ORG/SHOOTOUT
or visit the Intramural office for more details
Collegian FedEx Kinko's FUZE Spalding



ACROSS
1 Business bigwig
8 Fashion
10 Loafer or slipper
14 Rub out
15 Track shape
16 Spill the beans
17 Counter person
19 Finley
20 Entire amount
21 Meat cut
22 Do duty
23 Imitate Leo
24 Pistol case
26 Stonecutters
29 Woodland
30 Aware of
31 Become visible
33 Smash
36 Shallow-draft boat
38 ___ about time!
39 Lake
41 Erie Canal mule
42 Cavalryman
45 Reserve
46 Blast off
48 Limp
50 Board of painters
52 Pouty look
53 Blazing
54 Aegean
56 NYC arena
59 Davenport
60 Daughter of Demeter
62 Tallow base
63 Baroque master
64 German sub
65 Otherwise
66 Stick around
67 Hearth equipment

DOWN
1 Tableland
2 Spoken
3 Audacity
4 Employment
5 Practice session
6 Grinding tooth
7 Roasting place
8 Unexpected winner
9 Antlered grazer
10 Emphasize
11 Dreamboat
12 Popeye's gal
13 Senior
18 "Funny Farm" star
22 Wintry weather forecast
23 Cambrel or mansard, e.g.
25 OAS word
26 Racecar driver Sterling
27 "Dulna" singer Paul
28 Inanimate art
29 Retrieves
32 Pie choice
34 Groupie target
35 Small lad
37 Mozart's "The Magic ___"
40 French cleric
43 Social insect
44 River to the Gulf of Lions
47 Make bubbly
49 Production
50 Like yesterday's news
51 Run ___ of the law
52 Squishy
55 Killer whale
56 Bare buttocks
57 Unforeseen obstacle
58 Comes down with
60 Network of "News"
61 "The Sopranos" production co.

Find today's answers online
www.dailycollegian.com

SUBMIT COMICS
collegiancomics@yahoo.com

Amherst Hairstylists
Caren's Place
Stop putting your haircut off
Come in and get the attention you want!
Students always $17
shampoo & cut
We specialize in Multi-Color Highlight using three to four complementing and blending colors.
Free Haircolor consultation
Facial and Body waxing available
Walk-ins Welcome
Mon-Fri 10-6 253-1200
Sat 10-4 40 Main St.
Downtown Amherst
We check us we accept debit cards
$2 off haircut or 10% off Highlights (partial or full)
With this COUPON only
www.carensplace.com

H·O·R·O·S·C·O·P·E·S

aquarius • Jan. 20-Feb. 18
You are so photogenic. You should be on the cover of a magazine.

pisces • Feb. 19-Mar. 20
You should get a pet. Even just a rock will do.

aries • Mar. 21-April 19
Sometimes it is wise to take the advice of your elders.

taurus • April 20-May 20
Today you will finally be introduced to someone you've been wanting to meet.

gemini • May 21-June 21
Lots of excitement is in store for you this weekend.

cancer • June 22-July 22
You will watch a lot of movies this weekend. It's time that you got caught up.

leo • July 23-Aug. 22
This weekend, it's probably not a good idea to drink wine.

virgo • Aug. 23-Sept. 22
You need to start taking your work more seriously.

libra • Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Sometimes it's ok to use big words. There is a time and a place for everything.

scorpio • Oct. 23-Nov. 21
You need to stay far away from a computer screen for the next few days.

sagittarius • Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Today you don't have to work. Start planning the fun times for this weekend!

capricorn • Dec. 22-Jan. 19
You've had something on your mind lately. Maybe it's time to get it off your chest.

Quote of the Day

"Footfalls echo in the memory, down the passage which we did not take, towards the door we never opened, into the rose-garden."

—T. S. Eliot

Amherst Books
invites you to a talk & launch party for Chris Couch & Stephen Weiner authors of
The Will Eisner Companion
with special guest, Denis Kitchen
Saturday, February 26 2 p.m. 8 Main Street Amherst

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

Activities

Foam party Montreal weekends $89 Montreal Express.Net 1(781)979-9001

Announcements

$600 Group Fundraiser Scheduling Bonus 4 hours of your group's time PLUS our free (yes, free) fundraising solutions EQUALS $1,000-$2,000 in earnings for your group. Call TODAY for a $450 bonus when you schedule your non-sales fundraiser with CampusFundraiser. Contact CampusFundraiser, (888)923-3238, or visit www.campusfundraiser.com

Apartment for Rent

Center of town, 1, 2, 3 bedrooms; hardwood floors. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

Apartment for Rent

2 Bedroom $1050 3 Bedroom $1350 4 Bedroom $2100 Now Accepting Applications 253-7377 MillValleyEstates@winnco.com

Brandywine Apts. Now Leasing, 1&2 bedroom apts. Leases begin Jun, July, Aug or Sep. First come, first serve. Get them while they last www.brandywine-apts.com stop by or call 549-0600

1 Bedroom Available North Amherst $425 includes heat & electric bright clean washer/dryer in condo On bus route 1 mile to UMass female preferred Call Liz 508-367-8893

Spacious 2 Bedroom Apt. Heat/Hwatr Basic and extended cable. High speed internet included. Washer/dryer avail. Great location on Bus Route Minimal move-in costs. 665-3856

Apartment for Rent

Holbart Condos 3 bedroom, hardwood floors, study area in basement. Cable, telephone (internet access) in all bedrooms and study. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

Auto for Sale

Jeep '89 Rangler Good Condition $2250 582-9103 or 219-9011

Pontiac Sunbird 93 automatic 4 cyl excellent turquise ABS Bluebook Value $1400- $600 OBO Takes it. Call 253-0279

Employment

WHEN YOU GRADUATE Pick a place of beauty, personal freedom, economic opportunity to live, work. The Free State Project offers such a state. Check it out at freestateproject.org

Employment

Now Hiring On-Campus Representatives CampusFundraiser is hiring out-going students for on-campus spokesperson positions. $15 o $25 per hour plus bonuses. Modeling, acting or customer service experience helpful but not required. Visit http://www.campusfundraiser.com/crasp to apply.

SUMMER JOBS! Help new students get off to a good start. Peer advisors needed for Summer Orientation. Competitive salary. 20 hrs/week. Mid-May to mid-July. Applications in Pre-Major Advising 615 Goodell. Deadline April 19.

MAKE EXTRA CASH! Make your own hours! Sell T-Shirts to Sororities, Clubs & Groups & Make a commission on every sale. Guaranteed!!! Very Easy.

Employment

Bonus's too! 413-586-7133 OR print@sunrai-seinc.com

Earn some money! Rent us your ears! Listening experiments $8/hr 413-545-6837 phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu

Autism position in Belchertown. Language based home program using principles of ABA for 10 yr old boy with autism. Flexible shifts; mornings/days/evenings. Training provided. Requires commitment of 6 months or more. Car necessary. Call Heather at 413-323-5904 or e-mail hskawinski@charter.net EOE/AA

Make money taking online surveys earn $10 to $125 for surveys. Earn $25 to $250 for focus groups www.cashforstudents.com/umass

Employment

Nanny position for 2 boys ages 6 & 9. Perfect schedule for student. Part time Spring. Full time Summer. Prior experience necessary. 413-625-2288

Earn lots of $$ and have fun on the water this Spring & Summer. Raft guides needed at Crab Apple Whitewater in Charlemont, MA. Fun Summer job, no experience necessary. We will train. 413-625-2288.

Pets for Sale

Hand raised baby Guinea Pigs! Ready for new homes! Clean & Friendly. $20 Call Robin @ 253-6476.

Room for Rent

350 per month 413-335-5226

Services

Need help filling out immigration forms? Want advice on arranging documents for filing with INS? Contact the Student Legal Services Office at 545-1995 for help filling out immigration forms.

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth-control, and Emergency Contraception. Affordable and confidential. STI Screening and Treatment. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992.

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance 549-1906

Travel

XXX Night Montreal Weekends $89 Montreal Express.net 1(781)979-9001

Travel

One Bed and Studio (Four Queen Beds) at Deerpark one mile from Loon Mountain Available 3/11-3/18 Ken 335-9775

Spring Break 2005 Only 6 weeks left... Lowest Prices Biggest Parties Earn 2 Free Trips Exclusive with Sun Splash Tours www.sunsplashtours.com 1800-426-7710

Bahamas Spring Cruise 5 Days $299! Includes Meals, Celebrity Parties! Panama City, Daytona $159! Cancun, Jamaica, Acapulco, Nassau $499! Award Winning Company! SpringBreakTravel.com 1-800-678-6386

Collegian Advertising
Call 545-3500 or visit us in the Campus Center Basement 9-4.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS WEEKEND

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 2005

SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Jordan downs UMass with a three at buzzer

BY BRENDAN HALL
COLLEGIAN STAFF

On a night when the seniors were honored and their home season came to a close, the Massachusetts women's basketball team almost pulled off the unthinkable: upset the near-perfect No. 16 Temple Owls.

Owls senior Cynthia Jordan had just seven points — all in the second half — but it was her last three that did in the Minutewomen (13-13, 6-8 Atlantic 10), as her buzzer-beating three-pointer allowed the Owls (23-3, 15-0 A-10) to escape with a 66-63 win on senior night at the Mullins Center.

Temple	66
UMass	63

Temple now extends its winning streak to a school-record 20 games.

"I thought my team came out ready to play," coach Marnie Dacko said. "We looked at this game as an opportunity...outside of some fouls, and outside of some poor decisions on the press, we played a pretty good game of basketball."

With five seconds remaining, TU coach Dawn Staley called a timeout to set up one last play. When the teams reemerged onto the court for the inbound, forward Brooke Campbell was jumping up and down in Kameisha Hairston's face, making it difficult to get the ball into play.

Staley called another timeout, and the Owls came out this time in a different pattern. Hairston was able to get the ball off this time to Jordan, who in turn shot off the game-winner from the right wing as time expired, sealing the last-second victory and delaying UMass' hopes of securing their first winning season since 1998-99.

Katie Nelson was pulled from the starting lineup by coach Marnie Dacko last night, but she came in to score six points in the loss.

In what is now becoming almost routine, freshman Pam Rosario led all scorers on the night with 20 points to go along with three assists and two steals. But of course, Rosario would rather have the win.

"It was good to score all those points, but I'll take a win any day, no matter how many points I score," she said.

Campbell (17 points) and Tatham (10 points) also hit double figures for the Maroon and White. Dupree was Temple's high scorer with 16 to go with eight rebounds, accompanied by double-figure efforts from Hairston (14 points and a career-high nine steals) and Ari Moore (14 points, five rebounds, three steals).

In a surprising move, Dacko replaced forward Kate Mills with Idris Bailey and guard Katie Nelson with Monique Govan to start the game off. The switch worked wonders, as the Minutewomen scored the first eight points of the game to catch the Owls completely asleep.

Following an 11-3 run, the Minutewomen led TU by 10, the first time the Owls have trailed in a game since Jan. 30. The combination of Bailey, Mills and Tamara Tatham gave Dupree and company all they could handle, and UMass led by four going into the break.

When the teams reemerged, Staley switched her girls to a different kind of zone that they had used scarcely in games. The results of the switch, combined with key free throws down the stretch (17 in the second), speak for themselves.

The Minutewomen wrap up the regular season this Sunday, when they hope to maintain their first-round bye against the Rhode Island Rams (7-18, 5-9 A-10).

Minutemen set to play most crucial February game in years

BY MIKE MARZELLI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

It was once one of college basketball's most intense, entertaining and bitter rivalries, pitting the Atlantic 10's premier teams against each other twice a year in matchups that consistently carried significant postseason implications. Yet after nearly a half-decade worth of mediocrity on both ends, it has faded to little more than just another game on the conference schedule.

That will all change tomorrow, however, as the Liacouras Center in Philadelphia will play host to a crucial contest that has been long overdue: a game that will have a major impact on each team's chase for an Atlantic 10 championship and a postseason birth.

Massachusetts versus Temple, the Minutemen and the Owls, Maroon and White against Wild Cherry and Black: to the winner goes ultimate control over second place in the A-10 East. For UMass fans in the Pioneer Valley who have been longing for meaningful college hoop in February for some time now, it just wouldn't be right any other way.

Game on.

"It's definitely big for us," UMass coach Steve Lappas said. "To be able to move up to second place and control where we go for the rest of the way is exactly what we want, and we need to seize hold of the opportunity and take advantage of it.

"We know that we're getting better, and playing better as a team, and we need to continue that over into [tomorrow] to put ourselves in the best position we can."

One aspect of the rivalry that will be missing tomorrow is Owls Hall-of-Fame coach John Chaney. Chaney was involved in an incident Tuesday night in a loss to Saint Joseph's in which he inserted little-used 250-pound forward Nehemiah Ingram, whom he called his "goon," into the game for the sole purpose of roughing up Hawks players who he claimed were setting illegal screens.

Because of the incident,

UMass sophomore Art Bowers scored 18 points in the team's win over URI on Wednesday. The Minutemen will travel to Temple tomorrow.

See MEN'S HOOPS on page 8

Morris to lead UM lacrosse to Hofstra

BY JEFF HOWE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

It snowed only three days ago, students are still walking to class with heavy winter jackets on and the first round of tests of the spring semester are just getting underway.

Of course, that can only mean one thing.

Lacrosse is back.

Perhaps the best collegiate sport that no one knows about and the fastest game on turf kicks off tomorrow for the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team when it travels down to Shuart Stadium in Hempstead, N.Y. to do battle with Hofstra at 1 p.m.

The Minutemen are ranked 15th in the country after a mediocre 7-7 season last year, and the Pride are ranked 25th in the nation following a tough 4-10 campaign in 2004.

UMass appears to be stacked and is certainly full of players who are receiving national recognition.

Four players have been named preseason All-Americans, including junior defenseman Jack Reid (first team), junior attackman Sean Morris (third team), senior midfielder Chris Doyle (honorable mention) and senior defenseman Matt Garcia (honorable mention).

Morris was also named the ECAC Preseason Offensive Player of the Year in a vote done by the league's coaches.

Reid is one of 57 players on the preseason watch list for the Tewaaratan Trophy, which is lacrosse's version of football's Heisman Trophy.

With all of the individual accolades being handed out before a ball has even been picked up, one name was left off the list.

Jeff Zywicki, a redshirt senior attackman, was a Preseason Second Team All-America selection in 2004, but he injured his back during the first half of the first game of the season last year against North Carolina. The injury caused him to miss the entire season. His 41 goals, 21 assists and 62 points all lead the Minutemen in 2003.

The Maroon and White are led by coach Greg Cannella, who is in his 11th season at the coaching helm.

UMass has a 25-25-1 all time in season openers and also leads Hofstra in the teams' all-time series, 15-13, including a win in each of the last three meetings.

Last year, UMass staved off the Pride in Amherst, 6-5. Doyle scored a pair of goals, and goalie Bill Schell, who will start in net for the fourth straight year, held Hofstra scoreless in the fourth quarter and made 13 saves through the course of the game.

Several of the Minutemen, including Cannella, will be playing near their homes in Long Island for this game. Junior Bret Caretsky and his freshman brother P.J., sophomores Mike Gongas, Efosa Guobadia, Brian Iacovina David Von Voight and freshman Brian Danvers all hail from Long Island.

Cannella's father, John, founded the lacrosse program at Lynbrook High School where Greg played and was a All-America selection.

NOTE: Make sure to check out next Friday's Collegian to see the full men's lacrosse season preview, which will highlight Massachusetts' home opener against Yale on the following day at Garber Field.

Late-season trip to Niagara

BY ANDREW MERRITT
COLLEGIAN STAFF

With two weeks to go in the 2004-05 regular season, the Massachusetts hockey team plays somewhat of a scheduling rarity this weekend.

Though non-conference games are usually played early in the season, and almost never after Valentine's Day, the Minutemen travel to Buffalo, N.Y. Saturday to play Niagara (2 p.m., WRNX-1M 100.9 tape-delay).

UMass is 11-20-2 overall (5-15-2 Hockey East) and is on a four-game losing streak. Since the start of 2005, the Minutemen have won just one game, a 3-1 decision at Merrimack on Feb. 5. Other than the victory and a 2-2 tie with Maine at home on Jan. 14, UMass has lost 10 games in 2005, with six of those losses coming at home, where the Minutemen went 10-1 before the start of the new year.

Craig MacDonald and the Minutemen will wrap up their non-conference schedule against Niagara.

Of course, those home losses have little bearing on Saturday's trip, which is the third-longest voyage the Minutemen make this year, behind Alaska to start the season and Denver on Thanksgiving.

Saturday's brief departure from the Hockey East grind means a long road trip, a non-conference foe that UMass has classically fared well against, and just one game instead of the Friday-Saturday combo that the Minutemen have played almost exclusively in 2005.

The Minutemen have won both meetings of the two teams, most recently beating the Purple Eagles 4-0 on Dec. 28, 2001 at the Mullins Center. The two teams have agreed to meet again in two years, and this year's game came mostly to fill a scheduling hole created by an off-week in the conference slate.

"It fills our schedule," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "It's better for us as a team developing, if we have a game this weekend."

The Purple Eagles (13-16-2, 8-8-2 College Hockey America) are hardly just filler, though, and Cahoon has stressed the importance of a con-

See HOCKEY on page 8

Sortino's crew looks stacked for new year

BY DAN DEGGAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts softball team's season is underway. The Minutewomen have played one game this season, losing 8-0 to No. 23 Texas A&M in the Kajikawa Classic at Arizona State. UMass was scheduled to take on No. 1 California and other top opponents, but rain forced most of the tournament to be cancelled.

The Minutewomen are led by coach Elaine Sortino, who is in her 26th season at the helm in Amherst. Sortino, who is 10th among active Division I coaches with 858 career victories, was inducted into the National Fastpitch Coaches Association (NFCA) Hall of Fame on Dec. 4. She has been named the Atlantic 10 Coach of the Year seven times in her illustrious career.

The Minutewomen continue their challenging early season schedule this weekend as they travel to Columbus, Ga. to participate in the NFCA Classic. The Minutewomen will take on Georgia and Cal State Northridge on today and Nebraska on tomorrow. Bracket play will take place tomorrow and Sunday.

Sortino consistently schedules tough non-conference opponents, and this weekend will be a big test for UMass.

"We're going to play three teams that were in the tournament last year," Sortino said. "So obviously there is no mercy (in the schedule). This is the way we normally schedule at the beginning of our season. Obviously, as an at-large selection to the NCAA Tournament a year ago, our RPI is very important in terms of maintaining a posture nationally as a program. It's going to be tough, but we look forward to it."

The Minutewomen should be up to the challenge as they are coming off a 34-17 season in which they finished first in the A-10 for the 10th consecutive year. UMass was upset in the A-10 tournament, but received an at-large bid to the NCAA tournament.

UMass returns seven starters from last year's squad and is expected to have another strong season. The Minutewomen were picked to finish first in the A-10 in a preseason poll of conference coaches. UMass is also receiving

See SOFTBALL on page 7

Jeff Zywicki will play tomorrow in his first game since injuring his back during last year's season opener against North Carolina.

Sports Weekend Web Poll

Which NBA team benefited the most from its moves before the trading deadline?

1. Boston Celtics - Antoine Walker
2. Philadelphia 76ers - Chris Webber
3. Golden State Warriors - Baron Davis
4. Atlanta Hawks - Gary Payton

To Vote: visit DailyCollegian.com

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY • EST. 1890

The Daily Collegian

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 2005 — WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM — VOLUME CXIVIII ISSUE 88

Future medical students urged to gain experience caring for all types of people

BY DAN TERK
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Doctor Deborah Harmon Hines had one piece of advice for group of approximately 50 UMass students interested in attending the University of Massachusetts Medical School (UMMS): if you expect to succeed, medicine better be your passion.

As the Associate Vice Chancellor of School services at UMMS, as well a professor and a member of the admissions board, Hines conducts interviews with perspective students and is very well versed in what it takes to get into UMMS.

"Basically I'm an educator," Hines said. "At some point in your life you wake up and realize you have such a passion for something you can't live with out doing it."

Teaching is Hine's passion and she made it quite clear that medicine better be your passion or you will do poorly at medical school if you get in.

Hines stressed that medical schools look to for, "evidence that you have dealt with sick people you are not related too...you have no choice about who you take care of, you will take care of dirty people, smelly people, and people with all types of diseases."

Volunteer work is also a must for medical school, she said.

"Medicine is a service profession," Hines said. She related a story to the group about one applicant whose service activities for the year consisted of "walking for hunger" for three hours. This person was immediately written off. She suggested after that, students who want a shot at medical school try for two to three hours per week.

Hines said that volunteering in a hospital, nursing home or hospice is an excellent way to kill two birds with one stone, completing both your medical experience and service requirement.

Doctor Deborah Harmon Hines of the University of Massachusetts Medical School told interested medical students that they must be prepared to care for all types of patients, from dirty to diseased people.

The academic requirements probably came as no surprise to anyone. Hines spoke about "the eyeball test." If you do not have a GPA of 3.0 or higher, your application is immediately denied. Your major does not matter as long you take to required classes: a full year of biology/zoology, general chemistry, organic chemistry, and physics (a year of calculus is recommended).

Hines also noted that withdrawals and incompletes look bad if there are too many of them. If you cannot handle taking a full course load as an undergraduate, you will not survive in medical school, she said, adding that the workload "has been described as drinking water from a fire hydrant," due to the fact that the volume of work increases 100 percent.

Most of topics touched on by Hines are true for all medical schools, yet some were very specific to UMMS. First off you must be a Massachusetts resident to be accepted, meaning you must have graduated from a high school in Massachusetts or you must be a taxpaying resident for at least five years. Simply attending a college or university in the state is not enough.

The admissions process is not one sided either. Students are strongly encouraged to visit medical schools and see which ones they like, Dr. Hines compared it to buying a suit: you do not just look at the suit and buy it, you try it on to see how it fits and then decide.

The differences between medical schools are not academic; all accredited medical school in the United States and Canada are the same. The differences lie in the "culture" of the school.

Price is also a major factor in deciding what schools to apply to and in the end attend. There are four medical schools in Massachusetts: UMMS Tufts, Boston University, and Harvard. UMMS costs about $14,000 including tuition and fees. The other three are about $50,000. UMMS also will deduct two-thirds of the tuition, about $6,000, if you agree to practice medicine in Massachusetts after graduation. The average debt of a physician graduating from UMMS: $95,000; other schools: $300,000.

Another strong recommendation is that you spend some time doing something else after college and before medical school. According to Hines you need to be in tune with the real world citing the fact that the average age of the UMMS freshman class in 26.

Professionalism is key for the admissions process. Applicants will be interviewed and if they are not able to conduct themselves in a professional setting they will not be considered any further.

Hines suggested that students visit the Association of American Medical College's web site at www.AAMC.org and start looking over the American Medical College Application Service web site at www.AMCAS.org well before they actually plan to apply.

"The main message," Hines said, "is do your homework and be intentional."

Student leaders express concerns over Commission

BY BRIAN CASTRO
COLLEGIAN STAFF

As the Commission on Campus Diversity at the University of Massachusetts is about to release its report to Chancellor John V. Lombardi and UMass community, students are worried the administration won't follow up on the committee's recommendations.

"There are clear inadequacies with the administration dealing with diversity issues on this campus," said Uri Strauss, Graduate Student Senate President and Commission member.

Lombardi formed the 22-person committee in response to a sequence of events since he became Chancellor two and a half years ago.

The most notable incident is the "KKK-9" photos showing members of the Student Government Association posing next to a drawing of a student leader dressed as the grand wizard of the Ku Klux Klan.

The committee will also address minority enrollment at UMass. Currently, minority students make up 17 percent of 18,000 undergraduates.

However, there are criticisms that a commission was not needed because students already had set their demands on diversity issues.

"The fundamental problem is that students know exactly what they want and instead of meeting those demands we being put into this time consuming process (in which) the students' needs are presented into a three to five minute statement at a one time public forum," said Marisha Leiblum, a member of Take Back UMass. "We're jumping though hoops."

Another problem is the make up of the Commission.

"Many of the Commission members are part of the University administration and sit directly under the Vice Chancellor and are evaluating themselves," said Leiblum. "They are evaluating the same offices they work in."

Strauss and SGA President Eduardo Bustamante are the only student representatives on the board.

"Whoever picked the Commission did a good job about picking talented people on it, but I think there should've been more student representation," Strauss said.

Strauss said the Commission has been good at identifying areas, structure and polices in which the University is lacking in diversity issues and has make some solid recommendations.

On the Commission's recommendations, Strauss would only say that the Commission looked at admissions, policies and a broader enrollment policy, which include things like student retention and demographics.

"We considered things like minority faculty rates and retentions, the structure of the University. We got all kinds of suggestions including curriculum including support services that were restructured a few years ago," said Strauss.

Leiblum says the main problem behind the lack of diversity is that the administration has steadily cut funding for student support services that

See COMMISSION on page 2

Carnival celebrates independence of the Dominican Republic

BY MEGAN DALEY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

More than a century after the Dominican Republic declared its independence from Haiti, about 240 Five College students gathered in the Student Union Ballroom at the University of Massachusetts to eat, dance and learn a little about Dominican history at the 12th annual "El Carnaval" hosted by Casa Dominicana.

Attending students were treated to Dominican cuisine and music. Melissa Estrella, a Smith College student and medical sciences major, who said she was attending the event "to be with my people," thought that the food was "just the way my mom cooks."

Following dinner, Jackie Santos, Casa Dominicana's treasurer, gave a short speech about Dominican independence and encouraged students to always "celebrate the day that celebrates our freedom and desire for progress."

Elvis Menendez, also a member of Casa Dominicana, gave a brief history of El Carnaval, saying that too often people "devalue history" and that to celebrate as true Dominicans, people needed to "embrace history and our culture." Menendez explained that El Carnaval has long been a celebration in Europe, but that Dominicans had made changes to it in order to distinguish themselves from the Haitians from whom they had just gained their freedom.

El Carnaval has grown through the years, for example, said Menendez, and is "no longer an event just for the people." Important figures come from all over the country to celebrate with the masses, symbolizing the Dominicans' unity. The Dominican El Carnaval is a month-long celebration culminating in a parade.

"The festivities," Menendez said, "are a mixture of African customs and European traditions."

Another thing that makes El Carnaval de la Vega, the version of the celebration unique to the Dominican Republic, different is the figures who dance in the Carnaval parade. These figures include "the chicken thief" and "the devils."

Cayena, a Dominican folklore and dance team, did a performance demonstrating similar dances that one might see at El Carnaval parades. A group of women in feathered masks and grass skirts beat drums in time with the music and were soon joined by men in the devil masks to dance through the crowd of attending students.

"Los Diablos," said Estrella, "I feel like I'm back at home."

A skit about the importance of modern Dominicans remembering their history, entitled "The Car Ride," ended the set events for the evening; the rest of the night was devoted to dancing to Dominican music and learning the salsa, merengue and bachata.

Attending students, like Seth Rowell, a civil engineering major, said that "the food is delicious and the music is good."

"It's all pretty interesting."

See DANCE on page 2

State cuts spending on scholarships; Student fees rise up to 75 percent

BOSTON - The state has cut spending on grants and scholarships for college students by more than $20 million over the past five years, while enrollment increased and public colleges raised tuition and fees as much as 75 percent.

As a result, fewer needy students receive state aid, and many grants are smaller than in the past, financial aid administrators told the Boston Sunday Globe.

Spending on grants and scholarships fell 22 percent in five years, from $105 million in 2000 to $82 million this year. State support for Massachusetts' 29 public campuses, which more than 180,000 students attend, declined at a similar rate.

The five-year drop followed a period of growth in the 1990s, when spending on grants for Massachusetts students grew by $32 million, or 44 percent, from 1998 to 2000.

Gov. Mitt Romney has proposed a small increase in funding for state campuses next year, but no separate increase for financial aid. State legislative leaders predict another tight budget in 2006.

As state aid has fallen, tuition and fees have risen as campuses try to offset state budget cuts. Tuition and fees at the University of Massachusetts increased from $4,700 to $8,400 in the last five years, while state college charges grew from $3,000 to $4,600 and community colleges increased rates from $2,000 to about $3,300 per year.

The number of students systemwide at the state's public colleges grew 5 percent from 1998 to 2003, according to the state Board of Higher Education. The increase included a 12 percent rise at community colleges, which tend to serve more poor students.

"Whenever you have an increase in enrollment, you see an increase in financial need," said Clantha McCurdy, director of the state Office of Student Financial Assistance, which administers the grant programs.

State assistance, already a small portion of total financial aid to students in Massachusetts, has shrunk in proportion to other funding sources.

Across the UMass system, for example, 69 percent of all need-based aid to students was federally funded last year, while state aid declined to 12 percent of the total, down from 14 percent the previous year.

The state Board of Higher Education created a new standard for financial aid two years ago requiring the state's nine state colleges and 15 community colleges to meet the financial need of at least 85 percent of students who sought aid and met eligibility guidelines.

The new rule covers only direct costs, such as tuition, fees, and books. The rule doesn't guarantee help with the room-and-board charges, which make up roughly half the cost of college for many resident students.

Higher Education chancellor Judy Gill said the colleges have surpassed the standard, meeting 90 percent of students' direct need. UMass has met student need at similar levels in recent years.

—Associated Press

State aid for students at UMass has declined by 12 percent this year.

Bank of America loses customer data

BY PAUL NOWELL
ASSOCIATED PRESS

CHARLOTTE, N.C. — Bank of America Corp. has lost computer data tapes containing personal information on 1.2 million federal employees, including some members of the U.S. Senate.

The lost data includes Social Security numbers and account information that could make customers of a federal government charge card program vulnerable to identity theft.

Sen. Pat Leahy, D-Vt., is among those senators whose personal information is on the missing tapes, spokeswoman Tracy Schmaler said.

"There were some senators' Visa credit card accounts involved," Schmaler said. "We don't know how many, but he was one of them."

The bank issued an apology.

"We deeply regret this unfortunate incident," said Barbara Desoer, who is in charge of technology, service and fulfillment for the Charlotte-based bank. "The privacy of customer information receives the highest priority at Bank of America, and we take our responsibilities for safeguarding it very seriously."

Leahy has been a leader of calls this week for a Senate Judiciary Committee inquiry into whether more regulation of companies that buy and sell personal data is needed.

That came after the disclosure that ChoicePoint Inc., a data warehouser, had learned that as many as 140,000 consumers may have had their personal information compromised.

"I hope this latest incident at least will bring the issue closer to home so Congress will pay better attention to the rapid erosion of privacy rights that ordinary Americans are facing as more and more of their

See BANK on page 2

ARTS & LIVING
GONE MARTHA
Learn how to mimic home and living diva Martha Stewart
PAGE 7

EDITORIAL/OPINION
BUSH VS. PUTIN
The Bush Administration pushing for Democracy raises issues for Putin.
PAGE 5

WEATHER
TODAY Snow, H34°, L25°
TONIGHT Snow, H24°, L22°
TOMORROW Snow, H35°, L20°

SPORTS
SWEPT
UMass loses to Temple for the second time this season.
PAGE 8

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center
University of Massachusetts
Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Peter Foundas
MANAGING EDITOR Mike Martelli
BUSINESS MANAGER Rich Pacheco
PRODUCTION MANAGER Cory Rosenberg
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Meghan Healy
ADVERTISING MANAGER Tiffany Sugalski
EDITORIAL PRODUCTION Samantha M. Nielsen
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Michael Busack
COMICS EDITOR Alyson Zillmann
EDITORIAL EDITOR Yousef Munayyer
EDITORIAL EDITOR Allison Edles
NEWS EDITOR Erika Lovley
PHOTO EDITOR Alex Demosthene
SPORTS EDITOR Bob McGovern
CIRCULATION MANAGER Kristen Weiss
CLASSIFIED ADVERTISING Marty Pappas
DISTRIBUTION MANAGER Josh Kiggans
FINANCE MANAGER Hirak Shah
ACCOUNTING CLERK Virginie Frecaut
HUMAN RESOURCE Sandra Marquez
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Josh Greenberg
ASSISTANT BUSINESS Nathan Chomsky
ASSISTANT FINANCE Thomas Hecht
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Rachael Bruno
GRAPHICS ADVISER Charlie Higgins
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Matthew O'Rourke
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Chris Gazzara
ASSISTANT NEWS Julie O'Donnell
ASSISTANT NEWS Dan O'Brien
ASSISTANT PHOTO Megan Brinster
ASSISTANT SPORTS Jeff Howe

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS CALENDAR SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY FUNDED, OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS AGGIE LIFE, BECAME THE COLLEGE SIGNAL IN 1901, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1914 AND THE TRI-WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1956. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967. THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN BROADSHEET SINCE JANUARY 1994. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL WEEKDAYS BETWEEN 8:30 A.M. AND 3:30 P.M.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Mike Marzelli
PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Alex Demosthene
COPY EDITOR
Matt Elder
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Molly Eggleston
PRODUCTION STAFF
Kaitlin Rowe, Jameson Melbourne

Visit us online at:
www.dailycollegian.com

Bank customers may have identity stolen

BANK from page 1

personal and financial information is collected and sold on databases that too often have too few privacy protections," Leahy said in a statement Friday.

U.S. Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., said he was told the data backup tapes were likely stolen off of a commercial plane by baggage handlers in December.

"Whether it is identity theft, terrorism, or other theft, in this new complicated world baggage handlers should have background checks and more care should be taken for who is hired for these increasingly sensitive positions," he said.

Bank spokeswoman Eloise Hale called the system of shipping backup tapes "an industry practice and a routine bank practice. As a safety precaution measure, backup tapes are stored in different locations."

She declined to give any more details about where and how the tapes are moved around the country.

The missing tapes include information on federal employees who use Bank of America "smart pay" charge cards for travel and expenses, Hale said Friday.

She said federal law enforcement officials were notified as soon as the tapes were discovered missing.

Hopeful presidential candidates see future

COURTESY PHOTO

Republican Mike Huckabee

WASHINGTON — For governors thinking about running for the White House in 2008, a formal dinner with President Bush at 1600 Pennsylvania Ave. provides a glimpse of what the future could hold.

Even for those who dismiss — at least publicly — such talk.

"Presidential talk is way too speculative and way too early," said Republican Mitt Romney of Massachusetts. "Now is the time for policy and progress. Not presidential ambitions."

Presidential pageantry was to be on display Sunday night in the State Dining room as Bush and first lady Laura Bush welcome the governors, who are in town for their annual winter meetings.

Speculation already has started about the next White House race, less than four months after the election that narrowly sent Republican Bush to a second term.

"I'd be disingenuous to say, 'Oh, I don't like that kind of talk,'" said Republican Mike Huckabee of Arkansas, who awoke Sunday to find the newspaper outside his hotel room door mentioning him among possible 2008 candidates. "But I need to concentrate and focus on finishing my term as governor."

"My attitude is grow where you're planted," he said.

Pennsylvania Democrat Ed Rendell, former head of the Democratic National Committee, said he and many other governors cannot really pursue a White House bid if they want to be re-elected.

"If I went to New Hampshire, it would become an issue in my 2006 election," he said.

Other governors — Rendell singled out Democrats Bill Richardson of New Mexico, Tom Vilsack of Iowa and Mark Warner of Virginia — already are being closely examined by political donors because they either are term-limited or are so popular at home their re-election is secure.

—Associated Press

License bill may up surveillance

By Suzanne Gamboa
Associated Press

COURTESY MOTHERJONES.COM

A new license bill passed by the House may allow the government to monitor citizens through a chip hidden in their licenses.

WASHINGTON — A proposal to stop potential terrorists from getting a U.S. driver's license may turn the licenses into a national ID card or help the government track gun purchases, opponents fear.

Conservatives, civil libertarians, gun owners and others share such concerns about a House-passed bill that broadly rewrites the rules for licenses and is portrayed as an anti-terrorism tool.

They fear that licenses, like Social Security numbers, could be used for purposes well beyond their original intent.

These opponents say the measure, passed by a 261-161 vote last month and supported by the White House, even could make it possible for the government to monitor people's movements in the country through a chip in a license.

"Supporters of this don't seem to have the ability to look beyond how this system they are putting in place can change. They can't see how it can metamorphose into a national ID card," said Steve Lilienthal, director of the Free Congress Foundation Center for Privacy & Technology.

The House passed the legislation Feb. 10. Supporters promote the bill, which the Senate has yet to consider, as another way to fight terrorism.

Under the measure, states must verify they are giving licenses to U.S. citizens and legal residents. If they fail to do so, federal officers cannot accept licenses from residents of those states as proof of identity to get on an airplane or into a federal building, for example.

Lilienthal, whose think tank says it is politically and culturally conservative, asked what is there to stop the government from eventually requiring information about people's health, criminal backgrounds or gun ownership.

Larry Pratt, executive director of Springfield, Va.-based Gun Owners of America, says the bill "hands an open-ended blank check" to the government to collect information about people.

States can opt out of the requirements, but the bill would withhold money from states for driver's license improvements if they do.

The bill's sponsor, House Judiciary Committee Chairman Rep. James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., told colleagues that the minimum standards already are met by most states and are intended to prod those whose lax licensing checks are "a magnet for foreign terrorists, criminals, home grown identity thieves and illegal aliens."

The Sept. 11 commission urged Congress last year to make it harder for people to get a driver's license, noting that some of the Sept. 11 hijackers fraudulently obtained licenses that allowed them to board commercial flights.

Cultural dinner night keeps local Carribean spirit alive

DANCE from page 1

said Ednei Furtado, a sociology major.

Brenda Ramirez, a Smith College anthropology major, felt that this event was, "a great opportunity to be around and learn about Caribbean culture that is so different from the Latino culture of California, where I'm from. I've really learned a lot."

Juana Baez, the president of Casa Dominicana and a legal studies major, said that she was "just keeping the tradition going," by putting on this event.

"It's good to have a night of cultural dinner, people gathering together and learning about a culture they might not have known about," she said.

Vice-president Valerie Louis says that she feels that with this event Casa Dominicana, "has done a great job at informing the campus community about Dominican culture, while incorporating the Dominican experience with the UMass experience."

Sponsors and supporting organizers of the dance included the Office of Alana Affairs, Coca-Cola, Nelson Acosta, the Vice-chancellor of student affairs, Mario Teron, Jackie Santos, the Persian Student Association, Flava Unit, Pillon Restaurant, Phee Paradise, Chris Dixon, Lambda Alpha Upsilon, Inc. Interest Group, The Architeks, Amy Glynn and Paula Hodecker.

Comission to report tomorrow

COMMISION from page 1

support minorities, such as Committee for the Collegiate Education of Black and Other Minority Students and the Bilingual Collegiate Program.

"You don't see 50 percent cuts in the sciences; you don't see cuts in Commonwealth College or athletic programs," said Leiblum.

Strauss said student support agencies are being dismantled. He anticipates that in the next month another major restructuring of student affairs will further disempower them.

According to SGA senator Pavel Payano, nearly half of Hispanics attending UMass are below 2.0 GPA.

"Before these support programs got started, that was happening among the minority population here. After that you not only had more minorities going to UMass, but they were also staying here and graduating with good grades," said Payano.

The native of Lawrence, Mass. says UMass need to aggressively recruit students from urban communities.

The concern is whether the or not the public statements that have been issued to the commission by the wider UMass community will be adequately heard. The Chancellor made a verbal commitment to follow up on any of the committee's recommendations but that commitment has not been put in writing, according to Leiblum.

"The Chancellor has made an explicit commitment to implement all the recommendations the committee makes and if he does that we're off to a very good start. I'm looking forward to a positive change," said Strauss.

"The Commission has obtained considerable information pertaining to the status of diversity efforts at the University and factors that mitigate in full inclusion of all groups," said Commission Chair Orlando Taylor in a press release. "We will now focus on analysis, conclusions, and recommendations."

The Commission's final report will be presented in a public forum tomorrow.

THE ATLANTIC 10 SHOOTOUT
WIN $10,000
QUALIFYING EVENT
THURSDAY, MAR. 3
6:00 PM
CURRY HICKS CAGE
CO-ED CHAMPIONSHIP
SATURDAY, MAR. 5
2:00 PM
MULLINS CENTER
FREE to STUDENTS
Free:
Food, Drinks,
t-shirts
and more...
Age of Shaq
3 Divisions:
Male, Female
& Co-Ed
1 pm
Win Airline Tickets!
Firestone GMAC Pontiac US AIRWAYS Caribbean XBOX
WWW.ATLANTIC10.ORG/SHOOTOUT
or visit the Intramural office for more details
COLLEGIAN FuzeTV SPALDING

Natural, Healthy, and Smart!
Dr. Lee Kane
Chiropractic Physician
Participating provider for student insurance, GIC, automobile insurance & most others.
Amherst Family Chiropractic
Center for Natural Health
228 Triangle St • Amherst (next to Bertucci's)
549-1500

STUDENT LEGAL SERVICES OFFICE
UMASS, AMHERST
HELPING STUDENTS PROTECT THEIR RIGHTS FOR 30 YEARS
Free Legal Advice Referrals
Representation and Counseling for UMASS Students
Student & Workers Rights: Family & Criminal Law: Landlord/Tenant & Consumer Disputes
CALL 545-1995
or stop in at 922 Campus Center

UMASS Campus Recreation
STILL TIME TO ENTER:
Softball (M/W/C).....A.S.A.P.
Co-rec Soccer.....A.S.A.P.
Volleyball Special (C).....A.S.A.P.
OFFICIALS NEEDED:
Softball Clinics.....3/21, 3/23, 3/24
Co-rec Soccer Clinics.....3/21, 3/23, 3/24
Volleyball Special.....3/22
Call for clinic attendance requirements, times and locations.
More info: 215 Boyden, 5-2693
On The Web: www.umass.edu/umim

Pssst... Hey, Umass Seniors...
HOW WILL YOU REMEMBER THE GREATEST YEARS OF YOUR LIFE?
Take your senior yearbook pictures today!
Location: Campus Center
Senior Portrait Sitting Dates Are:
March 1 - March 4
April 4 - April 14
Go to www.ouryear.com and use school code 147 to schedule your appointment today!

Write for the Collegian. It beats doing nothing.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." -Voltaire

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 2005 EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Push for democracy, but be careful not to push too far

Matthew Reid

Last Thursday, United States President George W. Bush and Russian President Vladimir Putin met privately for over two hours in Slovakia. The two discussed, among other things, the state of democracy in Russia and the relationship between Washington and Moscow.

The two tried to appear as if they were old friends, smiling and waving to the media and calling each other by their first names. But watching the post-meeting press conference on television, I couldn't help but notice how tense each looked. It was clear that the relationship between two of the Great Eight superpowers was deteriorating.

Bush prodded Putin on Russia's "commitment to democracy," something he vowed to do to all world leaders in his inauguration speech last month. Some newspapers and T.V. news stations have labeled Bush the "Johnny Appleseed of democracy."

While Bush may have been right to question Putin's commitment to the almighty-democratic-way-of-doing-things, he must not let his mission of spreading democracy to all corners of the globe alienate a key G8 ally.

Putin insisted that his country was not backsliding on the subject. Russia has been democratic for well over a decade, and Putin agrees with Bush that things in Russia can never return to the way they once were.

That's all well and good, but Putin's actions would tend to disagree with his words.

For one thing, he is not exactly open to competition. One of the most important obligations of being a G8 member is to have a "commitment to multiparty democracy and openness to competitive forms of government." Meanwhile, Putin is constantly undermining and repressing his opposition, evidenced by his campaign against the privately-owned Yukos oil company, whose owner financed opposition parties.

Another area for concern is Russia's lack of a free press, also a G8 necessity. When Bush raised his concerns at the conference in Slovakia, most of the Russian reporters came to the defense of their president, claiming that the Kremlin's press corps, much like the Washington press corps, commonly criticizes Russia's government.

However, Bush argued that Russian reporters would naturally think their own country has free press. An article in the Feb. 24 New York Times pointed out that the Kremlin press pool is handpicked, comprised of men and women working for the state. They "ask" questions that will surely result in government-friendly responses, and can get their jobs taken away if their questions do not meet government standards.

While Bush may have been right to question Putin's commitment to the almighty-democratic-way-of-doing-things, he must not let his mission of spreading democracy to all corners of the globe alienate a key G8 ally.

Putin wants nothing more than to see his country admitted into the World Trade Organization, much in the same way Boris Yeltsin gained post-Soviet Russia admittance into the G8 alliance in 1998. Yeltsin needed to use words like "freedom" and, of course, "democracy" in order to win over the members of the then G7 alliance. Putin must do the same, and follow WTO standards if is to achieve Russian admittance. However, he has a couple of trumping cards of his own.

As Washington Post editorials pointed out last week, Putin and Bush agree that Iran can not become a nuclear power, yet Russia is in a perfect position to undermine the United States' efforts to prevent this from happening (Russia is currently building a nuclear power plant in Iran).

Russia also sells weapons and information on how to build weapons, to neighboring rogue regimes in numerous countries. For example, they sell arms to the nation of Syria.

Russia's unique position, both politically and geographically, can go a long way if the country chooses to undermine the G8's specific goal of "respecting the sovereignty of neighboring nations."

Putin could even make things more personal with Bush. At the recent meeting, he could have very easily thrown Bush's rhetoric back in his face. Ignoring the Geneva Convention? Locking terror suspects in a Guantánamo Bay prison without a fair trial? A Justice Department that validates torture? Putin could have easily mentioned these things when he had the chance. The fact that he didn't only proves that he is willing to play the game.

This being said, it is critical for Bush to walk a thin line when dealing with Putin. While I personally would want a less hypocritical man to lead the charge in creating friendlier, healthier relations with Russia, at least Bush is doing what he needs to do. Russia cannot be allowed to leave the G8, and certainly cannot be kicked out, as Sen. John McCain suggested yesterday (as a result of the Russia/Iran nuclear weapon situation).

Holding Putin to his commitment to democracy is essential. However, Bush and his contemporaries must not force Putin's square Russian peg into a round democratic hole. Finding middle ground is the key.

Russia is set to hold the G8 summit in 2006. What happens between now and then will go a long way in determining not only the future of American/Russian relations, but the future of the free world as well.

Matthew Reid is a Collegian editor.

Praise the Numa Numa guy

Allison Edles

We've all seen it. In fact, many of us have secretly danced to it in our rooms. Yes, I'm talking about the Numa Numa song, appropriately lip-synched to by a chubby 19-year-old named Gary Brolsma from Saddle Brook, New Jersey. This video, a short clip of Brolsma lip-synching to a Romanian pop song, Dragostea Din Tei, was filmed on his web cam and promptly posted on newgrounds.com back in December of 2004. Since then, it's been a hit and has been made mention of on many national television shows, from Good Morning America to VH1's Best Week Ever.

Now, obviously this is quite embarrassing for any young individual to endure. Dancing like that is only, and I mean only, done in the privacy of your own home in front of a mirror with the door closed and locked. And now, according to a New York Times article, Brolsma is feeling angry and mortifyingly embarrassed, as is understandable, and wants no part in the recent fame that has been coming his way. This is his 15 minutes of fame and he is flat-out rejecting it.

To Brolsma I will say this, bask in the glory that comes from being a temporary celebrity! Currently, he is more popular and has been around longer than many one-hit wonders that have graced the Billboard charts. I say, use this fame and enjoy it. Paris Hilton had a sex tape come out of the internet and look at how she milked that. Now, the Numa Numa video is hardly a sex tape, but it's certainly less shameful and degrading.

This video is beneficial on many levels, more so than just for Brolsma. First of all, it has introduced a new pop song to the masses, one that is catchy and different from what American audiences have been being fed. The group that sings it, O-zone, has no doubt enjoyed the massive broadcasting that their song has been receiving. Because of Brolsma's video, their fan base has no doubt increased, and so will their album sales, if they haven't done so already.

In addition, the video provides America with another self-made American Idol, similar to William Hung. Brolsma is the epitome of what an average American can relate to: lip-synching to songs in their room while dancing: an overweight male with some free time on his hands and being very internet/computer savvy. And while William Hung actually thought he was America's next sensational pop star, Brolsma doesn't. In fact, he seems to have banked on that in actually putting his video up on the internet.

To Brolsma I will say this, bask in the glory that comes from being a temporary celebrity! ... I say, use this fame and enjoy it. Paris Hilton had a sex tape come out of the internet and look at how she milked that.

Also, at least speaking from a college student's perspective (or any person with too much work and too little time), he has given us all a reason to slow down and take a break. Admit it, it's the perfect distraction. Imagine yourself slaving over a paper that you know you should have completed yesterday, which is due bright and early the next morning. The amount of stress is mounting because of the other course work that has been neglected because of this paper.

To help relieve the stress, you go and get a drink from a vending machine, and when you come back, a friend of yours has IMed you the link to this video. You click, watch and enjoy. After you viewed the video, you view it again. You have your laugh, bookmark it and go back to writing.

The process was quick, yet enjoyable. It proved to be the perfect break from the headache that comes from schoolwork overload. It allowed you, for one moment, to completely forget about Beatrice and Benedick's relationship in Shakespeare's Much Ado About Nothing and realize that you need a laugh every now and then in order to keep you sane.

The fact of the matter is that yes, it's very embarrassing. But Brolsma must know and be comforted in the fact that he is not alone. Sure, the fame may be slightly unwanted in the sense that it came about from an embarrassing act that wasn't originally meant to be seen by anyone more than close friends. However, it's here now. Embrace it. Milk it for all it's worth and move on.

Also, from watching the video clip, it only portrays Brolsma in a pleasant light. Countless people who have seen it and want to meet and even possibly befriend him. A side of his personality comes through in that video clip that is usually only seen once you've known someone for a good length of time. The fact that he can just put it out there is very admirable and is a quality that will serve him well throughout the years.

So, to the Numa Numa guy, I close with this: lap it up, because it could all be gone tomorrow.

Allison Edles is a Collegian editor.

College's seven deadly sins

Duncan Devlin

I have come to a realization concerning the seven deadly sins. You know them, that list of sins that will send us straight to hell and that many movie lovers associate with Brad Pitt and Morgan Freeman. I realized one morning that the point of creating the seven deadly sins was so that any college student can commit himself or herself to hell before even getting out of bed in the morning. Let me show you.

Sloth

Laziness. Have you ever woken up and thought to yourself, "I want to go back to sleep?" If so, then you are guilty of sloth. That is right; in the eyes of the church, you are a useless tub of lard, who has nothing better to do with his time than to lay in bed thinking about not getting up. That's one step down the staircase to hell, and if you are guilty of that one, I bet you hit the snooze button. That makes you guilty of...

Greed

You set that alarm for 8:30 am, and now it is 8:39 am. You are already two steps into hell, so go ahead, hit that button again. There is no need to worry about that shower, or breakfast, or that 9:30 am class. You want all of the sleep that you can get! Hog all of the covers while you're at it, and make sure that you turn off the alarm, if you ever get up. Most likely, you will go back to sleep, grumbling about the professor... oops...

Wrath

That's right. You just expressed that you do not like having an 8:00 am class, or complained about a boring professor, or have had one negative thought (and we are capable of many of these when faced with the unavoidable task of, "getting up.") Even worse is that your roommate is lying there, and he does not have to go to class until noon. Uh oh, that makes you guilty of...

Envy

How dare you be jealous of your roommate for having later, and easier, classes than you do. How dare you be jealous of that girl down the hall who gets a check from her parents every week, who takes 12 credits, is gorgeous, and has ten thousand friends. That laptop on your friend's desk has nothing on your Apple IIe you got on loan from the museum of modern history. Oh well, you have more important things to think about today. What are you going to wear?

Vanity

If you have ever thought that you do not want to look like a vagrant, or that you would like your appearance to project anything other than humility (or carpentry), then you are guilty of vanity. Rolling around in that bed, hitting that snooze button, and hating your professor, you just thought about clothing as anything other than utilitarian. Do they wear clothes in hell? Do they eat there? I wonder what the D.C. is serving for breakfast. I bet you could go for some...

Gluttony

Does food make you happy? Have you ever had a burger and really enjoyed it? Do you eat chocolate? Well, you are a glutton. That means that you will die, or bring hell upon yourself and others, all because you were hoping that they would be serving French Toast Sticks this morning. Now, don't you wish you were raised on dog food just so you could avoid hell? So, what's left?

Lust

Two young lovers wake up in each other's arms, and they have thoughts of hugging, or kissing, or maybe even saying, "I want you." Well, these lustful deviants have sealed their fates, and I imagine that at least one of them will be lining up near hell's little guillotine before this eternity is up.

So, before you go to bed at night, remember you will damn yourself to hell just for being a college student. Enjoy your sleep, and remember to wake up immediately when that alarm cracks your restful slumber. Do not dare press the snooze button. Love your professors and your roommate, dress like a carpenter. Remember that bread and water make a nutritious breakfast, and not answering that call for a sexual proposition may destroy your love life, but it will save your soul.

Duncan Devlin is a UMass student

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is currently accepting applications for assistant Ed/Op editor.

See Allison or Matt for more information.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

OUR TROOPS SUPPORT FREEDOM

COLUMNIST'S HYPOCRITICAL ACTIONS

In response to Mr. Naughton's opinion of the war in Iraq, I have to disagree with his opinion. However, guarantee of free speech is provided by the Constitution, so I must respect his ability to voice his opinion. That being said, Naughton has committed the very crime that infringes on his own ability to convey his opinions to the public when he admitted to ripping off the yellow ribbons placed on automobiles.

By doing so, he has become a hypocrite in regards to the freedom of speech. He is allowed to voice his opinion, so why can't people place yellow ribbons on their cars to voice their opinions? Mr. Naughton must respect the rights of free speech, especially since he himself has written for the Collegian on many different occasions.

What I find most amusing, however, is the fact that the Daily Collegian has a quote from Voltaire at the top of the page, yet Naughton's actions contradict that statement.

I was deployed to Iraq for 12 months. I have seen death and destruction, along with the courage of my comrades, and the friendship of the Iraqis. Once the bullets start flying overhead, once the IED's explode next to our Humvees, politics and personal opinions about the war and the administration go right out the window.

Mr. Naughton has admitted that he hasn't heard or spoken to his friend in Iraq since that soldier was deployed. I remember how scared I was the first time I went down there. However, my opinion changed as soon as I saw that I was not alone. I had the support of my very dear battle buddies throughout the war. Mr. Naughton should contact his friend and ask him how he is doing. Who knows what his friend will say? Maybe his opinion has changed.

Furthermore, many people who hang yellow ribbons have loved ones fighting in Iraq right now. Many of them hang the ribbons for lost sons, husbands, daughters, wives, brothers and sisters. The people hanging up those ribbons are merely honoring their loved ones who may have passed on. Would Mr. Naughton be so bold as to spit on a grave or coffin of a dead soldier? Because by tearing off those stickers, not only is he censoring the opinions of fellow Americans, he is slapping the faces of friends and families who have lost loved ones.

Mr. Naughton makes a lot of assumptions in his editorial, which I'll have to respect, since it is his very right to do so. So that being said, what are the first three letters in the word, assume?

Kendrick Lau
UMass student
Sgt. and war veteran of the United States Army.

NO RESPECT FOR OUR TROOPS

I read Thomas Naughton's piece in the Feb. 23 issue of the Collegian and was completely outraged and disgusted, but not surprised. The North East is a breeding ground for elitists who, for some reason, fail to step back and look at the big picture. Instead they are content to stand back and criticize situations and impose their biased views. UMass is no different.

People claim to be educated intellectuals, but day after day of sitting in class and talking to the people here, it is clear that UMass is full of ignorant, hypocritical morons. Naughton is a great example. He enjoys his first amendment right to spout off some hate-filled tirade in the paper but tries to take away others right to freedom of expression by tearing off a yellow ribbon. He says that he cannot bring himself to support the troops but he can hope his friend and families in harms way can return safely. Isn't that, in fact, supporting the troops?

I would like to find out what exactly Naughton stands for. He is against the war, but not doing anything about it except infringing upon others rights. He obviously has no respect for his fellow citizens and their views. He is cars to voice their opinions? Mr. Naughton must respect against supporting the men and women who are doing their job and protecting our nation and our rights. He is against President Bush, probably because it's the popular thing to do and that's what the media told him. Naughton talks about his friend but has made no effort to see how his friend is and to maybe brighten his friend's time in Iraq by writing to him because that would be supporting the war.

People like Naughton are exactly what are wrong with this country. He is an ignorant, close-minded person. I am proud of the service men and women who do their duty and protect our rights, the Iraqi people and us. People like Naughton, however, should be ashamed of themselves and offer an apology to all the troops and all the people who read the garbage that he penned. Be proud of our troops and all of the people who support them and God bless America!

Mark R. McNamara Jr.
UMass student

VIOLATION OF AMERICAN'S RIGHTS

I am writing this in response to Thomas Naughton's Feb. 23 column "No Yellow Ribbons Here," in which he brags about ripping off "Support the Troops" ribbons off of cars or wherever they may be. He excuses his (illegal) actions by claiming they are a way for him and his friends to alleviate the shame they feel over the war. Well Thomas, it does not surprise me that you don't support a war, which is being fought to liberate millions when you don't respect the freedoms of your own fellow citizens.

What you really should be ashamed of is not the war but yourself. Your column was an example of one freedom America holds dear, the freedom of expression. And as you sit in judgment of others, using this freedom to your own benefit, you are directly denying others theirs. I have a right to proudly display a "Support Our Troops" ribbon on my car. By ripping these magnets off and destroying private property you are infringing upon my rights.

Perhaps you think you are making a statement, but the only statement your words and actions are making to me with your immature act of rebellion is not that you should feel guilty over the war, but that you are guilty of violating the rights of others.

Erin Moreno
UMass student

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS LIVING

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 2005

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

RELEASING YOUR INNER MARTHA

BY ANDREA LORENZ
KANSAS CITY STAR

The craft diva is getting out of jail next week, and her new television shows start soon. We asked local craftspeople to come up with three easy projects, each costing no more than $20 at craft stores. You had your break, now it's time to get creative.

COURTESY MIKE RANDALL

Beaded Hair Ribbon

A simple way to add sass to your wardrobe is to add bead fringe to a scarf or ribbon. Karen Roark and Cindy Dahnke from Urban Arts + Crafts in Kansas City, Mo., (www.urbanart-sandcrafts.com) created a ribbon headband with beads that sway as you saunter. To get started, pick up the supplies below at a craft store. Beading needles are smaller than sewing needles, and bead string is stronger than ordinary thread. Choose the color and bead size you feel comfortable with. Dahnke suggests using smaller "seed beads," with a larger accent bead at the end of each strand. The accent beads will give the strands swingy, sassy weight.

WHAT YOU NEED:

Scissors
Red ribbon (1 1 yards long and 2[inches wide)
Sewing needle
Red thread
Waxed nylon bead string (about 3 yards)
Beading needle (size 10 to 13)
312 red seed beads
24 black accent beads
Ruler
What to do

Cut the ends of the ribbon at a slant. Hem both ends with sewing needle and thread. The hem is not necessary, but Dahnke says it hides the bead string as you add strands of beads across the ends of the ribbon.

Thread about a yard of bead string onto the bead needle. Pull needle through one side of the hem end; the knot should be hidden in the hem.

String 12 red seed beads onto the needle and pull close to the edge of the ribbon. String on one black accent bead and slide it next to the seed beads. Now, string on one more seed bead. This bead will serve as the "anchor." Do not pull it next to the others just yet.

Pull the needle back up through the beads (except the anchor bead), from the accent bead to the first seed bead, so the needle comes out at the edge of the ribbon (see photo). Pull the string tight while holding onto the anchor bead.

Make a small stitch in the ribbon right above the bead strand. Before you pull the stitch tight, knot the needle through the loop to make a slip knot to secure the strand.

Use the ruler to measure \inch along the hem from the first strand. Stick the needle horizontally through the hem to hide the thread and pull through toward the bottom of the hem at the \ inch mark. Begin stringing beads again. Continue making bead strands every \inch until you get to the end of the ribbon. You should end up with 12 strings of fringe. Make two knots above the last strand to secure the thread. Repeat process on the other end of the ribbon. Wear it like a headband with the ends tied at the nape of the neck, so beaded ends swing down the back.

Don't stop here! Add fringe to purses, coasters, napkin rings, placemats, scarves, ribbon necklaces, bookmarks, T-shirts, Capris , curtains, shawls, dresses, pillows, lampshades and anything else that would benefit from a little sass.

Fleece Blanket

Beads and knitting needles scare you? Here's a project you can try, no lessons required. Kids love making these no-sew blankets out of fleece. Give them to new parents as a baby blanket, or throw one on the sofa and snuggle. Once you start, better not put away the scissors. Mary Addadt of Addadi's Fabrics in Overland Park, Kan., warns fleece tie blankets are addictive. She shares how to get started.

WHAT YOU NEED:

2 pieces of fleece (1\ yard each for baby blanket, 11 yard for throw, 2 yards for bedspread)
Sharp scissors
Pins
Ruler
Choose two pieces of fleece in different colors or patterns. Trim the selvage (the edges).

Lay the blankets flat, one on top of the other. Pin the two sides together. If the sides don't line up, cut any excess material.

Cut 4-inch squares from the four corners. (Squares should be 3 inches for a baby blanket.) Measure and cut strips 1 inch wide and 3 to 4 inches long at each corner. Tie adjacent corner strips in a double knot to close the missing square chunks.

Cut strips that are 3 to 4 inches long and 1 inch wide around the edges of the blanket. Double knot each top strip to the strip underneath. Continue cutting and tying until all sides are complete.

If the fabric bunches up, pull slightly on the edges of the blanket to straighten them.

Felted Blanket

Make your knitting creations more modern: Try felting. Turning wool into felt is easy, as long as you have a washing machine or some quarters for the Laundromat. Plus, felting hides small mistakes in your stitches. Start with a knitted purse. Wendy Kim-Luellen, who works at Yarn Barn (www.yarnbarn-ks.com) in Lawrence, Kan., and Cindy Craig, manager of the Studio Knitting and Needlepoint (www.thestudioknc.com) in Kansas City, explain how to turn a knitted purse into a stylish fashion accessory.

WHAT YOU NEED:

A knitted purse
A washing machine
Hand dishwashing soap
What to do

1. Begin by knitting an oversized purse, longer in height than width. Because the purpose of felting is to shrink the wool, knit big with larger gauges and needles. Craig says because of the shape of the stitch, knitted items shrink more vertically than horizontally. Keep this in mind when experimenting with patterns.

2. Squirt a small amount of the dishwashing soap into the washing machine. Wash the garment in hot water in the cycle with the most agitation. If you want to keep the washing machine clean of wool fluff, use a garment bag or pillow case. Follow the hot water wash with a cold water rinse.

3. After the machine stops, take the purse out and look at two things: the stitches and the size. If you can no longer see the stitches, great, it's done. If you can still see the stitches, you might want to put it in for another cycle. First though, check the size. If you are making a garment to wear, try it on. Make sure it is big enough to withstand another round of shrinking.

4. Reshape and dry. To reshape, fill with plastic bags or apply pressure to flatten it while drying. Kim-Luellen likes to use scissors to remove the excess fuzz that gathered on the material, but she says some people like fuzz. If you like fuzz, keep the fuzz.

Don't stop here! Try felting socks, sweaters, blankets, scarves, bags, pillows. Anything you can knit, you can felt. Try knitting embellishments with synthetic novelty yarns in between the wool stitches, as shown on the purse in the photo. The synthetic fibers won't shrink as much as the wool, so the embellishments will stand out from the felt.

X-rated museum showcases controversial steamy art

By Stevenson Swanson
Chicago Tribune

NEW YORK — New York's newest museum is a discreet affair, the architectural equivalent of a plain brown wrapper.

The windows facing Fifth Avenue are opalescent to discourage peepers, and the entrance is around the corner on a side street, so museum visitors can slip in and out without attracting stares.

Tasteful lettering at knee-level reveals that behind these milk-white windows is a place devoted to the birds and bees. But this isn't a natural history museum. It's the Museum of Sex.

"Sex is wonderful, and it's here to stay," purrs a former stripper on the museum's audioguide. "I guarantee it."

Whether the Museum of Sex MoSex, as it has dubbed itself, is also here to stay is another question.

Claiming to be the first American museum devoted to the subject, MoSex is attempting to walk an almost impossibly fine line. It wants to present serious scholarship about what academics call the history of sexuality. That includes not just shifting attitudes about sex but also such related matters as prostitution, birth control, and AIDS, all of which are covered in the museum's first exhibition, which opened last month.

But the museum's narrow galleries also brim with photos and films of naked men and women in a variety of geometrically arresting postures.

"We're clearly an educational institution," said Daniel Gluck, MoSex's founder.

But, "we believe pornography is a form of popular culture, like Levi's or Coca-Cola," he added. "We want to take this material and give it its proper place."

Public opinion may be fiercely divided on what that place is, but the museum's opening exhibit leaves little room for doubt that the right location for a sex museum is New York. Called "NYC Sex: How New York City Transformed Sex in America," the exhibit recounts nearly 200 years of sex and scandal in the Big Apple, from the sensational 1836 ax murder of prostitute Helen Jewett to former Mayor Rudolph Giuliani's battles to shut down porn shops in Times Square.

"We tried to show how sexual subcultures formed and how New York became Sodom on the Hudson," said Gluck, 54, a former computer entrepreneur who spent more than four years bringing MoSex to fruition.

See SEX on page 5

COURTESY MUSEUMOFSEX.COM

The Museum of Sex was responsible for much controversy in New York City recently. Located on fifth avenue, the museum has grown popular for showcasing a variety of exhibits that have a sexual theme.

Art pays tribute to sexuality

SEX from page 4

Shortly after the completion of the Erie Canal in the 1820s made New York the major American port, the city acquired its reputation as Sin City, a place open to all sexual permutations.

One display case features an 1855 guide to New York's bordellos, intended for the city's "sporting gentlemen."

But the city has been more than a setting for the salacious. Important free-speech and women's rights struggles played out in the city's courtrooms and streets.

New York was the home not only of Margaret Sanger, who helped coin the phrase "birth control" and worked to make contraceptives more readily available, but also of her nemesis, Anthony Comstock, head of the New York Society for the Suppression of Vice, who deemed contraceptives obscene because he believed they would lead to promiscuity.

In 33 years of raiding art galleries, newsstands, and other businesses, Comstock compiled a store of obscene material that, as Loyola University Chicago historian Timothy Gilfoyle notes, probably would have been lost otherwise. Some of the items on display at MoSex are from the Comstock lode.

Still, does lust really run more rampant in New York than in other cities? What about San Francisco, home of the Summer of Love in 1967? Or Chicago, whose Everleigh Club was nationally famous as a high-class brothel at the turn of the last century? A Playboy bunny waitress outfit on display at MoSex serves as a reminder that Hugh Hefner's magazine is still published in Chicago.

New York beats them all, argues Gilfoyle, the author of a history of 19th Century prostitution in New York and a member of MoSex's academically heavy advisory board.

"It's in the nature of the city, being the center of so much population movement and the center of the media and entertainment industries, to play the role of changing the way the country thinks about sex," he said. "Examples like Margaret Sanger

COURTESY SEXTHESHOP.COM

The gift shop in New York City's Museum of Sex sells many different items including the first FDA approved glow-in-the-dark condom.

Gluck's request for non-profit status, saying that his idea made a mockery of the word "museum."

MoSex, which has drawn more than 12,000 visitors since it opened, is housed in a modest five-story building on an undistinguished stretch of Fifth Avenue near Madison Square.

Even before the museum opened, the Catholic League for Religious and Civil Rights, which sided with Giuliani in his battles over displays of art he deemed offensive at the Brooklyn Museum of Art, labeled it the "Museum of Smut," or "MoSmut."

But most of the museum's critics have charged that the exhibition is not racy enough, especially for the hefty $17 admission. "Boring," read one critique in the museum's comment book, predicting that MoSex would be "closed within the year."

Gluck understands the visitors point, but he defends the museum's decision to start with a relatively academic approach to its subject.

"We started with a historic exhibit to show what we mean by a museum of sex," he said. "In our concern not to be perceived as leaning toward the titillating or pornographic side, we erred on the other side. If that means we're not the most exciting place, so be it."

Top ten best records to hit the hip-hop world in 2004

1. "Why?" Jadakiss ft/ Anthony Hamilton

Nothing says power more than the ability to question. Why? Because Jadakiss asks all the right questions. Ranging from "the Terminator." Arnold Schwartzenegger winning the election in California, to the devastating aftermath of crack abuse, Jada leaves nothing unexposed. This is what hip-hop is about-challenging the norm and questioning its ideals. It also does not hurt to have a soulful hook.

2.Never Let Me Down Kanye West ft/ Jay-Z & J-Ivy

When Kanye made 11 to the Izzo, taking the Jackson 5 song "I want you back" and turning it into a rap anthem, Jay-Z became the king of New York. Three years later, Kanye introduced himself as a rapper, and Jay-Z was not going to let him down. The song, which features an unheard of two Jay-Z verses, rocks from beginning to end. The song never lets us down.

3. Ghetto Show Talib Kweli ft/ Common

Lyrically, Common and Talib Kweli have reached a pinnacle. Not only have they written great similes and metaphors, Jay-Z has mentioned them in the lyrics of his song titled "Moment of Clarity." Obviously, ball players and actors are not the only ones to know their lines. In this show, the two rappers create a beautiful picture of broke down palaces where "even whats bad becomes good/ status becomes stood." With a soothing beat and Anthony Hamilton's falsetto hook, "Ghetto Show" is the type of song, Jay-Z and others want to emulate.

4. Sunshine Mos Def

Critics may have had qualms with his first studio album in five years, but this song is masterful. Doctored by Kanye West with a melodic sample, Mos Def makes a song for all the "lovers, the leavers, the doubters, believers, the slayers, the quitters, rebel guerillas, the ghetto civilians." With great comparisons and use of the English language Mos Def may dabble in other genres of music, but the Black Dante can never escape the pleasures of hip-hop. Neither can we when a track like this is made.

5. Guns are Drawn The Roots

With a guitar riff, the tightest reggae band would die for, The Roots have pulled off another addictive song. The fourth track on "The Tipping Point" is a true follow up to "The Seed" for the album "Phrenology." It is lunky, and Black Thought knows exactly how to complement the beat. His verses are not mind-altering, but they are consistent, and what more can we ask for from hip-hop's greatest band.

6. Sunshine Twista ft/ Anthony Hamilton

Not only did Twista acquire 2004's Nate Dogg, he also sampled Bill Withers, and named his song "Sunshine." Reaching for a lovely song, Twista alludes to a day that Ice Cube could only dream about, when he wrote "It was a Good Day." For this track Twista slows down his rapid chatter that was made famous on "Slow Jamz." Everything may not be alright but just for today, Twista and company have found a lovely tune to complement a "loods day."

7. The Grind Date De La Soul

If you are going to be making solid hip-hop albums for fifteen years you have to work hard. And nobody on De La is slacking. In the title song of their seventh album — the first departure from their former label, Tommy Boy — the three elder spokesmen of hip hop go to work. They realize there is no time for Xbox or drug dealing, and all they want to do is reach their potential. With a playful beat, Posdnuous and Dave are able to give the track their best work.

8. Yellow Brick Road Eminem

Ever since Marshall Matthers hugged Elton John on stage, there has never been a better couple. Borrowing from his favorite gay singer, Eminem says goodbye to the yellow brick road. This is a road of racial slurs and violence. Eminem does not want to be misunderstood anymore, and also wants to repent for his sins. Even if you make not be able to take Eminem's actions seriously, you must respect his command of the English language. There is no word that he can't make rhyme, and if you doubt that, you can listen to him say it on the song.

9. Die Trying Cee-Lo Green

The horns are irresistible, the singing is exquisite, and the rapping measures up. Cee-Lo has found the perfect mixture of soul-funk and hip-hop that other rappers hoped they could one day die trying to match. Cee-Lo also identifies his insecurities, but believes he can do better. His albums may not sell well, but he will always try again, and let's hope he does.

10. American Way Nas ft/ Kelis

Hip-Hop's hottest couple shows their ability to talk about more than having sex in public, and they make one of the years' strongest political statements. Nas is angry about the state of his country, and will not let anyone accept what has happened. He attacks everybody in site, including John Kerry and Condoleezza Rice. With a great verse by his wife, Nas hopes America will listen and think about what has happened to the American way.

Nathan Rothstein is a Collegian correspondent

WRITE FOR ARTS.
545.1361

STSTRAVEL.COM
Join America's #1 Student Tour Operator
CANCUN
ACAPULCO
JAMAICA
BAHAMAS
FLORIDA
SPRING BREAK 2005
Sell Trips, Earn Cash & Travel Free
1-800-648-4849 / www.ststravel.com

Attention: Artists!
Arts Extension Service presents
Making Art • Making a Living
Four workshops that address the business of being an artist:

• MONEY for Artists	(ART 41)	March 1
• MARKETING for Artists	(ART 42)	March 8
• JOBS for Artists	(ART 44)	March 22
• LEGAL STUFF for Artists	(ART 40)	March 29

Information: www.UMassULearn.net
Register: 413-545-3653
Workshops are scheduled for Tuesdays in March (except the week of Spring break, March 15) in the Campus Center, at the University of Massachusetts from 4:30 - 6:30 p.m. Preregistration is required. For more information, please visit www.UMassULearn.net and look under Noncredit Art courses or call 413-545-2360. Arts Extension Service sponsors the series through support from the UMass Arts Council.
UMassAmherst Continuing Education
You Choose Your Future Your Way

JOHN H. SYKES COLLEGE BUSINESS
Enroll in The University of Tampa's MBA program and cancel winter.
It's 85 degrees and sunny in UT's MBA program.
✷ Tampa is the fastest growing job market in Florida
✷ Full-time MBA Day Program with quality reputation and challenging program design. Complete program in 16-24 months
✷ Seven concentrations: Accounting, Finance, Entrepreneurship, Information Systems Management, International Business, Management and Marketing
✷ Tuition advantage for out-of-state and international students
✷ Graduate assistantships for qualified full-time applicants. Includes tuition waiver and $1500 stipend each semester.
✷ Full-service university with personal attention from faculty and staff
✷ Accredited by AACSB International
For more information: (813) 258-7409
E-mail: mba@ut.edu
Apply online at mba.ut.edu
John H. Sykes College of Business
401 W Kennedy Blvd Tampa, FL 33606 1490
The University Of TAMPA

Let's Continue to Celebrate the Big Win!
New England Patriots
We Won Another Wager...
This time with Penn State!
• Amish Chicken Corn Chowder
• Oak Leaf Lettuce Salad and Baby Greens
• Pork Loin Steak
• Philadelphia Style Cheesecake
Thursday, March 3rd
5-8 pm in all DC's
DINING SERVICES
UMassAmherst

UM picks up first win

MEN'S LAX from page 8

Morris scored his third goal of the game with 3:33 left to play in the first half by darting past his defender behind the net, quickly turning around and launching a 10-yard shot past Hofstra goalie Matt Southard to make it a 6-4 game heading into the half.

Zywicki scored his first goal of the new season 1:51 into the second half when Gene Tundo found him from behind the net all alone to the left side of the net to push the lead to 7-4.

Brian Iacovina added his second goal of the game just two-and-a-half minutes later when he scampered around the left side of the net before finding enough room to bounce a shot past Southard to give the Minutemen a four-goal advantage.

UMass capped off its four-goal run just a little over five minutes later when Chris Doyle intercepted a pass on the UMass side of the field and sprinted 50 yards to the cage to beat Southard for his second goal of the contest, putting the Minutemen ahead 9-4.

Hofstra made some noise by scoring two goals in a 58-second span in the fourth quarter to make it a 10-7 game, but the Pride could never make it any closer.

